THE QUIVER.

AN AMICABLE ARRANGEMENT.

BY ANNIE S. SWAN.

CHAPTER I.

ON a summer's evening two figures were pacing slowly to and fro a country lane, and too deeply engrossed in conversation to be observant of the beauty of their surroundings. It was an old-fashioned lane, leading from the back grounds of an old-fashioned mansion-house by a circuitous route into the small market-town of Silchester. The month was June, and every hedgerow was white with may, while lilac and laburnum hung in fragrant clusters over the high wall which enclosed the Priory grounds. The meadows were clothed with the waving hay harvest, and every green bank was carpeted with wild flowers. The old house in the lane stood on a slight eminence which commanded a view of the town, over which there hung a haze left by the smoke and heat of the day. Silchester was a small town, but a busy and populous one. Its deep and winding river turned the wheels of more than one factory. Conspicuous among the tall chimney-stacks was one rising from a perfect beehive of works. It pertained to the old-established firm of Vance, Vance and Company. The big house in the lane was the residence of Mr. Joshua Vance, one of the magnates of Silchester. The other Vance was dead, and his widow, while living abroad, still retained a share in the business.

The two figures were pacing up and down the lane very leisurely, the girl with her hand over the young man's arm, just in the old approved fashion. They were lovers, of course, and a handsome, well-matched pair. We may look with interest at the young lady, she being Mr. Vance's only daughter, and the greatest heiress in Silchester. She was a slender, graceful girl, with a fair face and a mass of light golden hair: a pretty girl too, with a certain style and haughtiness about her. Miss Vance of the Priory was a person of no mean importance in Silchester, and she knew it. She could be wholly sweet when she liked, but she could also be cold, reserved, and unamiable when it suited her. Miss Vance was sometimes capricious. She had never had a whim crossed nor a desire unfulfilled in her life—not the best development for the character of any woman. Clara Vance required a softening touch to her nature. She was altogether too imperious and exacting. Even her lover was struck and saddened at times by her selfishness. It was accounted an extraordinary piece of luck in Silchester for young Carew to have won the proud and rich Miss Vance. He was a young and struggling lawyer, with whom cases were none too plentiful. He was of poor extraction too, his father having been nothing but a manager at Vance's. The announcement of their engagement took Silchester by storm. Even had Miss Vance been less proud, there was her father, one of the most unapproachable and ambitious men in the county. How had he ever given his consent? The answer is simple. Mr. Vance idolised his daughter; her slightest whim had ever been his law. Then young Carew had a good appearance and a winning personality. It was impossible to resist him; therefore he became the affianced of Clara Vance. I am not sure that his position was one for unmixed envy. He was received at the Priory as an accepted lover, but he was always uncomfortably conscious that he was the recipient of a great many favours. Mr. Vance was kind, but condescending, Clara capricious, exacting, boastful of her charms, her influence, and her fortune. Graham Carew, though gentle and unassuming, keenly felt his position. There were, indeed, times when he almost regretted the step he had taken. It was improbable that he could ever hope to offer Miss Vance a fortune equal to her own, and he felt that these were the only terms on which a man could be thoroughly at his ease and happy at the Priory. There were other times, however, when he forgot these drawbacks, when he felt that he really loved Clara, and knew no shadow on his happiness. It was not on this June night, however. Perhaps the hot weather tried her, but she was particularly cross and out of sorts.

"How stupid you are, Graham!" she said petulantly. "You have not said one agreeable or entertaining thing to-night. I am sick of this lane. Let us go back to the garden."

"You were sick of the garden a minute ago, Clara. You are difficult to please," said Carew, a trifle absently. He was thinking of something else, and she was quick enough to note his listlessness and to resent it.

"You look insufferably bored, Mr. Carew," she said scornfully. "We both are; a pleasant prospect for the future, is it not? Pray, if you are sick of the Priory, don't put yourself to any trouble to come up. I daresay its inmates will survive your absence."

"If you would rather I stayed away, I can do so," returned Carew, rather meekly. He was by nature quiet and gentle, and never argued with his lady-love. To use an out-of-the-way but very expressive phrase, he was very much put upon in consequence. Had he taken a firmer stand, he would have found her much more amenable to reason.

"Are you going in, then?" he asked, holding open the garden gate. She swept through it, and up the narrow path through the shrubbery, with an air of offended dignity. Graham Carew was not a demonstrative lover by any means. The spoiled heiress missed in him much of the homage to which she felt herself entitled. Carew closed the gate and joined her as she emerged on to the wide and beautiful lawn which lay behind the fine old house.

"Do you know what I heard in Silchester to-day, Clara?" he said presently.

"No; how can I possibly know?" she answered coldly.

"I heard that Robert Gay had bought the Gryffe Mills, and that he intends to begin operations at once."

Miss Vance curled her haughty lips in amused scorn.

"Nonsense; the Gays are as poor as church mice—besides, papa would soon put a stop to that. The right to the river has always belonged to the Vances. But for that the Gryffe would have been sold long ago. If Robert Gay has bought it he is a fool, and the representatives of old Slade have woefully taken him in."

"Do you know Robert Gay, Clara?"

"No; the Gays are not in our set," she answered indifferently. "There is a sister, a dowdy thing: a kind of Dorcas or something in the town. Is she paid by any society to look after these low kind of people?"

Graham Carew winced. The tone of the remarks jarred upon him. "No. Miss Gay does a great deal of good, and spends a great deal, I know, only out of the kindness of her heart," he said, a trifle warmly. "Do you not consider her a pretty girl, Clara?"

"I oh, I never saw her. Lady de Lindley was speaking of her to me the other day," returned Miss Vance carelessly. "There is papa; shall we go in?"

"Presently. When are you coming to see my mother, Clara?"

"I don't know. Don't bore me, Graham."

"She often asks. It is natural she should wish to see you sometimes, and she is not able to go out."

"Your house is so poky and dull; but there, don't look so distressed. I'll come some day and pay the old lady a duty visit. Let us go in."

CHAPTER II.

IN Graham Carew's private room at his office in the Market Square, sat that gentleman and his future father-in-law the following afternoon. It was very warm, and the casement was wide for the wall, and the pleasant hum from the street came sounding through the stillness of the drowsy summer air. Market Square was only really noisy on market days, when the farmers stood about in groups beside their corn-sacks, while their wives and daughters shrilly bargained with the towns-folk for the produce of the dairy and the poultry-yard. Mr. Vance was very warm. He was a stout gentleman, with a large red face and a spotless expanse of white waistcoat, across which glittered a heavy watch-chain, adorned by sundry expensive seals and other trifles. Mr. Vance was not a particularly gentlemanly looking man, nor very prepossessing in his appearance. When he was angry he was very formidable. Graham Carew looked as if he were not particularly enjoying the interview.

"Young Gay is an upsetting puppy, and I'll fight him to the last farthing, if need be," fumed Mr. Vance. "Begin operations at the Gryffe, indeed! why, everybody knows it would have been sold long ago if they'd had the shadow of a right to the water. If the young idiot really intends to contest it, he'll find himself ruined; though, as far as that goes, I don't see how he can have anything to lose."

Graham Carew was silent a moment, pondering the thing in his mind. "He certainly intends to question your right to the water just below the bridge, Mr. Vance. Pardon the question, but how did absolute right to the river become yours? Is it only use and wont?"

Mr. Vance's face grew redder at the question.

"Use and wont! it's mine, I tell you, and was my father's before me. The Vance Mills have always had the right to that part of the river."

"Then how came it that the Gryffe was ever built at all? Why did you not prevent it?" asked the lawyer quietly.

"The ground wasn't ours, of course, only the right to the river. The man that built the Gryffe, a Bradford speculator, was ruined by it. He always talked of making a case of it, of wresting our rights from us, but he never did; I expect no respectable lawyer would take it up for him."

Graham Carew was silent a moment, looking absently out of the window. This case did not commend itself to him. His sympathies were entirely with Robert Gay.

"Is there not enough water in the river to work the other mills, Mr. Vance?"

Mr. Vance frowned.

"That isn't the question, Carew. Do you think I'm going to have that abominable Gryffe going on under the very shadow of my mills, taking the very bread out of my mouth?"

Graham Carew could hardly repress a smile.

"I should think there is not much fear of that. If I might presume to advise you, sir, I should say let the thing alone."

Mr. Vance started.

"I don't want your advice, Carew. I want you to do work for which you'll be paid, and handsomely too," he said, in his most offensive manner. "Young Gay has got to be interdicted from working the Gryffe, and if you won't fight the case for me, why, I suppose another will."

"Will you give me until to-morrow to look into this case, Mr. Vance?" asked Carew quietly. "I must tell you plainly that, so far as I understand it just now, I am afraid the successful issue would rest with Mr. Gay."

Mr. Vance rose haughtily to his feet. To say he was disgusted and annoyed scarcely expresses his state of mind. It did not please him that young Carew should have any opinion of his own, especially one opposed to his.

"Very well. You can make me aware of your decision. Don't imagine it is of the slightest consequence to me. I know very well Wynyard would do me more good, but I didn't want to put the job past you," he said stiffly. "But of course you understand that your decision decides also the relations between us. I cannot be expected to give my daughter and heiress to a man who as good as tells me I'm a rascal, for I suppose you mean that. I suppose it's your conscience that won't let you take up a case like mine. Keep your conscience, then, young man, and I'll keep my daughter."

So saying, Mr. Vance bowed stiffly, and strode pompously out of the office. Graham Carew smiled slightly, and then bent over his desk. He was troubled in mind, but he had work to do. Nevertheless, the question remained uppermost, distracting his attention, until he found himself compelled to stop the work he was at. He leaned back in his chair, and tried to think the matter out. He was not quite prepared to give Clara up, and yet of late his heart had whispered to him that that wild infatuation which had resulted in an engagement with her was quite a mistake. There was nothing in common between him and the Vances; at the Priory he was out of his element—even with Clara he felt sometimes as if he were acting a false part. Mr. Vance was a worldly man, if not an unscrupulous one in certain circumstances. Graham Carew was not only sure that his claim to the river would never stand the test of the law, but he felt that selfishness and unrighteous greed were the millowner's motives. Robert Gay was his dear friend, a young man whom everybody in Silchester loved and honoured beyond his fellows. But for Graham to refuse to conduct Mr. Vance's case meant standing in his own light, for that magnate's countenance would be entirely removed from him, and his influence in the town was very considerable. Wynyard the attorney would gladly and thankfully take up the work, Graham knew, because he was not in the least troubled with qualms of conscience. Graham Carew had a high principle; he had resolved that in his professional life he would have nothing to do with any wrong or questionable dealing, and he knew that to fight Mr. Vance's case would be to fight his own conscience. And yet he was a young, struggling, comparatively unknown practitioner; he had much to lose. It was a hard struggle, a difficult question to decide. He rose at length with a quick, troubled sigh, took down his hat, and went out of doors. It was his mother's afternoon tea hour, and he felt that he would like to see her for a moment. The house which Miss Vance had designated as poky and stuffy was a small cottage standing back in an old-fashioned garden at the head of the High Street. It was certainly small, but it was cheerful and homely; there were some in Silchester who thought Mrs. Carew's sitting-room the pleasantest place in the world. She was a widow and an invalid, but one of those bright, sunny natures whom no amount of care or trouble can make gloomy or sad. She was sitting among her flowers in the low window with her tea-table beside her, books and papers on the ottoman, and her work in her frail, fair hands. She looked up with a sweet, bright smile when her son entered. It was not often she had his company to tea.

"Come, my boy, this is an unlooked-for pleasure! Tea is just in. Do let me give you a cup. I don't often have the pleasure."

"If I wasn't uncommonly bothered, mother, I shouldn't be here to-day," he said, as he poured out his mother's tea, and waited on her with all the gentleness and deftness of a woman. She looked anxious and sympathetic, and in a few minutes the whole story of her boy's perplexity was laid before her.

"I don't think you need have much hesitation in deciding, Graham," she said quietly. "If there is a doubt in your mind about it, I think it is decided for you. So far as I can judge, Mr. Vance cannot advance a righteous claim."

"I am sure of that; but there is Clara, and other things, mother. Mr. Vance will not be a pleasant enemy."

"Enemy! why should he be your enemy? How many in Silchester will believe anything bad of you?" asked the fond mother proudly. "And so long as you do not fight on the other side, Mr. Vance cannot have a word to say."

"You do not know him, mother, as I do," he answered, and then, as a light footstep sounded in the garden path, he looked up with a smile. "Why, here is Miss Gay."

"Don't let me frighten you away," said a pleasant young voice in the doorway. "Mrs. Carew, I will make a clean confession. It is not to see you, but to ask a cup of tea, I have come. I am so tired."

"You are welcome, whatever brings you, my dear," was the invalid's hearty response, as the graceful figure in grey stole up to her side. As Graham Carew looked, he could not but be struck by the quiet womanly charm about her. Perhaps she was not pretty, certainly she had neither style nor dignity, but she was a sweet, fresh-faced English girl, about whom there was no nonsense nor affectation. Mary Gay would never shine in society nor create a sensation in a crowd, but at home she was perfect; there was no womanly attribute she did not possess. Graham Carew lingered long over that pleasant tea-drinking, and when he went back to his office, the memory of Mary Gay's sweet face and quiet voice was curiously uppermost in his mind.

CHAPTER III.

NEXT morning Mr. Vance was called away to Manchester on urgent business, which would detain him for a day or two, consequently there was a respite for Graham Carew. He had time to ponder the matter over and over in his mind, but his decision remained unaltered. His mother's words, "If there is a doubt in your mind, I think it is decided for you," had really settled the thing, and he had faced all the possibilities which a breach with the Priory might involve for him. He did not go to see Clara in her father's absence, and that young lady, wondering perhaps what had become of him, took a walk up to Poplar Cottage on the afternoon of the second day of her father's absence. She found Mrs. Carew alone. The old lady looked up a trifle nervously at her entrance, and her colour heightened. Nevertheless, she had a kind smile and a warm welcome for her, though she did not quite understand the visit, and was not sure how matters stood between Graham and the heiress. Miss Vance did not kiss Mrs. Carew, but shook hands cordially enough, and threw herself into a low chair opposite to her, and drew off her gloves, languidly letting them fall to the floor. Then she took off her white-plumed hat, laid it on her knee, and leaned back with an air of weariness.

"Oh dear! it is so insufferably hot!" she said, fanning her face with her lace handkerchief. Mrs. Carew had nothing to say. She did not feel at home or at ease with Miss Vance.

"Did you walk up, my dear?" she asked kindly.

"Oh dear no. Kirby drove me, but I told him not to wait nor come back—that I should walk down in the cool of the evening. Are you feeling any stronger, Mrs. Carew?"

"I? oh no, much the same. There is seldom any change, dear," returned the invalid pleasantly. "The heat and the sunshine are very grateful to me. I grudge the summer passing, Clara."

"Ah, I daresay it must be rather dull here in the winter time," said Miss Vance, glancing rather suggestively round the little room.

Then there was a short silence.

"Is your father well, my dear?" asked Mrs. Carew then.

"Oh, yes, thanks, quite well. He is from home, you know. But I think he will be back to-morrow."

"You will be glad of that. Will you ring the bell, please? and Kitty will show you up-stairs to lay aside your hat, then we can have tea. Shall I send a message to Graham, dear, to tell him you are here?"

"Oh dear no; I have come to see you to-day, and I shall not mind going up-stairs, thank you."

"Well, Graham comes in to dinner at five, so we will just have a cosy cup of tea and a chat before he comes. It is so long since I saw you."

"Yes, I ought to be ashamed; but really, Mrs. Carew, one's engagements are so many. I am going to Scarborough next week to spend a few days with Lady de Lindley. They are at the Hawk's Nest just now."

"Indeed!"

Mrs. Carew spoke quietly, and did not seem at all impressed. Presently Kitty brought in the tea, and they chatted about all sorts of indifferent matters, but neither alluded in the most distant manner to the Gryffe question. The fact, however, that it was uppermost in both their minds, caused a little constraint to creep into their conversation. The time seemed long till five o'clock, but the hour passed and Graham did not come. About half-past five the office boy came down with a message from his master to the effect that he had gone up to Bradford by the five-fifteen train, and would not be down till eight.

"That is a disappointment, my dear, but if you could wait it would not be too late to walk down. Suppose you and I eat Graham's dinner for him?" said Mrs. Carew.

"I don't mind about dinner, thank you. We dine at eight, you know," said Miss Vance. "But as I don't know when I can be back, I shall stay a little longer. Let me do that stitch for you, Mrs. Carew. I like having something in my hands."

She took up the dainty piece of fancy work as she spoke, and began to put in an idle stitch or two.

"Has Graham told you anything about the Gryffe affair?" she asked, after a moment.

"He spoke to me about it," answered Mrs. Carew, and the nervous colour rose a little in her cheek again.

"Don't you think it's absurd of that Robert Gay to think of setting up in opposition to papa? Somebody ought really to give him sound advice. If he goes to law with it, papa and Graham will ruin him."

"I don't know what to say about it, my dear," said Mrs. Carew in a low voice.

"Do you know Robert Gay, Mrs. Carew?"

"Very well. His mother was my dear friend when we were girls. She was a March of March Court, you know, when I was at home at the Rectory at Main March."

Miss Vance elevated her eyebrows. "Indeed! I thought they were quite common people. Lady de Lindley led me to believe so when she spoke of them."

A slight smile touched Mrs. Carew's lips at this speech.

"When Lady Lindley was at Main March, the Marches did not visit her, my dear," she answered quietly. Miss Vance looked slightly put out.

"What kind of a man is he? I have never seen him, Mrs. Carew."

"I consider Robert Gay a very handsome man. He is very like his mother, and Emily March was a beauty once. But, my dear, I need not enlarge, because here he comes down the street; and, yes! he is coming in here!"

having done no wrong, and his only feeling at the moment was intense and sincere admiration for the lovely woman before him.

"Is Graham not in, Mrs. Carew? I wished particularly to see him," he said, in his easy, pleasant way.

"Graham has gone up to Bradford on business, I think. Johnny came down with that message a little while ago. He will be down at eight-fifteen. Is Mary well to-day?"

"The two were pacing up and down the lane very leisurely."—p. 1.

Miss Vance suddenly sat up, and looked very dignified and haughty. She looked lovely, too, in her cool white dress, with her heightened colour, and the golden locks straying a little on her brow. Then Robert Gay entered the room. Mrs. Carew felt very nervous, but she introduced them calmly to each other. As Miss Vance rather distantly acknowledged Robert Gay's salutation, she could not but admit that he was a very handsome man. He was tall, and carried a fine, well-made figure with a manly grace. His face was rather dark in hue, and while the features were strongly marked, the keen, pleasant grey eyes, and the sweet, kind mouth, relieved it from sternness. He did not feel at all embarrassed at meeting with Miss Vance. He was conscious of "Quite well, thanks.—We are having lovely weather even for August, Miss Vance."

"Yes."

Miss Vance answered briefly enough, and kept her eyes fixed on the work she had again taken up. She felt unspeakably drawn to Robert Gay, but she imagined it behoved her to be very distant in her manner towards him. But he was so very different from what she had expected.

A half-hour passed very pleasantly in the little drawing-room. Robert Gay could talk well on most subjects, and his manner was singularly winning. His manliness and quiet self-possession commended it to Miss Vance; there were times when she had wished Graham Carew less subservient to her will.

She could not help comparing the two. Robert Gay, she felt sure, could love a woman very truly and unselfishly, but he would never step down from his own dignity, nor allow even the woman he loved to make a toy of him.

"I really must go now, Mrs. Carew; it is past seven," she cried, springing up at length.

"So must I. If you are walking home, Miss Vance, and will allow me, I will walk with you. I have a man to see in the Mile End Walk," said Robert Gay in that easy way of his.

Miss Vance did not demur. So Silchester was electrified that evening by the sight of Robert Gay, and Mr. Vance's daughter walking side by side through the town, and looking as if they quite enjoyed it, too.

CHAPTER IV.

"WHERE 's Miss Clara? Tell her I want to speak to her, and be quick about it, girl!"

So said Mr. Vance in his loudest, most peremptory tones, meeting a housemaid in the hall at the Priory as he entered it one afternoon, a day or two later.

"I am here, papa; what is it?"

Clara had heard the angry tones, and appeared at the library door, wondering what had happened to upset her father. He followed her into the room and shut the door. His face was very red, and his eye very terrible; but Miss Vance did not appear at all disconcerned.

The mill-hands dreaded the flashing eye of the master; not so his daughter.

"The man's an ass, a perfect fool, and will die in the workhouse, and serve him right too. I told him so," he fumed angrily, as he took a turn across the room.

"What man, papa?" asked Clara serenely, although she had a good guess as to whom he alluded.

"Carew, of course; who else could I mean? and I'll tell you what—he'll come no more here. You must be done with him, Clara."

"Why?" Still Miss Vance did not seem at all put out. She even smiled.

"Why! because he had the coolness to tell me to my face to-day he thought I hadn't right on my side in that Gryffe affair. His conscience, forsooth, won't allow him to act for me. I told him not to alarm himself, that I could get plenty to serve me without injuring their precious consciences. I've put the thing in Wynyard's hands. And of course I've washed my hands of Carew, and so must you."

"Very well, papa. Shall I write to him to-day, and break our engagement?"

"You can write what you like. I broke the engagement, and I must say the fellow took it very coolly. It strikes me you never cared a straw about him, either. You should do better, any way. He was never a match for you, Clara," said Mr. Vance, with a return of his pompous way. He was quite pleased with his daughter's behaviour, but it rather surprised him. He had expected opposition, and had been prepared to act the stern parent. Graham Carew had given him a mortal offence.

Clara Vance wrote to Carew that night an exemplary little note, the very coolness of which told how very little her heart was engaged in the matter. The coquette had had her day of Graham Carew, and had grown tired of the chain which bound her. How much that evening walk along the Priory lane with Robert Gay had to do with it I cannot tell.

If Mr. Vance had guessed the current of his daughter's thoughts his surprise could only have equalled his indignation. The following day she went away to Scarborough to visit Lady de Lindley, and when she returned, litigation in the case of Vance v. Gay had commenced. Mr. Vance was in his element. He was by nature a trifle aggressive, and dearly loved a law-suit. It was his talk in-doors and out-of-doors; but in spite of Mr. Vance's position, it was astonishing how much public opinion was in favour of Robert Gay. On a certain evening early in September, Miss Vance happened to be in Silchester, and seeing the light in Mrs. Carew's drawing-room window, felt impelled to go to Poplar Cottage. She was feeling strangely out of sorts; her head was filled with a vague mist for which she could not account. She had never seen Graham since before their engagement was broken; perhaps she had a slight curiosity to know how it had affected him. She was shown directly into the room where Mrs. Carew sat, and, at sight of her, strange unwonted tears sprang to the eyes of the heiress. She had no mother, and somehow to-night her heart went out to the sweet invalid who bore her cross with such cheerful patience. She crossed the room, and kneeling down swiftly by the invalid's chair, leaned her head on the arm, and spoke in low, trembling tones. "Dear Mrs. Carew, forgive me coming; I have no right to come, but I felt so miserable I could not pass the door."

"My dear, you are as welcome as ever; why should you not come if you wish?" said Mrs. Carew, with all the old kindliness. Her hand touched the girl's shoulder gently, and Clara lifted grateful eyes to her face. Mrs. Carew thought at that moment that she had never seen a lovelier or more winning face. "How good you are! Oh, Mrs. Carew, I am so vexed about all this law-suit; I think everybody in the town looks coldly on us about it," she said in a low voice. "Will you tell me, please, how Graham is? Was—was he very much vexed?"

"My dear," said Mrs. Carew quietly, "I think you both made a mistake, and that you will be much happier as friends than you would have been as husband and wife."

So Clara learned that Graham had not been seriously cast down by the cancelling of their engagement; but, though her heart was not at all touched, it made her feel very forlorn.

"I am very sorry about this law-suit, Mrs. Carew," she said, after a little pause. "Will you think it very dreadful of me to say I think papa is quite wrong?"

"I cannot think the opinion I hold myself very dreadful, Clara," said Mrs. Carew, with a slight smile. "I am very sorry for the Gays. They cannot afford to lose any money, but Mr. Gay will fight the case now. He thinks it a matter of conscience."

"I should think he could be very determined," said Miss Carew thoughtfully.

"Yes; and yet he is the kindest and gentlest of men. His devotion to his sister is a very touching thing. But she is a sweet girl."

"She goes about among the poor, and that sort of thing, doesn't she?"

"Yes; nobody knows the good Mary Gay does in Silchester, Clara."

"Everybody seems to be of some use in the world but me," said Clara dismally, as she rose to go.

Mrs. Carew looked searchingly for a moment at the girl's beautiful face.

"My dear, have you ever thought what opportunities you have? If you are anxious to do something for the Master, you have not far to seek."

Miss Vance's face flushed.

"I would, if I knew how. I am tired of being so useless. Tell me what I could do, dear Mrs. Carew."

"You have a home influence, my dear; see that you use it lovingly and wisely. Who knows but that a word from you might end the Gryffe dispute?" said the invalid, with a swift, tender smile.

Clara smiled too, and bending down, kissed the pale cheek.

"Good-bye, dear Mrs. Carew, and thank you. Would you ask Graham not to think very hardly of me? I was never good enough for him. Tell him I honour him for being true to his own idea of right and wrong. You will be friends with me yet, I hope."

"Always, my dear; and you are welcome here at any time," returned Mrs. Carew warmly.

So they parted.

"There is the making of a good woman there," said the invalid to herself as she heard the outer door close on her visitor.

The moon was up when Miss Vance stepped out into the little garden, and just then a tall shadow fell across the gateway, and she started and blushed hotly, thinking she was face to face with Graham.

"Good-evening, Miss Vance. This is an unexpected pleasure."

It was Robert Gay who spoke, and it was impossible to mistake the satisfaction both face and voice expressed. Clara gave him her hand with a strange shyness, and after a moment's talk, Robert Gay opened the gate again, and they passed out together. Miss Vance did not demur. Her heart beat, and she knew that she felt happier walking the narrow streets with Robert Gay by her than she had ever been in the company of Graham Carew.

CHAPTER V.

"I DON'T know what Silchester will say, Mr. Gay," said Miss Vance, with a smile of amusement on her beautiful face. They had just passed the corner of the busy High Street, and Miss Vance saw the exchanging of glances among the loungers under the lamps.

"It matters very little to me what Silchester says," returned Robert Gay, with an answering smile.

"We ought to be enemies, I suppose," said Miss Vance frankly. "But I feel very friendly to you."

"Thank you." The words were brief, but they were earnestly spoken, and the man's honest eyes were fixed as earnestly on the sweet face by his side. Somehow Robert Gay felt much less interested than he used to be in the issue of the fight between himself and Mr. Vance.

"May I tell you, Mr. Gay, I am dreadfully sorry about that wretched Gryffe affair?" said Miss Vance softly. "Couldn't you settle it up amicably somehow? It is such a stupid thing to go to law at all, and it costs so much money."

"You are right. If I lose the case I shall be ruined," returned Robert Gay gravely.

"Have you ever seen papa?—I mean have you had any talk with him about it?"

"No; I am not personally acquainted with Mr. Vance."

Clara was silent a moment. Judging from her own experience, she felt sure that were her father to meet with Robert Gay, all his animosity would quickly fade away. But how could that be accomplished? A new interest had crept into the life of Clara Vance. Henceforth she had an aim in view—something to plan and work for. She would put an end to this quarrel between her father and Robert Gay.

"How nice Mrs. Carew is, Mr. Gay. Do you not think so?" she asked presently, changing the subject.

"Most certainly I do. She has been a mother to Mary and to me for many years."

"And she would have been to me had I allowed her. Do you know, Mr. Gay, I have been a very selfish, horrid girl all my days!"

Robert Gay smiled at this girlish confession. This sweet woman was not the Miss Vance whom he knew only by repute.

"May I ask you a question, Miss Vance?"

"As many as you like." Somehow these two felt on the footing of old friends.

"Are you engaged to Graham Carew?"

"I was, but I am not now," she returned in a low voice. "We both made a mistake, and we are both glad to be freed."

Robert Gay said nothing, but a deep and earnest satisfaction crept into his eyes. It was a case of love at first sight with Robert Gay. He had already told himself that no woman but this one should become his wife. But how was this to be accomplished? It was as great a problem in its way as the question Clara had asked herself concerning the Gryffe dispute. That walk to the Priory in the cool, dusky autumn night was dangerously sweet to both these young people, and they were sorry when it came to an end. They reached the Priory by the lane, of course; though it was a longer, it was a pleasanter way than along the high road to the lodge gates. They lingered at the old-fashioned gateway in the lane, and were thus standing when Mr. Vance, taking an evening stroll in the grounds, suddenly appeared from out the shadow of the trees.

"Is that you, Clara?"

"Yes, papa."

Clara's voice shook, not with fear, but with laughter. The comical side of the thing struck her,

"Who is this with you?" he asked, peering over the top of the gate.

"Good-evening, Mr. Vance."

Robert Gay gravely lifted his hat, and turned his face fully toward Mr. Vance, who, recognising him, was too much astonished to speak.

"Mr. Gay, papa," said Clara's ringing tone. "He has been good enough to escort me home from Mrs. Carew's. He may come in, I suppose, and chat a little with you?"

"Gay! Robert Gay! come in! Oh, certainly!" said Mr. Vance, rather incoherently, for he was quite taken aback. The effrontery of these young people subdued him altogether. He held open the gate, and when he heard Robert Gay's cheerful, easy tones he did not feel at all certain that there was any law-suit in hand. Clara had taken a daring step, but she did not regret it. In ten minutes her father and Robert Gay were sitting in the library discussing the Gryffe question in all its bearings. This was the opportunity for which Robert Gay had longed, but Mr. Vance had repeatedly refused to see him at the mill. Young Gay spent the evening at the Priory, and when he left it was under agreement to meet Mr. Vance in Wynyard's office next morning.

If his parting word and hand-clasp to Clara were very marked in their earnestness, it need not be very much wondered at. Love is a curious plant, which in sound soil takes sudden and permanent root.

"Her hand touched the girl's shoulder gently."— p. 6.

"What do you think of Robert Gay, papa?" asked Clara, seating herself on a stool at her father's feet, and looking up into his face with a most innocent and winning expression.

"Think of him! I think that you and Robert Gay, between you, are going to make an ass of me," said Mr. Vance grimly.

Clara laughed.

"And you won't go on with the law-suit, papa?" she said coaxingly. "Though the Gryffe were working to-morrow, papa, it would make no difference to us. And they are very poor. If he lost the case, he would be ruined; he told me so to-night."

"H'm, it seems to matter a good deal to you whether he is ruined or not. Have you thrown over Carew to take up with this penniless young fellow? I won't consent to it, Clara; though, I must admit, that of the two I should prefer Gay. He has plenty of courage and independence. You wouldn't pull him along in leading-strings, my lady."

Clara's face crimsoned, and she quickly changed the subject.

Next morning the interview took place in Wynyard's office, with the result that all proceedings in the law-suit were arrested. It was explained to the authorities that the parties had come to an amicable arrangement. Within the year the whole matter was made clear, when the owner of the Gryffe was married to Mr. Vance's heiress on the same day that witnessed the union of Graham Carew and Mary Gay. Of course a man could not very well continue a law-suit against his intended son-in-law, Silchester said; and those interested were all glad that the Gryffe dispute had ended in such an amicable arrangement.

"THE SEVEN LEAVES OF THE VINE."

THOUGHTS UPON THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF OUR LORD UPON THE CROSS.

BY THE RIGHT REVEREND WILLIAM ALEXANDER, D.D., D.C.L., LORD BISHOP OF DERRY AND RAPHOE.

I.—THE WORD OF HUMAN SUFFERING (St. John xix. 28):

"I THIRST."

[This word is the fifth in order; I have found it more convenient to begin with it. The meditations upon the other six words will not always follow in historical sequence.]

ALL who have been sick themselves, or who have been called upon to watch over the sick, know how much the least selfish patient is necessarily absorbed by self and by suffering. This in every case is, of course, a proof of human weakness. The great poet represents the Roman nerving himself for the assassination of Cæsar by calling to mind Cæsar's fever in Spain, when "the tongue that bade the Romans mark him" cried "as a sick girl, Give me some drink, Titinius!"*

In some cases sickness is accompanied by that peculiar irritation of the weak so well known as peevishness. The Scotch master of romance, in a once famous passage,† describes one who had borne in society for years the reputation of being a stately and courteous gentleman as screaming out reproaches against his gentle niece and her attendant because he himself had broken a tea-cup upon a table which was placed a little too far from him. God forbid that we should forget the marvellous power of sanctifying grace in sustaining the sick children of God. But when one reads anecdotes of the superhuman patience of the sick, one is sometimes tempted to think that the doctor and the nurse might have something more to say if they could be cited as witnesses.

Among the last words of Jesus bodily pain claims one only—the fifth in order, "I thirst!"‡ Let us consider what this word teaches of our Lord's manhood, of the history of His Passion, and of His character.

1. This fifth word teaches the reality of His bodily pain.

One school of modern spirituality seems to consider it a point of honour to depart from the general feeling of Christians in relation to this. He who knew no sin could not know sickness. But, as no sorrow was like His sorrow, so Christian feeling, the heart of Christendom, has held, not as an article of faith, but as an instinctive sentiment, that no suffering was like His suffering. And Scripture seems to fall in with this conception. One of the primary points of St. Paul's witness was, "how that the Christ is subject to suffering."*

It does not appear to be true reverence to minimise any part of Christ's sufferings. It has become fashionable to argue that the crucified thieves upon Calvary suffered more than the Redeemer. But the lower mental and moral organisation, even when the bodily system is stronger, suffers less, not more, than that which is more delicate and refined. The Chinese robber or rebel, dying of slow starvation, has been known to laugh and jeer day after day through the bars of his iron cage at the fierce mob which yelled at him. The exquisitely delicate and sensitive nature of our Lord's humanity may be included in the Psalmist's words as they are taken up by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews—"When He cometh into the world, He saith, A body hast Thou prepared for Me."†

After the agony in the garden; after the successive tribunals to which He had been dragged, from Annas to Caiaphas, from Caiaphas to Pilate, from Pilate to † Psalm xl. 6; Heb. x. 8.

Herod, from Herod back again to Pilate; after the mockery by the Jews, by the Roman soldiers, by Herod and his men-of-war; after the scourging by the tremendous Roman lash, stiffened with bone or steel; after the pressure of the crown of acanthus thorn; after the cramps which came with the terrible tension and rigidity of the position so long continued; after the parting with human love, and the dereliction continued through the sultry darkness for three long hours; after the slow exhaustion from the ebbing away of the drops of blood upon the dust of Golgotha, the raging thirst of crucifixion set in. The Saviour does not dwell upon His sufferings. From those white lips there drops just one word, summing up in itself all the physical suffering which He endured, "I thirst!"

Let us here note that there are two opposite extremes to be avoided by the Church, in teaching of the physical anguish which accompanied the crucifixion of Jesus.

1. The first is that of which travellers tell us in foreign countries.

A procession in the south of Spain, was described by one who witnessed it on a Good Friday some twenty years ago. It was a hard, cold night in March. The lights carried by the multitude showed wan against the sinking sun and the steel-blue sky. The figure of the Christ was carried in the dim square, nailed to the cross, scarcely lit by the flaring torches. But it could be seen that thin streams of real blood ran down over the livid face and white form.* Or we may turn to a widely circulated biography, that of the eloquent Dominican Father Burke. One Friday morning the novice found his preceptor, in the grey light of dawn, in a terrible intensity of prayer, as if half-dead, at the foot of a crucifix, the bare white wall splashed with blood from a whip which lay by his side. It becomes us to speak low and lovingly, in days when martyrdom is looked upon as a form of obstinacy, and self-sacrifice as a form of monomania; yet we may wish that someone could have come in and tenderly whispered to the devotee—"Who, His own self, bare our sins in His own body on the tree, by whose stripes" (the original words point to a blue, livid weal) "ye were healed."†

This form of sensationalism is like many others. This materialism may obscure the very sacrifice which it pictures or dramatises.

2. But much of the thought and feeling round us is at the opposite extreme.

Old expositors of St. John's writings tell us much of the Doketic heretics of the Apostle's time. Taking their start from the essential evil of matter, they denied the reality of our Lord's body, of the flesh of Christ. The Christ set forth by St. John is not one who left no footprints upon the earth; who did not really eat and drink; who had a spectre nailed to the cross in His stead; who melted away like mist in the illusive pageant of an ascension. He is one who came in the reality of flesh, in the likeness of sinful flesh. As He is not a common-place Christ, so He is not a shadowy Christ.

Much supercilious criticism on hymns which speak of the blood of Jesus is almost Doketic in essence.

The blood of Christ implies three realities—the reality of His manhood, of His suffering, of His sacrifice. It is dogma made pictorial, passionate, pathetic. This objection to all loving, adoring mention of the "blood of Jesus" is out of touch with St. Paul, who speaks of Christ having "made peace through the blood of His cross"; out of touch with St. Peter, to whom we owe the tender expression, "the precious blood"; out of touch with St. John, who announces that "the blood of Jesus keeps cleansing from all sin"; out of touch with the redeemed, who sing "Thou hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood."*

II.

THIS fifth word from the Cross teaches us further that we are contemplating a momentous point in the history of the Passion.

"After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now finished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, saith, "I thirst." The brightness is beginning; the victory is already commenced in His soul. We may profitably note here the unity of the character of Christ as presented to us by St. Luke in the record of the Temptation with that which is given here by St. John. "In those days He did eat nothing; and when they were ended He afterwards hungered."† First, in both cases, comes the spiritual struggle, afterwards, in both cases, the conflict with the bodily need. A comparison has been drawn by a great Protestant German writer‡ between our Lord and some hero who, through all the dust and heat of battle, either does not feel, or does not give expression to, his exhaustion. But when the smoke begins to drift away from the lines, and the long roll of artillery is exchanged for dropping shots, he passes into his tent and calls for drink. Let it be noted that the verb (rendered accomplished § by the A.V. in the twenty-eighth verse) is the same as that translated "it is finished," the sixth of the last words preserved in the thirtieth verse. The text should be rendered by the same English equivalent in both places, as in the R.V. The two taken together indicate that the victory recognised as begun in thought in the first passage has been won, and is expressed verbally in the second.

Nor shall we fail to note the attestation which is given to the sacredness of the Old Testament—"Jesus, that the scripture might be fulfilled." The that * does not denote conscious determination. It is the same word which we find four verses above. "The soldiers said among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it whose it shall be; that † the scripture might be fulfilled." The meaning cannot be that the soldiers acted with a deliberate purpose of ensuring the accomplishment of Scripture; but with the result of its being fulfilled.‡ In a history of such transcendent significance in the spiritual world, nothing is mean, nothing fortuitous. The Roman guard of four for an execution was turned out with the usual precision of that faultless military machine. There was the vessel of vinegar (posca) for the cheap refreshment of men in a hot country. There was the sponge for cleansing the accoutrements which might be splashed with blood, and the hyssop stalk. If those splendid soldiers had been told that these details of drill and parade were part of a Divine chapter in the history of the world, they would have laughed with the rude laughter of the barrack-yard. Yet, according to St. John, these things must be, and to thirst was part of the martyr-image of Messiah in the mirror of the Psalms.§

III.

BUT the word from the cross is also a revelation of the character of the Sufferer.

1. How truly human He is!

There are three draughts on the cross mentioned. The first is the proffered opiate, refused because He meets death without respite or alleviation. The second is the mock wassail-cup, the caricature of the imperial coronation wine. The third is that on which we meditate.‖ Jesus complies with the claims of the body —with the duty of seeking refreshment when resistlessly needed. The Stoic sheathes himself in marble. The Indian brave has been known to refuse his enemies the satisfaction of asking for a little water, when he has been fastened to the stake, ringed round with fire, and his lips black with agony. The Fakir hangs silent on his dreadful hook. Such is the difference between "free self-sacrifice and crazy suicide."

In our Lord, then, as this word proves, there is no affected superiority to bodily pain or bodily need; He is truly human.

2. But there is something more in it.

What must have been the temptation for a lofty nature at that supreme moment? His friends, John and the three Maries, were no longer near. None but enemies are within hearing. "He will not condescend to appeal to them"—so pride might surmise. No! Peace is being made by the blood of His cross; the work of atonement is all but over; the breath of reconciliation blows upon Him as He hangs there. "I thirst!" is the hint and signal of forgiving love.

In man's nature, as it is, there are two elements, a fact and a possibility. The fact of man's nature is, that it is fallen. Of this fact Jesus had a terrible knowledge. How could it be otherwise with Him who knew both man and men: both man in the abstract, and the individual men who came across His path?* How could it be otherwise with Him who, starting from the lowest and most abject fatalities of man's physical being,† threw that ray of light upon the other abysmal cloaca of an unrenewed human soul?‡ But Jesus also recognised another and loftier element. That ear, which was so keenly sensitive to all the discords of sin, was at the same time the first which ever heard the one chord which was yet capable of keeping time and tune in the harlot's passionate heart. That insight which saw, as never moralist or physiologist of the platform, how in all sensual sin the impulse waxes as the pleasure wanes, saw also that man's nature was capable of an expulsive pleasure of a loftier kind, which might yet win for him the victory. Jesus had a deathless belief in the possibility of man's recovery, in the existence within him of the germs of an undying life. With that belief He inspired His Church. All evangelical believers hold that there is a real Fall, that we are not "born good," that we are "very far gone from original righteousness." Yet the believing Church speaks her sweet invitation wherever there are men—to the thief, the harlot, the savage. As she reads history, she says, "I am human, and nothing human is alien from me." Christians believe in virtue. Contrast with religious historians of the Church that great master of epigrams whom the course of his vast subject brought into contact with the origin of Christianity. They can recognise the dignity of truth and goodness wherever it is to be found. He may talk of the dignity of human nature, but his spirit is like that of Vivien when she reveals her nature to Merlin. If any man renounces the world, it is, according to Gibbon, because it has become evident that he would not succeed in it. For him the virgin is not so pure, nor the saint so holy; the martyr is not very disinterested, and the doctor is not very learned. He looks along the line of men whose forms rise from the mist of ages. He spurts his vitriol into every eye that is lifted heavenward. He plunges the stiletto of his epigram into every heart which beats for God.

The Master of the Church believed in the recovery of man; and, therefore, in the existence of something recoverable within him. He came to make men more human, to give humanity to man. He appealed to His executioners as men; He gave them credit for the possession of humanity. "I thirst!" He said, as though He would remind them—"These hands are nailed; I cannot use them; cannot raise a cup, if I had one, to My lips. I know that there is humanity among you. I thirst!"

It is often overlooked that this word was not without effect. The great cry, just as the dereliction was passing away at three o'clock, was misunderstood by some of the bystanders. "Behold! He calleth Elias." Then St. Mark, in his vivid way, paints the effect produced upon one of the soldiers. "And one ran and filled a sponge full of vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave Him to drink, saying, 'Let alone: let us see whether Elias will come to take him down.'"* It may well be that there is something of mockery here, at least of an affected mockery. Such is often the cover for growing conviction in its first stages. But we feel that there is genuine pity and sympathy underlying the act. Pity was abroad. The pathos of such a death for such a man was widely felt. "All the people that came together to that sight"—we have the touch from the soft pencil of St. Luke—"beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts and returned."† Pity is nearly always contagious. There was pity in the movement of those who "filled a sponge with vinegar and put it round a hyssop stalk, and lifted it to His mouth."‡

But if there was pity, there was something more than pity at work. The darkness had awed them. That patience such as never saint, that delicacy such as never virgin, that courage such as never soldier, that dignity such as never king had displayed, was not altogether unnoticed or unfelt. In the "Eli" cry there was a tremendous reality of prayer. Even to the Roman legionaries, in a country such as Palestine then was, something was known of Elijah. They, very probably, when they were told that "He calleth Elias," thought of the spectral form of the prophet of retribution, who came of old for vengeance, with the sweep of fire and the rush of rain. "Let alone: let us see whether Elijah cometh to take Him down." They half expected to see him come through the dust-cloud of the earthquake just passing away, and they cover their terror by an affectation of wit. There is room for so many contradictions in a human heart. The soldiers despise the crucified Galilean. Perhaps. But they pass the cooling sponge over the parched lips—therefore, they pity. What they say is frivolous. Possibly; for they jest. But it is tremendous; because, as we listen to the hearts that beat behind those abrupt, broken words, we feel that they tremble.§

St. John's words, if they are to be literally pressed, would lead us to suppose that more than one took part in that act of pity. They were the first-fruits of the appeal in the fifth word from the cross. Its result has been the finer feeling, the readier sympathy, the instinctive tenderness, of Christian men and women. "We first knew that we were women when we came to know Christ," was the exclamation of a group of Chinese women to a devoted missionary. Men first knew manhood when they knew Christ. Here was the pledge and beginning of it: the first tiny ripple of that great springtide of sympathetic helpfulness and charity which is breaking upon every shore. The first sweet movement of philanthropy thus comes from the lips of Jesus.

Is this to be rolled back by the morality of a new philosophy? The realm of evolution broadens with a vengeance. From the animal and vegetable world, from the worlds of space, it takes in, in its ever-widening circle, the world of feeling and of duty, the world of society. The suppression of the unadapted and the unfit is the cynical secret of social evolution. We build hospitals, asylums, infirmaries, refuges for children; our weakness is rebuked by the wholesome yet awful cynicism of Nature—which excretes suffering and sickly specimens of humanity.

Nay, as long as Christ crucified is worshipped, as long as His words are the charter of Christendom, the sick and suffering will be cared for and ministered to. It may be thought too severe to say that not only alcoholic excess, but luxury, much kitchen-talk, and the like, are rebuked by the poor drink of our dying Lord. But, at the lowest, Christians feel that luxury is to be ransomed by paying a large price for it. Christ is seen in His poor. He gives us a key to the interpretation of the fifth word from the cross—"I was sick, and ye visited Me; whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward."* The sweet appeal of Jesus rolls round the whispering-gallery of the Church. "I thirst!" says Christ. The feverish, the consumptive, the cancerous, the little children with poor hot fingers and bereaved faces, say so too. And He takes it up again from their lips, and repeats it in their pathetic voices. In all His words there are heights and depths which are not for us. So of this word one said of old—"Sitit sitiri Deus," "our God thirsteth to be thirsted after." But it is for us to hear Christ in hearing His afflicted ones. And each gift, given in this spirit, is like raising the sponge to pass it over those pale and dying lips.

FIRMNESS OF FAITH.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON.

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

MR. SPURGEON'S STUDY.

ENTRANCE GATES TO MR. SPURGEON'S HOUSE.

"IT'S a great thing to learn to trust in God. At first it is wonderfully like walking on a tight-rope, but afterwards it is the simplest thing."

So said Mr. Spurgeon, in the course of a conversation with the present writer, one dull summer evening not long since. But, be it understood, there was nothing in the slightest degree irreverent in the illustration. The tone of the voice, and the manner, absolutely forbade it. And it struck us that this was an instance of one source of Mr. Spurgeon's great power—viz., his remarkable faculty of apt, homely, and forcible illustration. The thought he wishes to convey is sent swift and straight to the understandings of his hearers by some remarkable yet easily comprehended metaphor, and the idea can be grasped at once.

For instance, if the mind dwells for a moment on the illustration we have just mentioned, its aptness will be seen, and can be apprehended by even the meanest intelligence. The difficulty of learning to walk on a rope, or even of doing so when one has learned, is at once apparent; the feeling of the insecure hold, and the dangers of slipping and sliding, are perceived at once. And it will be a help and a consolation to many a tried and weary heart to know that such a Christian as Mr. Spurgeon fully admits the difficulties which they may find in the life of faith.

But he does not believe that faith is to sit still and do nothing. He is eminently practical, and his idea of faith seems to be to do as much as you can yourself first, and then leave the rest to God. A story will illustrate this.

One morning, a few years ago, he was presiding at a meeting of the trustees of the Orphanage which he founded, and it was announced that there was only sufficient money in the bank to pay the bills then due.

"Well," said he, "we 're cleared out. We must go to the great Chancellor of the Exchequer; but before we pray, I want to know what you are going to give. I will give £25."

Each of the trustees present gave the same amount, and as there were five in addition to Mr. Spurgeon, £150 was raised at once. Then he prayed. It was a short and simple prayer, asking plainly for what was wanted.

That day was Friday. On the Sunday following he saw the trustees, and they came to him and said—

"Well, sir, did you get the money?"

In his answer he was able to say that £850 came in that very Friday, and almost as much for other institutions.

A remarkable incident had occurred on that same Friday. A gentleman came to the College, and asked Mr. Spurgeon if he was in need of money.

"Always in need of money here, sir," was the brisk reply. Then he mentioned the College, for which the stranger gave £100; and then the Colportage Society, for which he gave another £100.

"Ah! but," he said, "there is something for which you have greater need than these."

Then the Orphanage was mentioned, and for it the stranger gave a large sum.

"But," he said, "you must sit in your chair for five minutes after I am gone; you must not try to find out who I am. I promised God to do this some years ago, and I have never done it till now; and now my conscience is relieved."

From that day to this Mr. Spurgeon never knew who his visitor was: but such cases of donations coming in to supply the needs of his institutions, he assures us, occur whenever there is need for them.

Now he is endeavouring to collect enough money for an endowment when he is gone, for it is a fact that very much of the money is sent to him personally.

As for the numerous philanthropic agencies in connection with his work, for which the money can be used, their name is legion. There is the well-known Stockwell Orphanage, which we venture to think is Mr. Spurgeon's pet institution, and which, since it was founded in 1867, has sheltered and fed and trained some thousands of orphans, about five hundred being now always in residence. This institution has no regular subscribers, because, if so, the managers would be obliged to give them votes; but no fewer than seven thousand orphans have applied for admission to it in a single year, though perhaps only fifty can be taken. Then there is the Pastors' College, which has always some eighty young men in training for the Baptist ministry; there are the Almshouses for sixteen poor women; there is the Colportage Association, which sends out about eighty men to distribute and sell tracts, religious and pure literature; there is the Evangelistic Association, the agents of which conduct missions in various districts, both in London and the Home Counties; and all these, in addition to the work at the Tabernacle itself, with its congregation averaging some six thousand people, its immense Sunday-schools, Band of Hope, Temperance Society, Loan Tract Societies, Mothers' Meetings, Benevolent Societies, Flower Missions, etc., and three large separate missions in the south and south-west of London—viz., Haddon Hall Mission, Bermondsey; the Richmond Street Mission and Ragged School, Walworth; and the Ebury Mission. All these agencies and institutions have their own managers, but Mr. Spurgeon presides over, and in a sense rules them all.

Of the history of the Metropolitan Tabernacle it is hardly necessary to speak. It was opened in 1861, and cost about £31,000. It has been Mr. Spurgeon's only chapel save one—the little square reed-thatched building at Waterbeach, in Cambridgeshire, of which he still keeps a picture. He was but a boy of sixteen or seventeen when he was minister there, and some two years later he was invited to the pastorate of New Park Street Baptist Chapel, Southwark. Speedily he became one of the most famous preachers in the metropolis, and the New Park Street Chapel blossomed out into the large Metropolitan Tabernacle, on a new site—not very far, however, from the old one.

Mr. Spurgeon comes of Puritan ancestry, for one of his kinsmen, Job Spurgeon, was imprisoned in Colchester gaol for conscience' sake in 1611. Both his father and grandfather were Independent ministers in the county of Essex; and it was in Kelvedon, in the same county, that Mr. Spurgeon was born in 1834.

Ten years later, the celebrated Rev. Richard Knill was visiting the house of Mr. Spurgeon's grandfather, to preach on behalf of the London Missionary Society, and the little lad was there. The minister took great interest in the boy, and said he felt a "solemn presentiment" that he would "preach the Gospel to thousands." So sure was he, that he made the lad promise that when he preached in Rowland Hill's Chapel he would give out the hymn "God moves in a mysterious way." The prophecy was fulfilled to the very letter. Mr. Spurgeon preached and gave out that hymn both in Mr. Hill's pulpit at Wotton-under-Edge and in Surrey Chapel.

He was at school at Colchester, and then he filled two situations as tutor in schools. The latter was at Cambridge, and while there he became connected with St. Andrew's Street Baptist Chapel, which had a Lay Preachers' Association. Mr. Spurgeon became one of its members. His first sermon was preached when he was about sixteen, and he was dressed in a round jacket and broad collar! When seventeen he was pastor at Waterbeach; and then, after preaching at the New Park Street Chapel in Southwark, was invited to the pastorate there. For some time he lived in Nightingale Lane, Clapham, but his health beginning to fail, and feeling the imperative need of fresher air, he moved further out into the suburbs.

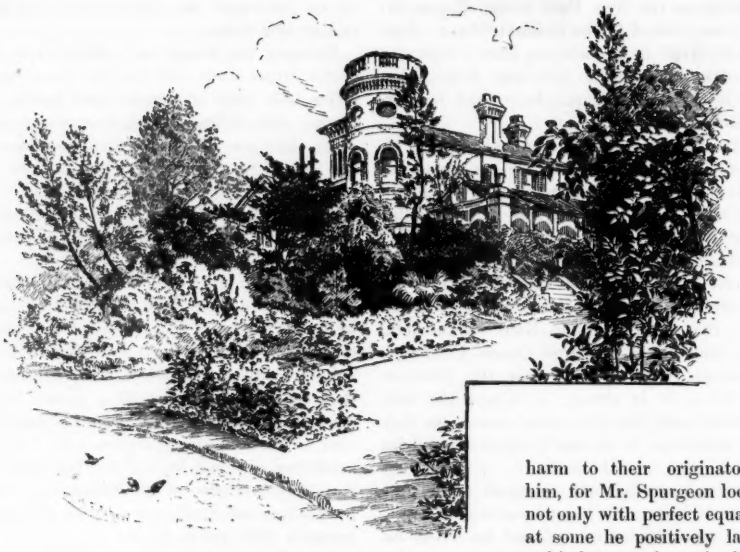
His residence is delightfully situated on one of the hills at Upper Norwood, to the south-east of London. It may be described as a spur or continuation of the hill on which the Crystal Palace stands, from which building it is situated about a mile. From the house and grounds can be obtained superb and extensive views over the weald and hills of beautiful Surrey—from Wimbledon, with a peep at Windsor on the right, round to Kent on the left. The strong sou'-wester has free course here, and sweeps straight from the sea over the pleasant country. When it is strong, it brings the salt spray with it; and Mr. Spurgeon assures us that the salt is driven on to his study windows, and he has tasted it from them himself.

It is the fresh air that Mr. Spurgeon needs, and he rejoices in it here to his heart's content. "Fresh air is more than medicine to me," said he. And he can sit in his study, with the glass door open to the grounds, or make his way to a summer-house near, or, if the weather be bad, he can retire to a conservatory.

The house stands in its own grounds, which are both beautiful and extensive. It is approached from the main road leading to Streatham Common by a carriage-drive, which is so flanked and shaded between trees and shrubs as to form almost a continuous avenue right up to the house.

Between the fencing and trees on the right we catch glimpses of the beautiful garden and grounds, and presently of the commencement of a sheet of water, which winds away below the slope of the hill on which the house is built.

The portico, beautified with greenery, is at the foot of a tower which rises above the house-roof. The front door will probably be found open, if the weather be favourable, and a light but strong wire-trellis "door" closed instead. This is, no doubt, to permit free ingress to plenty of fresh air, while affording an effectual barrier to any "stranger" who may have found his way in past the lodge at the entrance-gates. The same trellis-door is to be found in the study, opening on to the lawn.



The hill slopes downward on two sides of the house, and is clothed with beautiful trees. Down below are the kitchen-garden and lawns, on one of which the students of the College sometimes disport themselves at bowls. In the kitchen-garden is the well of medicinal water known as the Beulah Spa, from which Mr. Spurgeon permits his neighbours at the hydropathic establishment to draw. It is curious to think of the great preacher of the Metropolitan Tabernacle as the proprietor of a Spa; but such is the fact. We are inclined to think, however, that he holds a far higher opinion of the exquisite fresh air on the top of the hill than of the unpleasant-tasting Spa-water.

Entering the house, and ushered into Mr. Spurgeon's larger study—for he has two—we find ourselves in a noble apartment, and having the whole of one side, facing the south-west, of glass. The other sides are filled with shelves of books, except the spaces for the doors. One of these sides, the largest, is covered with commentaries. We question if anyone has a larger collection, for Mr. Spurgeon believes he has a copy of almost every commentary published.

He has compiled a book upon commentaries; and this he regards as the most useful work for ministers he has produced. The names of the commentaries criticised are printed in three different kinds of type—bold, medium, and comparatively insignificant—so that the reader can see at a glance the principal opinion expressed. The remarks made are witty also, so that, as Mr. Spurgeon says, "It is the only catalogue with wit in it;" for the book is, in fact, a critical catalogue of commentaries. Some of the booksellers use it also as a work of reference, and regulate their prices by it.

This fine apartment was the billiard-room of the former owner, and the gas is kept in the same position as then, for it illuminates the long, large table beneath, at the head of which Mr. Spurgeon sits, with two gentlemen, who act as his secretaries, on either side. Close to his hand is a movable electric bell, by which, when alone, or when suffering from his old enemy, rheumatic gout, he can summon his servant without rising from his chair.

The windows give access to the beautiful lawn and rosary bounded with trees; while over their wavy, tremulous tops lovely glimpses are seen of the fair land of Surrey, with its hills in the blue distance. Not far from the window the ground slopes down to the lake and the fields, which are also included in Mr. Spurgeon's grounds. Quite near is a summer-house, to which he is fond of betaking himself. There are three conservatories also in direct communication with his study, and to these he often retires; he is able to come hither when, by reason of unfavourable weather or feebleness of health—for, as is generally known, he has suffered much of late years from rheumatic gout—he could not go into the garden. The pleasant-looking chairs in the first one suggest a cosy chat with a friend; and another is festooned with grapes. Between the conservatories and his study is an inner study, or sanctum sanctorum, also with its walls covered with books; and while the larger and outer one is used more for what may be called the transaction of business connected with the Tabernacle and its various institutions, the other is reserved for Mr. Spurgeon's private use alone. On one of the shelves here is a series of volumes containing extracts from newspapers, etc., referring to him, all carefully indexed. In one of these is that precious copy of one of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons which was found in

MR. SPURGEON'S HOUSE.

Dr. Livingstone's box, in Africa, after the great missionary explorer's death. It was brought to his daughter, who, thinking Mr. Spurgeon the most suitable possessor, sent it to him. The paper is brown with age and travel and climate, but on the top of the front page can still be seen the words, "Very good.—D.L.," in faint pencil.

There are many more books in the large room—half drawing-room, half library—on the other side of the hall. The whole of one large wall is covered with them. They are of a more general character than those in the two studies, which are mostly of the nature of "tools" for the preacher's work; but these are historical and biographical, and also comprise several works on natural history. Of this latter class of reading Mr. Spurgeon is very fond. He has a set of old Herbals, and has read them all, finding many quaint and curious illustrations in them. The windows of the large drawing-room-library look into a very fine fernery, some of the plants being very large, and the whole graceful in arrangement and appearance. In this room, too, are kept two huge volumes, containing copies of numerous caricatures, photographs, and pictures of Mr. Spurgeon—commencing with a large-sized portrait, representing him as a young and ardent preacher, which was published many years ago, together with a picture of Lord Palmerston, under the title of "The Two Prime Ministers." Another portrait is an outline—and a very good one—sketched before the audience by Zoë, Mr. Maskelyne's clever automaton at the Egyptian Hall. Others are not so flattering—some positively unkind; but we fancy they will do more harm to their originators than to him, for Mr. Spurgeon looks at them not only with perfect equanimity, but at some he positively laughs. The unkindness or the satire hurts him as little as water does a duck's back. In one he was represented as sliding down the baluster of the pulpit stairs, because, it was said, he did that to show how people became backsliders. "At the time that this story was first circulated," he said, "my pulpit was built upon the wall, and had no stairs!"

In another large volume Mr. Spurgeon keeps the illuminated addresses, etc., which he received on the occasion of his jubilee. One of these—very beautifully designed and coloured—was from former students of the College who were then in Australia. In his dining-room are other jubilee gifts—some fine bronzes, and also very fine impressions of engravings of several of Doré's pictures. Mr. Spurgeon knew the great French artist, and thinks highly of him and his work. Near by is Mrs. Spurgeon's own room, where she conducts much of the work of her Book Fund, which has now sent books to about 13,000 ministers. Mrs. Spurgeon is an invalid, and is kept much indoors. Her room looks on the lawn, but faces the north-west, and from its windows, through an opening cut in the trees, she can obtain a beautiful view right across the country to Windsor.

Though the Tabernacle has its deacons, and the Orphanage and other institutions have their officers and managers, yet much of the work is done by Mr. Spurgeon, and at his house. Numerous sums of money, for instance, are constantly sent him for use in the various institutions. These remittances have to be acknowledged, and then either sent on to the banking account of the particular institution for which it was sent, or if—as often happens—money is given to be used at his discretion, he divides it and forwards it to the weakest. Many people also write about getting children into the Orphanage. This is not the slightest use, as each case is considered on its merits by the committee. Then there is the preparation involved in the sermons at the Tabernacle, the week-night services, and the usually weekly address to the students at the College, in addition to the editing and writing of his well-known magazine The Sword and the Trowel, his numerous books, and the presidentship of all the various agencies and societies and institutions connected with the Tabernacle. Still, he admits his business is rendered as light as possible by his numerous helpers. "They say," he added, "'You sit in the centre, like Wellington on his horse, and direct the battle,' and they do save me all they can."

Nevertheless, there is a large amount of business of various kinds that goes through Mr. Spurgeon's hands, and he accomplishes it, he said, by keeping on "always at it, using up every scrap of time, and using other people as much as possible." How, then, about the preparation of his numerous sermons and addresses? Concerning this matter, he said—

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON.
(From a Photograph published by Messrs. Passmore and Alabaster.)

"I am always preparing my sermons—reading and thinking; but the specific preparation I always begin at six o'clock on Saturday evening."

The great difficulty is to find a text! This may seem strange until it is remembered that for years Mr. Spurgeon's Sunday morning's sermon has been published. There are now thirty-three volumes of these sermons, and they are ranged on a shelf in the cases not far from Mr. Spurgeon's chair. His study-Bible is a fairly large octavo volume, and in it every text from which he has ever preached is marked, and sometimes a note or two beside it. Unless, then, he strikes out a new vein of thought, it will not do to take a text previously preached from—at all events, for Sunday morning. But having fixed upon a text, the next step is to see what the commentaries say about it; and then a few notes or an outline are made, for which a half-sheet of paper is quite sufficient.

Several interesting incidents have occurred in connection with his preaching. A man came up to London on his way to Australia. He thought he would please his mother by spending his last Sunday evening in the Old Country by "going to hear Spurgeon." The sermon had such an effect upon him that he wrote home, "I believe I am changed." The next Wednesday he, with some others, was knocked off the deck of the ship by an accident, and drowned; and that last letter he had written was the comfort and relief of the family in their dire distress.

Another time Mr. Spurgeon returned a considerable amount to a firm from whom it had been unjustly taken in the course of business. The defaulter had been touched by one of the pastor's sermons, and he sent the money to Mr. Spurgeon, asking him to convey it to the person named, but the sender gave no name.

On another occasion a mother wrote to him, saying that her son was going to China, and that she would bring him to the Tabernacle—could Mr. Spurgeon preach a sermon to touch him? Not long after the Sunday when Mr. Spurgeon responded to that appeal, no fewer than three young men communicated with him, each feeling that the sermon was addressed to them; and each, curiously enough, going to the "Flowery Land."

But such instances as these are frequently happening in Mr. Spurgeon's experience. They illustrate the power and effect of his pulpit appeals, and they serve to show the extent and variety of the large audience which, Sunday after Sunday, gathers within the walls of the Metropolitan Tabernacle. For all through his career, no matter in what other work he has been engaged, he has been a preacher first and foremost.

"'T IS A GREAT MISTAKE TO GROW OLD."

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

I WAS travelling a little time ago by train, and there being a thorough draught, I asked my fellow-passenger who sat next me, and was nearest the window, if he had any objection to its being closed. He very politely shut it up at once, and at the same time remarked that it was "a great mistake to grow old."

Now, having been some time out of knickerbockers, in fact, so far as my memory concerning 'knickers' serves me, having been born before they were known, I might have taken this observation to myself; and if I had been crusty on the subject of Anno Domini, I might have thought he had spoiled his action of courtesy by his uncourteous words; but there was something in his voice which made me look at him, there was a melancholy in it which there could not have been if his observation had applied only to me. It wanted that raspishness, that tartness, which generally flavours any little acid-drop which we give our neighbours to suck, hoping that they will like it; and 'that it may agree with them!' though we don't go in for any from the same canister ourselves.

My fellow-traveller had so slight a figure, and indeed looked so juvenile all over, that I might have been well pardoned if I had thought him a young man taking the shine out of an old one.

But when he turned towards me, I saw that he was an old man, far, far on in life; and now I understood his tone of voice. What he said in reference to himself—the tone of sadness in it—was not for me; though, from his kindly way, and alas! from his explanation of what he said, I daresay he meant to include me—aye, everyone advancing in life with himself.

"Oh, no!" said I, "for there is something better beyond," and though I cannot recall exactly now the words I used, I spoke of better youth, and the future beyond all present age.

"It is a good thing," said he, "for those who can believe it—but I do not; I am an Agnostic," and that, our readers know, means a man who says he knows nothing and believes nothing about anything which cannot be proved, or which is not apparent to the senses themselves. He could not say that there is a God, or that there is not; that there is a future, or that there is not; that there is a resurrection, or that there is not. All is blank before him.

There was something very touching in the tone in which he spoke; there was congratulation thorough and real for me, in that I could believe such things—sorrow, commiseration for himself, that he had no faith—that once he had, but now he had not. And having nothing in the future, all that remained for him was to live amid the perishings of the present; youth with all youth's pleasures gone, the bounding step, the beating heart, the firm muscle, the well-strung nerve, the pleasures of the eye and ear, the witchery of love, the fantasies of imagination, the flashings of enthusiasm, the vistas of hope—all gone, gone with time. They were the perquisites of youth, and youth had passed, and old age had come, and it had nothing in it; and oh, it was a cheerless thing to become old; it was a great mistake to grow old. My fellow-passenger got out with many others, and as I saw him depart amid the crowd, my own heart was sad. Who was he? where was he going? Perhaps to a cheerless home, a desolated hearth. It may be that wife and child were gone; it may be that infirmity, and disease, and decay, were all that life had left; anyhow, age had brought nothing to him, but the ashes of burnt-out life.

I had plenty to think of during the remainder of my short journey. I thought of what he said. I wonder if he thought of what I said!

"It is a mistake to grow old." Even if we had the power of living on, continually growing, would that be best for us?

With age, looked at simply as such, no doubt come fadings and perishings and regrets, and little to replace the past; with it comes the sense of the unsatisfying, which is either a tongue to prophesy to us of the future, or a tooth to gnaw us as regards the past.

The Christian would not remain for ever young, even if he could. When he grows old he sees what was inseparable from youth. He must not claim a model youth—a perfect youth; he must take it as it is, with all its conditions, and disqualifications, and mistakes. He must not say, "I would wish to live always young, but with my present wisdom." Youth must be taken with all that goes with it, and that surely is not what he would wish to be his for ever.

He sees that it is a good ordering that he should not be always young; that age is a preliminary, an unveiling of the false, that there may be an entering eternally on the true.

Had sin never come into the world, old age as we know it now would have doubtless never been; but an everlasting youth for such as we, and in a condition such as ours, would be a terrible lot indeed.

There is no mistake on God's part in allowing us to grow old, if we make old age what He will have it to be—a mellowing time; a ripening time; a time of the stilling of all earthly passions; a time of retrospect of the way by which we have been led, when we see in Heaven's forecasting light—aye, and in Heaven's hinder-casting light too—what we had not seen when "no small tempest lay upon us;" that "goodness and mercy had followed us all the days of our life"—this may be old age's voice for the past; and its word for the future is as bright: "I shall dwell in the House of the Lord for ever."

The hopelessness, the helplessness, the vacuity of an Agnostic old age are terrible to think of; its starless, sunless heaven a leaden, illimitable grey; life a past with nothing in it, and a present realising that emptiness. Rowland Hill, himself a very old man, says that he heard of one who was asked what age he was. He answered, "The right side of eighty." "I thought you were more than eighty," said the inquirer. "Yes, I am beyond it," he replied; "and that is the right side, for I am nearer to my eternal rest."

A man once said to Dr. Rees, "You are whitening fast." The Doctor answered him in a sermon which he preached immediately after: "There is a wee white flower which comes up through the earth at this season of the year. Sometimes it comes up through the snow and frost; but we are all glad to see the snowdrop, because it proclaims that the winter is over, and that the summer is at hand. A friend reminded me last night that I was whitening fast. But heed not that, brother; it is to me a proof that my winter will soon be over—that I shall have done presently with the cold east winds and the frosts of earth, and that my summer—my eternal summer—is at hand."

To a humble Christian it was remarked, "I fear you are near another world."—"Fear it, sir!" he replied, "I know I am; but, blessed be the Lord, I do not fear it—I hope it."

The Apostle Paul was an old man, but, happily for him, he was no Agnostic, and so he could say, "I know in Whom I have believed, and that He will keep that which I have committed to Him until that day; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

But for old age to be happy it must be a time of acceptance. Old age fought against is miserable; old age accepted is calm and peaceful. Enamelled wrinkles dare not smile; the honest wrinkles may even laugh. To be living in a mistake is to be living in a false position, and in all false positions there is weakness, and discomfort, and misery.

The way to be happy in your old age is to consider that you are not in a false position, but in a right one—in the one which God has ordained for you, and therefore in the one which contains blessings for you—ITS blessings, its own peculiar blessings. Where you meet with disappointment, is in expecting from it what does not belong to it, and what would not be blessing even if it did.

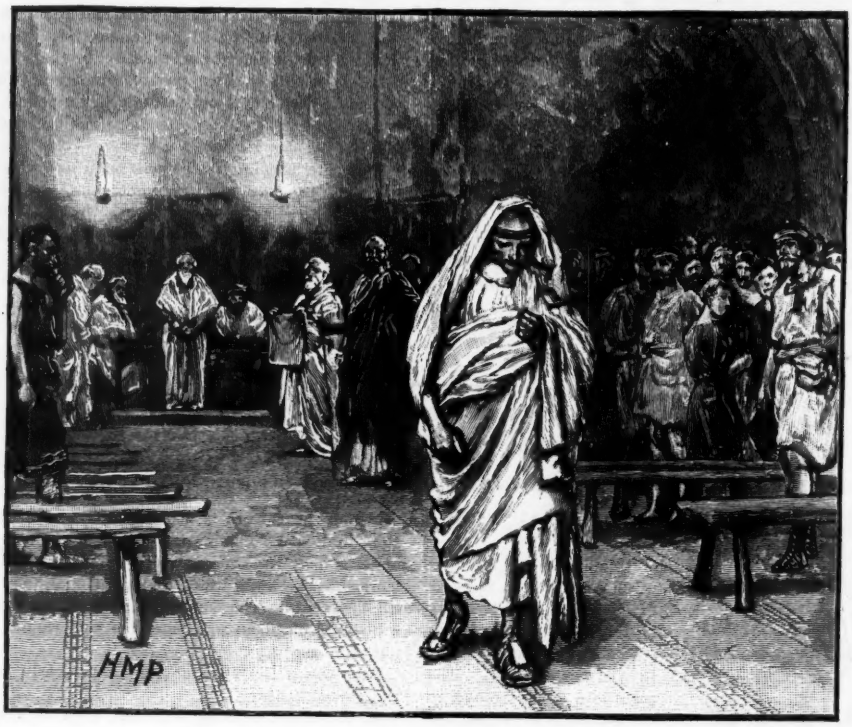
There are flowers on the bank on which you must sit, while the sunlit stream comes merrily along, or the turbid and flooded waters rush tumultuously by. Many a one has seen them as God-given, and blessed the One with whom "a thousand years is as one day," believing that he was in His hands, and that in them it was not

A MISTAKE TO GROW OLD.

"TO THE LIONS!"

A TALE OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS. BY THE REV. PROFESSOR CHURCH, M.A.

CHAPTER I.—AN ACCUSATION.



THE time is the early morning of an April day in the year of Our Lord 112. So early is it that the dawn has scarcely yet begun to show in the eastern sky. The place is a burial-ground in the outskirts of Nicæa, one of the chief towns of the Roman province of Bithynia. We must imagine an oblong building, about sixty feet in length and forty in breadth. The roof is arched, and, at the highest point, perhaps twenty feet from the ground. The further end from the door is semicircular, like what is called an apse in church architecture. There are four windows in each of the side walls; these, however, are not glazed, but furnished with wooden blinds, which can be opened or shut as the weather serves. The building is commonly lighted with lamps, six of which hang from the roof. It has little ornament about it; the floor is tessellated, but the work is rough; the little cubes of which the pattern is made are of baked clay, not stone or marble, which are more expensive materials; and the patterns themselves are rude and carelessly worked. The walls are of rough stone, plastered and colour-washed. The semicircular end only is hung, to a distance of about six feet from the ground, with purple curtains.

Such was a Christian church in the early part of the second century.

It must not be supposed that even this simple building had been erected for its own use by the Christian community. Even if it could have found the means to do so, it would not have ventured so to attract public attention. For the Christian faith was not one of the religions which were sanctioned by the State; and it existed only by sufferance, or rather, we might even say, by stealth.

This meeting-house of the Christians of Nicæa was really the club-house of the wool-combers of that city. The wool-combers' guild or company had for some time been declining. The trade had, for some reason, passed to other places. Old members had died, and few or no new members had been admitted. Much of its property had been lost by the dishonesty of a treasurer. Finally, the few surviving members had been glad to let the building to persons who were acting for the Christian community. No questions were asked as to the purpose for which it was to be used; but, as two or three out of the half-dozen of surviving wool-combers were Christians, it was well understood what this purpose was. It would have been, by the way, more exact to say "a burial club." This was the object for which it had been founded. Its social meetings had been funeral feasts; hence its situation in the near neighbourhood of a cemetery. This made it particularly suitable for meetings of the Christians. Assemblies held before dawn—for this was the custom, and close garments so coarse as almost to look like mats. Among the few worshippers of superior station was an aged man, who wore a dress then rarely seen, the Roman toga. The narrow purple stripe with which it was edged, and the gold ring which he wore on the forefinger of his left hand, showed that he was a knight. His order included, as is well known, the chief capitalists of Rome, and, among other speculations, was accustomed to farm the taxes. Titus Antistius—this was the old man's name—had been the

to a burial-ground—would be little likely to be observed.

The congregation may have numbered one hundred persons, of whom at least two-thirds were men. There was a division between the sexes—that is to say, the men occupied all the seats (benches of the plainest kind) on one side of the building, and the front half of these on the other. It was easy to see that, with a very few exceptions, they were of humble rank. Many, indeed, were slaves. These wore frocks reaching down to the knees, cut square at the neck, and, for the convenience of leaving the working arm free, having one sleeve only. These frocks were made of coarse black or brown serge, trimmed at the bottom with sheepskin. Two or three were sailors, clad in agent for this purpose in Bithynia, but he had for some time retired from the occupation. His age, his blameless character, and the wealth which he dispensed with a liberal hand, helped, together with his rank, to make him the principal character in the Christian community of Nicæa. He sat on a cushioned chair, but the privilege had been conceded to him quite as much on account of his age and infirmity as of his social position.

The only other member of the congregation whom it is necessary to mention was an elderly man who sat immediately behind Antistius. His dress, of plain but good material, showed that he belonged to the middle class. His name was Caius Verus.

The semicircular end of the building was reserved for the clergy, of whom three were present. They wore the usual dress of the free citizen of the time, a sleeved tunic, with a cape over the shoulders that reached to the waist. The only thing that distinguished them from the congregation was that their dress was wholly white. One of the three was an old man; his two colleagues were middle-aged. The three sat facing the people, with a plain table used for the Holy Supper in front of them. On either side of the apse, as we may call it, on the line which divided it from the main body of the building, were two reading desks. On each a volume was laid. One of these volumes contained the Old Testament, in the Greek version of the Septuagint, the other the New.

The minister left his seat behind the Table and advanced to address the people. It was evident that his agitation was great; indeed, it was some time before he could command his voice sufficiently to speak.

"Brothers and sisters," he said, "I have a grave and lamentable matter to lay before you. Serious charges have been brought against our brother Verus—for brother I will yet call him. It has been alleged against him that he has gambled, and that he has sacrificed to idols. Caius Verus," he went on, "answer as one who stands in the presence of God and His angels. Do you know the house of the merchant Sosicles?"

Verus stood up in his place. Whatever he may have felt about the truth of the charges and the likelihood of their being proved, he did not lose his confident air. He had stood not once or twice only in his life in positions of greater peril than this, and he would not allow himself to be terrified now.

"I know it," said the accused, "as far as a man may know a house which he enters only for purposes of business. I have had dealings with Sosicles on account of the Church, as the brethren know. He is a heathen, but a man of substance and credit; and the moneys of the Church have increased in his hand."

"It is true," said the minister; "and I have often wished that it could be otherwise. But the holy Apostle Paul tells us that if we would have no dealings with such men, we must needs go out of the world. But you affirm that you have not companied with him as with a friend?"

"I affirm it."

"Cleon, come forth!" said the minister to a young man who was sitting on one of the back benches.

Cleon was a slave from the highlands of Phrygia—not a Greek, but with the tinge of Greek manners, which had reached by this time to all but the most inaccessible parts of Lesser Asia. He was a new-comer. Verus scanned his face narrowly, but apparently without any result.

"Tell your story," said the minister; "and speak without any fear of man."

Cleon went on in somewhat broken Greek. "It is a month since I came into the possession of the merchant Sosicles. He bought me of the heir of the widow Areté of Smyrna. She had provided in her will that I should be free; but her heir disputed it, and the Proconsul gave judgment against me." The poor lad choked down a sob as he said this, and a thrill of sympathy ran through his audience. "Sosicles knew that I was a Christian, and took two hundred drachmæ* from the price for that reason. I heard him say that Christians had scruples and were obstinate. I worked chiefly in the garden; but about a week since I had to take the place of Lycus, the cup-bearer. The master had flogged him so severely for stealing a flagon of Chian wine that he could not stand. When I came into the dining-chamber the dishes had been removed. I mixed the first bowl, and set it on the table before Sosicles. I filled the cups out of it. Sosicles poured out a libation.† 'To Apollo and Aphrodite,' he said. I filled the other cups. There were eight guests in all. They all said the same words, excepting Verus, who lay on the host's right hand. I observed that he drank without speaking. When I saw this, I thought to myself that he must be a Christian; and then I remembered that I had seen him here. The drinking went on. I filled the cups many times. Towards the end of the first watch,‡ Sosicles, who by this time was, as I should judge, half-tipsy, poured out a libation to Hermes. He said to Verus: 'This toast you shall not refuse. For Apollo and his harp you care not; no, nor for Aphrodite with her girdle of love; but Hermes, with his money-bags, is your true god.' Verus laughed, and said nothing. Then Sosicles grew angry. I had heard that he was apt to be quarrelsome in his cups. 'By Hercules,' he said, 'you shall drink it! I will have no dealings with atheists. Drink it, or we close our accounts.' Verus tried to put him off; but it was of no use—Sosicles only grew the more furious. At last I heard Verus mutter the words. About the middle of the second watch I came in again. Some of the guests had gone away; others were asleep. My master and Verus were playing at dice. Each had a pile of money before him. I watched them for a time, and it seemed to me that my master scarcely knew what he was doing. About half an hour afterwards Verus went home. I noticed that he had a bag of money with him. It seemed heavy. He was quite sober."

Self-possessed as he was, the accused could not quite hide the dismay with which he listened to this narrative. He had not noticed the new cup-bearer at Sosicles' entertainment. He had often heard his host say that he would have no Christian slaves: they were troublesome, and made difficulties about doing what they were told. Accordingly, he had made sure that he was safe. He would gladly have escaped saying the idolatrous words. His Christian belief, without being sincere, was yet strong enough to make him shrink from committing so manifest an offence against it. Of love for Christ he had nothing; but he certainly feared Him a great deal more than he feared Hermes. Still, when he came to balance his scruples against the present loss of breaking with his host,

* Two hundred drachmæ would be a little more than £8. Cleon—as a slave without any special accomplishments, but of good character, and young—might fetch about £100.

† A few drops were poured out of the cup, before the drinker tasted it, in honour of some god.

‡ This would be some time between eight and nine. The second watch began at nine.

they were found the lighter of the two. So he had come to speak the words; but he had followed them up with a sentence muttered under his breath: "Who, for all that, is a false demon." With this he had salved his conscience, which by this time had come to heal of its wounds with a dangerous ease.

He now rapidly reviewed his position, and thought that he saw a way of escape. He spoke with an appearance of moderation and candour that did credit to his power of acting.

"I have a fault to confess, but it is not the grievous sin of which Cleon accuses me. It is true that I was at Sosicles' banquet. I repent me of having concealed this from the brethren. But it is not true that I spoke the blasphemous words. What I said was a colourable imitation of them, intended to appease the unreasonable rage of a tipsy man. Who knows what trouble might have arisen—not to me only, but to the whole community—if I had angered him? As for the dice-playing, I played, indeed, but I played to humour him. I so contrived it that he won back the greater part of what he had lost. If I gained anything, I gave the whole of it to the poor. As for the bag of money which Cleon saw me carry away, it was given to me in payment of an account. These things I confess, because I would not hide anything from my brethren, and desire to make any amends that they may judge to be fitting. Yet there is something that I would urge. Does not the holy Apostle command that an accusation be not believed against an elder except from two or three witnesses? If I am not an elder, yet the Church has put me in a place of trust. Were I standing on my trial before the unbeliever, would he condemn me on the testimony of a single slave?"

"Take heed what you say," interrupted the minister. "In this house there is neither bond nor free."

"It is so," said Verus. "I spoke after the fashion of the world. But who is this young man? Is he not a stranger, known to you only by a letter which he brought from the elders of Smyrna? Can you condemn me for aught beyond that which I have myself willingly owned on his single testimony?"

He looked round on the congregation as he spoke, and saw that his appeal had not been without its effect. It was true that, as the minister had said, all in that house were equal; but the difference between slave and free man was too deeply ingrained into human nature in those days to be easily forgotten. And no one felt it more than the slaves themselves. It was they who would have been most shocked to see a respectable merchant found guilty on the single evidence of one of their own class. A murmur of approval ran round the congregation; and when the minister put the question, though some did not vote either way, the general voice was for acquittal.

Before the minister could speak, the old knight rose in his place.

CHAPTER II.—AN OLD STORY.

VERUS bent on the old man the same closely scrutinising look with which he had regarded the slave. Again he failed, it seemed, to connect the face with any recollections in his mind. There was, as we shall see, a dark past in his life which he was most unwilling to have dragged into the light. But he had no reason to associate Antistius with it, and nothing more than a vague sense of distrust haunted him, but he felt that if the old man had anything to say against him, he could be a far more formidable witness than the young Phrygian slave.

"You have been in Rome?" said the knight to Verus.

"Yes," he answered; "but not for some years past."

"Nor I," went on the old man; "nor do I want ever to see it again. She is the mother of harlots, drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus! But when I left it last, seventeen years ago, I carried away with me a memorial of a deed that I shall never forget, nor you either, if there is anything human in you."

The speaker produced from the folds of his toga a small packet wrapped in a cover of silk. Unwrapping it with reverent care, he brought out a handkerchief stained nearly all over of a dull brownish red.

"Know you this?" he said to Verus.

"Why do you ask me? What have I to do with it?" answered the man, with a certain insolence in his tone. The majority in his favour made him confident.

"Yet you should know it, for it is blood that was shed by your hands, though the blow was dealt by the axes of Cæsar. If seventeen years are enough to make you forget the martyr Flavius, yet there are those who remember him."

It is impossible to describe the effect which these words produced. In those days of peril, next to his love for his God and Saviour, the strongest emotion in a Christian's heart was his reverence for the martyrs. They were the champions who had fought and fallen for his faith, for all that he held dearest and most precious. He could not, he thought, reverence too much their patience and their courage. Were these not the virtues which he might at any hour be himself called upon to exercise?

This reverence had, of course, its meaner counterpart in a base and cowardly nature such as was Verus'. The man had not belief enough to make him honest and pure; but he had enough to give him many moments of agonising fear. It was such a fear that overpowered him now. Any wrongdoer might tremble when thus confronted with the visible, palpable relic of a crime which he believed to be unknown or forgotten. But this was no ordinary wickedness. The betrayer of a martyr was looked upon with a horror equal to the reverence which attached itself to his victim.

Nor was it only the scorn and hatred of his fellowmen that he had to dread. There were awful stories on men's lips of informers and traitors who had been overtaken by a vengeance more terrible than any that human hands could inflict; and these crowded upon the wretched creature's recollection. His face could not have shown a more overpowering fear had the pit itself opened before him. The staring eyes, the forehead and cheeks turned to a ghastly paleness and dabbled with the cold drops of sweat, proved a terror that in itself was almost punishment enough.

But the criminal was almost forgotten in the thrill of admiring awe that went through the whole assembly. With one impulse men and women surged up to the place where the old knight was standing with the venerable relic in his hand. To see it close, if it might be to press their lips to it, was the one desire. The old man was nearly swept off his feet by the rush. The minister stepped forward, and took him within the sanctuary at the end of the meeting-house. The habit of reverence kept the people from pressing beyond the line which separated it from the body of the building, and they were partially satisfied when the handkerchief was held up for their gaze.

When silence and quiet had been restored, Antistius told his story.

"I went to Rome in the last year of Domitian's reign. It was at the season of the holiday of Saturn, which, as some of you may know, the heathen in Italy keep in the month of December. But it was no holiday time in Rome. The Emperor was mad with suspicious rage, and no man's life was safe for an hour; and the higher the place, the greater the danger. Yet there was one whom, though he was near to the throne, everyone thought to be safe. This was Flavius Clemens. He was the Emperor's cousin: his sons were the next heirs to the throne. He was the gentlest, the least ambitious of men. It is true that he was a Christian, and the Emperor's rage at that time burned more fiercely against the Christians than against anyone else; but the Emperor knew it, had known it for years, and had made him Consul in spite of it.

"When I reached Rome, he was near the end of his year of office. I dined with him on the Ides of December, for he was an old friend, and he told me—for we were alone—how he looked forward to being rid of his honours. 'Only eighteen days more,' he said, 'and I shall be free!' Ah! he spoke the truth, but he little thought how the freedom was to come. He told me, I remember, what an anxious time his Consulship had been. The Consul, you see, has to see many things, and even do many things, which a Christian would gladly avoid. To sit at the theatre, to look on at the horrid butchery of the games, to be present at the public sacrifices, these are things which a man can hardly do without sin.

"'But,' he said, 'my good cousin the Emperor has considered me. Happily he has been my colleague, and he has taken a hundred duties off my hands, which would have been a grievous burden on me.' And then he went on to tell me of some troubles which had arisen in the Church. A certain Verus had had the charge of the pensions paid to the widows, and of other funds devoted to the service of the poor, and he had embezzled a large part of them. 'You see,' he went on, 'we are helpless. We cannot appeal to the courts, as we have no standing before them; in fact, our witnesses would not dare to come forward. For a man to own himself a Christian would be certain death; and though one is ready for death if it comes, we must not go to meet it. So, whether we will or no, we must deal gently with this Verus.' And he did deal gently with him. Of course he had to be dismissed; but he was not even asked to repay what he had taken—Flavius positively paid the whole of the deficiency out of his own pocket. And he spoke in the kindest way, I know, to the wretch, hoped that it would be a lesson to him, begged him to be an honest man in future, and even offered to lend him money to start in business with.

"And yet the fellow laid an information against him with the Emperor! It would not have been enough to charge him with being a Christian; he was accused of witchcraft, and of laying plots against the Emperor's life. He used to mention Domitian's name in his prayers, for he was his kinsman as well as his emperor, and they got some wretched slave to swear that he heard him mutter incantations and curses. And Domitian, who was mad with fear—as he well might be, considering all the innocent blood that he had shed—believed it.

"I shall never forget what I saw in the senate-house that day. It was the last day of the year,* and Flavius was to resign his office. There sat Domitian with that dreadful face, a face of the colour of blood, with such a savage scowl as I never saw before or since. Flavius took the oath that he had done the duties of his office with good faith, and then came down from his chair of office.

"In the common course of things the senate would have been adjourned at once. But that day the Emperor stood up. What a shudder ran through the assembly! Everyone saw that the tale of victims for that year was not yet told. The question was, whose name was to be added. Domitian called on Regulus, a wretch who had grown grey in the trade of the informer. He rose in his place. 'I accuse Flavius Clemens, ex-Consul, of treason,' he said. Why should I weary you, my brethren, with the wretched tale? To name a man in those days was to condemn him. I have heard it said by men who have crossed the deserts of the South that if a beast drops sick or weary on the road, in a moment the vultures are seen flocking to it from every quarter of the sky. Before, not one could be seen; but scarce is the dying beast stretched on the sand, but the air is black with their wings. So it was then. One day a man might seem not to have an enemy; let him be accused, and on the morrow they might be numbered by scores.

"Flavius, as I have said, was the gentlest, kindest, most blameless of men. But had he been the worst criminal in Rome, witnesses could not have been found more easily to testify against him. They brought in that wretched slave with his story of muttered incantations.

"You will say, perhaps, 'But he could not bear witness against his master!' Ah! my friends, they had a device to meet that difficulty. They sold him first, and, mark you, without his master's consent, to the State. Then he could give evidence, and the law not be broken. Then this villain Verus came forward. He told the same story, and with this addition, that he had been bribed to keep the secret, and he brought out the letter in which Flavius had offered him the money, as I have told you. Kind as ever, the Consul had written thus: 'We will bury this matter in silence. Meanwhile, you shall not want means for your future support. Flaccus the banker shall pay you 100,000 sesterces [about £1,000].'

"Then senator after senator rose and repeated something that they had heard him say, or had heard said of him—for no evidence was refused in that court. At last one Opimius stood up. 'Lord Cæsar,' he said, 'and Conscript Fathers, of the chief of the crimes of Flavius no mention has been made. I accuse him of the detestable superstition of the Christians.'

"'Answer for yourself,' said the Emperor, turning to the accused.

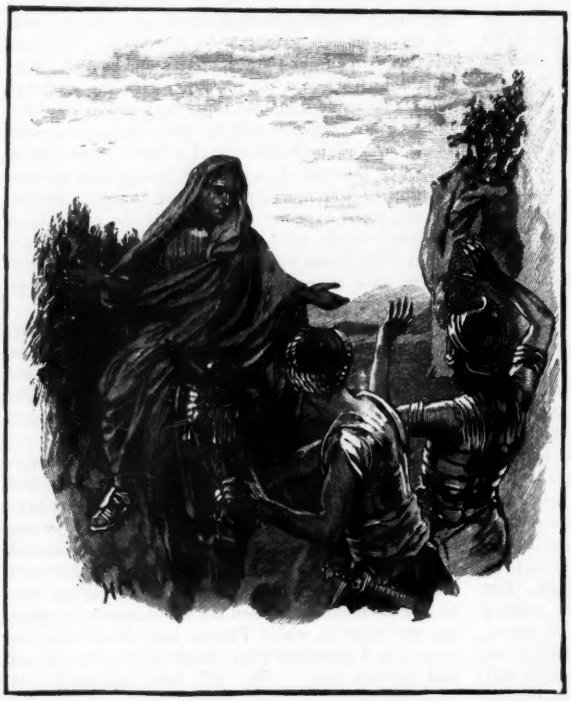
"He stood up. Commonly, I was told, he was a faltering speaker, but that day his words came clear and without hindrance. We know, my brethren, Who was speaking by his lips. He spoke briefly and disdainfully of the other charges, utterly breaking down the evidence, as any other court on earth but that would have held. Then he went on, 'But as to what Opimius has called "the detestable superstition of the Christians," I confess it, affirming at the same time that this same superstition has made me more loyal to all duties, public or private, of a citizen of Rome. I appeal to Cæsar, who hath known me from my boyhood, as one kinsman knows another, and who, being aware of my belief, conferred upon me this dignity of the Consulship, which is next only to his own majesty. I appeal to Cæsar whether this be not so.'

"He turned to Domitian as he spoke. That unchanging flush upon the tyrant's face fortified him, as I have heard it said, against shame. But he kept his eyes fixed upon the ground, and for a while he was silent. Then he said, 'I leave the case of Flavius Clemens to the judgment of the fathers.'

"You will ask, 'Did no one rise to speak for him?' I did see one half-rise from his seat. They told me afterwards that it was one Cornelius Tacitus, a famous writer, but his friends that were sitting by caught his gown and dragged him back, and he was silent. And indeed, speech would have served no purpose but to involve him in the ruin of the accused.

"Then the Emperor spoke again, 'We postpone this matter till to-morrow.' Then turning to the lictors—

"'Lictors,' he said, 'conduct Flavius Clemens to his home. See that you have him ready to produce when he shall be required of you.'



"This, you will understand, was what was counted mercy in those days. A man not condemned was allowed the opportunity of putting an end to his own life. That saved his property for his family. In the evening I went to Flavius's house. He was surrounded by kinsfolk and friends. With one voice they were urging him to kill himself. Even his wife—she was not a Christian, you should know—joined her entreaties to theirs. Perhaps she thought of the money, and it was hard to choose beggary instead of wealth; certainly she thought of the disgrace. Were she and her children to be the widow and orphans of a criminal, or an ex-consul?

"He never wavered for an instant. 'When my Lord offers me the crown of martyrdom,' he said, 'shall I put it from me? That was his one answer; and though before he had been always yielding, and weak of will, he did not flinch a hair's-breadth from this purpose.

"That night, I was told, he slept as calmly as a child. The next day he was taken again to the Senate, and condemned. But I heard that at least half of the senators had the grace to absent themselves. One favour the Emperor granted to him, as a kinsman: he might choose the manner and place of his death. He chose death by beheading, and the third milestone on the road to Ostia. It was then and there that the holy Apostle Paul had suffered; and Paul, whom he had heard in his youth, was his father in the faith. I saw him die; and, besides his memory, that handkerchief, stained with his blood, is all that remains to me of him."

"What answer you to these charges?" said the minister to Verus.

He said nothing; and his silence itself was a confession.

"He turned to fly."—p. 26.

Still, it would have ill become the Church to act in haste. Antistius was asked to give proofs of the identity of the Verus who was present that day with the Verus who had brought about the death of Clemens. The old man told how his suspicions had been first aroused; how a number of circumstances, trifling in themselves, had turned this suspicion into certainty. And he then indicated, though only in outline, his discoveries—that Verus had been following again the same dishonest practices that had brought him into disgrace at Rome. He promised that he would bring the evidence in detail before the Church at some future time.

The accused was still silent.

Then the minister addressed him:—"Verus, you have heard what has been witnessed against you. We do not repent that you were acquitted of the first charges. Be they true or no—and what we have since heard inclines us to believe them—they were not rightly proved. God forbid that the Church should be less scrupulous of justice than the tribunals of the unbeliever; but to the accusations of Antistius you yourself oppose no denial. Therefore hear the sentence of the Church.

"I have thought whether, after the example of the holy Apostle Paul, I should deliver you over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh. I do not doubt either of my power or of your guilt; yet I shrink from such severity. Therefore I simply sever you from the Communion of the Church. Repent of your sin, for God gives you, in His mercy, a place for repentance. Make restitution for aught in which you have wronged your brethren, or them that are without. And now depart!"

The congregation left a wide space, as if to avoid even the chance of touching the garment of the guilty man, as he hurried with his head bent downwards to the door.

When he had gone, the minister addressed the congregation.

"Brothers and sisters," he said, "I cannot doubt but that we shall be soon called to resist unto blood. There are signs that grow plainer every day, that the rulers of this world are gathering themselves together against Christ and His Church. It was but yesterday that I received certain news of that of which we had before heard rumours, to wit, that the holy Ignatius of Antioch suffered at Rome, being thrown to the wild beasts by command of the Emperor. But the fury that begins at Rome spreads ever into the provinces, and it cannot be hoped that we shall escape. We have this day made an enemy, for assuredly Caius Verus will not forget the disgrace that he has suffered, but will betray us, even as Judas betrayed his Lord. Therefore it becomes us to be ready. Provoke not the danger, lest your pride go before a fall. Many a time have they that were over-bold and presumptuous failed in the time of peril, and so have sinned against their own souls and done dishonour to the name of Christ. So far, therefore, as lieth in you, study to be quiet; and assuredly, when the time of need shall come, you will not be the less bold to confess Him who died for you. More I will say, if the Lord permit, when the occasion comes. Should it seem dangerous to meet in this place, I will summon those with whom I would speak to my own home."

connected with the management of the Church affairs followed this address. He then pronounced the blessing, and the congregation dispersed.

CHAPTER III.—A CHRISTIAN HOUSEHOLD.

WE will follow one party of worshippers to their own home, a farmhouse lying about a mile further from the city than the chapel which has been just described. This party consists of four persons, a husband and wife, and two daughters.

The head of this little family is a man who may perhaps count seventy summers. But though seventy years commonly mean much more in the East than they do in our more temperate climate, he shows few signs of age, beyond the white hair, itself long and abundant, which may be seen under his broad-brimmed hat. His tread is firm, his figure erect, his cheek ruddy with health, his eyes full of fire; yet he had seen much service, of one kind or another, during these threescore years and ten. Bion, for that was the veteran's name, was a Syrian by birth. He had followed Antiochus, son of the tributary king who ruled part of Northern Syria under the Romans, to the siege of Jerusalem. A more hot-headed, hare-brained pair than the young prince and his favourite aide-de-camp could not have been found. They laughed to scorn the caution of the Romans in attacking the great city by regular approaches. "We will show you the way in," said the prince to the centurion who showed him the works.

Of course this effort failed. If success had been possible in this way the Romans would have achieved it long before. Scarcely a third of the Syrian contingent came back alive from the forlorn hope to which they had been led. Bion was one of the survivors, but he was desperately wounded, and had not recovered in time to take part in the final assault. He did not lose, indeed, either pay or promotion. Before he was five-and-twenty he was commander-in-chief of the army which the Syrian king was permitted to maintain.

This was a sufficiently dignified post, and his pay, coming as it did from what was notoriously the best furnished treasury in Asia, was ample. He might have been satisfied, if he had been content to be a show soldier. But he was not content; and unfortunately, now that the turbulent Jews had been quieted, it seemed, for good, there appeared no chance of being anything else. His restless spirit led him into intrigues with the Parthians: a compromising letter fell into the hands of the Roman governor, and he had barely time to escape across the Euphrates. The Parthians, with whom he now took service, gave him fighting enough with the wild tribes who were perpetually trespassing over their northern and eastern borders.

Again his reckless valour brought him promotion; and his promotion brought him enemies. An arrow which certainly could not have come from any but his own men, missed him only by a hair's-breadth; two nights afterwards, the cords of his tent were cut, and he narrowly escaped the dagger which was driven several times through the canvas before he could extricate himself from the ruins; and it was nothing but a vague feeling of suspicion, for which he could not account, that kept him from draining a wine-cup which had been poisoned for his benefit. These were hints that it was well to take. He left the camp without saying a word to anyone, and made the best of his way out of Parthia.

The difficulty was where to go. The world in those days consisted of Parthia and Rome, and he was not safe in either. Nothing was left for him, he thought, but becoming a brigand; and a brigand he accordingly became. It was a perilous profession, for the Roman governors of Asia kept a strict look-out, and did not approve of anyone plundering the provincials but themselves. One band after another that he joined was broken up, and at last he bound himself to one in the neighbourhood of Ephesus. His chief here was a young man of singular beauty, and of a fine, generous temper, who had been driven into this lawless life by the oppression of the Roman officials. Bion, who was by some years his senior, formed a great friendship for him, and the two contrived to keep their rough followers in as good order as was possible in a band of brigands.

And now came the strange incident that was to change the course of Bion's future life. The two were watching the road that ran from Ephesus across the heights of Mount Tmolus to Smyrna for a tax-gatherer who was expected to come that way with his money-bags. It was not long before a solitary rider could be seen, slowly making his way along the steep road which wound up the wooded mountain side. The two companions rushed from their hiding-place, and in a few moments were at his side. Bion seized the bridle of his mule, and the chief called upon him to give up all the money that he had with him. The rider, whose figure and face were concealed by a traveller's cloak and cape, answered in a voice of singular sweetness, "Silver and gold have I none, but what I have I give thee." At the same time he threw aside his disguise. If the brigand chief had seen a grinning skull instead of the sweet and loving face, with eyes full of compassion and tenderness, bent upon him, he could not have been more startled. He turned to fly.

The rider dismounted with an agility which no one would have expected from so old a man, followed him, and caught him by the cloak. "Listen to me, my son," he said. "Four years since, I left you in the charge of Polydorus of Smyrna. At the end of two years, when I had finished my visiting of the churches of Asia, I went to Smyrna. They told me that you had left the city. Some said that you had fled to the mountains, and were living by robbing. I went to Polydorus. I said to him, 'Where is the treasure that I left in your hands?' He did not know what I meant. 'You left no treasure in my hands,' he said. 'I left a treasure which the Lord Himself had committed to me,' I answered, 'even the soul of the young man Eucrates.'

"Then I went out to seek you. For if I had trusted it to an unfaithful steward I should have myself to answer for it to my Lord. But now, thanks to our Father and His Christ, I have found it again. And you, my son, will surely not take it from me."

This good shepherd who had thus sought and found his wandering sheep upon the hills was the Apostle St. John. The persuasiveness of this constraining love was such as no one could resist. Before he had finished his appeal the young man was sobbing at his feet. The three returned to Ephesus together, for Bion would not leave his friend, and he too had been touched by some power that he did not understand, which seemed to dwell in the old man's words.

The Apostle was a man of no small influence in Ephesus. His character was of that rare sweetness and beauty which even the world is constrained to love. And with this love a certain awe was mingled. It was rumoured that a Divine protection guarded him from danger. Had he not been thrown into a caldron of burning oil and come out unhurt? Hence he was able with little difficulty to obtain from the Roman governor of the province an amnesty for his two companions, and even to get for Eucrates restitution of the property which had been taken from him. The young man did not forget Bion, but made him the tenant and afterwards the purchaser of a farm which he owned in the neighbourhood of Nicæa.

Meanwhile, Bion had been listening with a heart disposed to conviction to the instructions of St. John. It was the late autumn when he had given up his brigand's life, and he was among the candidates who presented themselves for baptism at the Whitsuntide of the following year.

No more devout and earnest soul was to be found among the converts than Bion. The fiery temper which he shared with the teacher who had brought him to Christ was tamed rather than broken. He had found, too, during his sojourn at Ephesus, earthly happiness as well as heavenly peace.

One of the most trusted lay-helpers of the Church was a devout centurion, who had served under Titus at the siege of Jerusalem. Bion recognised in him, not without a smile at his own foolish boastfulness in times past, the very officer who had been appointed to attend on his master, and who had afterwards helped to nurse him during his tedious recovery. The old comrades were glad to meet again.

But Bion found in Manilius' house a more powerful attraction than friendship. This was the centurion's adopted daughter, Rhoda. Manilius had found her, then a girl of some seven years old, in a burning house on that terrible day when the Holy City was destroyed. Her father, mortally wounded in the last desperate struggle which his countrymen had waged against the Roman storming parties, had crawled back to his home, and the child, made old beyond her years by the dreadful experiences of those months of siege, was sitting by the dying man, and striving in vain to staunch the flow of blood from his wounds.

Anxiety for his child mastered the Jew's hatred of the foreigners. In broken Latin he besought Manilius to be good to his daughter. It was a strange responsibility for a lazy and somewhat reckless soldier, but it seemed to sober him in an instant. He found his Tribune, and obtained permission to take his young charge to the camp. From thence she was transferred as soon as possible to the house of a merchant of his acquaintance at Cæsarea.

No spoil that he could have carried off from the sack of Jerusalem could have proved such a treasure to him as the little Rhoda. She had learnt from her Christian mother, who, happily for herself, had passed to her rest just before Jerusalem was finally invested, some Gospel truths, and Manilius listened with attention which he might not have given to an older teacher when she told him in her childish prattle the story of the life and death of Jesus.

When the rewards for services in the great siege were distributed, he received a permanent appointment at Ephesus. Here he came under the influence of St. John, and here he, his wife, and the little Rhoda were received into the Christian community.

Rhoda was now a beautiful young woman of two-and-twenty; but no suitor had hitherto touched her heart. Bion, in the full strength of his matured manhood, for he was now close upon the borders of forty, with the double romance of his strange conversion and his old life of adventure, took it by storm. The lovers were married on the day after his baptism, and took possession of the Bithynian farm before the end of the year.

Rhoda's story has been given in the story of her husband. She was a woman of a character gentle yet firm, who never seemed to assert herself, whom a casual observer might even suppose to be of a yielding temper, but who was absolutely inflexible when any question of right or wrong, or of the faith which she clung to with a passionate earnestness of conviction, was concerned.

The two girls, Rhoda and Cleoné, were singularly alike in figure and face, and singularly different in character. They were twins, and they had all the mutual affection, one might almost say, the identity of feeling, which is sometimes seen, a sight as beautiful as it is strange, in those who are so related. Rhoda was the elder, and the ruling spirit of the two. This superior strength of will might be traced by a shrewd observer in the girl's face. To a casual glance the sisters seemed so exactly alike as to defy distinction. But those who knew them well never confounded them together. The dark chestnut hair and violet eyes, rare beauties under that Southern sky, the delicately rounded cheeks, with their wild-rose tinge of colour, the line of forehead and exquisitely chiselled nose, modified by the faintest curve from the severely straight classical outline, were to be seen in both. But Rhoda's lips were firmly compressed; Cleoné's were parted in a faint smile; and the gaze of Rhoda's eyes had a directness which her sister's never showed. Rhoda's nature was of the stuff of which saints are made; Cleoné's was rather that which gives peace and sunshine to happy homes. Hitherto the quiet in which the two lives had been passed had given little to occasion anything like a divergence of will. In the small questions that occurred in daily affairs Cleoné had followed without hesitation the lead of her sister. A time was now at hand which was to apply to their affection and to Rhoda's influence a severer test.

WHITTIER'S RELIGIOUS POEMS.

BY A MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

WHITTIER'S BIRTHPLACE.

IN America, John Greenleaf Whittier holds a place of special honour amongst men of letters and amongst poets. He is not a "town poet" in the land where genius congregates in cities. Country born, trained, and domiciled anew, the Quaker poet has derived much of his vigour from his rural surroundings. Round his home the beech, the oak, the chestnut, and maple cluster; and, secluded from a busy Massachusetts village, he enjoys his walks, his books, the converse of his friends. In one of the poems little known yet on this side of the Atlantic he pictures his home scene—

> 'Earth, sky, home's pictures, days of shade and shine,
> And kindly faces to my own uplifting
> The love that answers mine."

He has fought the fight that was for him; he has done the work given him to do; and secure in that conviction, honoured by his contemporaries, and the younger generations who have followed, he enjoys the earthly rest—even with age's pains—that precedes the heavenly.

It is difficult to divide Whittier's poems into "religious" and "secular," for the religious sentiment runs through most. But the American poet—the greatest of the living poets of the New World—has written much verse with a distinctly devotional aim, and it is to this that we have most reference now. He has given us more than one hymn of trust and resignation; he has produced one or two attempts in verse to solve doubts rather than to raise them; he has written two poems of enduring merit on the highest themes; and he has well illustrated phases of the life and history of the religious society with which he has all his life been associated. But there are many poems, also, in which the theme is less directly associated with religious consideration, but from which the poet naturally glides to the consideration of the great issues of life and the grave thoughts of hereafter, so that it is well worth glancing at some of the religious poems, and especially of those the aim of which is apparent.

One of the poems which is less read now than it used to be, but which is typical of Whittier's genius, is the dramatic episode in early Quakerism, in which Barclay of Ury (father of the Apologist Barclay) was insulted and mobbed in his own city of Aberdeen.

After picturing the scene, how the Laird rode up the "streets of Aberdeen" with a furious mob beside him, jeered at, flouted, and cursed by those who had been dependents or servants; how the troop of soldiers came riding by "with broadswords swinging," and how they proposed to—

> "Ride him down,
> Push him, prick him, through the town
> Drive the Quaker coward, when one of them, an old comrade of Ury's lord, came with "ready weapon bare" to help him, but that aid is refused by Barclay, who avows that he can suffer.

> "'Give me joy that in His name
> I can bear, with patient frame,
> All these vain ones offer;
> While for them He suffered long,
> Shall I answer wrong with wrong,
> Scoffing with the scoffer?'"

And so as "towards the Tolbooth prison" the old soldier goes to hear through iron gates poor disciples "preach of Christ arisen," the fine moral is drawn that he is happy whose inward ear is consoled by angel comfortings, and, when the faggots of hatred burn, can discern glimpses through the smoke "of the good hereafter." There are others of this class of picturesque and denominational poems, possibly the best being that entitled "The Quaker Alumni," a poem read at a Friends' school anniversary, a verse of which may be quoted, in which Berkeley, Hopkins, and Channing are described as three shades walking Rhode Island—

> "One holy name bearing, no longer they need
> Credentials of piety, and passwords of creed;
> The new song they sing has a threefold accord,
> And they own one baptism, one faith, and one Lord;"

And in one of the hymns that he has written for the use of others—the "Hymn for the Opening of Thomas Starr King's House of Worship," as the Quaker poet phrases it—he echoes a little the words, for that fine hymn ends with the hope that, in time to be, a sweeter song shall be heard, when "one faith, one hope, one love," together restore "the seamless robe that Jesus wore." And before passing away from this class of Whittier's poems, reference should be made to that noble tribute to Joseph Sturge—

> "Thanks for the good man's beautiful example,
> Who in the vilest saw
> Some sacred crypt or altar of a temple,
> Still vocal with God's law."

In some of his religious verses the poet does not rise to the height that his theme demands; his poem on "The Crucifixion" is polished and fervent, but it contrasts unfavourably with others of higher merit; and the lines on "Palestine," and on the "Cities of the Plain" also fail in such a comparison. But in some of his lyrics Whittier has rare merit. In "Trinitas" he tells how he prayed that he might see "How Three are One and One is Three," and he finds his answer: the sun and air are bestowed on good and evil; the presence of innocence pauses to greet one who has fallen into sin, and a still small voice whispers within him, and he learns that the gifts of sun and air show "the all-compassionate Father;" the white soul stooping to raise the lost one typifies the Christ, and the still small voice "was the Holy Spirit's mystery." So he finds—

> "The equal Father in rain and sun,
> His Christ in the good to evil done
> His voice in thy soul; and the Three are One!"

Another poem of Whittier's, valuable for its lesson as well as for its melody, is that of the "Two Rabbis." In this we have the story of Rabbi Nathan, who, "just as the almond blossomed in his hair," sinned miserably, left his seat, and went out from the congregation "girt about with sackcloth," and went to seek counsel of Rabbi Ben Isaac. When the two Rabbis met, and Nathan confessed he had sinned, Ben Isaac was awe-struck, and laid bare the "mournful secret of his shirt of hair," and added that having himself sinned "in thought if not in act," he was coming to Nathan to claim his prayers. So the two knelt together, and each besought peace for the other, and thus forgetting self, they rose up to see "God's pardon in his brother's face!" Then, in "The Meeting," Whittier justifies not so much the Quaker method of worship he loves but the act of meeting, because—

> "Heart answers heart; in one desire
> The blending lines of prayer aspire:
> 'Where, in My name, meet two or three,'
> Our Lord hath said, 'I there will be.'
> So sometimes comes to soul and sense
> The feeling which is evidence.
> * * * *
> That all our sorrow, pain, and doubt
> A great compassion clasps about,
> And law and goodness, love and force
> Are wedded fast beyond divorce."

Again, in "The Prayer Seeker," the poet tells the story of one who glides along the aisles, and leaves on the desk a scroll which bore the words, "Pray for me," and goes out to "the night from whence she came," and who furnishes the moral, differing from Coleridge's—

> "He prayeth best who leaves unguessed
> The mystery of another's breast.
> Why cheeks grow pale, why eyes o'erflow,
> Or heads are white, thou needst not know.
> Enough to note by many a sign
> That every heart hath needs like thine—
> Pray for me."

There are two poems, longer and more sustained—"The Eternal Goodness," and "Our Master," which are amongst the best of Whittier's religious poems—the melody and versification being very sweet; whilst a few lines from one may exemplify the teaching of both—

> "No fable old, nor mythic lore,
> No dream of bards and seers,
> No dead fact stranded on the shore
> Of the oblivious years;
> But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
> A present Help is He;
> And faith has still its Olivet;
> And love its Galilee!"

This is, perhaps more than any other, the typical teaching of the poems of Whittier—that religion is a present, active belief; that it should be exemplified in the life, and that, whatever the future may bring, the call of duty must be obeyed, but in obedience will be found solace, consolation, hope, and trust. The full humanity of man belongs to the Lord in all its joys and sorrows, and if these are brought to Him, He will reject none. In the silent questioning of the soul, even the wrestlings for the right are found to be from mixed motives; but even when so standing apart, the lesson is that "God's hand controls whate'er thou fearest," and so

XUM

> "In life, in death, in dark and light
> All are in God's care;
> Sound the black abyss, pierce the deep of night,
> And He is there."

It is rather the testimony of the Quakers of old than of those of to-day which Whittier presents; but it is none the less melodiously given, and it is none the less Catholic in spirit and broad in its sympathies.

MY MASTER'S MAN.

A TALENT universally possessed is that of appreciating other people's duties. The science of social criticism to this extent requires no expounder. Belief in a gift is not quite the same thing as having it, but the assurance of being able to determine what ought to be the conduct and demeanour of men and women whom we drag to judgment at our private bar is widespread and inveterate. It will be found in all ranks and relations of life. Writers of Court memoirs make it clear that they know how princes and statesmen should have governed the people over whom they were set. The tenant understands the obligations of the landlord. The curate could compile a code of excellent rules for the vicar, and the vicar for the bishop. All journalists see distinctly the reasonable methods of editing which would insure the success of a newspaper. The clerk and the shopman could be at no loss to arrange the details of a model management. And the youngest domestic in the humblest "Englishman's castle" is prepared to explain in what manner and to what extent authority should be exercised.

There is, however, an offset to this clearness of vision. The eye that takes the widest range, and is surest at defining shortcomings in the character and deportment of those who have the privilege—and thereby the onerous responsibility—of governorship, is apt to fail in distinguishing similar objects that are near. The mists of self-satisfaction hang about the home precincts. My master's man escapes with a lenient and makeshift scrutiny.

For several reasons it may be doubted if this is well. In the interests of Charity, the sweet and gentle maid whose lieges all should be, it is advisable to measure, with some pretensions to accuracy, one's own failures before harbouring ill thoughts of another. Even protest against injustice will be made in more kindly fashion if it is realised that the extirpation of selfishness is everybody's problem. And then it pays in patience and in the grace of humility to seek first for faults to mend at close quarters. To feel how hard a thing it is to adjust fairly conflicting claims of duty and inclination, and how full of flaws is the most conscientious toil in any domain, is a long step towards a serenity of soul that, by simple dignity, can win its own in spite of the opposing frowardness and arrogance of others. Yet, again, my master's man must infallibly gain in the only real capacity which marks progress on Humanity's dial—that of doing true work in a true spirit—by the steady pursuit of self-knowledge.

Alas! slipshod service in every department of human industry abounds. It is a wrong to the community as a whole, to the immediate section—whether a body or a unit—to whom it is rendered, to the man or woman who yields it, and to all who find therein a mischievous example or superficial excuse.

If the ethics of work were better understood, a cure might be found for the malady that has vexed honest, earnest souls in every age. It is possible that my master's man has been trained in one of two schools, either of which has a fundamentally false idea of the meaning and business of work; and that thus he has become the victim of perplexity and disappointment, if not also of chagrin and an Ishmael-like hate of his fellows.

Philosophers recognise the abstract worth of work, and encourage whole-hearted devotion thereto. But for all that, their theory and their counsel are marred by a radical defect. Theirs is the gospel of the main chance. Labour is a means to an end, they affirm, and that end the attainment of wealth and ease, or of fame. No energy can be too great to lavish on the compassing of these results. And if no crown of riches or worldly honour rewards the toiler as his life's sun sinks in the west, he has lived in vain and spent his strength for naught.

It is cruel, disheartening teaching. All men cannot be millionaires, or even wrest a competence from Giant Difficulty. Not to every stout aspirant can the bays be granted. And is the life of my master's man a failure if at the end he is still poor and a nobody?

Has he missed the mark if his treasure, on the last balance, is a peaceful conscience, and the recollection of unflinching performance of every daily duty, and not houses and land, and the praise of the multitude? A deep-rooted instinct in the human heart answers in the negative. Character is the best wealth, and loyal work springing from true motives and solaced by heavenly hopes inevitably moulds this on noble lines.

Not that fame and riches within reasonable limits may not be followed. They may, and often with advantage to mankind at large. Yet, while becoming an objective towards which the most strenuous efforts are bent, the desire to obtain them cannot lawfully take the place of the principle that informs and underlies all true work, whether mean and common as men estimate, or precious and rare.

It will help my master's man wonderfully in his struggles, support him in hours of despondency—and who of us is never shut into the dungeons of Doubting Castle?—and give him an outlook beyond the petty vexations of the moment, to reflect on the purport of labour and the place of even the most obscure toiler in God's economy of creation.

Acceptable work must be thorough and conscientious work, and, in so far as the element of choice may determine, useful and morally gainful work. Fulfilling these conditions in his degree, every craftsman in the world's great hive of industry is in a vital and significant unity with the entire working forces of the universe. It is only the drones, the indifferent, the reckless workers who strike jarring notes in the majestic harmony. Believing in an omnipotent Eye overlooking the vast labour field, and in an omnipotent Hand which through humanity's varied travail shapes a beneficent design, my master's man may know that "the trivial round, the common task," which seem sometimes like dullest drudgery, when honestly accomplished, in a religious spirit, ally him by the bond of a similar and sympathetic obedience with the very highest of created intelligences, and, inasmuch as he serves willingly, and not by the dead fidelity of mechanism, are works wrought upon a loftier level than the law-compelled operations of the mightiest forces of nature. Mean work—that is, true work—this universe, strictly speaking, knows nothing of. It does not exist.

And at the very heart and centre of every kind of service Christianity seeks to put this guiding principle —"as unto the Lord." By its adoption the lowliest occupation is ennobled, and the most commonplace task is rendered beautiful. That is not all. To the Christian toiler in any sphere the gates of promise open. Work well done, continuously done, as in the Master's sight, must have a formative influence upon the character; and who shall say what higher tasks in the land that is very far off to purblind mortal sense await the worker who has been faithful here over a few things? FELIX FERRY.

WORDS OF ONE SYLLABLE.

BY THE REV. TRYON EDWARDS, D.D.

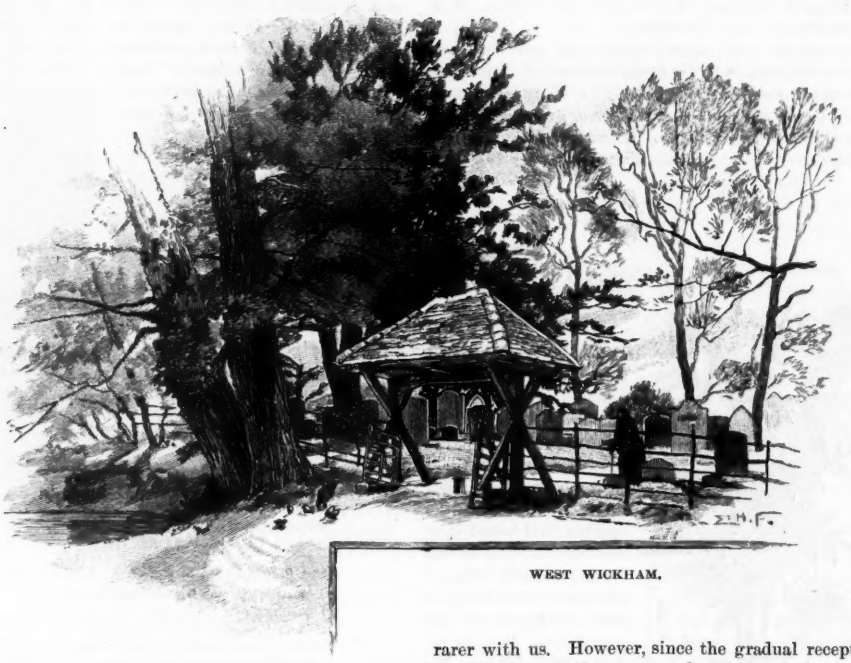
A GENTLEMAN addressing a large gathering of scholars from several schools, was noticed to use words of only a single syllable. A friend who heard of the address, wrote to the speaker, and asked if it was the fact that he had spoken or could write an address of even thirty or forty words, all of one syllable, as it was reported he had done. The following was the reply to the inquiry:—

"I have no time now to tell you where to find the brief speech as to which you ask, nor do I know that I could at once write what you want if I should try, as I do not claim to have much skill in such work; though to write short words, and make fair sense with them, does not need much skill or deep thought; and this truth is shown in what I now send, in a copy of my short speech made to the schools some time since." Here is a sentence of ninety-one words, each of but one syllable.

A lady, saying she thought monosyllables even more expressive than longer words, wrote, to illustrate her idea, the following lines—

"WHAT THOU WILT.

"Not what to me seems good,
Not what my choice would be;
I dare not ask for these,
Lord, when I plead with Thee:
But give what to Thy mind seems best,
And let Thy love not grant the rest.



"Not heaps of gold in store,
Not health, nor friends, nor fame—
I dare not ask for these,
Though sought for in Thy name,
Save as Thou seest such gifts would be Laid at Thy feet in love to Thee.

"My heart is full of needs;
My wants reach out to Thee;
I only plead Thy call,
Thy words of grace to me.
Take from my heart its load of guilt,
Then give me, Lord, what else Thou wilt!"

And the Rev. Dr. Addison Alexander, long a professor in the Theological Seminary of Princeton, New Jersey, being asked if one could write as forcibly in monosyllables as in words of greater length, sat down and wrote, almost without stopping, the following lines—

"Think not that strength lies in the big round word,
Or that the brief and plain must needs be weak;
To whom can this be true who once has heard
The cry for help—the words that all men speak
When want, or woe, or fear is in the throat,
So that each word is gasped out like a shriek
Pressed from the heart, or as a strange, wild note,
Sung by some fay or fiend! There is a strength
Which dies if stretched too far, or spun too fine,
Which has more height than breadth, more depth than length.
Let but this force of thought and speech be mine,
And he that will may take the sleek, fat phrase
Which glows and burns not, though it gleam and shine;
Light but not heat, a flash without a blaze.
Nor is it nought but strength the short word boasts;
It serves for more than wind or storm can tell,
Or roar of waves that dash on rock bound coasts;
The crash of tall trees when the wild winds swell;
The roar of guns; the groans of men that die
On blood stained fields. It has a voice as well
For them that far off on their sick beds lie;
For them that weep, for them that mourn the dead,
For them that dance, and laugh, and clap the hand
To Joy's quick step, as well as Grief's sad tread;
The sweet, plain words we learn at first keep time,
And though the theme be sad, or gay, or grand,
With each, with all, these may be made to chime,
In thought, or speech, or song, or prose, or rhyme.

LYCH-GATES.

WEST WICKHAM.

A LYCH-GATE, or lich-gate, is a gateway, covered with a roof, giving access to a churchyard. In Wales, many, if not most, of the churchyards in which the little old grey churches stand so serenely at the foot of the immutable mountains, or on the borders of the lakes, or on the shores of the great grey sea, are entered through lych-gates. Some of these are ancient; some of them are modern; but the idea of their use and appropriateness, if not necessity, is general. Curiously, although occasionally to be met with in the English counties, they are much rarer with us. However, since the gradual reception of the idea of the power of structural fitness to quicken religious feelings, among other means to the same end, attention has been turned to this proper and picturesque addition to the ordinary features of a churchyard, and several have been erected in various parts of the kingdom. In one instance, in a village in Northumberland, the promoters of the formation of a new cemetery, not desiring the usual chapels on their ground, have built a large lych-gate at the entrance to it, where the mourners can rest and re-arrange their procession conveniently and under shelter. This is at Embleton, the birthplace of Duns Scotus, the great theological disputant in the thirteenth century, the place where stands Dunstanborough Castle, so gallantly defended in the wars of the Red and White roses. There is a fine old church there, very solemn, though gracious-looking, well calculated to excite piety in the minds of those who regard it, as though the old builders had done their best to leave a lasting heritage of incentive; but the churchyard required extension, and the cemetery in question was made to answer that purpose.

There is a new lych-gate at the yew-lined entrance of Morpeth churchyard, dated 1861. There are seats in it, and a memorial inscription, with the text, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." Another lych-gate has been erected not very long ago, at Clifton Hampden. Another, among others, near Preston, quite recently. There is another to the churchyard of the new church of St. Chad, Hopwas, in Staffordshire. And the good Prince Consort caused an open timber lych-gate to be placed at the entrance of Whippingham churchyard, in the Isle of Wight. This is constructed of East Indian teak, and is built on a stone foundation. The gable end of it faces the road. In the more recent Hopwas example the slanting face of the roof is placed cross-ways, to stretch across the road, and the gables, therefore, are at the sides of it.

But the lych-gates we are about to mention specially are the ancient examples left us by those who gave their best and did their best in the days of old. They have stood through all the seasons, in deep snow, with biting blasts, and fierce, hot sunshine alike, just as their builders left them; just as when these were carried through them to their resting-place, and their children and grand-children were carried thither likewise; and just as the grandchildren of these last found them and associated them all their lives long with every thought of their village churches, and left them at last for those who were to come after them. More than three hundred times these ancient gates have seen successive groups of village folk pass through, wishing each other a right merry Christmas, and commenting upon the events of the day. They have seen stately dames wearing farthingales, stomachers, and ruffs; wives with broad beavers and falling bands; women in sacques, hoops, and high-heeled, red-heeled shoes, as reign after reign has passed; men in doublets and trunk hose, in bombards, in knee-breeches, with buckles in their shoes, as the Tudors and Stuarts passed away, and the Hanoverian succession was established. Wind-swept and sun-baked all these years, they have gradually acquired a very venerable and wistful aspect.

There is an interesting example at Beckenham, in Kent, the pleasant village in which Anthony Rawlis built an almshouse for three poor widows in 1693. The church steeple attracts our steps to the sacred edifice, and at the entrance to the churchyard, which has an air of freshness and forestry, stands an ancient lych-gate. It is made of roughly-wrought oak. A sturdy tie-beam stretches across the opening, upheld by a strong post at either end of it. From these oaken posts, or pillars, branch out arched struts, which carry the necessary supports for the rafters of the roof and the eaves. The actual opening to pass through is made into a shoulder-headed outline by a corbel on either side springing from the pillars mentioned. Additional sturdiness is obtained by two sets of struts that rise from the stone footing to the main horizontal beam. The slant-faced roof is hipped on four sides, and finished with a raised saddle-backed ridge. A five-barred gate, opening in the centre, is hung from the strong upright timbers that carry the main beam. We may be sure we see it just as Anthony Rawlis saw it, when, with his compassionate heart full of thoughts for the three poor widows, he built the almshouse for their shelter mentioned above.

There is another lych-gate, or corpse-gate, about four miles from Croydon, at West Wickham. The church and churchyard are about a mile from the village, on the opposite hill. The roof over this gate is also four-sided, but it is plain, or without the saddle-backed ridge that makes the Beckenham example so picturesque; and down the four angles are lines of tiled ridgings. It is also constructed of roughly-hewn oak beams resting on oaken wall-plates, and has the same oaken corbels, and is hung with a six-barred gate opening in the centre.

At Heston, in Middlesex, is an example of a different form. It has a two-sided roof, and is furnished with a central post for the gate, that moves as on a pivot. But it is also made of roughly-hewn timber placed on strong stone footings on which are laid oaken wall-plates. Heston, it will be remembered, adjoins Hounslow, so famous in the annals of the road, through which more than two hundred coaches passed daily less than fifty years ago, and where there was always a relay of horses for the kings on their way to and from Windsor.

HESTON, MIDDLESEX.

There is a small lych-gate, too, at Harrow, not, however, hoary and mellow like these, though it may have replaced one as ancient. The spire of Harrow Church is seen from so many points of view for so many miles in the north and north-west boundaries of the metropolis, that we need scarcely mention this world-known edifice stands on the summit of a hill. Those who visit it (and who does not who can?) climb and climb, past the famous school, the old houses of the "Sir Charles Grandison" period, and the older houses of the "Battle of the Books" period, and the shops and the new villas of to-day, and at last arrive at this gate, whence they pass into the churchyard, and among the tombstones Byron has invested with so much interest; from which height they look down upon a prospect they are not likely to forget.

As mention has been made of Welsh examples, one should be given. There is one, deserted and forlorn, between the edge of some low-lying marshes and the verge of the sea, near Pensarn, in Merionethshire. This is built of stone, and has the appearance of a detached porch at the entrance to the churchyard. The church is floorless, and otherwise in ruins, and the windows are glassless, for service is no longer held in the fabric, and "the wind's clarion and the water's chime" are the only notes that now greet the ear there. Less melancholy, however, is another stone-built example at Llanbedr, about a couple of miles nearer to the bordering mountains, where, used and cared for, it covers the entrance to the churchyard from the village, and forms a fit shelter for Christian mourners.

"THAT IMPUDENT RUTH."

A STORY IN ONE CHAPTER.

MISS GOLIGHTLY and Miss Heloïse Golightly invariably had boiled eggs with their breakfast.

If it were not for this important fact my story could never have been written.

Charlotte had always boiled the eggs exactly as they should be done. But then Charlotte had lived with the Misses Golightly fifteen years. Of course she had had experience. She knew, to the second, how her mistresses liked the eggs done. But Charlotte had had the stupidity—I might say the audacity—to get married. "At her time of life too!" as Miss Golightly said; "one would have supposed a woman of her sense might have known better; but servants never do know when they are well off." Notwithstanding wise counsel she had persisted in her own foolish way, and now Ruth reigned in her stead.

Ruth was young; indeed, Miss Golightly found her too young, and also somewhat flighty. Her flightiness showed itself chiefly in her caps, which had an aspect of jauntiness and smartness quite in contrast with the oval-shaped crocheted mats which had adorned the head of Charlotte.

Poor Miss Golightly! She was housekeeper, being older by three years than Miss Heloïse. Miss Heloïse did not know of the trials of housekeeping or of servants. No doubt this accounted for the fact that she was inclined to be lenient towards Ruth's delinquencies—far too lenient, so Miss Golightly said.

But the eggs; they were the point!

It was at breakfast most especially that Charlotte's ingratitude became apparent, for it was then that Ruth's short-comings were most felt. Ruth could not, or perhaps would not, boil the eggs right. On Tuesday morning they were just a little too soft.

"It's a very sad thing, Heloïse, my dear," sighed Miss Golightly, "that at our time of life we cannot get even an egg boiled aright; and after all these years, too, when Charlotte has done them properly."

Miss Heloïse replied with diffidence. She said, "Don't you think, sister, that as we've had them done right for so long, we ought to—to—well, be a little patient with Ruth? She's younger than Charlotte, you know; she hasn't had such experience."

"Experience, Heloïse?" exclaimed Miss Golightly; "experience?—fiddle-de-dee! It doesn't require experience to boil eggs; it requires obedience to her mistress. I've told her, over and over again, just three minutes and a half—no more, no less."

Then Miss Golightly got up from the table to give the cat her milk. Wednesday morning came, and with it the invariable eggs. Miss Heloïse dared not take the top off her egg; but with a dexterous hand Miss Golightly decapitated hers. As she did so half of it ran trickling down the side of the egg-cup and floated about the plate.

"The same thing over again!" exclaimed Miss Golightly. "You must ring the bell, Heloïse, my dear." Then the old lady proceeded to put salt on the egg, and to replace the top.

The maid appeared at the door.

"Ruth," said her mistress sternly, "if I have to complain of the eggs much oftener, you must leave our service. It's impertinence to bring them in like this—nothing less than impertinence. If you don't choose to go by the kitchen-clock, what is to be done? Eggs at eight a shilling, as they are now! Think of the waste! It is disgraceful of you to behave in this way. Here, take them out, and boil them one minute more; and mind that you hold mine upright in the water with a spoon!"

Ruth hurried out of the room, and the two old ladies sat sipping their tea and waiting for the return of the eggs.

"I am quite sure the girl must do it to annoy us!"

exclaimed Miss Golightly presently. "She doesn't choose to go by the clock."

"But you know, sister," ventured Miss Heloïse, "that the kitchen-clock hasn't a second-hand, and it's rather difficult to calculate half-minutes by the long hand."

"Fiddle-de-dee!" ejaculated Miss Golightly.

"I was noticing only yesterday," continued Miss Heloïse in her measured tones, "that the hands of the kitchen-clock are so far from the face that if you stand by the door the long hand points exactly at the minute, and if you stand at the fireplace it looks in front of the minute. Perhaps this is the reason of Ruth's mistakes."

But as the eggs reappeared at this juncture the argument of Miss Heloïse's defence was interrupted, for the old ladies were ready to apply their energies to their breakfast. Before many days had passed Ruth was in disgrace again. It was the eggs once more, and this time they were too hard.

"We really cannot stand this any longer!" exclaimed Miss Golightly in disgust. "Heloïse, my dear, I shall give that girl warning to-morrow. Now don't make excuses for her," she added with a wave of her hand. "I cannot allow our comfort to be thus destroyed. An uncomfortable breakfast puts me out for the rest of the morning. My dear, it is not good for our health to be so worried!"

But a happy idea had occurred to Miss Heloïse, and after waiting a little while, until her sister's just displeasure had somewhat subsided, she said—

"How would it be to buy an egg-glass? They are made to run three minutes and a half, on purpose to boil eggs by. Give the girl another trial with one of those; after that——"

Miss Golightly was dusting the Chelsea cups on the mantel-piece with a silk duster. She paused thoughtfully.

"Well, it certainly would be a nuisance to have to teach another girl all our ways, and Ruth is getting into them now, it's true!"

"How would it be then, sister," said Miss Heloïse, not too eagerly, "if we were to go into the town this afternoon and choose an egg-boiler at Mason and Jebb's?"

Miss Heloïse got her way. If Miss Golightly ruled the house, Miss Heloïse ruled Miss Golightly, though no one suspected it—least of all Miss Golightly.

That same afternoon the two old ladies walked side by side into the town, and at Mason and Jebb's, not without due discussion and much inspection, a sand-glass was procured.

"You are sure it is arranged to run exactly three minutes and a half?" asked Miss Golightly of the shopman.

"Quite sure, madam; this article is made for the express purpose of boiling eggs."

That evening, when Ruth was taking out the tea-things, Miss Golightly formally presented her with the sand-glass.

"Now, Ruth," she said, "there will be no excuse whatever if the eggs are not always done right. If you bring them in badly cooked again, there will be not a doubt in my mind as to the reason. I shall know you do it to annoy and worry us. Keep this carefully on the kitchen dresser, and always use it!"

Alas! alas! those tiresome eggs had not given the last of their trouble yet. Actually the very next morning when Miss Heloïse, without a moment's misgiving, took the top off her egg, she found it boiled as hard as a bullet.

"Well, Heloïse, my dear, what excuse have you to make for that girl now?" exclaimed Miss Golightly triumphantly. "Did I not assure you she was an impudent hussy? We must certainly get rid of her!" and at this Miss Golightly rose from her chair and rang the bell.

Ruth appeared.

"What do you mean by this?" asked her mistress shortly, pointing to the egg.

"Please, ma'am, I went by the sand-glass."

"How dare you add untruth to impertinence? You went by the glass?"

"Yes, ma'am," and Ruth applied a corner of her apron to her eyes. "But it doesn't seem right nohow!"

"Now, Ruth," said Miss Golightly, assuming her most imposing manner, "you have proved yourself untruthful and impertinent; you show no desire to please us, though we have done our part to make you comfortable. The only remedy is for you to leave us. So, you understand, this day month you quit our service. I hope this will teach you a lesson, and that in future you will at least adhere to the truth when you are corrected for your faults."

Ruth hurried from the room. All the rest of the day she was in dire disgrace. Even Miss Heloïse looked sadly at her, but did not speak. A girl who sheltered her carelessness behind a lie must be shown the error of her way.

The next day was Sunday, and, wonderful to relate, the eggs at breakfast were boiled quite to the turn.

"She's going to try and get a good character out of us," said Miss Golightly.

"Perhaps she feels sorry, and wishes us to think so," said Miss Heloïse.

An hour later the two old ladies, dressed in black silk, their prayer-books in hand, stood ready to go to church. Ruth was summoned to show them out at the front door.

"You have very little cooking to do this morning," said Miss Golightly in a very solemn voice; "let me advise you to take your Bible and read the fifth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles."

Ruth bit her lip, but did not reply; and her mistress marched sedately down the steps.

"The eggs were quite right this morning, Ruth," said Miss Heloïse with a gentle smile, lingering behind for a moment.

"But I didn't go by that sand-glass," said Ruth with a grin.

Miss Golightly's ears were sharp.

"What did Ruth remark?" she asked, as her sister overtook her on the garden path.

"She said she did not boil the eggs by the glass this morning."

"How can you allow that girl to be so saucy?" exclaimed Miss Golightly indignantly. "How dare

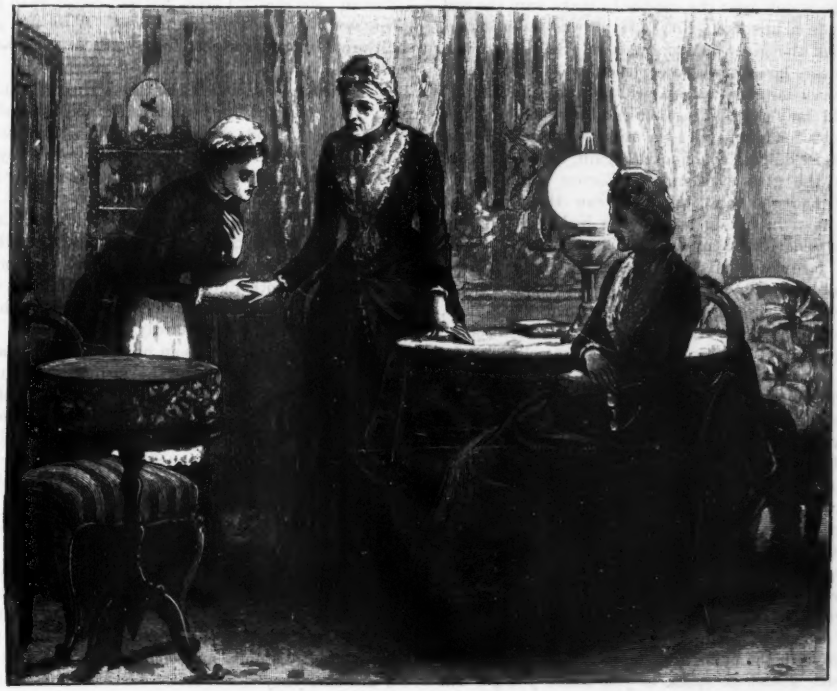
she disobey my orders, when I told her always to use the glass to boil the eggs by?"

"But perhaps the glass isn't right after all."

"I wonder, Heloïse, you can condescend to argue in favour of that impudent girl!"

That was all Miss Golightly deigned in reply, and soon after the two sisters were making their way into church.

It was the custom of these two old ladies to attend the evening service in turns, taking Ruth with them, while the other "kept house." On this particular Sunday evening it was Miss Golightly's turn to stay at home. She had been sitting in the cosy parlour, reading The Quiver; the cat was asleep on the hearth, the canary dozed in its cage. I am not quite sure that Miss Golightly had not enjoyed forty winks herself; but presently she rose from her chair and made her way into the kitchen. Here the fire needed making up, and the clean linen airing on the horse must be turned. These little affairs attended to, Miss Golightly took a good survey of the kitchen.



"H'm, I must admit Ruth is very tidy and very clean," said the old lady to herself. "If only she were truthful, I should be inclined to keep her even now."

At this moment her eyes fell on the little egg-boiler standing amongst the bright tins on the dresser. "What could the impudent girl mean by saying the glass did not do?" she meditated. Then she took up the glass and, turning it upside down, put it on the table. At the same instant she drew out her watch and looked at the time. "I'll sit down here awhile, and see how the glass acts," she thought. So she sat down with the watch and the egg-boiler before her.

Lying open on the table was a Bible. The fly-leaf showed it was Ruth's—a prize awarded her at Sunday-school.

"I wonder if she read the fifth chapter of the Acts," thought her mistress, turning the pages over aimlessly. A small Christmas-card caused the book to fall open where it was placed as a marker. Miss Golightly saw it was in the Epistle to the Ephesians. At the fifth and sixth verses of the last chapter a thick pencil-mark attracted her attention. She read the words: "Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but as servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart." Then scrawled on the margin she read: "Lord, help me to be a Christian servant."

The old lady took off her spectacles and rubbed them—they had become dewy. She had for the moment quite forgotten the egg-boiler. The spectacles

"Ruth with a sudden impulse bent and kissed it."—p. 38.

exclaimed Miss Golightly presently. "She doesn't choose to go by the clock."

"But you know, sister," ventured Miss Heloïse, "that the kitchen-clock hasn't a second-hand, and it's rather difficult to calculate half-minutes by the long hand."

"Fiddle-de-dee!" ejaculated Miss Golightly.

"I was noticing only yesterday," continued Miss Heloïse in her measured tones, "that the hands of the kitchen-clock are so far from the face that if you stand by the door the long hand points exactly at the minute, and if you stand at the fireplace it looks in front of the minute. Perhaps this is the reason of Ruth's mistakes."

But as the eggs reappeared at this juncture the argument of Miss Heloïse's defence was interrupted, for the old ladies were ready to apply their energies to their breakfast. Before many days had passed Ruth was in disgrace again. It was the eggs once more, and this time they were too hard.

"We really cannot stand this any longer!" exclaimed Miss Golightly in disgust. "Heloïse, my dear, I shall give that girl warning to-morrow. Now don't make excuses for her," she added with a wave of her hand. "I cannot allow our comfort to be thus destroyed. An uncomfortable breakfast puts me out for the rest of the morning. My dear, it is not good for our health to be so worried!"

But a happy idea had occurred to Miss Heloïse, and after waiting a little while, until her sister's just displeasure had somewhat subsided, she said—

"How would it be to buy an egg-glass? They are made to run three minutes and a half, on purpose to boil eggs by. Give the girl another trial with one of those; after that——"

Miss Golightly was dusting the Chelsea cups on the mantel-piece with a silk duster. She paused thoughtfully.

"Well, it certainly would be a nuisance to have to teach another girl all our ways, and Ruth is getting into them now, it's true!"

"How would it be then, sister," said Miss Heloïse, not too eagerly, "if we were to go into the town this afternoon and choose an egg-boiler at Mason and Jebb's?"

Miss Heloïse got her way. If Miss Golightly ruled the house, Miss Heloïse ruled Miss Golightly, though no one suspected it—least of all Miss Golightly.

That same afternoon the two old ladies walked side by side into the town, and at Mason and Jebb's, not without due discussion and much inspection, a sand-glass was procured.

"You are sure it is arranged to run exactly three minutes and a half?" asked Miss Golightly of the shopman.

"Quite sure, madam; this article is made for the express purpose of boiling eggs."

That evening, when Ruth was taking out the tea-things, Miss Golightly formally presented her with the sand-glass.

"Now, Ruth," she said, "there will be no excuse whatever if the eggs are not always done right. If you bring them in badly cooked again, there will be not a doubt in my mind as to the reason. I shall know you do it to annoy and worry us. Keep this carefully on the kitchen dresser, and always use it!"

Alas! alas! those tiresome eggs had not given the last of their trouble yet. Actually the very next morning when Miss Heloïse, without a moment's misgiving, took the top off her egg, she found it boiled as hard as a bullet.

"Well, Heloïse, my dear, what excuse have you to make for that girl now?" exclaimed Miss Golightly triumphantly. "Did I not assure you she was an impudent hussy? We must certainly get rid of her!" and at this Miss Golightly rose from her chair and rang the bell.

Ruth appeared.

"What do you mean by this?" asked her mistress shortly, pointing to the egg.

"Please, ma'am, I went by the sand-glass."

"How dare you add untruth to impertinence? You went by the glass?"

"Yes, ma'am," and Ruth applied a corner of her apron to her eyes. "But it doesn't seem right nohow!"

"Now, Ruth," said Miss Golightly, assuming her most imposing manner, "you have proved yourself untruthful and impertinent; you show no desire to please us, though we have done our part to make you comfortable. The only remedy is for you to leave us. So, you understand, this day month you quit our service. I hope this will teach you a lesson, and that in future you will at least adhere to the truth when you are corrected for your faults."

Ruth hurried from the room. All the rest of the day she was in dire disgrace. Even Miss Heloïse looked sadly at her, but did not speak. A girl who sheltered her carelessness behind a lie must be shown the error of her way.

The next day was Sunday, and, wonderful to relate, the eggs at breakfast were boiled quite to the turn.

"She's going to try and get a good character out of us," said Miss Golightly.

"Perhaps she feels sorry, and wishes us to think so," said Miss Heloïse.

An hour later the two old ladies, dressed in black silk, their prayer-books in hand, stood ready to go to church. Ruth was summoned to show them out at the front door.

"You have very little cooking to do this morning," said Miss Golightly in a very solemn voice; "let me advise you to take your Bible and read the fifth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles."

Ruth bit her lip, but did not reply; and her mistress marched sedately down the steps.

"The eggs were quite right this morning, Ruth," said Miss Heloïse with a gentle smile, lingering behind for a moment.

"But I didn't go by that sand-glass," said Ruth with a grin.

Miss Golightly's ears were sharp.

"What did Ruth remark?" she asked, as her sister overtook her on the garden path.

"She said she did not boil the eggs by the glass this morning."

"How can you allow that girl to be so saucy?" exclaimed Miss Golightly indignantly. "How dare

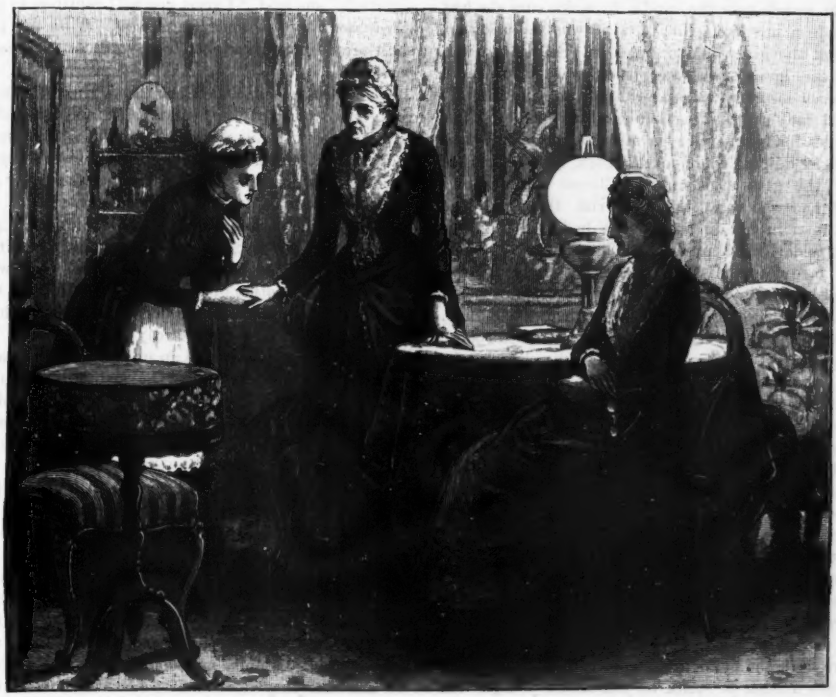
she disobey my orders, when I told her always to use the glass to boil the eggs by?"

"But perhaps the glass isn't right after all."

"I wonder, Heloïse, you can condescend to argue in favour of that impudent girl!"

That was all Miss Golightly deigned in reply, and soon after the two sisters were making their way into church.

It was the custom of these two old ladies to attend the evening service in turns, taking Ruth with them, while the other "kept house." On this particular Sunday evening it was Miss Golightly's turn to stay at home. She had been sitting in the cosy parlour, reading The Quiver; the cat was asleep on the hearth, the canary dozed in its cage. I am not quite sure that Miss Golightly had not enjoyed forty winks herself; but presently she rose from her chair and made her way into the kitchen. Here the fire needed making up, and the clean linen airing on the horse must be turned. These little affairs attended to, Miss Golightly took a good survey of the kitchen.



"H'm, I must admit Ruth is very tidy and very clean," said the old lady to herself. "If only she were truthful, I should be inclined to keep her even now."

At this moment her eyes fell on the little egg-boiler standing amongst the bright tins on the dresser. "What could the impudent girl mean by saying the glass did not do?" she meditated. Then she took up the glass and, turning it upside down, put it on the table. At the same instant she drew out her watch and looked at the time. "I'll sit down here awhile, and see how the glass acts," she thought. So she sat down with the watch and the egg-boiler before her.

Lying open on the table was a Bible. The fly-leaf showed it was Ruth's—a prize awarded her at Sunday-school.

"I wonder if she read the fifth chapter of the Acts," thought her mistress, turning the pages over aimlessly. A small Christmas-card caused the book to fall open where it was placed as a marker. Miss Golightly saw it was in the Epistle to the Ephesians. At the fifth and sixth verses of the last chapter a thick pencil-mark attracted her attention. She read the words: "Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but as servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart." Then scrawled on the margin she read: "Lord, help me to be a Christian servant."

The old lady took off her spectacles and rubbed them—they had become dewy. She had for the moment quite forgotten the egg-boiler. The spectacles were soon on again, and half mechanically she continued reading where she had left off. She read as far as the ninth verse:—"And ye masters do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening, knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with Him."

Again the spectacles required rubbing. But suddenly, during the process, Miss Golightly caught sight of the sand-glass. It was still running. She looked at her watch. Surely she must have mistaken the time! It was five minutes since she had last looked at it, and still the sand was running! She held the watch near the candle to make sure she had not made a mistake. No; now it was six minutes. She took the glass up and shook it. Still it ran on. Dear, dear, how very strange it all was! Now more than seven minutes had passed, yet the sand ran on! The old lady sat shaking her head and rubbing her spectacles for nearly six long minutes more, and then at last, in despair, she looked again, and found the top of the glass was empty. Eleven minutes and a half had the sand taken to run through. The young man in Mason and Jebb's had sold them an article under false pretences. That was bad; but worse, far worse, Miss Golightly had judged Ruth without a hearing, and had accused her of falsehood. She rose, replaced the egg-boiler on the dresser, then, candle in hand, she went upstairs to her bed-room.

When Miss Heloïse returned from church she found the parlour unoccupied, except by the cat, who was warming her paws on the fender.

According to invariable custom, Miss Golightly read family prayers that evening. Miss Heloïse sat on her own chair by the fire; Ruth, very upright, on the edge of another by the door. Miss Golightly always read in clear, decisive tones, as became her character; but, strange to say, there was a slight hesitation in her voice to-night. Her mind appeared preoccupied.

The Lord's Prayer and the Grace were ended, the last Amen said, and Ruth—murmuring, "Will you require anything more, ma'am?"—was just about to leave the room, when Miss Golightly made a slight gesture with the hand, and stepped towards the door.

"Ruth, I wish to speak to you before you go," she said.

The girl trembled; she felt something awful was about to follow.

"I wish to tell you, Ruth," continued Miss Golightly, "that I am sorry I did not take steps to find out whether the sand-glass acted properly before I accused you of falsehood. I am an old woman, and perhaps a proud one, but, by God's grace, I am not too old or too proud to learn a lesson. I trust in future my judgments will be more just."

What a strange girl was Ruth! at this point she stifled a suppressed sob. It was Miss Heloïse's spectacles this time which became dewy and required to be immediately rubbed.

"Heloïse, my dear," said Miss Golightly, turning towards her sister, "while you were at church I tried the egg-boiler. It took very nearly thirteen minutes for the sand to run through. So, you see, I was wrong to accuse Ruth of untruthfulness so hastily."

Then the old lady turned and held out her hand to the girl. Her demeanour showed a strange mixture of its wonted stateliness, added to which was a touching softness in the expression of her face.

"Ruth," she said, "I trust you will continue to pray Lord, make me a Christian servant. I, on my part, shall pray, from this night, Lord, make me a Christian mistress."

The old lady had placed her thin wrinkled hand in the girl's stout red one; and Ruth, with a sudden impulse, bent and kissed it. Then she bolted suddenly out of the room; her feelings were beyond restraint, and, once in her own kitchen, she threw herself on to a chair to enjoy a good cry.

A few moments later the two old ladies, each with her silver candlestick, mounted the stairs to their respective bedrooms. On the landing, as was their wont, they bade one another good-night. Miss Heloïse, with her hand on her sister's shoulder, pressed her withered cheek against her own, hardly less withered, and kissed her twice. This was an unusual demonstration of affection, for as a rule the sisters only interchanged one kiss. Though neither spoke to the other, they understood its meaning. Miss Golightly meant: "I have had a sharp fight, but I gained the victory." And Miss Heloïse meant: "Sister, to my love and respect for you has this night been added veneration."

How well the old ladies slept that night, and how peculiarly good the eggs were the next morning!—just cooked to a turn. But directly after breakfast Miss Heloïse, whose mission in life seemed to be making excuses for other persons' delinquencies, disappeared into the kitchen. "Ruth," she said, "I'm going to put that egg-boiler down into the fender for a good long while. We must not scold Mason and Jebb till we are sure they deserve it. You see, now watches are so cheap, no doubt this glass has been in their shop a long while, and has got damp—so damp that the sand sticks, and doesn't run through evenly."

Miss Heloïse's theory was correct, and thus Mason and Jebb were saved a scolding.

Of course Ruth did not leave at the end of a month. In fact, she stayed several years in the service of the Misses Golightly. Then she proved to all the world how well Miss Golightly had judged her—for she did a very flighty thing—she got married!

Let us hope her successor boils the dear old ladies' eggs exactly three minutes and a half.

Hark, the Notes of Angels Singing.

Saints and angels thus united Songs imperfect still must raise:
Though despised on earth and slighted,
Jesus is above all praise.

Filled with holy emulation,
Let us vie with those above;
Sweet the theme—a free salvation!
Fruit of everlasting love.

Endless life in Him possessing,
Let us praise His precious name;
Glory, honour, power, and blessing,
Be for ever to the Lamb.

A SORROWFUL COMFORTER.

BY THE REV. FREDERICK HASTINGS.

"I CANNOT see the doctor. I don't want to see him. I know what he will say. He will tell me Archie has no chance for life. I won't believe it. He cannot, must not, die. I cannot do without him, He is so true, so manly, so dear to me. I have waited so long for him. He must recover, and we shall yet be married. I don't want to see the doctor unless he can tell me there is great hope;" so spake a beautiful maiden of twenty-three summers. Her affianced was just hanging between life and death, prostrate from brain fever, the result of over-effort in a department for which he was responsible in a great house. He was highly valued by the principals, and, indeed, by everyone with whom he came in contact. He was most useful in church work too, and "made time" to help when he could not spare it. It was a great blow to a large circle when he was stricken down.

But the blow was most severe to the one he had loved so faithfully, and to whom in a month or two he was to have been married. Hence her strong words and refusal to see the medical man. When he came she went out of the room, and directly he left would go back and minister gently to the one whom she loved more than life. She did not weep or fret, but only did everything she could to try and help to the restoration of the stricken one.

Poor girl; her hopes were vain. The dark shadow fell. The manly face was pallid and still in death. Minnie Martin was left to a bitter blank of loneliness. She carried a widow's heart, but wore no widow's weeds. For a time her eyes were dry. The blow had so stunned her that tears seemed denied. The ease they would have brought to her heart was not obtained at first. She was dazed with grief. Friends feared for her reason. Sunday came just after the death of her Archie. He had been a member of the choir. Minnie would go to church, as she thought she would be able to hear, as of old, his voice. She listened for it. She fancied she heard it. "Ah! he is singing among the angels now," she said, "and will not again sing on earth." Still no tears came.

The minister had spoken of what Christ suffered, and of how, by suffering, He was able to sympathise with us; of how, by trying to cheer others, our own burdens are often lifted; of how, while we strive to do God's will, we are enabled to say, "Thy will be done." The stricken-hearted girl listened, and at the close went and thanked the preacher, saying, "I will try and do God's will and bear trial in His strength."

That morning special prayer had been offered for another who was dangerously ill. Minnie Martin noticed this; found out who it was. The invalid was a most estimable man, who was gradually yielding to the power of a fell disease, one who, it was said, could not live many days. He would have to leave a large and loving family. His wife kept from him the fact that the doctor said his case too was hopeless. She carried alone the heavy burden, and kept back all signs of sorrow in his presence. Minnie Martin heard of this, and resolved she would go and try and comfort one who had so much to bear. So, with weakened frame and bleeding heart, this noble girl went to the house of the invalid. When she met in the parlour Mrs. Shepstone, whose husband was so ill, she said, "I came, dear Mrs. Shepstone, to see if I could render any help to you, or at least say a word that would help you to bear the great trial that seems coming on you."

"You came to comfort me! why, my dear girl, you have sorrow enough of your own. I know what a terrible loss you have had. How can you think of me at such a time?"

"God has given me strength thus far. My loss is overwhelming. I must do something, and go out of myself, or I think I should go mad. The Saviour enables me to try and say, "Thy will be done," and He will help you to say it also. He goes with one through the dark valley. Oh! I could not have believed it. I dared not contemplate the possibility of my loss, but it has come; and yet, though I feared as I entered into the cloud, I can hear a voice of divine consolation out of the cloud. I see, like the disciples on Tabor, "Jesus only."

Thus she spoke. Mrs. Shepstone looked at her in amazement, and listened in silence. Then a tear of deep emotion stole down her cheek, as she thought of how this poor stricken-hearted girl had come to her, even from the bedside of death, to try and console her in the impending sorrow of widowhood. Minnie Martin caught sight of the tear. Further utterance was choked. She took hold of Mrs. Shepstone's hand, and, putting the other arm round her neck, she bent her head down and burst into tears. Both shed copious tears, and both hearts were somewhat relieved by their mutual sorrow and sympathy. They both prayed, "Lord, still give us strength; still uphold us by Thy free spirit."

Two days after, when there came the trying moment of parting with the remains of poor dead Archie, Minnie, to the surprise of all, was able to maintain a composure which would have been unnatural had it not been that it was the outcome of faith in Christ as the resurrection—a faith that "overcometh the world," a faith that "giveth the victory."

NOT FORGOTTEN.*

ALONG the margin of the winding stream
I wander as the light grows dim;
Around me floats, as in a dream,
The happy birds' soft vesper hymn.
Grey shadows fall along the dewy fields,
By many a bank and grassy plot,
Where shining sprays of palest tender blue
Whisper, Good-night—Forget-me-not.

Forget me not, sweet heart, in years to come,
As life grows hard with toil and care,
Or, when thy loved ones swiftly pass away
Into the unseen Silent Land.
Still call to mind the old bright summer days
Of long ago, when all was fair.
Walk in the love and fear of God, true heart,
So shalt thou find some loving hand,
Some loving heart, how lone soe'er thy lot,
To whisper, as Night comes, Forget me not!

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

NEW SERIES.

No. 19. Defeat at Ai.

To read—Joshua vii. 1—12. Golden Text—Psalm cxix. 36.

I.  HE DEFEAT. (1—5.) So far all had prospered with Joshua and the Israelites. Had crossed the Jordan safely, entered the land, taken great city of Jericho. Now prepare for new victories. Ai the next city. Joshua sends men to view it and come back and report. What do they say?

The city is small—easy to take.

The people are few—whole army not needed to secure possession of it.

Thus two faults committed—

(a) They despised the enemy.

(b) They sought not counsel of God.

Result—(a) Disaster—Israelites put to flight.

(b) Alarm—all the people dismayed and afraid.

II. The Humiliation. (6—9.) Joshua and the elders at once do the right thing.

(a) They repair to the ark—the presence of God.

(b) They fall to the earth—i.e., humble themselves.

(c) They acknowledge God's hand in this judgment.

(d) They put dust on their heads in token of shame.

(e) They seek God's counsel.

What does all this show on their part?

(a) Piety—to seek God in all things.

(b) Sincerity—they spend the whole day in prayer.

(c) Zeal for the honour of God's name.

III. The Sin. (10—12.) God never sought in vain. Answers at once. Joshua must rise—there is work for him to do. God tells him all about it.

(a) The cause. Israel has sinned—transgressed God's covenant. He had promised to help them if they obeyed Him.

The sin was taking some of the spoil of Jericho, called the "accursed thing," because devoted to the Lord—had done this secretly—taken it into the camp.

(b) The effect. The people defeated by their enemies.

God's presence removed till the sin be destroyed.

Who was it that had done this? (See ver. 1.)

Notice the steps in Achan's sin? (See ver. 21.)

(a) He saw the gold and beautiful dress.

(b) He coveted them.

(c) He took them home to his tent.

(d) He involved his family in the sin.

(Notice how his sin followed the same steps as Eve's. She saw, longed for, took, gave to Adam—the forbidden fruit.)

What a solemn warning to all.

Lessons. 1. Thou shalt not covet.

2. Be content with such things as ye have.

3. Thou God seest me.

4. Be sure your sin will find you out.

No. 20. Caleb's Inheritance.

To read—Joshua xiv. 5—15. Golden Text—Psalm xxxvii. 3.

I. Caleb's Claim. (5—12.) About five years passed since events in last lesson. Israelites under Joshua gone on conquering the land—been divided among the different tribes—Levi alone having no share—Levites dwelling in selected cities among the people so as to teach them the fear of God. Each man now settled on his own farm, sitting under his own vine and fig-tree. Country rich in cattle and flowers—milk and honey—sheep also abundant on mountain slopes. Now Caleb comes forward with special claim to his old comrade Joshua. Remind how these two had been the faithful spies, and how Caleb had specially urged the people to be brave, and trust in God's help to take the land at once (Num. xiii. 30), but all in vain. This was when they came to Kadesh-barnea, borders of Canaan, one year after leaving Egypt. Caleb then forty years old. Forty-five years passed since then—forty years in wilderness (during which all except him and Joshua had died who came out of Egypt) and five in Canaan. What does he say to Joshua?

1. He reminds him of God's Word to Moses in Kadesh (Num. xiv. 24.)

2. Of his own faithfulness in following God.

3. Of Moses' promise to give him an inheritance.

4. He tells of his own strength for war.

5. He asks for this particular land of Hebron.

6. He promises to drive out the fierce Anakims.

What has all this to do with us?

1. Temporal blessings. These often promised in Bible to those who fear God. Examples.

Abraham promised land of Canaan. (Gen. xvii. 8.)

Solomon—riches and honour, because asked for wisdom. (1 Kings iii. 11.)

Obedient children to dwell long in the land. (5th Commandment.)

So to Christians in the New Testament. (1 Tim. iv. 8, etc.)

2. Faithfulness. God's promise must be kept though forty-five years had passed. How often would Caleb have looked forward to this time of quiet and peaceful rest! So shall God reward all his servants with rest when life's warfare is over.

II. Caleb's Reward. (13—15.) Joshua granted Caleb's request and Hebron was given to him. Why would he so much value this place?

1. Here Abraham had built an altar. (Gen. xiii. 18)

2. God appeared to Abraham and promised him a son. (Gen. xviii. 1.)

3. Here Abraham was buried. (Gen. xxv. 9.)

4. Land was fertile, as shown by grapes of Eshcol. (Num. xiii. 23.)

Therefore the land was full of holy associations—was suitable from its fertility—some enemies still remained to be conquered.

So this good and brave old man settled in the land and began at once to drive out the sons of the giants (xiv. 13—17), and thus won and kept his inheritance.

LESSONS. 1. This earth is not our rest.

2. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.

No. 21. HELPING ONE ANOTHER.

To read—Joshua xxi. 43—45; xxii. Golden Text—Gal. vi. 2.

I. ISRAEL SETTLED. (xxi. 43—45.) At last the Israelites settled in Canaan, 450 years since God's first promise to Abraham, 260 years since Jacob went down to Egypt, 47 years after the Exodus from Egypt. Notice—

1. They had all that God had promised. (Gen. xiii. 15.)

2. Their enemies were all conquered.

3. God's faithfulness and truth stood firm.

And he is the same God "yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

II. THE TRIBES SENT HOME. (xxii. 1—9.) Remind of the two and a half tribes whose land was to be on the east of Jordan. What had they promised to do?

(a) To fight for their brethren.

(b) Not to leave them till they were settled.

Then to return and take possession of their own land.

The time now come for them to leave. Joshua speaks parting words.

(a) He commends them—they had been faithful.

(b) He speeds them on their way.

(c) He exhorts them to continue to serve God.

(d) He rewards them with the spoil taken.

What lessons may we learn from them?

1. Fidelity—to keep our promises.

2. Help—to assist our friends in need.

3. Patience—to wait for our reward.

These three equally important for spiritual life.

We have vowed ourselves to God—keep faithful.

We must help others on way to heaven.

We must patiently wait for promised rest.

III. THE ALTAR SET UP. (10—34.) The tribes depart and get as far as the Jordan. They come to the same place where Israelites had crossed. (Ver. 11.) There they build a great altar exactly like the one in the Tabernacle. (Ver. 29.) Why did they build it?

Not for burnt offerings—only allowed at the Tabernacle. (Ver. 26.) But for a memorial of the past, and to be a witness for the future. But at first this altar gave great offence to the Israelites. What did they do?

Prepared for war to avenge the wrong doing—showing zeal.

Send a priest and ten princes to reason with them—showing discretion.

How the deputation addresses them.

(a) Why have they built this altar—turning away from God?

(b) Have they forgotten the idolatry at Peor, and the plague sent (Num. xxiii. 3.), and Achan's sin and punishment?

(c) Let them return and live amongst the others rather than do this?

Listen to their reply. They appeal to God who knows all things. The altar is built in all innocence for two objects. (a) Memorial—to keep in remembrance God's past dealings. (b) Instruction — to teach their children to fear God.

The explanation received with gladness and contentment, and the deputation departed in peace.

LESSONS. 1. Appearances sometimes deceptive. Always make full inquiry before blaming others.

2. Benefit of a soft answer. It turns away wrath.

No. 22. THE COVENANT RENEWED.

To read—Joshua xxiv. 14—28. Golden Text—Joshua xxiv. 24.

I. EXHORTATION TO SERVE GOD. (14, 15.) Joshua quite an old man, 110 years. (Ver. 29.) Knows he must soon die—anxious for the people—makes a farewell address. Bids them be decided.

(a) God must be served with a whole heart. He must have our best love—must be first or nowhere.

(b) Sin must be put away. Their ancestors beyond the flood (i.e., River Euphrates crossed by Abraham) gave up false gods. So must they—

(c) Choose once and for all whom they would serve.

II. REASONS FOR SERVING GOD. (16—18.) 1. For what He has done. What?

He brought them out of Egypt. He worked great miracles for them—Red Sea, manna, water, etc. He preserved them from their enemies. He drove out the Canaanites and brought them in.

2. For what He is. He is their God. So they will serve Him.

May not we say the same? What has He not done for us?

Given food and all temporal mercies. (Rom. viii. 32.)

Redeemed our life from destruction. (Ps. ciii. 4.)

Put down Satan under our feet. (Rom. xvi. 20.)

III. DIFFICULTIES OF SERVING GOD. (19—24.) People must not think it an easy thing to serve God.

(a) He is a holy God—cannot look on the least sin. Are they prepared to give up all sin?

(b) He is a jealous God. Will they give Him undivided service.

(c) He punishes sin. He will consume those who forsake Him. So the choice is again put before the people. What is their decision? Notice that this choice for them and all must be—

(a) Voluntary, and not of compulsion.

(b) Individual—must decide for ourselves.

Ask God for grace to make it now.

Examples of those who made the choice and left it—Saul, King of Israel, began well, but disobeyed God. Judas became disciple; fell through love of money. Demas forsook Christianity, loving the world too well. (2 Tim. iv. 10.)

Examples of those who made the choice and kept it—Joseph—good son, brother, slave, prince. Moses—faithful in ungodly palace. (Heb. xi. 25.) Samuel—served God from childhood to old age.

He'll make your wants His care."

A WALK DOWN A CHINESE STREET.

BY THE REV. W. T. A. BARBER, M.A., MISSIONARY AT WUCHANG, CENTRAL CHINA.

A CHINESE STREET.

A CONFUCIANIST SCHOLAR.

COME with me down the main street of the city in which I live. It is in the heart of China, uncontaminated by the hybrid influences of foreign trade. Not here will you see the many English signboards of wondrous spelling and miraculous grace the streets of the coast ports. Not here, as in Hongkong or Shanghai, will you buy your wares of Cheap Jack & Co., Ship Chandlers, or Happy Tom & Co., Limited, Tailors & Outfitters, nor will you get your bread from Sing Song, European Loafer. It is true that one unhappy wight, aiming at the mysterious reputation attaching to foreign goods, has raised an English signboard even here in Wuchang. Often did it puzzle me as I read—until one day an older resident suggested that I should read it backwards, and then I realised that somebody with an unpronounceable name, Senior, Chinese Storekeeper, dwelt within. Still this is but the fly in the pot of ointment. Let us be as exclusive as the Chinaman himself, and banish all signs of the "foreign devil," while we see China pure and unalloyed.

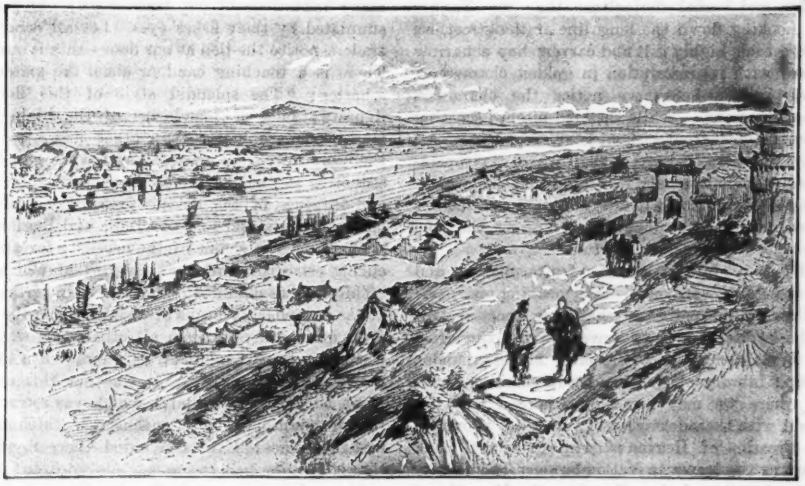
Streets from six to twelve feet wide, filled from morning to night with a ceaseless throng. Every man is black-haired, the fore-part of his head is shaven, while behind him hangs the long queue imposed by the Manchu conquerors. Here come the coolies, in blue jackets and blue knickerbockers, barefooted or straw-sandalled, with a bamboo across the shoulders, carrying heavy weights, and singing, "Eh ho, ah ho, ay ho-li!" like all the brethren of their craft east of the Mediterranean. This man with long flowing robe, wide sleeves, huge horn-rimmed spectacles, slow swaggering gait, languid-fluttering fan, evidently a very important person indeed, is in fact a Confucianist scholar. Here totters along a woman on her tiny three-inch feet, clad in gay embroidered jacket and delicate silk skirt, perhaps a small silver-mounted tobacco-pipe in her hand, her head adorned with strange hirsute structures like a carving-knife, a trencher, a flying swallow, or what not, a touch of rouge to cheeks and lips, while white powder gives mistiness to full-fleshed facial charms. Here a small boy, if it be winter, gaily dressed in brilliant colours, a perfect ball of many wrappings—if it be summer, equally gaily dressed in the not unbecoming garb of his yellow skin alone.

For vehicles look at yon sedan chair, borne by two or three men. In it sits a gentleman, elegantly clad in white or flowered silk or in costly furs, according to the season. If there be four or even eight bearers you will have timely warning, for this is a mandarin; before him runs a motley crowd of retainers beating gongs, carrying tablets inscribed "Be silent," "Make way." Villainous-looking fellows, with steeple-crowned Guy Fawkes' hats, armed with whips, mouthing out uncouth cries, are the lictors of the great man. Others carry the great silk umbrella, the badge of office, meant for the official, should he ever wish to move his heavy well-fed body, with its impassive self-content, from his chair. This is an event which rarely occurs; in fact, it is an awful thought to an Englishman that sitting in a chair and scolding are the most violent forms of exercise in which a mandarin ever indulges. On the breast of his handsome silk robe he bears embroidered some strange bird or beast, which marks his rank; on his hat a button, blue, red, crystal, or gold, according to his dignity, and, if he be distinguished, a one-eyed or even two-eyed peacock's feather. Occasionally some disturber of the peace, spied flagrante delicto from the chair, is promptly thrown down in the street, stripped and beaten.

Here comes clattering and jingling along a small pony, which bears a military official; none but one accustomed to the rough life of camps would use so fatiguing a mode of locomotion. This miserable unkempt being, howling a dismal ditty, and rattling together two bamboo slips, is a beggar. It is as well to give him the microscopic dole he claims, for he will stay there, inert but vocal, till he gains his point. Such a one has been known to commit suicide in a determinately parsimonious shop in order to bring its owner into trouble with the authorities.

Avoid this man carrying odorous buckets through the crowd; his burden is liquid manure, which will shortly fertilise the gardens outside the city; so hold your nose and look at the stalls—for, narrow as are the streets, there are numerous stalls, fixed or moving.



Here is the barber, the best patronised of all the tradesmen of China. There are the little portable hot-water stands, and other implements of his trade, and at every street corner he may be seen shaving the head, combing the tresses, plaiting the queue, and shampooing the back of his clients.

Here is the stall of the quack doctor, who sells phials full of abomination to the unsuspecting crowd. His surgical operations are calmly carried on amidst the bustle of the street. Now he grubs about in some poor patient's inflamed eye, and pretends to extract maggots; now he digs needles an inch or two into all parts of an afflicted frame, with the inquiry, "Now you feel better, don't you?" or again, he prescribes pills to be taken eighty a day until relief ensues.

Here is a dentist with a large tray of ancient extracted molars and incisors, "pour encourager les autres;" he, too, professes to cure toothache by extracting grubs from the teeth.

The travelling tinker with his portable forge makes day hideous with his metallic advertisement, and will mend your kettle or solder your broken spectacles on the spot. The peripatetic cobbler sits down at the street corner and mends the well-worn shoes entrusted him by the housewife yonder. Here is the vendor of false hair for pigtails, here the seller of false tresses for women, each with his own peculiar cry.

Yonder stall with its small oven is for confectionery; and rice-cakes, pork-balls greasy with oil, and joyously spiced with garlic, together with sweetmeats of various hue and taste, are always sure of customers. Near by is the large tea-house, where harmless willow-leaves and water, under the generic name of tea, afford pleasing distraction and gossip to leisurely groups of loiterers, or the contents of bowls of impossible-looking messes are disappearing rapidly, with the help of chop-sticks, down eager throats.

Yonder hurries along with shouts and mirth a long double line of boys clad in soiled scarlet, with bedraggled feathers erect upon their heads, bearing tablets, and of men bearing tinsel sceptres, paper pagodas, fans, umbrellas, and all manner of gifts. This is the wedding procession escorting a bride in the closed chair, all gorgeous in crimson and gold, while a body of long-robed low-bowing gentlemen bring up the rear. That shrill mournful music of fifes and drums marks a funeral. Many are the tatterdemalions hired for a few cash to carry tablets bearing inscriptions complimentary to the deceased; many the priests burning crackers and scattering paper money to appease the spirits; soon comes a cock bound and borne aloft to delude any wandering goblin of malevolent intent into the belief that all the fuss is about the bird and not about the corpse. Then follow chairs draped in white, containing the women of the household, whose well-trained moaning can be heard through the muffled windows; the chief mourner, draped in sackcloth, walks before the coffin, and is supported in the supposed agony of his grief by assistant mourners on right and left. Then, borne by two-and-thirty men, comes the huge dragon-shaped bier on which rests the coffin on its way to sepulture outside the city gates.

Here the eye is caught by a blank wall-front surmounted by two great masts with square cross-trees high aloft. This is the official residence of a magistrate or other mandarin, and is known for good or evil fame as a Yamen. Here justice is administered in fashion more or less paternal with a view to the support of sundry legal retainers. That litigation is not without its expenses may well be believed. "The entrance of the yamen is very wide" says the Chinese proverb, "the exit very narrow."

It takes but a short time to convince the stranger that the Chinese East is even more prodigal of honorifics and verbal floriculture than the Yankee West. Looking down the long line of the street, we see before each highly gilt and carven shop a narrow signboard with its inscription in golden characters.

As we pass a house we notice the characters "Eternal Harmony"—while the loud-pitched scolding of a woman's voice from without lends emphasis. "All Pewasive Honesty" adorns a shop where a vituperative countryman is loudly declaring that the vendor is a cheat. Over the windows of an opium den is inscribed "Inhale the clouds, and breathe the joy; this dynasty's special good fortune."

Yonder is a stall with a few fruits upon it, and the motto "One word all"—its meaning is made more clear by the perpetual chaffering necessary for a purchase. Here is the "Retreat of the three-fold Senior Wrangler," where groceries change hands; here the "Library of the three Supreme Constellations," where we may buy buns; here a store resplendent with the adornment of yesterday "Founded at the Creation of Heaven;" while we have, thick scattered as the leaves in Vallombrosa, "The Galaxy of Virtue," "Superlative Happiness," "Magnificent Universal Peace," "Ten-thousandfold Beauty" "Assembled Gems." A bank is adorned "Abundance through Circulation;" and indeed, considering that the only coin in use is of value so small that three hundred of them strung together would amount to one shi. 'ng; and that should you wish to pay a bill of a couple of pounds you have a full load for a coolie, we may well understand that there is at any rate "abundance in circulation."

Yon dingy place filled with monstrous forms of tigers' teeth, crocodiles, malefactors' gall-bladders, newts' and dragons' scales, is a medicine shop, and reposes in dignity under the device, "The Hall of Benevolence and Longevity." Enter its doors and you will be informed, "The elixir confers long life on the world, the herb of good omen confers immortality;" or again "This shop collects medicine from every province and place, and inherits ancient methods of preparing drugs. Though none may be here to see our compounding, yet with a stout heart we can say that 'Heaven knows.'" This undertaker's workshop has its ready-made coffins piled up, a suitable present for the season, all marked euphemistically enough, "Long life." No more delicate attention can be shown than to present an elderly friend with his coffin.

Here is the advertisement of a comb-seller: "This establishment manufactures on the premises beautiful combs for the dragon and the phœnix, some made of boxwood, others marked like the knots of a bamboo; pairs fitting like the hawk and his mate; ten sorts fit for the use of the palace. Combs of strange forms and wondrous workmanship. All kept in stock. No customers will be neglected."

The sellers of scents and rouges must drive a profitable trade, for there is a great family resemblance between the advertisements of our home papers and the following: "We have penetrated throughout the Empire to obtain all manner of famous perfumes; we have spared no labour or expense to produce faces fair as a jewel statue, and perfumes fit for the palace. Our fame has spread far and wide. Now, there are many imitations of our trade-mark; our pearls are simulated by their fishes' eyes. Let all scholars and traders notice the lion at our door—this is our mark." There is a touching candour about the statement of a hatter: "The splendid style of this flourishing dynasty; hats of mandarins of the highest rank. Our goods are better than other men's, we cannot therefore lower our prices." And what can be more seductive to the martyr to corns than this: "Boots and leggings of the Peking pattern; boots of good omen and universal peace." India and England share with China the shame of the necessity for the opium curing establishment, the signboard of which states, "This hall has obtained its method from across the sea. It has a wonderful means of weaning from the foreign drug, quite different from all others; in seven days the craving can be cured; we guarantee a cure, and that you will thank us." It was not this establishment, but a foreign hospital, which was recommended for an opium cure by an enthusiastic Chinaman—"A first-rate place; I've been cured there myself four times!"

Some of us who watch the development and hope for the welfare of the Chinese national character sometimes reflect rather sadly as to the effect of centuries of all this abuse of words, which have thus lost all the heart of their meaning, and fear that we detect a corresponding loss of heart in the morality of the people, notwithstanding many a lofty moral maxim, hoary with age, dignifying the pages of Confucian sages. And yet there is a contentment and good humour very attractive, a cheeriness and industry very hopeful in this folk; and although in moments of passion and mob-rule they sometimes rise and burn our houses, and though in their ordinary horse-play they indicate plainly our infernal origin and emphasise the belief with gibes and stones, yet we who know them find much to love and esteem; and, now that China is awaking from the sleep of ages, we anticipate with intense interest the mighty part she is to play in the world's arena in the centuries to come.

A NEW YORK PHILANTHROPIST.

"HUMANITY" is literally written above the doorway of the fine and commodious building situated at Fourth Avenue and Twenty-Second Street, New York, which is the home of the "American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals." And the figure of the horse pawing the air above the portico, together with the big stuffed Newfoundland dog on guard within, are significant of the application here given to the august mottoes of Justice and Mercy sculptured on the exterior. The work that finds its centre in these offices, and which has been for long a salutary and an acknowledged power, not only in the Empire City, but far and wide through the United States, was commenced in 1865 by the noble and self-denying man whom we have selected as the subject of this paper.

At the age of sixty-five Henry Bergh has recently passed away, and America has lost one of her best and bravest sons, a friend of the friendless, a protector of the dumb and the despised, an unshrinking foe to every species of oppression and cruelty, and an advocate who never tired in pleading the cause of the weak, whether animals or children. Every breathing thing was dear to Henry Bergh's heart, and his career was informed by the spirit of the often quoted, but never too hackneyed couplet of Coleridge:—

> "He prayeth well who loveth well
> Both man, and bird, and beast."

The stories of such lives are not only full of interest, but are weighty with instruction, and possessed of an influence which is sure to beget in other cases a similar devotion to high and worthy objects. However succinctly told, there is refreshing stimulus in the narrative of a gallant crusade against callous wrong.

While proving in his own person the might of individual conviction and individual effort to force a path through the dismal resistance of apathy and indifference, and ultimately to stamp the desired impress on the rubber-like surface of popular opinion, it was also Henry Bergh's avowed belief that he was an instance of providential adaptation of means to ends. The task was waiting and the man was provided. When the hour struck for the inauguration of the reform, he, the instrument, was equipped with adequate means—employing this last word in its widest sense. He had money at his command. Robust health, great bodily strength, and an imposing presence were his. Extensive travel had given him the alert, cosmopolitan mind; and mixing with all sorts and conditions of men had trained him in dialectical skill, and provided him with the self-confidence—at the antipodes of conceit—which alone could carry him unwavering to his goal.

The New York Berghs were (as the name might suggest) of German extraction. But the migration took place at a date anterior even to the era of Washington. Henry Bergh's father began at the bottom of the ladder, and ended in a good old age in great repute as the chief ship-builder of his time in the Republic. Christian Bergh had amassed a considerable fortune, and of this a third share came to his son Henry. The young man held with Goethe that it is to give room for wandering that the world was made so wide, and though he had entered Columbia College, he left it, as his friends probably thought, prematurely, and sailed for that warm-coloured Europe which continually fires the imagination of Young America.

For upwards of a decade he was a veritable bird of passage, journeying from country to country, or paying flying visits to his native land as the caprice seized him.

One momentous step he took which might never be recalled: he married a lady of his own city. At this time his leanings were apparently less towards philanthropy than towards literature and the drama. He wrote various plays—for the most part unacted—and poems, which duly appeared in the glory of type, but achieved no special success.

All this in later years he came to consider as so much "drill." And certainly there can be no better discipline for possessing the soul in patience under the difficulties and delays of a stiff up-hill struggle than a protracted waiting on the word of publisher and theatre manager.

The family had deserved well of the State, and Henry Bergh was not now wanting in personal qualifications for serving his country in an important post. He was sent to St. Petersburg in 1862 as Secretary to the American Legation. It was war time, and in this way Henry Bergh was removed from the immediate vortex of the strife His stay in Russia was, however, brief, the climate threatening him with a serious break-down in health.

But already had been struck the key-note of the work to which his mature life, with its rich store of energy and address, was to be yielded as a free-will sacrifice. In the northern capital his spirit had again and again been stirred by the sight of wanton cruelties wreaked on helpless and inoffensive beasts. And elsewhere during his travels he had observed how small was the average compunction in inflicting pain on members of the brute creation. Indignant at barbarities which seemed to exist to a greater or less degree in every land, he formed the resolve to dedicate the residue of his days to a grappling with the genius of cruelty, wherever found, and, above all, to seek to save his own people from the stigma.

HENRY BERGH.
(From a Photograph by Sarony, New York.)

Returning to New York by way of England, heart and brain dominated by his new project, Henry Bergh paused in London to investigate the modes of action of an English "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," which had been carrying on its operations with varying success for a period of forty years, and of which Lord Harrowby was then president.

It is startling to reflect that up till 1822 there was no law on any statute-book to preserve animals from torture. As the writer of the article on Isaac Walton, in the "Book of Days," remarks: "Strange as it may seem, compassion for animals is a virtue the coming in of which may be remembered by living men." The prime mover in the matter had been Richard Martin, representative of an Irish county in the British House of Commons. He fought hard for what in his day was commonly considered an amiable craze, and ultimately induced the English Legislature to pass an Act which threw the shield of just and reasonable protection over cattle. The coming into force of "Martin's Act" led to the organisation of a society to see that its provisions were duly put in force. And it had soon come to be manifest that only the start had been made. A wide field of labour opened out before the gradually instructed gaze of those who had enlisted under the banner of humanity. From point to point the Society had advanced, until a valuable system of penal checks of proved efficacy everywhere held back the ruthless hand in the United Kingdom.

Henry Bergh could have found no better adviser than the nobleman who, in the year of the former's visit, was not a nominal, but an active working president of the English Society of friends of animals. Lord Harrowby had bestowed patient care in mastering both theory and practice of the onerous problem:

how to inculcate humanity into the hearts and lives of a whole people.

Reaching New York towards the end of 1864, the man with a mission was apparently in no hurry. The final phases of a contest which had become patently to all the world an anti-slavery war were occupying men's minds, and so space was afforded for the consolidation of purpose. At length Henry Bergh went abroad with his plans and solicited countenance and aid in giving them effect. His proposals were welcomed with warm approval, and a declaration affirming the principles of the new society was speedily drawn up, and received the signatures of seventy of his most influential fellow-citizens, amongst the names appended being those of Horace Greeley, editor of The New York Tribune, and, later, a candidate for the Presidency, George Bancroft, John Jacob Astor, and Alexander T. Stewart. In the spring of 1866 the Society became a legal entity, with Henry Bergh, as was fitting, at its head. Precipitation had been as absent from the commencement of the enterprise as hesitancy and sluggishness were from its prosecution.

And from that April day, twenty-two years ago, to the end, there was no more earnest and determined worker in any vineyard of philanthropy within American borders than this brilliant son of the old carpenter who had become a builder of war-ships. The yoke had not been taken up in haste to be laid down in swift repentance or in disappointed dudgeon.

Laws, to a considerable extent on English models, were procured from State Legislatures, and Henry Bergh made it his duty to see that they were not empty verbiage merely. He went into the streets, and may be said to have literally walked down the plague of open cruelty—demoralising to both perpetrator and careless spectator. In a very little while he was currently labelled as one of the eccentrics of the Empire city. The scoffer took him in hand, and poisoned barbs of satire were launched at him even from quarters whence better things might have been expected. But there was no flinching. He went on his chosen path through a storm of ridicule with the same calm reticent persistence with which he would have encountered a hailstorm from winter heavens. And the brunt of the onset was soon over, even if a few laggard gibes dropped here and there in his way when most of his neighbours had detected the hero in the seeming meddler.

He was ubiquitous. None knew where to expect him, or—if they were offenders—from round what corner Nemesis might fix them with a glance of indignant reproach. With absolute indifference to personal comfort he made the night as day in his quest for cases of gross inhumanity. His career was a long campaign. Very few forms of cruelty escaped without eliciting at least his sturdy protest. He entered the lists of controversy with those members of the medical profession who practised and defended vivisection, quite careless of offending that amour propre of scientists which once found expression in the bitter comparison of Dr. Klein, who remarked that foreign opinion, unlike English, "assumed that men of science, like men in general, have conscience enough not needlessly to hurt brute animals."

By continued interference he remedied the wrongs inflicted on the over-driven and over-loaded hacks of the city roadways. He struck sharp and telling blows against the brutal pastimes which still lingered in the haunts of the lowest type New Yorker. His untiring vigilance made dog-fighting, cock-fighting, and the like, sports which could only be indulged in where the probability of arrest was regarded with indifference.

And he did not refrain from charging cruelty against the rich in the matter of their pigeon-shooting matches. So well-established by this time was Henry Bergh's influence and authority, that yet again he was victorious, and the evil fashion was largely abandoned.

Knowing that publicity—especially in the early stages of the movement—was half the battle, he seized every opportunity of attracting attention to the existence and aims of his Society. He spoke upon platforms and he pleaded in the courts. A notable instance of both his thoroughness and his lynx eye for effect was the celebrated "turtle case," which occurred almost at the beginning of the agitation. New York buys turtles, and Henry Bergh observed that these creatures were imported alive tied together like huge beads upon a string, by a cord passed through punctured holes in their "flippers." The daring investigator arrested one ship-captain and the whole of his crew, and placed them at the bar on a charge of unnecessary cruelty. It was a much-discussed trial, and although the judge discharged the prisoners Henry Bergh's object was in the main attained. The right of even a turtle to considerate treatment was brought home to the popular mind.

There is this conspicuous feature about works of love: they are cumulative. The wish to "do noble things, not dream them," strengthens with performance, and new chances of usefulness seem ever to be presenting themselves to men and women who are ready to embrace them.

It was so with Henry Bergh. He had founded a great institution, had breathed mercy into a people's life and law, had fairly throttled the old base and brutal superstition that man had no duties towards the beast that served him. But this was not the extent of Henry Bergh's humanitarian endeavour. In 1874 the head of the Society (American) for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals rescued from heartless ill-treatment a little girl, and, touched by child need, he was an instrument in setting on foot another society—for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

The familiar form has vanished, and admiring strangers will no more describe to hotel waiters the outward presentment of a spare muscular figure, tall, erect, of military bearing, conventionally attired, but winning wondering notice from the conscious right of compelling a pause in the traffic-tide to rescue some suffering beast of burden. The answer will no more be heard "You mean Henry Bergh." But it is certain that for many generations America will keep green the memory of her valiant volunteer soldier of peace and good-will.

RICH MAN AND BEGGAR.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A.

I WILL take for granted (as I know I may) that you are all of you familiar with the narrative of Dives and Lazarus.

There are few parts of Holy Scripture better known, and perhaps I might say, few parts more keenly discussed, than the parable in which our Lord describes the character and destinies of the Rich Man and the Beggar.

I. Now that parable presents to us—as of course you have observed—a succession of contrasts. There is, first, the contrast between the rich and the poor. It is put before us with a very few strokes of the Saviour's pencil, and with an utter absence of effort or elaboration; but anything more striking, more graphic, more life-like, can hardly be imagined. The wealthy man, in his beautifully furnished house, waited on by a crowd of servants; seated in splendid dress, in purple and fine linen, at the head of a luxurious table; surrounded by well-satisfied and complimentary guests, enjoying the flattering speeches about his well-known hospitality, and his choice dishes, and his wine, and his pictures, and his plate, and his flowers; and living this kind of life continually, day after day, or only exchanging the pleasures of Jerusalem for the pleasures of his country seat on the banks of the lovely lake of Galilee—why, we almost seem to know the man! We almost, at all events, feel that we have met him somewhere.

And, then, that other figure, covered with rags that are scarcely sufficient for purposes of decency, huddled together miserably—not on the door-step of the lordly mansion, but outside the outer gates, at a spot from which he cannot conveniently be ordered off—well, we seem to know him also!

Poor fellow! he has no friends, or only such as think him a nuisance and a burden. They have brought him—they bring him, day by day: it is as much as they will do—and roughly put him down at the rich man's gate. "Let the rich man take care of him!"

And, indeed, if the wretched Lazarus had really been cared for, his condition would have been far from being so desperate as it is. Had he medicine and nursing, or even if he had good food, and plenty of it, those frightful ulcers of his might perhaps disappear altogether. But he does not get enough to eat as he lies there. Crumbs and remnants are occasionally tossed to him by the servants in a kind of contemptuous pity, but he is always hungry, always unsatisfied; he pines away within sight of that lavish profusion, and his feeble body becomes at last so feeble that he has no strength to drive off the street dogs, that come sniffing round him, and put out their tongues to lick his sores.

Why is it that these two persons are thus brought together—these two extremities of the social scale?—this man, in his miserable squalor and penury, and that other man, in the brightness of his splendid and luxurious life. Why? Because God would give us the opportunity of removing—or, at least, of mitigating, the social inequalities which exist amongst us. We hold our good things in trust for the benefit of others, and the others are placed by our side for the purpose of receiving the benefit. Have we wealth? It is to be used for those who are poor. Have we intellectual power or learning? We are to employ it for those who are ignorant or stupid. Have we spiritual insight, holiness, or any gift of grace? The gift is not for ourselves; but we are to strive, God blessing us, to lift others up to our level—to enable others to see what we see, to help others to enter into the power and the joy into which we have been admitted ourselves, and to make them partakers with us in the common bounty of the bountiful Lord.

II. In the second place, there is the contrast between the characters of the two individuals.

The beggar is called Lazarus, which means "God is my help." The name, no doubt, is significant, and we infer, from the fact of its being given, as well as from the sequel of the narrative, that the beggar was a godly man. Now, in such circumstances as his, godliness might well be regarded as a phenomenon of a somewhat remarkable kind. It is comparatively easy to be good when we are comfortable. But constant pain and misery bring with them terrible temptations. Affliction in itself has no power to lead the soul to God, or to create the Christian character; indeed, it not unfrequently tends to an entirely opposite result. It hardens and embitters, by suggesting thoughts of the Divine injustice, or, at least, of the Divine inattention to our particular case.

Add to this peril—and it was one, of course, to which Lazarus was exposed—the other peril arising from the constant contemplation of the abundance enjoyed by his wealthy and prosperous neighbour.

Not a few persons nowadays are inclined to deny the existence—or, if not the existence, the power—of God, because He permits such unbridled luxury at one end of the social scale and such appalling destitution at the other. We should not have been much surprised if the poor sufferer of the parable had been irritated into impiety on this very score. What was he to think of a Supreme Governor of the Universe who had left him in hopeless hunger, whilst He heaped upon that other man—that other man who lived within his very sight—a perfect load of superfluous indulgence?

But if such thoughts ever crossed the mind of Lazarus they were never harboured there. He bore his burden meekly, patiently, uncomplainingly. It was his business to submit to the will and to believe in the love of the Heavenly Father. And he left the solution of this and other apparently insoluble problems to the revelation of the better and brighter day which he believed to be coming. If he had no help in man, at all events he had help in God.

We turn now to the other figure—to Dives, as we are accustomed to call him. What is to be said about him and his character?

Well, you cannot fail to have observed that no specific offence or sin whatever is laid to his charge. In the heading of the chapter he is, indeed, spoken of as "the rich glutton;" but those headings are of no authority, and, in this particular instance, the interpretation given is manifestly and glaringly incorrect. If the man had been a sensualist the Saviour would have said so. But he is nothing of the kind. He is rich; but, although there may be peril, there is no sin in the possession of riches. He dresses finely; but it is in accordance with his rank and station. He fares sumptuously; but we discover no trace of even an approximation to excess in his magnificent banquets. Nor is there any hint of fraud throughout the entire narration. The man has not become wealthy by the false balance and the light weight, or by any other of the tricks of trade. He has not contrived schemes for sweeping into his coffers the portion of the orphan, the pittance of the widow, the hard earnings and savings of laborious and ill-requited toilers. He has been characterised, so far as appears, by integrity and honour; and the property which he possesses has either descended to him by legitimate inheritance, or is the produce of his own industry and perseverance, of his own capability and success.

And yet, again, Dives is not an unbeliever, in the ordinary sense of the term. He would exclaim, and justly exclaim, against your uncharity, if you stigmatised him as such. He is an orthodox Jew, accepting, so far as intellectual acceptance goes, the orthodox creed: never openly scoffing against the faith, and never ostentatiously absenting himself from the appointed ceremonies and ordinances of the Church to which he belongs. His friends and associates—the guests who assemble at his luxurious board—would never dream, of course, of saying that he was a religious man; but still less would they detect in his life and conduct any valid and tangible reason why he should be shut out from the Kingdom of Heaven.

Where then is the blot upon which we have to put our finger? It lies here: in his utter lack of the feeling of brotherly love. This deficiency I shall try to analyse by-and-by. Meantime, let me say broadly that Dives was selfish, selfish to the core. He valued his fellow-men so far as they could minister to his own indulgence or gratification; but when matters passed beyond that limit he had not a single thought or care to bestow upon them. Then they were to him simply as though they existed not.

III. There is a third contrast—which we may just mention and dismiss—the contrast between the deaths of the two personages who appear in the narrative.

Lazarus is the first to go. He has run his weary race to its end. He has quitted the world which was to him little else than a hopeless scene of misery and suffering, and he enters into rest. His poor, wretched, diseased carcase is shuffled into a pauper's grave! But the angels, we are told, came to carry his emancipated spirit to the calm abode of the blessed dead.

The rich man follows, but after an interval. Is it that a longer space is given to him to repent in? Probably so. But if so, the opportunity is not improved, and the last illness comes to a hardened and impenitent man.

And then when the illness comes there is the muffled knocker at the door, and the calls of friends to inquire, and the frequently issued bulletin registering the fluctuation and the progress of the disease, and the constant attendance of the best medical skill of the city, and the sedulous nursing, and the carefully prepared delicacies to tempt the appetite of the invalid—in fact, all that money can do to avert the clutch of Death from his destined prey. But Death is not to be deceived! He knows his victim, and he strides in, with uplifted dart—through the crowd of friends, up the soft-carpeted staircase, and into the luxurious bedroom, pushing the physicians aside—and, with one blow, the end has come, and the earthly career of the rich man is over!

A few hours more—for Oriental habits permit of no delayed interments—and the splendid funeral makes its appearance in the streets, and with it the muffled conversation of the crowd, alternating between regrets at the loss of the good dinners, which Dives was famous for giving, and speculations as to the amount of money that he will be found, when his will is opened, to have left behind him.

Ay, there are some marked differences between the funeral of Lazarus and the funeral of Dives, and amongst them is this—that, in the one case, we have the angels without the procession; and in the other case we have the procession without the angels!

IV. We have now to consider a fourth contrast, and a more painful one than any which has preceded.

The curtain which hangs between this world and the next is lifted for a moment by the hand of Christ, and, looking in, we behold the two figures again, but in circumstances exactly reversed. The poor beggar is at rest—really at rest. His bodily sufferings—his miserable circumstances—have been replaced by the calm enjoyment of a soul that lies in the light of God's love. The contempt with which he was regarded whilst upon earth is now a thing of the past. He is held in honour; seated as it were in the chief place at the heavenly banquet. The rich man is in torment—spiritual torment, if you like—I mean such as a spirit can feel, for the flesh is in the grave, but torment still; torment which the Saviour compares to the effect of the action of fire on the sensitive human frame.

V. We need not push the description further. We will pause here, to ask ourselves why this extraordinary change of condition has taken place. Now there is one thing that we may be sure of: that there is nothing arbitrary or capricious in the respective allotments. The future life is only the continuation, but under different circumstances, of the present life; and in both the cases with which we are now concerned there can be no question that the conduct upon earth has found its necessary and unavoidable development in the unseen world. Both Lazarus and Dives have gone to "their own place."

Lazarus has had "evil things"—pain, hunger, scorn, contempt, weariness, misery generally. "Evil things!" These things, in themselves considered, are evil. But the "evil things" have wrought in him the heavenly temper. By means of them he has come to patience, to submission, to trust, to love—in a word, to that value for God Himself which makes men fit for the presence of God.

We must not suppose for a moment that the whole matter is a mere restoration of balance—the present happiness being regarded as an equitable compensation for the past distress. It is not so. Rather take it thus: that the man's character is suited to the circumstances in which he finds himself placed; and that that character has been gradually formed within him during the painful discipline of his sojourn upon earth.

But what we affirm about Lazarus applies to the rich man also. Dives is suffering terribly; but he is not suffering because he was rich while on earth. His suffering arises from the fact that he is at the present moment placed in uncongenial circumstances. There may be superadded misery. I do not know. But the explanation I give is quite sufficient to account for all that we find in the narrative.

Why is it that you and I live in such comfort in this world? It is on account of the perfect correspondence between our bodily frames and the environment in which they are placed. Change the conditions, and you know what will follow. Let the air which we inhale, let the water which we drink, be composed of new elements, or the old elements in a new combination—let the light by which we see be ruled by different laws; and then, although we ourselves remained the same, we should be plunged in absolute misery; for every sound would be a discord, every sight a distortion, every scent an offence, every breath a distressing and an agonising gasp.

This fact enables us, I think, to understand the unhappiness of the condition of Dives. He has not been when upon earth what we call a "bad" man. No, but he has been a worldly man; and he has not prepared himself—he has not fitted himself—he has not qualified himself for the novel circumstances into which he passed when he entered the unseen world. "Thou hast had thy good things," says Abraham to him—that is to say, the things which thou didst consider worth having: the wealth, the splendour, the pleasure, the self-indulgence, the honour and respect of this world. This was all that Dives really cared for. At this, and this alone, he aimed. And now, with the appetite still strong within him, because it has been pampered so long, he finds himself in a condition where these objects of his desire are not to be found, and where he hungers and thirsts—but hungers and thirsts in vain—for his accustomed gratifications. This I call being placed in uncongenial circumstances.

Moreover, consider that Dives—an unspiritual man—was transferred to a region which is essentially spiritual. "He loveth not." That is clear enough. He may care for his family, for his relatives—such affection being, of course, consistent with the most intense worldliness; but of the love for man as man—the love which the Spirit of God inspires in the heart of the Christian—of such a love it is obvious that he knows absolutely nothing. We cannot even conceive of him as sacrificing himself—as denying himself—or, indeed, as putting himself to any amount of inconvenience, or disturbance, or loss whatever, for the sake of the grandest enterprise that was ever started for the benefit of the human race. No! "He loveth not!" and, as a consequence, "he knoweth not God." That is to say, he has nothing about his character of the character of God. How then can he be happy when brought in the next world into direct, into immediate contact with God? It is impossible that he should be. It is contrary to the nature of things that he should be. There must be sympathy with God, there must be God-likeness—if we may coin such a word—before we can be "at home" in the presence of God. The sun pours his gracious radiance on the earth, and under his illuminating touch the meadow, and the flower, and the copse, the fresh foliage of the tree and the ripple of the stream, put on new beauty, and all nature rejoices. But there is one thing which participates not in the general exultation, but shrinks, and recoils, and cowers before him, and that is—the inflamed and disordered human eye.

VI. Observe, then, I pray you, the conclusion of the whole matter. If, when our time comes for us to go hence and be no more seen, we would enter into rest, we must have acquired whilst in life the spiritual character—the likeness to Christ which God the Holy Ghost produces in the people of Christ. It is not enough that we should be free from vice, should be hospitable, and upright, and should so live as that men should speak well of us. The important question is—Have we the mind of Christ? Do we resemble Christ? Do we understand and practise the spiritual life? Do we know what it is to value God for Himself, and to take delight in spiritual intercourse and communion with Him? If so, it is well. If not, the sooner we wake from our dream the better; for it will not be well to open our eyes at last, and find ourselves side by side with the wealthy and self-indulgent worldling in his dungeon of torment.

"And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame."

MEMORABLE LETTERS AND THEIR WRITERS.—I.

BY THE REV. ROBERT SHINDLER.

ST. PAUL WRITING HIS EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

LETTER-WRITING dates from a very early period. It has been said that the art was first practised by Atasso, a daughter of Cyrus the Great and the mother of Xerxes; but it had a much earlier origin, as, hundreds of years before her birth, we find David, King of Israel, writing a letter to one of his military captains, and the fact is recorded without any note as to the peculiarity or novelty of the circumstance.

Letters have often been made vehicles of instruction, in which the lessons have been imparted in a close and familiar manner, as if steeped in the true spirit of friendship and all aglow with love, being thus so much the more calculated to win their purpose of improvement and edification.

The Divinely inspired letters of St. Paul and other Apostolic writers are at once the earliest, the most perfect, the most powerful, and the most precious of such productions. Each of these writers has his own peculiarities: each one is himself. And yet, while the peculiarities of each writer are constantly apparent, there is also equally manifest a substantial unity in spirit, in sentiment, and aim.

In the case of letters of the didactic and the consolatory order, the writer and the reader appear in closer connection than is the case in oral instruction. There is a nearer and more familiar intercourse—a face-to-face and a heart-with-heart communion—an entering together into the secret chambers of friendship, which actual distance of place one from the other rather intensifies than lessens.

The personal element appears in all the letters of St. Paul addressed to the different Christian Churches; and the same feature is manifest in the "General" Epistles of St. John, St. Peter, St. James, and St. Jude. But in the letters of St. Paul to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, and in the letters of St. John to the Elect Lady and to Gaius, there is a greater familiarity indulged by the writer, and the friend and the brother are more apparent than the teacher and the Apostle, while sympathy, solicitous care, cordial approval of what is excellent, and the purest affection, flow forth in every line. This is the case, too, though in a less degree, in many letters penned by uninspired writers, such as Samuel Rutherford, Dr. Watts, Dr. Doddridge, the poet Cowper, and the Rev. John Newton.

The exquisite refinement, gracious maturity of thought, and thoroughly Christian gentlemanliness of St. John's letter to the Elect Lady places it in the front rank of such literature, apart from its Divine inspiration.

Of other letters Divinely inspired we may take St. Paul's letter to Philemon—one of the most characteristic of all the Pauline Epistles; and one in which the true dignity of Christian manhood appears to eminent advantage. His humiliating surroundings did in nowise lower the tone of his high and heavenly spirit, or weaken the backbone of his principles as a man of God.

He was a prisoner in Rome. In a sort of shanty adjoining the barracks, and outside the walls of the city, he was seated with the soldier to whom he was chained. With him was a young runaway slave, Onesimus, who possibly had embezzled property belonging to his master, Philemon, or had in some other way wronged him. Philemon was one of St. Paul's early converts, a man of pleasing manners and amiable disposition, and, as his name denotes, of affectionate nature, all which renewing grace had improved and developed. Onesimus had been a trusted because for a long time he had been, perhaps, a faithful servant, and, as his name also imports, a profitable slave; but in some way he loses his character, becomes a wanderer and something worse, and would no doubt have continued to descend but for that unseen and unknown Hand which interposed for his deliverance. He was somehow brought into contact with Paul the prisoner and his teaching, and was not only rescued from his downward course, but was made a new man in Christ Jesus, and a member of the Christian brotherhood. It may be that it is Onesimus who is writing, at Paul's dictation, this letter to Philemon, in which the aged Apostle, with "the marks of the Lord Jesus" upon him, entreats Philemon to receive again his sinning servant, not now altogether as a slave, but rather as a brother in Christ. Writing out of the fulness of his heart, he dwells—plays, almost, with his native wit—on the loving name of the master, and the now profitableness of the erring slave of former days. St. Paul urges his plea with the warm kindness of a personal friend, with the ready tact of a clever logician, and with all the weight of his own character and office. He will answer for all the shortcomings of Onesimus, and put everything straight between him and Philemon. And so he entreats Philemon to forgive and receive Onesimus, even as Christ had forgiven and received him.

Philemon would at once recognise the style and spirit of the letter as St. Paul's own, and he would be far from forgetting how much he owed the Apostle for that Gospel and that grace which he had received; but lest there should be the least shadow of suspicion of collusion in the letter, Paul seizes the pen, and scrawls in his own rugged characters the words of his last appeal and pledge:—"Receive him as myself. If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee aught, put that to my account; I, Paul, have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it." No doubt everything in this transaction turned out as the Apostle desired.

One of the most elaborate essays upon letter-writing was penned more than half a century ago by the poet James Montgomery. He has left us some very pertinent remarks:—

"In letter-writing," he says, "when the heart is earnestly engaged, the first thoughts in the first words are usually the best; for it is thoughts, not words, that are to be communicated; and meaning, not manner, which is mainly to be aimed at. The ideas that rise, and thicken as they rise—in a mind full and overflowing with its subject—voluntarily embody themselves in language the most easy and appropriate; yet they are so delicate and evanescent that, unless caught in their first forms, they soon lose their character and distinctness, blend with each other, and, from being strikingly simple in succession, become inextricably complex in association, on account of their multiplicity and affinity. The thoughts that occur in letter-writing will not stay to be questioned; they must be taken at their word, or instantly dismissed. They are like odours from a bank of violets—a breath and away."

It will be difficult to follow any chronological order in these papers; or indeed, any order; and among the vast mass of valuable and memorable letters at our disposal it will be quite impossible to give a large selection, or any adequate idea of the wealth of thoroughly Christian instruction and consolation which has been treasured up in this particular form.

Among the most precious in these respects we may mention the letters of Samuel Rutherford. In 1627, having taken his M.A. at Edinburgh, he was appointed minister of Anwoth, Kirkcudbrightshire. He was then twenty-seven years of age. He was an excellent preacher, a faithful pastor, and a man "full of faith and the Holy Ghost." His strong Presbyterian principles made him obnoxious to Charles I. and those who sought to force Episcopacy on the Scottish people. In 1636 he was deprived of his church, and sentenced to imprisonment at Aberdeen, from which place very many of his letters were sent. He was restored in 1638, and the following year was appointed one of the ministers of St. Andrew's, and professor of divinity in the new college established there. These appointments he held until his death in 1661. The patron of the parish of Anwoth was Lord Kenmure, and many of his letters were addressed to Lady Kenmure, who seems to have had her share of sufferings and trials. She must have been a very intelligent and gracious-minded woman to have relished his deep-thoughted and spiritually minded letters. Here is one written when he had not been long settled in his parish of Anwoth, dated 27th July, 1628:—

"To the Viscountess Kenmure.

"Madam,—All dutiful obedience in the Lord remembered. I have heard of your Ladyship's infirmity and sickness and grief; yet I trust ye have learned to say, 'It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth good in His sight.' It is now many years since the apostate angels made a question, whether their will or the will of their Creator should be done, and since that time mankind have always in that suit of law compeared [mated, matched, appeared] to plead with them against God, in a daily repining against His will. But the Lord being both party and judge, hath obtained a decree, and saith, 'My counsel shall stand, and I will do all My pleasure.' It is then best for us in the obedience of faith and a holy submission, to give that to God which the law of His almighty and just power will have of us. Therefore, Madam, your Lord willeth you in all states of mind to say, 'Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.' And herein shall ye have comfort, that He who seeth perfectly through all your evils, and knoweth the frame and constitution of your nature, and what is most healthful for your soul, holdeth every cup of affliction to your head with His own gracious hand. Never believe that your tender-hearted Saviour, who knoweth the strength of your stomach, will mix that cup with one dram of poison. Drink, then, with the patience of the saints, and the God of patience bless your physic."

A very characteristic letter is one he addressed to his "Reverend and dear Brother," Mr. John Row, from his confinement at Aberdeen, 8th July, 1637:—

. . . "I love my sweet Master still, the longer the better. A sight of His Cross is more awsome than the weight of it. I think the worst things of Christ, even His reproaches and His Cross, when I look on them not with bleared eyes, far rather to be chosen than the laughter and worm-eaten joys of my adversaries. Oh, that they were as I am, except my bonds! My ministry, next to Christ, is dearest to me of anything; but I lay it down at Christ's feet for His glory and His honour as supreme Lawgiver, which is dearer to me.

"My dear brother,—If ye will receive the testimony of a poor prisoner of Christ, who dare not dissemble for the world, I believe certainly and expect thanks from the Prince of the kings of the earth for my poor hazards (such as they are) for His honourable cause, whom I can never enough extol for His running-over love to my sad soul since I came hither. O that I could get Him set on high and praised! I seek no more as to top and root of my desires, but that Christ may make glory to Himself and edification to the weakest out of my sufferings. I desire ye would help me both to pray and praise. Grace be with you.—Yours in the sweet Lord Jesus, S. R."

Connected with Samuel Rutherford, in something more than name, is Thomas Erskine. Nearly two centuries divide them, but one spirit unites them, and their names stand together in at least one publication.

Thomas Erskine of Linlathen had an ancestry noble in things which are above name and pedigree. Upon the death of his only brother, James, he succeeded to the Linlathen estate, and bade farewell to the Bar, where he had shone as an advocate. His piety was deep and thorough, and as he had suffered considerably earlier in life by contact and intercourse with men of shining talents, who unhappily made no profession of faith in Christ, he thought that, in retiring into private life, he would leave something as a parting testimony of his earnest faith in Christ for the benefit of his companions at the Bar. The paper was written, but remained unpublished for nine or ten years. Dr. Chalmers was editing a series of "Select Christian Authors," and requested his friend, Mr. Erskine, to write some introductions. The neglected manuscript was then brought to light, and published as an Introductory Essay to Samuel Rutherford's Letters.

Mr. Erskine's own letters, a recent volume of which has now reached a third edition, furnish many specimens of letters such as we fear few people will in any way equal in this age, in which correspondence partakes more largely of brevity, superficiality, and hastiness, than of any more valuable characteristic. A specimen or two must suffice. The first is on the death of his brother, an eminently godly man, who died at Broadstairs, after having served in Canada in the 41st Regiment, and in the Walcheren Expedition as captain of the 87th Regiment:—

"My Dear Cousin,—God's thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor His ways as our ways. May He, by His Holy Spirit, conform our wills unto His holy will! Katherine* is wonderfully supported, but it is an awful blow. Pray for us that this dispensation may be sanctified to us; that we may look more to Christ; that we may look wholly to Christ! Oh! there is nothing else of any consequence. We live in the midst of shadows, and we think them realities. Lord, open Thou our eyes, that we may see the truth, and that we may be assured that Thy love is better than life! We hardly know yet what has happened to us—all seems a troubled dream—but we know that 'It is the Lord,' and that He doeth all things well. Katherine is quite resigned—quite peaceful. How good is God! I need not write any more. Let us pray.—Yours most affectionately, "T. Erskine."

Mr. Erskine's letters to Dr. Chalmers are very characteristic communications, and the same may be said of Dr. Chalmers' letters to him; but they are too long for quotation. Mr. Erskine's letters to Madame de Stael (daughter-in-law of the more celebrated lady of that name) are choice specimens. He writes:—

"I believe that we should seek to have, and to be satisfied with, the sympathy of Christ; that is the sympathy which strengthens and girds up the loins of the heart, while it gladdens. We need tonics to fit us for our life's battle—not emollients. Yet I find it an evil thing to live with those who can give me no sympathy—however good and worthy they may be—for they teach me to lock up my heart and all its feelings, which produces spiritual congestion, as bad for the soul as congestion in any bodily organ. I know the value of Mrs. Rich * as a sympathiser. I have sympathised with her, and been sympathised with by her, and I know that her love rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth (1 Cor. xiii. 6), which gives sympathy its right tonic quality. I am persuaded that there are many hearts that contain much sympathy, as the rock contains the water, without giving any sign of its presence until smitten by Moses' rod."

CROMWELL WRITING TO HIS DAUGHTER.

One other letter must complete this paper. It is from one not less worthy of honour as a man, a Christian, and a father, than of credit as a judicious ruler, and of fame as a military leader. There was a stern, but also a gentle, side to the character of Oliver Cromwell. After rather lengthy negotiations between the respective fathers, Oliver's son, Richard, had married Dorothy, daughter of Richard Mayor, Esq., of Hursley. Oliver was now on board the St. John, lying in Milford Haven, awaiting a fair wind to convey him and his troops to Ireland. The letter is dated August 13th, 1649, and is addressed—

"To my beloved daughter, Dorothy Cromwell, at Hursley, these:—

"MY DEAR DAUGHTER,—Your letter was very welcome to me. I like to see anything from your hand, because, indeed, I stick not to say, I do entirely love you. And, therefore, I hope a word of advice will not be unwelcome nor unacceptable to thee.

I desire you both to make it above all things your business to seek the Lord; to be frequently calling upon Him, that He would manifest Himself to you in His Son; and be listening what returns He makes to you—for He will be speaking in your ear and in your heart, if you attend thereunto. I desire you to provoke your husband likewise thereunto. As for the pleasures of this life and outward business, let that be upon the bye. Be above all these things by faith in Christ; and then you shall have the true comfort and use of them—and not otherwise. I have much satisfaction in hope your spirit is this way set, and I desire you may grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and that I may hear thereof. The Lord is very near: which we see by His wonderful works; and therefore He looks that we of this generation draw near to Him. This late great mercy of Ireland is a great manifestation thereof. Your husband will acquaint you with it. We should be much stirred in our spirits to thankfulness. We much need the Spirit of Christ to enable us to praise God for so admirable a mercy. The Lord bless thee, my dear daughter.—I rest, thy loving Father,

OLIVER CROMWELL.

THE STORY OF A SILVER KEYLESS WATCH.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE BRAVEST BOY IN THE SCHOOL," AND OTHER STORIES.

EIGHT times absent from call-over, involving a loss of as many conduct marks, that's rather a sad story for a little boy of ten," said Mr. Harding.

"Indeed, papa, it is," Herbert replied dolefully, with a heavy sigh; "but then you see," he went on with animation, "beetles and moths are so interesting. You get grubbing away for them and forget all about the time, or you don't listen for the school clock, and then—well, you rush on to find yourself late for call-over, and an imposition to learn next day.

"Well," said Mr. Harding, a remembrance of past days arising in his mind, "I daresay it is difficult to be always punctual, still it is a bad example to set, and Mr. Heywood calls special attention to this forgetfulness of duty, so I want to see you much more careful next term."

"Yes, papa, I will try."

"And if you don't lose a single mark this term I shall give you at Christmas a watch which will, I trust, keep you right for the future."

"A real watch, papa?" cried Herbert, jumping up as if he had received an electric shock.

"A real silver keyless watch," repeated his papa; "but this is a secret between us."

"Oh, papa, papa," he cried, "how delightful! How good you are to me!" and he flung his arms impulsively round his father's neck, exclaiming, "See if I lose a single mark!"

After dancing up and down the room for several minutes, during which he upset a gipsy table, tumbled over the cat, knocked his head against the chiffonier, and woke the baby upstairs, Herbert dashed off into the garden, exclaiming to himself, "A watch, a real silver keyless watch. What shall I do? I feel as if I wanted to fly. Oh, when will the holidays come to an end, I want so to be back at school!"

"I must tell someone," he went on. "I shall burst if I have to keep this secret all to myself."

Just then he trod on the dog's tail. "Oh, Fido," he cried, "I must tell you my secret;" and putting his arms round the dog's neck he whispered softly in his ear—

"My papa is going to give me a real silver keyless watch at Christmas if I don't miss any attendance marks. Isn't that just grand?"

"He placed it in the child's outstretched hand."—p. 58.

The stately mastiff opened his eyes and blinked them in a sagacious manner, as if he knew something extraordinary was going to happen, and then relapsed into the doze from which he had been so uncomfortably aroused.

The term was nearly half over, and as yet Herbert had not been within measurable distance of losing a mark. It was now towards the end of October, and on this particular day a hare and hounds chase had been arranged as a half-holiday entertainment.

The boys went scampering in the warm afternoon sunshine up the road to the beautiful hills resplendent in their mantle of purple heather, and there during those happy sunshiny hours of freedom from restraint and absence from care they ran the wild and eccentric career that the hares set them.

"Four o'clock," cried Herbert, listening intently to the sound of the school clock. "Call-over is at half-past four, that just leaves us nice time. Still, we'll trot home all the same, so as to make sure."

And away they dashed down the road on the return journey.

It was a pretty sight to see those happy flushed faces, as the boys tore down through the woods, making the hills merry with their laughter.

"What can that be?" cried Herbert, as a moaning voice reached their ears.

They stopped and listened.

The stifled sobs of a child were clearly heard, and looking over the hedge a little boy of about five years old was seen sitting on the ground holding his foot, and sobbing as if his heart would break.

"What is the matter?" asked Herbert.

"Oh, I've hurt my foot so very very much," cried the child, "and I've been lying here for such a long time—and I'm so hungry—and I don't know how to get home."

"Where do you live?"

"At the little cottage under the hill there," exclaimed the boy, pointing to a house about a mile away.

"What is to be done?" said Herbert. "Will anyone help me to carry him home?"

They all shook their heads. There had been so many absences from call-over that the penalty for being absent had been rather severe of late, and they none of them cared to risk transgressing the rules.

"Come, we must be going," said one of the boys. "Someone will be sure to find him soon."

"Let's shout!" said another. They all shouted at the top of their voices, but all in vain.

Herbert knew not what to do. He looked at the sobbing child, whose little face was upturned appealingly to him. He thought of his watch, and his heart beat heavily.

"Come, we shall be late," urged his companions again. "No harm can come to him, and we will tell them at the school." And they turned to go.

But Herbert remained fixed to the spot, irresolute and uncertain what to do, conflicting thoughts surging and rushing through his mind. He looked longingly at his companions, now disappearing down the copse; then he raised his eyes to the blue heavens—a sudden sense of peace came over him and his resolution was taken!

He could not have explained why in so many words, but the thought possessed him that if his father knew how he was situated he would wish him even to break his untarnished record for punctuality to serve this little one.

But then his father would not know why he had lost his marks, for he would never, never tell. And then—oh, the bitterness of the thought—he should lose his watch; the watch longed for by day, and dreamed of by night. It was so hard; but as he glanced at the great white cloud, now lit up by the sun's radiance, he thought of the Saviour's love to little children and that filled his heart with an overpowering sense of gratitude. Anyway He would know.

It was enough. In that moment his heart was thrilled with an emotion such as he had never before felt. He had counted the cost, and given up the watch willingly. So gathering the little one into his arms, he set off at a gentle trot towards the half-hidden cottage, the child's arms meanwhile stealing lovingly round his neck, whilst a look of quiet trust and joy came into the blue eyes, in place of the tears which had erewhile been there. A quarter of an hour later he deposited the child at its mother's side.

"You're a brave little fellow," he exclaimed, "and I hope your foot will soon be well." "See," he added, taking his treasured blue pencil from his pocket, "this may amuse you." He placed it in the child's outstretched hand, and before the mother could sufficiently recover from her surprise and joy to thank him, he was gone.

If any tears fell from the eyes of the boy on his way to the school, I think flowers must have bloomed in the place where they fell.

"And so you have lost your watch after all?" said Mr. Harding to him kindly, when they were looking over the monthly report together a few weeks later.

"Yes, father," said Herbert, looking lovingly into his face, "but I did try."

"I know you must have done so, my boy, and I honour you for it."

That was a great joy to hear, and the bitterness of losing his much coveted treasure did not oppress him as much as he had expected. He strove his best now to please his father, just as hard, indeed, as he had striven before for the reward that was to follow, and his happiness in achieving his aim seemed even greater.

It was a fearfully wet November. The cottage in which Jack Davis lived with his wife and little boy—though it had been so bright in the summer with its lovely surroundings—was bleak enough now, and few ever came near, though poor Mrs. Davis was suffering severely from rheumatism, and felt the loneliness exceedingly oppressive. Among those few who came to visit her, however, was Mrs. Harding, and her presence on this afternoon was sunshine itself to the inmates of that household.

Her basket had been emptied of its abundant and cheering contents, and she sat reading from the Bible to the poor sufferer.

"Yes, ma'am," the woman was saying, "I do indeed believe that the Lord watches over us and protects us from harm. It isn't many weeks since I was in a dreadful fright about my little boy Charlie. I had missed him for hours, and was getting so worried, for his father wasn't coming home till late at night, and I prayed the good Father to watch over him and bring him safe home to me. And then, would you believe it, ma'am, a little gentleman rushes into the house with him, sets him down at my side, patted him on the head quite kind-like, and gave him this pencil. Then, before I could thank him, he rushed off again. My poor little lad had strained his foot badly, and how he could have got home alone I don't know. Wasn't it a wonderful answer to prayer?"

"Marvellous, indeed!" said Mrs. Harding. "Don't you know who he was?"

"One of the young gentlemen from the school," said the woman, "that's certain, for I recognised the cap."

Mrs. Harding took the pencil absently and glanced at it, when her face lit up with interest.

"H. G. H." They were the initials of her son.

"Do you remember what day it was?" she asked.

"The 18th of October," said the woman, after a pause. "I remember it so well because my husband went to a sale that day and was late home."

A great wave of joy passed over the hearts of the parents that evening, as they examined Herbert's report and saw it was on that very day the boy lost the marks which would, apparently, cost him his promised watch.

* * * * * *

It was Christmas Eve. Notwithstanding the fact that his greatest treasure could not be amongst his presents on the morrow, Herbert was greatly excited. Being an only child, Christmas Day always found his stocking stored with gifts from parents and relatives, and his spirits always rose high as the eventful day approached.

To-night his anticipations of pleasure were more than usually vivid.

"Papa, may I bring down my stocking to your room to-morrow?"

Notwithstanding the full assurance that such a procedure involved a very early awakening in the morning, permission was readily given.

When Mr. and Mrs. Harding retired they found Herbert sleeping soundly, whilst hung on the wall beside him was a large clothes' bag, above which was pinned a notice in large letters—"This way, please, Santa Claus," with a hand pointing to the bag below.

About six o'clock on Christmas morning there was a knock at their door, and a voice cried out—

"Please may I come in? I've got a sackful of things."

"Very well;" spoken in a languid, sleepy tone.

In a moment the child had entered the room, lighted the gas, and was taking out the packets it contained with eager hands, trembling with excitement.

"A book from Grannie. Hurrah!"

"A jubilee crown-piece from Uncle Arthur. How good of him!"

"A box of paints from mamma. Oh, how delightful!"

"A knife from Aunt Anna. Well, that is lucky; I lost mine last week!"

Such were the successive exclamations that the little boy poured forth as he dived into the wonderful bag preceded by many guesses before he untied each parcel.

But last of all he came to a packet that puzzled him—"From papa in remembrance of a loving action." "A box, I do believe!" he cried—"a box, what can be in it?" "A beautiful leather box!" he exclaimed, as the wrapper fell off. "How does it open?" "What can it contain?" At length he pressed the spring, raised the lid, and to his expectant eyes was revealed A BEAUTIFUL KEYLESS WATCH.

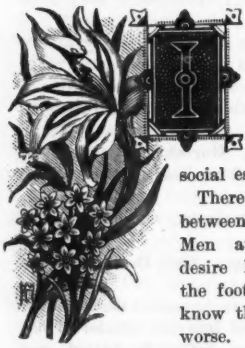
"Oh, papa! papa! papa! do look," he implored, as he danced about the room, heedless of cold, oblivious of all but the fact that he possessed his long desired unhoped for treasure. "Oh, how delightful!" "How glorious!" "How grand!" "It is so very, very good of you," he exclaimed, "when I really did not deserve it."

"Well, we think you did deserve it, little man, for by an accident we found out why you lost your mark, and it gave us sincere pleasure to learn the reason, for we know now that there is something higher, something better that you care for than even a silver keyless watch."

MISTS OF MEMORY.

TRIOLETS.

BALEFUL mists of Memory,
Veiling all the happy past,
Dimming old-time joy and glee!
Baleful mists of Memory,
Shrouding love and sympathy
With a darkness that must last!
Baleful mists of Memory,
Veiling all the happy past!



Loving mists of Memory,
Veiling sorrows of the past—
Woes that came so bitterly!
Loving mists of Memory,
Hiding aye, on Life's fair sea,
All the wreckage shoreward cast!
Loving mists of Memory,
Veiling sorrows of the past!

COMPANIONSHIP—GOOD AND BAD.

BY THE REV. HENRY ALLON, D.D.

"He that walketh with wise men shall be wise, but a companion of fools shall be destroyed."—PROV. xiii. 20.
"Walk with wise men and thou shalt be wise; but the companion of fools shall smart for it."—REVISED.

I TAKE it for granted that, with more or less of earnestness, we all wish to realise the great moral ends of life — virtue, purity, moral dignity, social esteem.

There may be great discrepancy between the wish and the effort. Men are full of anomalies; desire looks in one direction, the foot turns in another. We know the better and pursue the worse.

It is, however, much to have right wishes—so to retain intelligence and moral power of conscience as that these prompt a right desire. No man perhaps ever yet deliberately and intelligently determined to be evil.

It is a great thing therefore to have the Bible throwing strong lights upon this preference, and sharpening this desire; aiding and abetting our good wishes and resolutions with its utmost moral force.

It does this in many ways. It gives us great principles and wise precepts of life, to be embodied and practised. It tells us what to cherish in feeling, and what to do in practice, that the good desire may be realised. It sets before us instances of men who have actually attained to virtue and godliness, and it incites us by their examples.

David tells us that one of his methods was godly companionship—"I am a companion of all them that fear Thee, and of them that keep Thy precepts." And here, in his shrewd sententious way, Solomon, if this proverb is his, sets before us one of the great principles or laws of this moral issue—"He that walketh with wise men shall be wise."

It is an obvious maxim of common sense, a maxim even of pagan wisdom—"A man is known by his friends."

It is the operation of an imperative law.

No doubt every man is an individual person—complete in himself—and the law of individuality is strong and inviolable. You cannot reduce a man to the mere product of circumstances, without infinitely degrading him, and without contradicting his deepest consciousness—the consciousness of a personal will and responsibility. But he is not therefore absolutely independent. The man has his environment by which his personality is affected. Another great law of his nature makes him a social being, related to other beings, affecting them and affected by them; this limits the law of his individuality, and harmonises with it. He is not so individual as to be independent of his surroundings; he is not so dependent as to be without individuality. There are things within me—thoughts, feelings, purposes—that no stranger may intermeddle with. But my own conduct of these is influenced by information which I derive, and by impressions which I receive from those about me. I may shut up my thoughts, I cannot shut up myself. God did not intend that we should. We are constituted part of a social order, we sustain relationships, we are endowed with speech, we are mutually dependent, our social affections are strong. "It is not good for man to be alone"—that he should be a hermit, a monk, a recluse; the individual is perfected in society. "I pray not that Thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldst keep them from the evil?"

But then we cannot have equal intercourse with all, or regard all with equal affection. Nature, necessity, prompt to special companionships, intimacies, affections, confidences.

The question is, what principle or consideration shall determine our choice. This is important to the young especially, because the most ingenuous and influential companionships of life are formed in youth. The craving for fellowship is then most strong; facilities for it are greatest; the heart is most susceptible and disengaged; impressions are deepest. It is not often in after life that we so open our heart of hearts.

I.—May I speak of the principles upon which companionships should be formed?

I strongly hold to the sentiment of "falling in love." The strongest affections—perhaps the truest—whether between lovers or friends, are those of unconscious elective affinities. We cannot always give a rational account of our affections. But this, of course, has its limits and correctives in common sense, in religious principle and feeling. If the affinities which have inspired my affection are only partial or superficial, I may not, for the sake of lesser agreements and sympathies, sacrifice those that are greater.

Community of taste and feeling there must be. "How can two walk together except they be agreed?" "All flesh," says the author of Ecclesiasticus, "consorteth according to his kind; and man will cleave unto his like. What fellowship hath the wolf with the lamb, the sinner with the godly?" "What fellowship," says Paul, "hath righteousness with unrighteousness, and what communion hath light with darkness, and what concord hath Christ with Belial, or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing."

Considering the place and momentousness of religion, it would seem a kind of moral necessity that a man's companions should be those whose moral principles and character harmonise with his own. A pious man can have fellowship with a profane man only on one of two assumptions—either that their intercourse shall be marred by violent collisions, the holy principles, yearnings, and tendencies of the one coming into antagonism with the other, and producing painful contentions or a painful suppression; or that the piety shall be so limited, feeble, and stolid as that it cannot be wounded. Can we conceive an active, fervent piety consorting amicably and contentedly with its opposite?

The principle holds good in every relationship that we form. We are speaking now more especially of those affections of friendship which, irrespective of sex, find expression in frequent intercourse and mutual confidences. But the principle applies to the relations of servants and masters, of employers and employed, of families with which we board and lodge, and, above all, to the union of the sexes in marriage.

Least of all can man and wife dispense with essential agreement in the principles and sympathies of life. Can we conceive of conjugal felicity where, on the one side, there is an active, fervid piety, delighting in religious pursuits and exercises—in prayer, public worship, communion with God; and on the other, the lack, perhaps dislike of all these? The marriage relationship is too close for neutrality. Thorough confidence, deep heart-sympathy, intercommunion of thought, feeling, and sentiment, so entire as almost to be unconscious, and so essential to conjugal happiness, are obviously impossible. There will be a painful consciousness on either side—on the side of the pious husband or wife it will be well-nigh intolerable.

Young men and women, in the formation of such engagements—in the taking of what next to your personal conversion to God is the most solemn step of your life—you are apt to be thoughtless enough, to commit yourselves unconsciously, to talk lightly of it as if it belonged to the comedy of life. And others are ready enough to joke with you. But the inevitable issues are grave enough. Even on the lowest social grounds happiness is impossible where there is incongruity. No cleavage in social life is so great as that which religion makes. The spiritual results are incalculable. In a sense, and to a degree that are not possible in anything else, nay, more than in all other things together, you are shaping spiritual character and determining its destiny. You are choosing the conditions, the atmosphere, the soil, the nurture of your spiritual life; and that under the influence of the strongest and tenderest affections. If there be any step in life over which you ought to ponder and pray, if there be any spiritual influences which you should anxiously calculate, they are these. Imperfect sympathies in other things are comparatively innocuous. This is vital — "Only in the Lord."

In one way or another, there will inevitably be an assimilation. Either the unspiritual will become spiritual, or the reverse.

This leads to the formal doctrine of this proverb, The moral or spiritual power of association. "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise, but a companion of fools shall be destroyed."

His associates influence him, give form to his opinions, and conform his character to their likeness; and this because of the great law of social being to which I have referred. According to his character—in every community, great or small—every individual influences and is influenced by society. In every relationship this reciprocal influence is going on. How often we see a strong, determined character, good or evil, imprinting itself upon those around it; or a feeble character so imprinted as to have no individuality left!

Set it in your minds as of the most momentous import, that we are perpetually receiving or imparting influence, moulding or being moulded. Effects of which we are unconscious—for good or for evil—are being produced, which can never be wholly counteracted.

Both classes of influence are here affirmed. Wisdom comes from association with the wise, destruction is the necessary issue of associating with fools. He who chooses for his associates religious God-fearing men will himself become such. He who chooses for his companions, scorners, or sinners, or the ungodly, will share their doom, because he will be conformed to their character. That is, this is the natural law, the ordinary tendency of association. Exceptions there may be, in which the natural tendency may be counteracted; but the exception only proves the rule.

The very essence of social feeling is a craving for the goodwill and liking of those about us, the desire of being approved and esteemed. A noble principle in itself, but capable of urging us both ways—to good or to evil—of being consecrated or prostituted. Now suppose a young man thrown into association with the godless or the dissolute; this desire of approbation will be a constant temptation to do what will please. He thus commits himself to a strenuous conflict between desire and principle. Without affinity with his friend, he will be disagreeable just in proportion as he is pious. He will be always under the temptation to compromise his piety. If strong in resolution, he may break loose from such association; scarcely can he maintain it and preserve his integrity. Is it not almost a certainty that his principles will be undermined, his virtuous habits broken, and that he will gradually lay aside what is antagonistic in character and conduct, until his piety has melted down into an inoffensive conformity?

The temptation is chiefly on the side of evil. It is the mournful peculiarity of evil to corrupt what is good, rather than of good to correct evil. True, spiritual life is "as leaven," but will it work under such conditions?

A vicious man associated with a virtuous man may feel a desire for his approbation, and may be somewhat modified and restrained; but the influence of example is generally stronger on the side of evil than of good.

Hence companionships are so vital and momentous. The intimacy you form may be a casual thing, but its moral influence will be abiding. The fellowship of the godly is a vast help in saving the soul; the fellowship of the wicked is an insuperable hindrance.

Every parent and guardian of youth feels this to be of paramount importance. If son or ward is seen associating with the irreligious or the dissolute, it excites the utmost alarm, his ruin is regarded as well-nigh accomplished; if with the virtuous and devout, it is a satisfaction and a thankfulness.

The testimony of experience is so uniform that the exception is regarded as almost a miracle. Young men are known by the companions they keep. What can be thought of the youth whose ever-growing love is for the gay and godless, who has not a pious friend in the whole circle of his acquaintance?

It were easy to sketch a normal history, to trace a career that in its general features would be the counterpart of thousands. What circle of acquaintance would not furnish instances?

It is not long since that in the freshness and ingenuousness of youth he left his father's house; its fields are yet green in his memory, the features of each particular spot are yet distinct, the memory of solicitous counsel is yet fresh, the echo of earnest prayers yet vibrates. He brought with him much of carefully trained and protected virtue, much of the peach-bloom of youthful modesty; "simple concerning evil," he blushed at the very suggestion of sin; he virtuously recoiled from it; he was conscientious in worship, in Sabbath-keeping, in reading his Bible, in prayer; impelled by those blessed feelings and habits of educated virtue and piety which once lost are commonly lost for ever. With a troubled heart he enters the shop or the warehouse, piously resolving that he will sooner die than disregard his father's advice or grieve his mother's heart. But he finds himself in another moral atmosphere; his associates have long broken through such restraints, perhaps ridicule them; they are more or less vicious. In his first shock of feeling he makes resolves and offers prayers; but he unconsciously deteriorates, familiarity grows, repugnance lessens, the power of intercourse tells upon him; he rapidly passes from one stage to another, until he is a confirmed profligate, perhaps a hardened sceptic. Passions obtain the mastery, he grows reckless, and after more or less of struggling, he becomes to others what these have been to him—a seducer into sin.

The shores of this great sea of London life are strewn with thousands of such shipwrecks—shipwrecks of hopes once inspiring, of character once virtuous—many a ribald sceptic that once worshipped, many a profane wretch that once prayed; and the rock upon which he split was godless companionship. "The companion of fools shall be destroyed."

Choose the companionship of the wise. Their very association, instead of inciting to evil, will restrain the evil to which you are inclined. You will have to overcome two consciences, two feelings of self-respect. Their example will encourage, their counsel will teach and guard you.

Hence the importance of making an instant and decisive choice of virtuous and holy companions. There are young men amongst us who win our instant approbation, cheer our hearts, and strengthen our hands. Their friendships and preferences at once show that "in the excellent of the earth is all their delight." We are sure that by-and-by we shall find them "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

Is it not important that you should early associate yourselves with the Church of Christ? It will give a kind of security to your piety thus to be avowedly in fellowship with Christ's disciples. It will secure you from many evil solicitations and associations. It will bind you to a kind of consistency in your companionships. Ungodly men will not seek you. You entrench yourselves within the defences of the Church; and find among its members your friends and counsellors.

Much might be said about the conduct of friendships when formed. There are sins of even virtuous intercourse: sins of the tongue—evil-speaking one of another, uncharitable judgments, narrow intolerance, insincere words of flattery, unseemly levity, which is not so much joyousness as "foolish talking which is not convenient." "If any man seem to be religious and bridleth not his tongue, that man's religion is vain." "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, keep the door of my lips."

How little, again, we do to instruct and edify one another, to exemplify Christian virtues and graces, to charge our speech and doings with holy influence.

But I forbear. It is enough to urge the fundamental thing. Let me entreat you to make character the test of your companionship. Do not permit superiority of social station, or brilliancy of wit, or amiability, or fascination of manner, to beguile your judgment. These may only enhance the peril. If perverted or unsanctified, each quality may be a snare. Let moral considerations determine that none shall be admitted to your friendship who are not true and pure.

"Walk with wise men." Books are companions as well as persons. Shun a licentious book as you would shun the devil. Neither wit, nor genius, nor eloquence can compensate for that which pollutes the heart or befools the understanding. Walk with the wise men of the dead, the poets of virtue, the philosophers of truth.

In all relations let it be your boast, "I am a companion of them that fear God."

"The redemption of the soul is precious;" whatever helps it is momentous. The fellowship to which you are urged is high and honourable. It will dignify your life, enshrine your death, and enrich you for ever.

MISS HILARY'S SUITORS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A WILFUL YOUNG WOMAN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

A SOFT, still September day was wearing fast through its afternoon hours. The sun, which from its uprising had been veiled behind fleecy masses of high cloud, called by eastern-county folk a "flock sky," and had only lightened the earth in a tender, hazy, autumnal sort of way, now suddenly mastered its vapoury curtains, and blazed forth in an hour's glorious descent. From the brilliant west the cloudlets, all changed now into little gilded hillocks, floated in scattered companies before the red imperious rays that seemed aglow, to make up to the world for having hidden themselves so long from sight.

Over Brainford, whose smoke and mists were just discernible as it lay in a hollow of the horizon, stole the warm mellow light, then flooded acres of bared fields and browning hedgerows, tinted afresh the smooth pasture slopes that swept up towards Abbotswick, casting on them giant shadows of stalwart oaks and elms, and falling lovingly on the smooth lawns by the house itself, lit up the beds of blazing geraniums, kindled into smiles two sombre cedars that flanked the flowery expanse, and finally penetrated a large, low drawing-room, from whose deep bow window two people looked straight along this visible part of the golden ray's journey.

The room evidenced in its furnishings a series of tastes going back a century at the least. There were spindle-legged chairs in white-and-gold with little landscapes painted on their backs, couches covered with old brocade, and antique oval mirrors in beaded frames side by side with remnants of the rosewood period in a perfectly uniform suite, the cushions thereof curiously wrought in tent and cross-stitch; a carved oak cupboard up one corner smiled superior at a walnut davenport up another; lonely old bits of soft-coloured china, ranged from chimney-piece to ceiling, looked down upon a flaunting French clock; a large round table with shiny brass claws on its spreading feet bore many magazines of to-day among Worcester pots full of late Maréchal Niels; lounges in velvet, wicker, or rush; portraits of gentlemen in pigtails and ladies in powder, antique curios in ivory and silver, modern ones in photographs and bevelled edged glass; traces of many a generations' fancies were there jumbled together, and the conjunction was a room eminently comfortable but as full of incongruities as—well there were people who said—as the mistress thereof!

She, Miss Philippa Humphreys, certainly matched the room excellently. Seated now by the window in a basket-beehive chair, calculated to keep off all draughts, one could see she was a woman a little past the allotted three-score-and-ten, of strongly-marked but irregular features, having an abundance of white hair, and a mouth expressive of more resolution than is mostly seen at advanced age, this characteristic being somewhat assisted by a superb set of the very best false teeth obtainable for money.

Shrewd, active, not unkindly eyes the old lady had; remarkably well-shaped hands, of which she was inordinately vain; a figure still upright as a dart and inflexible as her will, and a voice of extreme clearness and decision. What Miss Humphreys said, it was well known by all about Abbotswick, Miss Humphreys would abide by, be that course wise or foolish to other people's thinking. Only one person ever ventured to question her opinion without getting worsted in the combat; and that hardy individual was not her present companion, who now sat knitting his brows at the unsatisfactory progress of his interview, while the lady of the house opposite was frowning in the most forbidding manner.

The sunshine bursting in athwart this gentleman's form played upon a face so evidently anxious and perplexed that Miss Humphreys' animus was mollified for the moment, and, tapping the floor impatiently with a black-satin-shod foot, she exclaimed, as though clenching some difficult question—

"Come now, after all, Mr. Stafford, you and I are too old acquaintances to let the sun go down upon our wrath! Just be reasonable, and we shall get on as comfortably as ever. You really must," emphatically, "agree to my plans, for I assure you I shall never alter them."

"If I did," was the answer, uncompromising though uttered in a singularly pleasant voice. "I should be grossly to blame, for indeed, Miss Humphreys, we should have the church falling about our ears before the winter was over. Dormer says so."

"Dormer's a donkey," said the old lady sharply, "or, at any rate, only an architect looking out for a a job. The place will stand safe enough for another fifty years, or till you've put me under the ground, which won't tax its strength quite so long, I dare say; tell Hooper to shore it up as strongly as he can, and I'll pay the bill. You can't expect more of me."

"I fear the shoring up will not keep the rain out," said the curate in charge, sticking to his point as doggedly as Miss Humphreys to hers; "the people in the nave sat in a shower bath last Sunday."

"Then, why didn't the idiots put up umbrellas?" was the retort of the impracticable old lady. "I don't believe they were wet, I never noticed it."

"Wet they were though, and in a state of anguish about spoiling their Sunday clothes," said Mr. Stafford, laughing. "So it is clear something must be done to the roof."

"Well, tell Hooper to put more tiles on and I'll pay for them too. Will that suit you, Mr. Stafford?"

He made an unwilling gesture of dissent. "The roof simply won't bear touching. Any attempt at repair would be simply flinging away the money which the rector has sent, and which the people have entrusted to me. Then there's the floor, I verily believe some one will soon drop through into an ancient grave. No two pews are on the same level. The fact may be unpalatable, but it's no good blinking it. St. Michael's is a disgrace to us as it stands——"

"Fudge, fudge, fudge," said the old lady irascibly.

"I don't want to act contrary to your wishes, and certainly have no wish to run into fashionable restoration, as you seem to expect. But well and soundly restored the place must be. I did hope you would see the matter in the same light, Miss Humphreys."

"And I repeat, Mr. Stafford, I never shall, for I never intend to! When I'm dead and gone do as you like with St. Michael's, it won't affect me then. Now any change would offend me, and I think it only fair to hint to you that offending me would be greatly to your own disadvantage."

It was not often Miss Humphreys so clearly overstepped the bounds of good taste. As in some sort the servant of his parish and people, the curate in charge had borne much of her eccentric imperiousness and might have borne more. Now attacked, threatened, whatever the words might mean by one whose age and sex forbade his retaliating, he felt annoyance closely verging on humiliation, and almost wished himself any craftsman rather than a curate.

"I'm sorry indeed," he said, somewhat bitterly, "that I have had to discuss all this with you, Miss Humphreys."

"Ah!" exclaimed the old lady, totally mistaking his tone and jumping at the meaning she desired. "Never mind having discussed it if you will look at it now as I wish. Just open that—or no," emerging from her chair and going to a leather-topped table she called her office—"I'll get it myself. See here," returning and settling her satin skirts carefully before unfolding the paper she had fetched, "this was my little scheme for next Christmas. I was going to name it to Mr. Milroy the next time he came. Extra sums to be annually expended during my lifetime: Ten pounds for week-day fires to dry the church; half-a-crown a week each additional to the ten occupants of the Humphreys almshouses (which they'll value far more than pulling their floors up and draining the whole row as you were worrying me to do last year, my good sir!); and—and—" emphatically, "one hundred a year additional stipend to the Rev. Norris Stafford in recognition of his services as curate in charge of Netley. There! now I do trust that will help to cool your ardour over this church business, and reconcile you to letting an old woman have her way for the year or two she may cumber the earth."

Miss Humphreys, thus concluding, leant back in her chair with the complacent air of a person who has just made a very handsome offer. Unluckily the curate was not able to view it in that light. In his eyes the extra stipend, which well he could have done with if offered elsehow, was nothing but a glaring bribe—a temptation to sacrifice his church and his poorer flock to the whim of the one rich woman of his congregation. A hot angry answer rose ready to his lips, curbed by no easy effort.

"I am sorry, Miss Humphreys," he said, "but if I accepted the scheme you intended for kindness, I should feel—I should feel selling my soul for a pair of shoes. I have promised Mr. Legh to do the best I can. So," very courteously though very firmly, "I must do it without your help."

The old lady looked at him for a minute in silence. Then said she—

"You're an obstinate—I very nearly said 'fool,' of course I meant 'man,' Norris Stafford. But as you will! Give me due notice if you please when you begin pulling the place about, for Pullen must have his horses ready to take me into Brainford for service then. Now we'll consider the subject closed. May I trouble you to ring the bell for tea?"

The curate did as requested. His equanimity on personal scores soon regained its balance. For the rest he must pocket his vexation as best he could, and trust time to set all straight.

"If you will allow me, I must be going now," he said, "I want to be over at Mosswick by six to tell them that I cannot dine there to-night as I had engaged to do."

"Oh, dined with the Dasents should you? Why are you calling off?"

"Merely because old Brand is worse and will want to see me this evening."

"So you throw the Dasents' dinner party over for a rheumaticky old poacher's fancies. I expect he'll only want half-a-crown of you."

"The Dasents haven't a dinner party, and poor Brand has much worse than rheumatism. He has not poached for many a long day, and it's no half-crown he wants of me to-night," said the curate pleasantly; "now may I say good-bye?"

"No, you may not," answered the old lady peremptorily. "You seem to think it your duty to attend to everyone before me, but it's my turn to be considered. We've been snarling and feeling evil at each other for the last half hour—at least, I've been feeling evil with you—and I look upon a cup of tea as a feminine pipe of peace. You're to stop and take it with me."

Nothing loth to make present friends on these easy terms Norris Stafford humoured his hostess willingly. It would only cost him a double quick run to Mosswick. So, at Miss Humphreys' bidding, when Wilkins had set the tea equipage on the table between them, he proceeded to serve her with her symbol of reconciliation. Not being, however, a too apt carpet knight, and unaccustomed to the entanglements of tea-trays, Mr. Stafford managed to tumble the sugar-tongs down and jangle the old Derby cups.

"Clumsy man," said Miss Humphreys, quite affable, though, in this chiding. "You bachelors wait on yourselves till you are not fit to wait on anyone else! Why don't you get married, Mr. Stafford?"

He laughed right out and cheerily.

"Having barely enough to keep one you think I'd best undertake to keep two! No, thank you, Miss Humphreys. I've never dreamed of such a thing."

"Well, then, begin to dream of it now," insisted the old lady. "A man of thirty—you're thirty, are you not?" He nodded, smiling. "A man of that age ought to be looking out for a wife. There are the Vincents at Holme; nice girls—not too young. What do you think of them?"

"Very nice, no doubt, but—I don't wish to marry."

"But, I advise it, Mr. Stafford! The Harleys have a daughter disengaged; why don't you look there?"

"My dear Miss Humphreys, don't talk of such a thing! An all but impecunious parson has no right to look anywhere. What's more, I've never seen the woman yet whom, if I were ever so rich, I should care to ask as my wife."

"Well, don't look so fierce about it, man," said Miss Humphreys, her keen old eyes gleaming with amusement at his earnestness; "I was only recommending what was for your own good; some day you may think so, if you live to be old like me, with no one of your own about you."

"No one of your own! why——"

"Oh, yes, I know what you are going to say—I have Hilary. So I have; but a second cousin's child is very different from chick or grandchick of one's very own. Not that I complain of Hilary. It's only natural she should like scampering about the country on that pony of hers, and only natural at my age that I should be left at home alone. Perhaps if I had had a granddaughter she would have served me just the same."

"A 'cup that cheers.'"—p. 67.

Mr. Stafford began now to perceive why he had found Miss Humphreys in one of her most awkward moods, and clumsily attempted to soothe the lady's ruffled temper.

"How came it Miss Hilary did not consult your wishes before her own? I think I shall take an old friend's privilege and tell her she ought to have done so," said he; and hereupon found what it was to put his finger between the bark and the tree.

"No, no," cried Miss Humphreys; "I insisted on the child going out. She would have stayed with me if I'd wished. As for saying anything to her, pray do nothing of the sort. I can scold her or spoil her without anyone else's help."

"Then far be it from me to intrude mine," said the curate quietly; but something in his manner or voice dissatisfied his exacting companion.

"Not that I spoil her in the least," she went on positively; "now, you're not going to insinuate, Mr. Stafford, that I do that?"

"I meant to insinuate nothing," he answered. "Let me give you another cup of tea."

"Don't try to distract me from my point. I'm confident from your tone you were thinking something of that sort. Now, tell me candidly, do you consider Hilary spoilt?"

"My dear lady, I don't want to discuss the point."

"But I do. As my spiritual pastor I consult you on what I choose. Is Hilary spoilt?"

The curate hesitated, annoyance and amusement playing on his features; something else—the expression with which kindly strength sets itself against a weaker foe—softening his firm mouth and deepening the light in his eyes.

"Is Miss Hilary spoilt?" said he. "Well," slowly, "I won't say she is."

"But you mean she's in a fair way to be so."

"You put the words in my mouth, Miss Humphreys."

"And you don't disclaim them, Mr. Stafford."

Truth was truth, and not to be shirked. "No, I do not."

"Then you're the most disgustingly honest man that ever added to a poor old woman's worries! When you had a chance of getting in my good graces, why on earth didn't you use it? Not that I care for what you think one bit. You're perfectly wrong about the child. Please put my cup down—the tea is bitter. Now kindly explain how Hilary is spoiled."

Norris Stafford knew there was no evading the reply, so he chose a light count.

"Miss Hilary is an absolute baby over money, and has a trick of demoralising her few favourites in the parish by giving them half-sovereigns."

Miss Humphreys chuckled at this. "And then, never makes her month's pocket-money last a week, the young spendthrift! Let her give what she likes, she'll soon find out she's being cheated. Money is nothing to her when she knows she can always have plenty."

"True enough," answered the curate, who was by no means in the same predicament. "Nevertheless, Miss Hilary might be the better for learning some of its responsibilities."

Miss Humphreys drew down the corners of her lips in renewed affront. "I will make it my business to see she does, Mr. Stafford. Perhaps I shall ask your help to teach her. Ah!"—stopping his protest with a gesture, "I won't trouble you to find any more fault with her to-day. Here she comes at last—the way I've forbidden. But I'm glad to have her back!" And following her signal, Mr. Stafford saw the well-known slender figure in dark habit, mounted on her pretty grey "Daphne," come tearing over the corner of a field, scattering late-standing shocks of barley, clear a hedge that divided off the Abbotswick grounds, leap a rhododendron that stood in the way, canter right over the level lawn, and draw rein exultingly with the pony's soft, quivering nostrils a bare foot off the very window of the room where this council of two was being held.

CHAPTER II.

AND a vastly pretty picture Miss Hilary St John made, as, backed by the yellow sunlight, framed in the swaying jasmine sprays that clustered about the wide casement, and breathless with her helter-skelter gallop, she leaned forward, looked gaily in upon Aunt Phil, as she always called Miss Humphreys, dropped the reins to clasp her gloved hands, and, bending her young figure into petitioning lines, drew her lips, oftenest parted by careless smiles, into solemn curves as of a culprit expecting a scolding.

"Please open the window!" she cried, and, as Mr. Stafford obeyed, with just a nod at him, "Oh, Aunt Phil, you're not to be cross with me! Expostulate with Daphne, please. The wicked creature sighed heavily for the stable when we got to the corner of the lane; so I turned her head just a little tiny bit, only just for fun, and I said, 'Would you very much like the short cut, dear?' and off she went like a bird, and kicked poor Baker's barley about under his very eyes, and came home straight as a bee-line, in two minutes, while poor old Pullen is still jogging on the high road at the rate of six miles an hour. Now what will you do to punish this bad Daphne?"

"What shall I do to punish your bad self, you mean," cried the old lady, with scowls that were more than half sham, "riding in that reckless fashion, breaking down my fences——"

"Slander, auntie, slander; we never touched a leaf of them."

"And cutting up my lawn!"

"Only very, very little. Daphne all but flies, you know."

"Giving Bell no end of work to make it good again!"

"Bell is a kind man, Aunt Phil; he likes extra work. Last time we two had this frolic he was growling over the grass next morning long before I was up, so I rang and ordered him early breakfast out of doors, coffee and cold meat, which his soul delights in. And he was as sweet as honey to me when I apologised to him for poor Daphne's hoof-marks later on."

"Umph!" grunted Aunt Phil, "if you 'order' entertainments of that sort for my servants, Miss St. John, they'll condone most of your offences. Pray, are you going to order coffee and cold beef up to John Baker's to atone for scampering over his field for the fifth time?"

"Third, auntie—don't exaggerate. Oh," laughing, "he did look irate! But I shot by him as if I had a perfect right; for, after all, auntie, it is your own land."

"But he hires it, child. I shall have him complaining again."

"Then send him half a crown to make it up."

"Men like him, my dear, are not conciliated with half-crowns. They stand on their rights."

"Oh, then," cried Hilary lightly, "make them pay for the privilege: put something extra on their rents. I will—I mean I would if I were you, Aunt Phil."

"Talk of what you understand," retorted Miss Humphreys sharply; "and keep off my tenants' land in future. Are you going to sit there all the afternoon, or do you want any tea?"

"Come and help me," said Hilary to the curate, with a glance that said, "I want you;" then, as he was making his way by the hall, she soliloquised aloud, for Miss Humphreys' benefit: "Oh, naughty, thoughtless Daphne! now, you are not to nibble Aunt Phil's jasmine and vex her! You forget yourself strangely to-day. Here comes Giles for you.—Giles, tell Bell to roll the gravel smooth early to-morrow. Daphne never intends to transgress again—never. Mr. Stafford," whispering confidentially up at that gentleman as he helped her down, "is Aunt Phil really angry with me?"

The frank, dark-fringed hazel eyes looked right full into his own; a small hand upon his shoulder for an instant seemed to cling there. A very odd sensation thrilled through Norris Stafford—perfectly new to him—gone almost as soon as come. He set the child—she was a child to him, of course—down as carefully as he used seven years ago when he first taught her riding on her Shetland, and let himself answer the young lady more impulsively than he usually did now-a-days.

"Really cross? No, I don't think she can be, Miss Hilary."

"Good man for once," she cried, brightly wafting him thanks with her whip, and ran fearlessly in while he more slowly followed.

The culprit was very comfortably sharing a footstool with Miss Humphreys' feet when he re-entered the room, one arm confidingly on the old lady's knee, the other holding up a peace-offering in a bunch of scarlet spindle-berries and feathery clematis seeds.

"I thought how charming this would look in a little nest of your black lace, Aunt Phil, so I crooked the 'Traveller's Joy' down with my whip and nearly swung myself out of my saddle after the spindle. Say 'Thank you,' and look quite pleased again! That's right! now I'll forgive your having frowned at me. Mr. Stafford, you might give a tired horsewoman a 'cup that cheers.' Thanks; and now," leaning lazily against Miss Humphreys, "what have you two been talking about?"

"Disagreeable things without number, yourself included," said Aunt Phil, beaming good-humouredly once more on the pretty brown head upon which she now rested her hand, pleasantly conscious that that background showed off the shapely member to advantage. "We nearly came to words over the church, but I wouldn't give way over that, so in revenge our pastor took to vilifying you. He says you're spoilt, my dear."

Hilary's lips drew down in affront. That charmingly mobile mouth of hers was always telling tales before her voice spoke. A flush rose on her rounded cheek as she said—

"No new accusation that, Aunt Phil. Mr. Stafford politely informed me I was frivolous only the day before yesterday."

"Miss St. John, I——"

"As good as said so, indeed—when you were coming from those ill people down by the marsh" (Netley parish ran far out seaward), "and I took the trouble to stop and invite you to my birthday lunch next week. And you were as absent-minded and grave as a judge, all because of your tiresome sick people; which caused me just to remark that cottagers in good health were a nuisance, but in illness a perfect plague.—And then, Aunt Phil," much aggrieved, "Mr. Stafford amiably said that as I grew older perhaps I might feel that poor folks' troubles had a claim on me, or something of that sort. I know somehow he implied I was frivolous, so I had to buy my favour back by promising his tiresome invalids no end of kitchen physic."

"Which had not reached them to-day, Miss Hilary, however," said the curate quietly.

"Not? Good gracious! I believe I forgot to tell Mrs. Wilkins to send it, so it's my fault. Never mind; they shall have double allowance to-morrow."

"The particular one for whom it was needed does not require it any longer—he died at noon to-day."

Hilary changed colour, angry with herself, but she had no mind to play the penitent to Mr. Stafford.

"Oh, then," she said, "I must tell my maid to send a big bundle of black clothes to the survivors. Good mourning is a great balm under these circumstances. And will you take them half a sovereign from me, Mr. Stafford, as the fine on my forgetfulness?"

"I'd fifty times rather you took it to them yourself, Miss Hilary," said the curate, abruptly getting up to leave. "Then you would see——"

"Ah! you're going to sermonise me! Don't, don't, dont!" cried Hilary, putting a hand firmly over each pink ear; and, as she resolutely maintained this deafened attitude, Mr. Stafford walked off without addressing her any more.

For half a minute Hilary furtively watched the door as though expecting him to return. When he proved actually and finally gone, she let her arms drop down with a droll little shrug.

"That man and I are doomed to fall out with one another nowadays, Aunt Phil. When he was young I recollect he used to be quite nice."

"A good many people have that opinion of him still, Hilary! Why haven't you?"

"I don't know; when he taught me to play tennis, and trample on his individual toes most unmercifully."

"And, really, I can't say you go the way to work to make him like you, Hilary."

"And, really, I don't want to, Aunt Phil. But what do you mean?"

"Why, that you make jokes of all his interests,

"She slid her gems over her long white fingers."—p. 70.

years ago, he was quite charming, and did not mind anything I said. Now he wraps himself up in clubs and labouring people, and does not drop in here half so often as he did in my lesson days, when I always struck work and rushed down-stairs as soon as ever I saw him in the avenue. And he's grown stiff and extremely old; and, really, I can't say I like him at all."

"Never! Aunt Phil. How?"

"Well, you remember the last time he was here how you launched out on the frightful poverty of someone—I forget whom—but someone with certainly treble his means. You enlarged on misery such as you have never known of—making sixpence do the work of a shilling, and so forth. It was rough on Mr. Stafford, Hilary. I could see it downright hurt him."

And Aunt Phil, who, with one of her capricious changes of mood, was now in fault-finding vein once more, looked grimly shocked. Hilary jumped up with the least possible toss of her shapely head.

"Ah! if you lecture me too, I shall go and dress for dinner, auntie, and take an hour about it. It's a pity I did not stay out longer with pleasant company when I had the chance."

"What pleasant company?" questioned Miss Humphreys, holding the girl tight by her habit. "Whom have you seen?"

"Oh, only just such another frivolous person as myself," returned Hilary, her eyes dancing with fun. She knew Aunt Phil's curiosity would bring her down to amiable level again. "No one more important than Captain Cavenham. He happened to be riding through the parish—I think he said something about coming to call; but he turned back with me instead—and he told me about the entertainment. How I should like to go to one! He was saying he wished I could. Oh, and, Aunt Phil dear, Captain Cavenham mentioned that his father is engaged, and will not be able to come to our lunch next week. He wondered if he might come instead. I said of course he might. Was that proper of me?"

"If it was not, you've said it, and it's done with," was the answer, and the old lady fell thinking, as the girl ran off with a nod: "Now, I'll be bound that young man has been talking nonsense to the child this afternoon, and filled her head with his valuable sentiments;" and with that she sank into a profound reverie.

It happened for once she had made a miscalculation. Hilary, traversing the gallery that ran round three sides of the hall, supported on fluted wooden columns, stopped short by the large window over the front door, looked across the gravel sweep, and down the avenue of limes and chestnuts that ran from Abbotswick straight up to the boundary palings, and the very porch of the half-ruinous church.

Slowly pacing into the deepening shadows, Norris Stafford was still in sight. Hilary leant on the balustrades that crossed the casement and watched him a minute; her lips petulant at first, then softened into a lingering half-smile. He was hardly going with his usual quick step. He carried himself as if tired. He looked exceedingly alone. She forgot she had called him old and disagreeable; kindlier light stole over her honest eyes. "I hope Aunt Phil was not right," she murmured to herself, with a last glance down the darkening trees. "Of course I never meant to hurt you," and then she betook herself to her own room, there to distract the staid woman who waited upon Miss Humphreys and her, by lavish orders concerning disused clothes, "which," as Joyce grumbled down-stairs, "was wholly unbecomin' to such as them Scotts, asides being her rightful perquisite, accordin' to mistress's own words; but, there! Miss Hilary fared to think she might do just as she liked nowadays."

Some similar sentiment to this last lay, perhaps, though barely recognised, at the root of the departing curate's inquietude. Once in the shadow of the avenue, his physique relaxed into lines of depression most unusual with him. Now and again the ups and downs which his life had known seemed to parade themselves rather cruelly before his mind. This fading September evening was one such time. As the wind sighed about him and he tramped along under the yellowing boughs, he looked wistfully back on eight years ago, when, rich in youth, and wealth, and schemes practically limited only by his own desires, he had been living through halcyon undergraduate days at Oxford. That was before the huge trading crash in Lancashire which deposed his father from the position of almost a cotton prince to that of a ruined man with less income than one of his own clerks had lately earned. Then came good-bye to all their moneyed state. His father's death followed quickly. Every penny that was saved from the wreck was needed by Mrs. Stafford, a delicate woman nursed by years of luxury into chronic invalidism. In a cheap Continental town she and her daughters elected to take refuge, and Norris was pitchforked by circumstances into a profession he had never dreamed of entering. The uncle of one of his Oriel chums, who had taken to the young fellow on a chance meeting, offered him a title to orders. Friends pressed the timely proposal upon him, and nigh eight years back he had become curate of Netley. Nowadays, less regret attached to the step than when he first took it. Then, as soon as the deed was done, the young man had felt appalled by a sense of his own incompetence—almost paralysed by realisation of what he ought to be for such a post. Curates in general may not be afflicted with such lowly self-estimation, but this one had it strongly. And what is more odd is that never, even with success at his work, did he outgrow it. A vivid sense of his own insufficiency for the highest labour a man can be called to, remained woven in with his nature, binding him always to be doing his very best with all entrusted to him, whether that were teaching a preternaturally stupid school-child or rebuilding the church left now in his sole charge by the rector whose ill-health kept him resident on the Riviera.

Consciousness that he was doing to the very zenith of his ability was one of the curate's crutches through many a halting season of self-doubt and care: the warm confidence and rough liking of his people was another. There was scarce a boy in the place who would not own his misdemeanours to Mr. Stafford, be they what they might; and more men found their way to his small, tumble-down church than might have been counted in the congregations of any four parishes around. Another and yet stronger staff than all unquestionably guided the steps of this thirty-year-old clergyman, but it was one he lived rather than talked of. There never was a man less of a prig than he in any sense of the word. "He haven't got no cant," an old ploughman said of him; "he don't give none of us physic that he haven't tasted of hisself!" and perhaps that same "physic" had brought his constitution into contentment with his life as it had to be; and seldom was that content ruffled by thought of what it might have been. But to-night—by the gate of the rectory, part of which he inhabited—Norris Stafford looked back at Abbotswick, with its windows gleaming in the light of the rising harvest moon, and felt as though he had borne away thence some new intangible care. It was not, surely, Miss Humphreys' resolute opposition to the scheme he had carried to her? No; candidly, he knew it was not. It was something, strange though it sounded, still closer to himself. What had possessed her to bid him go and get married? His stipend was wanted ten ways at once—for his mother, his sister, his people. He gave a curt laugh at the notion as he stood there solitary and silent; and yet——

A figure with hazel-brown eyes and ruffled rippling hair, a someone full of winsome ways and perverse contradictions, floated before him—the someone who had just, to his bewilderment and often pain, tripped over girlhood into woman's rank. Thought of her sprang into the man's heart unbidden, undesired, swiftly checked. It was like an instant's rift in heavy clouds that let through just one gleam of blue sky beyond. But the blue sky was absolutely unreachable. Such heights were not for him. He turned indoors smiling at his own ineffable folly.

"Ah! if I were young and rich," quoth he to himself, "and she were—— Pooh, Norris, my man, don't make an ass of yourself!" Then he plunged into the intricate accounts of his labourers' provident society, and set-to to drown his fleeting folly neck and crop.

But, however he succeeded, never again could he have told Miss Humphreys he had not seen the woman he would have cared to make his wife.

CHAPTER III.

MISS HUMPHREYS' fit of abstraction hung about her all through that evening. She was not feeling very well, though obstinately refusing to admit as much to herself or anyone else; and she had reached the age when the world's small frets and jars are either dwarfed by shadows of a great change assuredly not far off, or else rise into perplexing over-prominence.

Hers took the latter course. The afternoon, take it all in all, had not been an agreeable one. Mr. Stafford's stubbornness about that restoration craze had been most unpalatable. She dearly loved to domineer; was willing enough to make amends if yielded to, but apt to cherish resentment against any stronger force to which she had to bend. Then the provoking part of the business was, she knew the man was in the right; and yet, because the last six owners of Abbotswick had sat in the square oak pew decorated with the Humphreys "griffin rampant" at the four corners, which had blocked up nigh all the chancel since the days of good Queen Anne, there she had resolved to sit to the end of her time, and interference with this intention chafed her inconceivably.

Then, again, she was discontented at having had to oppose Norris Stafford. By some irrational process of feminine reasoning, she liked him all the better for not having submitted to her imperiousness. So altogether she was out of sorts. Even Hilary had added to rather than abated her fit of spleen, and Miss Humphreys was so gloomily silent while her maid performed her slight dinner toilet that Joyce ventured an artifice that rarely failed to lure her mistress into conversation.

"Ah, ma'am," said she, sorting her mistress's rings out of an old leather-covered jewel-box—one, a gleaming arrangement of diamonds close set round a sapphire as big as a fourpenny bit; another, a double row of rubies packed so tight that the half-hoop might have been cut from a single gem—"Ah, ma'am, I often say, these 'll never look as well on nobody's fingers as they do on yours. Short hands don't show them off nothin' like so well."

"Whose short hands are going to show them off?" said Miss Humphreys.

"Nobody's, for many a day, I hope, ma'am; but I was saying to Miss Hilary, when she once stood tryin' of them on—'Ah,' said I, 'miss, they don't look of a piece with you same as with my mistress. You only take six and a quarter, but you haven't got the real Humphreys hand.'"

"And what did Miss Hilary say?"

"Only laughed, ma'am, and told me about some she 'd seen Mrs. Clement Keen wear, set quite different, in thick gold bands. 'These would look lovely,' she said, 'done like that.'"

Miss Humphreys puckered up her mouth as she slid her rare old gems over her long white fingers.

"Ah, Joyce," she said, her afternoon notion reasserting itself, "if I had got married fifty years ago and had a grandchild coming after me, she might have cared for these ancient things. But now—you'll see changes in Miss Hilary's time, Joyce."

"Just the words Bell said to me, ma'am, when he was tellin' of me how Miss Hilary had been talkin' about orchard-houses here and orchid-houses there. 'Ah!' says Bell, 'Miss Hilary thinks she 'll make a rare fine place of it some day. She 've a pretty taste, and will spend a mint of money, I 'll warrant.' And I made answer, 'Don't you go spellin' of no such things, Mr. Bell. Missis is hale and hearty yet, thank God, and you and me mayn't never live to see Miss Hilary rule here.'" Here catching a distinct scowl on Miss Humphreys' face in the glass opposite, Joyce saw she was making a blunder, and began to hedge wildly with, "Though, to be sure, she 's a young lady no one could help being fond of; and of course young folks like new fashions."

Miss Humphreys cut the woman's gossip short. "Go and see if Miss Hilary wants you now," she said peremptorily. "It is nearly dinner time."

"Oh'm, Miss Hilary made me do her hair afore I came to you to-night. She 's foragin' up pounds' worth of things for them Scotts. I 'm to clear up when she 's left the room."

"That 's your own needlework hour, Joyce."

"Yes 'm, but Miss Hilary did not think of that; and"—trying to avert another heavy frown—"I really don't mind; it does not matter a mite, ma'am."

"When Miss Hilary bids you do anything of that kind in the evening," said Miss Humphreys slowly, "say—respectfully, of course—that by my orders your evenings are your own. Now go down-stairs."

And Joyce descended to report confidentially to Mrs. Wilkins, the housekeeper, "that missus was in one of her contrariest moods to-night—there was no pleasin' her noways." And the two women fell talking over the peculiarities of the lady who paid and treated them well, and yet whose uncertain temperament made serving her no sinecure.

Dinner accomplished with little conversation, save over the toughness of the first partridges and the unripeness of the last peaches—nothing went pleasantly that special day—Aunt Phil sat over the bright wood fire in the drawing-room watching Hilary flit hither and thither; holding back a curtain to peep at the great round moon, dipping a thirsty rosebud deeper in its bowl, changing this ornament or that to suit her fancy, and the strong liking, nearest approach to loving her later life had known, swept over the elder woman.

"Come here, Hilary," she commanded; and as the girl seated herself on a low stool in full light of the dancing flames, her kinswoman seemed to study intently the young frank face, which, without being beautiful, was wonderfully winning, with a sweet, generous mouth, and ready trustfulness written on every line, from the broad white brow to the curve of the round, childlike chin.

"Well, Aunt Phil, what are you thinking of?" quoth Hilary at last, reddening under this long inspection.

"I am wondering," was the answer, as Miss Humphreys brushed her hand over Hilary's thick, nut-brown braids, "what you would do with all this if you had no Joyce to attend to it, Miss St. John."

"Why, let Maria do it instead, to be sure." Maria was a house-servant earnestly desiring promotion to attend on Miss Hilary.

"Ah, but suppose you couldn't—suppose I said I couldn't afford anyone to arrange it? What then?"

"It can't happen, so we won't think about it," said Hilary comfortably.

"But you are to think about it! What then?"

"Why, I should—cut it off! Someone has always done it for me, and someone always must."

"H'm." Hilary rather expected a homily after this audacious speech, but Miss Humphreys suddenly changed the subject. "Where did you ride to-day?"

"Into Brainford, auntie. I was going to tell you at dinner, only you were not inclined to talk."

"Child, you know I don't like you going into the town with only Pullen."

"Oh, but I'd Captain Cavenham too, Aunt Phil. I'd not intended to go there when I set out, but I suddenly remembered it was the twins' birthday, so I thought you would not mind my riding over. I called at Drew's, and bought them some little gold bangles. They were charmed with them, and said I was their good fairy, and capered about me till they frightened Daphne, so Captain Cavenham was kind enough to get down and hold her bridle himself."

"Very polite! And did you see your father?"

"Oh, yes; he agitated himself," laughing, "over my dear pony; thought she was too frisky, and gave me dozens of instructions how to manage her. I ought not to joke about it, though, for he is very good to be so careful of me."

"He knows your value," said Miss Humphreys drily. "Did Madam St. John appear too?"

"Certainly; in raptures with my new habit. She paid me so many compliments I was ashamed for Captain Cavenham to hear them."

"Oh, the Captain would agree with them all, I've no question. He was bound to do so."

Hilary lost the faint sarcasm of this.

"He said he did, auntie," she acknowledged with perfect innocence, a pair of dimples lurking about her cheeks at the recollection.

"And you believed him?"

"Why should I not, Aunt Phil?"

But to this Miss Humphreys replied nothing. She simply sat stroking the girl's head, gazing with knit brows on the sparkling logs. In the stillness Hilary's glance roved about the room, lighting critically upon pictures of one century, furniture of the next, bric-à-brac of yet another; and presently she gave the result of her cogitation freely, according to custom.

"We have an omnium gatherum here, auntie! This room would look delightful with all the modern things weeded out, and everything left of a piece, as Mrs. Dasent has one of hers at the Heath. We could furnish that empty south room with what we could spare from here. Old chintz would suit that bow better than rep. Suppose we make the change, Aunt Phil?"

Miss Humphreys caught back her hand, and sat bolt upright.

"Suppose we do not," she retorted.

"Then," said Hilary cheerfully, "we will do without it till——"

"I'm tired," said Miss Humphreys abruptly; "keep your improvements to yourself, if you please. Go to bed now, and send Joyce to me."

That tone was not to be questioned. Hilary obeyed instantly, though with dark eyebrows lifted in surprise. She was not often so summarily dismissed; but Aunt Phil brooked no investigation of her moods, and now vouchsafing only the top of her cheekbone to the girl's good-night salute, was immediately left as she desired.

"Has anything worried auntie from down-stairs?" Hilary asked Joyce half an hour later; sometimes the iniquities of a kitchen-maid would make the mistress irate for days. But Joyce answered that nothing had gone wrong; and Miss Humphreys was only a little low-like at the turn of the seasons perhaps, but she did wish she would go to bed like a Christian lady, and not sit up poising by herself till goodness knew how late. Some night she would turn faint, as she did come Christmas five year, and then she'd be tumbling down and doing herself mischief.

Hilary sat up anxiously between her white curtains as the woman set her room straight for the night. "But, Joyce, could not Aunt Phil let you sleep in her dressing-room? Then you could see after her better."

"Goodness, Miss Hilary! I daren't speak of such a thing; it would anger her wonderful"

"How?"

"It would make her think she was getting old; and mistress can't abide that notion. Good-night Miss Hilary."

Joyce spoke as one who had learned her mistress by five-and-twenty years' experience, and spoke the truth. Miss Humphreys did hate, with all her remaining vitality, that notion of growing old, and yet it would keep coming to the fore. It haunted her now, as she sat wrapped up by her bedroom fire, and made her avoid a single glance at any mirror. The sight of herself without her gleaming teeth, all her wrinkles blazoning themselves under the crinkly lace of her nightcap, disgusted her. Hilary had never been allowed to see her in this undress. Sometimes it seemed only the other day she was young and smooth-skinned as Hilary herself only the other day, and yet it was nigh sixty years ago—that time when her father's death had left her mistress of Abbotswick, and she might have picked a husband where she chose. She need not have died Miss Humphreys"—pshaw! she was not going to die at all yet. The Humphreys had always been folks of small families and long lives. How would it have been if she had let that neighbouring squire (who had been buried these thirty years) have the marriage settlements to his liking, if she had not sent him adrift over the contested mastership of a few thousand pounds? They said he had made the wife he wedded a good husband enough. Still, she might have done well. At any rate, she had had every penny of her property under her own control her whole life through, and that had brought her pleasure equal perhaps to what she had otherwise missed. It had brought her power which none could say she had used altogether ill; and it had brought her Hilary!—Hilary, who kept youth alight in the old house—Hilary St. John—not a Humphreys, it is true, only the grandchild of a cousin on a mother's side; still, centre of all Aunt Phil's softest, most womanly, nearest-to-maternity care and love; a baby plaything for years after her young mother died; a growing amusement, a something whose prettiness was a thing to be proud of as an appendage of Abbotswick when she grew into gay and graceful girlhood. Companion pug-dogs, cockatoos, charitable societies—what such things are to many spinsters, Hilary had been to Aunt Phil. Fondness for her had grown with every stage. Had she spoiled Hilary? That insufferably straightforward man had as good as said so, and, to be sure, she had never permitted the slightest reproof to be visited on the girl by any but herself. Perhaps she was thoughtless. Time might mend that. As for money, what need had Hilary to count its worth? And yet—Miss Humphreys' face lowered ominously—Hilary did disperse pounds as though she had a mine of them. Owned—a—mine! Ah, Abbotswick, with its comfortable rent-roll, was to be Hilary's mine! So everyone, Miss Humphreys included, had settled long ago. But a most curious jealousy of her successor had disturbed her lately, fed from all sources. Hilary's rising sun would be worshipped as her own went down, and Hilary made very sure of this. Truly the girl might be only following her training; Miss Humphreys forgot that, as she sat silently fuming till midnight was long passed. But Hilary carried her own way nowadays against all rules: ordered the servants, scoffed at the tenants, meant to reset the old Abbotswick gems according to the latest fad of Bond Street jewellers—did she, indeed!—would build here, pull down there, alter everywhere, when, when——

Miss Humphreys' old eyes flashed out quite fiercely from under her frills. "Shall she?" she muttered; and then they dimmed again as, in profound perplexity, the sunken mouth worked nervously over some problem. "The toadies the child will have about her!" she soliloquised, "all helping her to spend, all preying on her—that father of hers the foremost; and she'll take all their flattery for gospel. George Cavenham would marry her then, the spendthrift! and her life here and the old place might turn into a curse to her. She has no right to Abbotswick. She'd be a better woman and a happier——"

The stable clock struck one. Fagged with long self-debate, Miss Humphreys got stiffly up. "I'll think no more," she said; "it's all a maze—all a maze," and then betook herself to bed to finish in uneasy dreams her last-born project for Miss Hilary—her heiress.

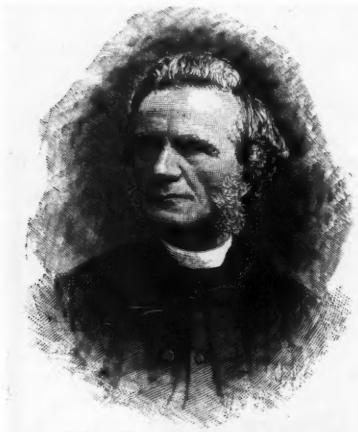
NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

"THE QUIVER" GOOD-CONDUCT PRIZES.

AGAIN the best girl and boy in various institutions for the young have received THE QUIVER prizes, and our readers will be gratified to know that much pleasure and encouragement have been given by these rewards. In the Gordon Boys' Home the recipient is S. C. ROBINSON, "a boy of exemplary character, perfectly trustworthy and obedient, attentive to all his duties;" at Reedham the prizes are taken by E. C. RICHARDSON and JESSIE HARDING, who tells us she made up her mind at the beginning of the year to be prize-winner; JULIA JOHNSON was successful at the Ham Orphan Home; CHARLES ELLIS and ELIZABETH SMITH represent Field Lane Schools; LINDA MARBROOK was unanimously chosen from the inmates of the Princess Louise Home, and she informs us she has purchased for her prize "a very nice work-box, and everything to fit it with." Most of us can remember what prize-day meant at school, and the pride and joy, the resolve to excel yet more in the future, that thrilled us when we were so fortunate as to carry off some trophy from the fascinating-looking table, and, better still, the rejoicing at home when the book was passed from friend to friend. We are glad to know that THE QUIVER prizes are inspiring young lives to do their best, to excel in character, and to form good habits which will prove more valuable than book, desk, or money. May they all be good for the sake of goodness! yet let us not forget that even in our Christian course we are cheered and encouraged by the All-wise, All-loving One with the hope of a prize set before us, an incorruptible crown awaiting those that love His appearing.

A SOCIETY FOR SHAKING HANDS.

Much has been said and sung in praise of solitude, but though most things are good in their place, it is not the right thing for fellow-Christians to feel solitary when they are gathered together in the House of God, and Christ Himself is in the midst of them. "I have been there two years, and nobody has shaken hands with me yet," said one, referring to a place of worship. This might have been a slight exaggeration, and, if quite true, it might be suggested that he could have started the hand-shaking himself, but this is a difficult effort for a new-comer unless gifted with unusual courage and confidence. Our congregations should care that the new-comer feels at home in the Father's House—that on entering a pew rented by somebody else he is not greeted with an astonished stare of disapproval, and that the social, benevolent side of Christianity is not kept only for the fellow-worshippers with whom we are on visiting terms already. "They shook hands with us and smiled at us the Sunday we dropped in, and here we are," said a worthy couple, who had settled down thankfully amid a kindly congregation with their numerous olive-branches. It has been said of our Lord, not irreverently, that He was "the first true Gentleman that ever breathed," and if His religion does not refine us into courtesy and care for the feelings of others, we have yet to learn much more of His spirit. We read lately of a new society to shake hands with every fellow-worshipper: "Thus one day," say the members, "we hope to shake the world." Let each of us personally take care that the stranger worshipping beside us does not feel isolated, or as the monk praying under a vow of loneliness.



LIFEBOAT WORK IN THE HUMAN SEA.

A RESCUING HAND.

Readers of THE QUIVER will remember our description of "Babies' Castle," Hawkhurst, Kent, the home maintained by Dr. Barnardo for his infants. One of these little ones, he relates, is "Shadwell Moggy," whose sole nursery was the streets, and whose nurse was a little eight-year-old sister. This little maid had to be taken to the hospital, having hurt herself by a fall. "Shadwell Moggy" came under Dr. Barnardo's charge, and the ten-months-old mite, without teeth, was found equal to the hardest crusts, potato-parings, and street garbage. "Now," says the Doctor, "Moggy is as round and rosy as the best of her happy foster-brothers and sisters." Dr. Barnardo truly affirms that no work on God's earth can be greater than to save poor boys and girls from the perils of the streets—a work in which he will press on unfalteringly if Christian men and women and children will uphold his hands. "You don't know what it is to be all alone in the world, sir," said a boy found in one of the recesses on London Bridge; "you don't know what it is to be chucked about without anybody caring for you."—"My lad," said the Doctor, "from this night forth I will be your friend;" and a true friend he has proved to many in similar case. There was a cheery children's service this summer at Bournemouth on the subject of a bright penny, when a collection was made on behalf of Dr. Barnardo's little ones, needing so many pennies to keep them clothed and fed. This is a suggestion for leaders of children's meetings, as in many cases there is no charge for membership of children's bands; but thank-offering gifts are a privilege even children may share, and they could not be devoted to a tenderer purpose.

THE REV. CANON WESTCOTT, D.D.

CANON WESTCOTT ON PRAYER.

We give this month a portrait of Canon Westcott, whose writings are doubtless known to many of our readers. Canon Westcott was educated at Cambridge, and was at one time assistant-master at Harrow; he has distinguished critical gifts, and is eminent as a scholar and commentator. Preaching this summer at Westminster, Canon Westcott emphasized the need of prayer if, amid the restlessness of much serving, Christians would receive more and more of the Divine fulness, and embody His spirit in action. He pointed out that prayer should be the voice of loving self-surrender, and not of self-seeking; "from God, through God, unto God"—that is the whole history of prayer. Jesus Himself has taught us the last word of prayer, "Father, glorify Thy Name;" therefore, let us seek to make God's will our own, that His love, His patience, His righteousness, may through His dealings with us be shown unto men. The preacher pointed out that private prayer rests upon careful reflection, and must belong to the essential fabric of our daily life; it will show us God as the living God, make the world to us as His temple, and cast our lives upon the Love that is infinite. There are Christians half-starved, restless, tossed and troubled now, who would live in peace and joy did they kneel more at the Mercy-seat. Truly does Richter say concerning prayer, "It purifies; it is a self-preached sermon."

RENOUNCING SORROW.

Self-sacrifice has justly been the theme of orator and poet for centuries; the patriot who leaped into the gulf, the warrior who rushed upon the spear-points to open a way for his countrymen, have won the laurels due to self-abnegation, and pointed many a moral worth remembering. We have heard of mothers perishing of cold that their infants may be warm; and of a poor gifted sculptor, who put all his clothing round the damp clay of his masterpiece, and died himself from cold rather than his statue should suffer. But we think it is Mrs. Browning who points out how hard, yet how great, a thing it is to sacrifice sorrow; sometimes renouncing pleasure is far easier than renouncing grief. We have had losses, troubles, disappointments; we feel we want to be alone and brood over our griefs; our summer days are over, we ask but to live in our past. This is natural, but scarcely healthy or even Christian; not for one moment would we underrate the weight of sorrow—God knows it, understands it, cares about it; nor do we think Time always heals the heart-ache—God will do that by-and-by in the Meeting-Land. But in this world of human needs, where love and help and sympathy are wanted all around, is it right for us to brood year by year over the cross the Master has laid upon us, while His fields are untended, His lambs are friendless? Let us arise and take up some work full of love, Divine and human.

"VOICES FROM THE DUST."

Under the title of "Proofs of Holy Writ; or, Voices from the Dust" (A. H. Barker, Queen's Road, Hastings), Mr. J. N. Fennings has published a small book, showing how the discoveries of modern times corroborate the truth of historical records found in the Bible, and also of various prophecies. Nineveh and Babylon have become "heaps," their ancient ruins having been discovered as mounds of earth were dug up; and Mr. Layard found inscribed on the pedestal of one of the great bulls Sennacherib's dealings concerning Judah and Hezekiah, as recorded in Scripture. The Moabitish stone is "like another page added to the Bible," taking us back to the time of Omri and Ahab, and throwing additional light upon Scriptural passages. Modern discoveries have witnessed the truth of prophetic words as to the site of the Temple, the condition of Egypt, the desolation of Babylon. It yet remains for the promise to be fulfilled that "the Lord shall smite Egypt, He shall smite and heal it, and they shall return even to the Lord." Mr. Fennings' book treats also of the Egyptian kings, the Israelitish captivity, and many other subjects in connection with latter-day evidence. Scriptural truth finds many assailants; there is room for many a diligent, thoughtful Christian in the ranks of those who by outside evidence strive to help the sincere seeker, the earnest Scriptural student; but let us also remember, when shadows of doubt arise, the promise of the Master—"If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God." The critical, antagonistic spirit, even in face of evidence, will scorn the Word of God; but the humble, obedient heart that prays for teaching and light and understanding, will daily hold the Scriptures more wonderful, more precious.

> "Happiest they of human race
> To whom their God has given grace
> To read, to mark, to learn, to pray,
> To lift the latch and force the way."

"THOU SHALT KNOW HEREAFTER."

Part of the gladness of our future life will be our progress in knowledge and understanding—the glorious explanation of every problem, the ravelling-out of lines that have seemed dark and crooked. How little, after all, do the wisest among us understand! how much lies beyond the capacity of human intellect, beyond the grasp of the mind that is even familiar with deep-sea marvels and the pathways of the stars! The other day we were out walking with a little child and listening to her gay chatter, when she suddenly grew grave, and asked, earnestly, "Whereabouts is my soul?" It was a question that had evidently perplexed her before, and she had treasured it up to bring it trustfully for our explanation. We tried to tell her simply that the part of her that loves, the part that never will die, is her soul, though she cannot feel it, like arm, and hand, and property; but we felt what a problem was perplexing the little heart, and that only our Creator can truly know the nature of the immortal soul. A boy about five years old asked with concern why God had ever made the devil—the problem of evil was perplexing him early in life, and though in game and romp he doubtless soon forgot his deliberations, the childish question lingered long with those to whom it was addressed. In face of questions and spiritual problems like these, we are ourselves but as little children, guessing at solutions which only God understands; it is vain to say we will believe only the things we can search into and understand, for many questions are past finding out here below. Our best days are yet to come, when the Master himself will make everything clear that has perplexed, and, recognising His glory and wisdom in what we deemed shadows and difficulties, we shall own in adoration, "He hath done all things well."

LIFE-SERMONS.

In an earnest sermon to which we listened lately, concerning the privileges and responsibilities of the Christian, the preacher likened the Christ-like disciple to a humble white cottage on the hill-top, which is as a landmark to labourer, traveller, and sailor, not on account of its own dignity, but from the fact that it is built upon the hill. We are called to an open, breezy, hill-top religion, seen and read of all men; even unbelievers take quiet count of professing Christians, and many will judge of our Master from our own every-day lives. A monk invited a young companion to go out preaching with him, and the young man asked him, as they threaded their way from court to court, ministering to the poor, when the sermon was to begin. "We have been preaching all the morning," was the reply, and it was true. Christian charity, sympathy, practical help, are sermons that assuredly represent the Master, even though no doctrines may have been expounded. There are many whose lives are of necessity so busy, whose hands are perforce so tireless, that they feel they are doing nothing for Jesus; but if their hearts commune with Him, even amid the work and all the pressure of life, some will be taking knowledge of them that they have been with Him. The preacher remarked suggestively that our attention is directed to the gas, or a lamp or candle, when it seems out of order and needing repair: otherwise we are only conscious of a bright and shining light, and think little about the channel whereby it reaches us; so, said he, when you get much talked about, beware lest there be something out of order. What the Christian lives for is not personal notice and adulation, but that others may be led to give glory to our Father in heaven.

"RELIGION CONSISTS IN A HOLY LIFE."

Guthrie illustrated the emptiness of a mere profession by the simile of a tree lying across the path, apparently a fair and mighty object; but the foot lightly placed upon it breaks through the bark and sinks down into the body, for insects and poisonous fungi have attacked the core and hollowed out the heart. "Take care," said he, "that your heart is not hollowed out, and nothing left but the crust and shell of empty profession." There are some who began the Christian life full of warmth, ardour, and zeal, who are still regular attendants at religious services, but scarcely the fruit-bearing branches that witness nearness to the Master; it would be possible to live beneath their roof in a state of unconsciousness as to religious influences, which certainly ought not to be the case with any who name the name of Christ. Children, servants, friends, if they think about the matter at all, secretly discredit church- and chapel-going when worshippers on their return abandon themselves to ill-temper, selfishness, worldliness. Religion is not a matter for Sundays only, for outside respectability, or even a mere matter of subscriptions and religious work, but it is a vital every-day concern, affecting the heart. It is an easy thing, but a dangerous condition, for us to glide into the customary groove of attending meetings and performing good works, thereby increasing our responsibilities the more while our own souls are full of worldly tendrils. It has been truly said that it costs but little nowadays to multiply copies of the Bible in our homes; our personal concern must be that God's Word is hidden within our hearts, and that it is the rule and chart whereby we are steering the bark of our every-day life, not only in perilous places when storms seem threatening, but when, all around us, things betoken fair weather and prosperity.

GOOD USES FOR LONG EVENINGS.

It has been said that the road to home happiness lies over small stepping-stones; little things make or mar the memories which those around us will keep in coming years of our homes. Outside duties have their claim upon us, but only as we do our part faithfully by those at home. There must be something out of gear when, at the entrance of a distinguished leader of public meetings, the children hush to guilty silence with an awed "Here 's father!" and when the modern mother is too busy with philanthropic details to notice the kind of reading her children are devouring, and the urgent need of mission-work in her own domestic circle. It is a difficult thing at times for the best-meaning Christian to find the happy medium between neglect of home and neglect of outside religious work; only prayer can settle this question, which must vary with the differing circumstances of each. But home meant so much in the past, and the wisdom of God has so tenderly arranged to set us in families, that it is worth time and thought to make home precious to the growing generation. Can we not drop one evening at least from our engagements and find content at home in reading aloud some noble, wholesome volumes to the young ones, or training their voices in inspiring music, while for the benefit of those less fortunate they employ the long evenings in mechanical, artistic, or needle work? for even the smallest can string beads, cut out and fix scraps, and take part in kindly contributions that will come in acceptably at Christmas time. Book-lovers are inclined to be a little selfish sometimes; it seems a sacrifice to read aloud instead of enjoying the book by oneself, but it does the cleverest of us no harm to "go shares" with our literary stores, and the happy fireside will be a precious memory that may be a safeguard to these young ones by-and-by. And if we chance to know some lonely lives at whose fireside are empty places, or boys and girls who know little of what home can mean, let us take advantage of the winter evenings now and then to gather them in with our own happy circle in the name of Christ.

READING ALOUD IN THE LONG EVENINGS.

PRAYER-TIME IN OUR SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

"All close your eyes!" is the familiar mandate issued from Sunday-school platforms when the leaders are about to engage in prayer; but teachers are obliged to be watchful even then, and the state of the school at such times is frequently a matter for grief and regret. Boys and girls are staring about—some are engaged in affectionate or wrathful converse with neighbours, and some are even engaged in attack and defence—and becoming reverence is exceptional. What can be done to improve the behaviour of the children during prayer-time? Some friends urge standing, some kneeling, some sitting quietly back with closed eyes; anything seems better than the careless, lounging, irreverent attitude so often adopted, as though the prayer had nothing at all to do with the scholars, as the hymns have, or the class-lessons. Let it be made very clear to the children that they possess a part in these supplications that are rising to the Divine Teacher—that definite mercies are asked and expected, in which every scholar may share. "Do you not want God's blessing?" we have sometimes pointedly asked a scholar fidgeting and playing with widely opened eyes. It has appeared quite a new idea to some that a blessing is descending while the prayers arise, or that the benediction is aught but a formality.

Every prayer should be so simply worded that the scholars can understand and inly unite with the leaders; it is still better when they can join in openly, either responsively, or by repeating the words of the leader. Reverence during prayer can only be attained by making the solemn privilege of prayer clear to the mind of each child, by simplicity and reverence in the words of him who leads, and by giving the scholars, if possible, some opportunity of taking part aloud in what seems to many of them too often a trial of patience.

"OPENED FROM END TO END."

"China is opened from end to end," said a speaker in connection with the Friends' Foreign Missions; "we can go throughout the whole country with the message from on high." The language is difficult to learn, and the inhabitants form a vast multitude, many of whom have had no opportunity of hearing the Gospel; but prejudice, exclusiveness, enmity, are breaking down not only as to religion but in social and educational matters likewise. Fifty years ago a missionary to China said he could number the Christians there at six, and there was only one city in the empire near which an Englishman might reside—even then not in the city itself. "What does the present opening up of China mean?" our missionary brethren ask. They praise God for it, and take it as a mighty call to the Christian Church to go in and possess the land for God. We hear of a native Christian praying for years that the Gospel may reach his own village, and not very long ago a devoted worker journeyed to that very place in company with the man who had prayed in faith so long. More labourers are needed in that great harvest-field, and more sympathisers at home to uphold their hands by prayer and help; year by year Divine prophecy is finding fulfilment in the spread of Christ's Kingdom—be it ours to aid in working out the glorious intercession—

> "Baptise the nations: far and nigh
> The triumphs of the Cross record:
> The Name of Jesus glorify,
> Till every kindred call Him Lord."

BOOKS FOR ALL READERS.

An illustrated edition of the Bible in weekly numbers, at the low price of one halfpenny, is a novel step in the right direction. Messrs. Cassell and Company have decided to publish their well-known Doré edition in this popular form, and we would advise our readers to use their influence in securing in their own localities the widest possible acceptance of this cheapest of issues.—Under the suggestive title of "The Sun of Righteousness and the Dark River" (Elliot Stock), Mr. William M. Ferrar has produced a lengthy essay on Christianity and Freethought, which contains some useful points, and, occasionally, some striking passages. But we are bound to express the opinion that the book would have been more effective if the language here and there were less stilted and unnatural. The highest praise we are able to give to this work is that the motive which prompted the author to the labour of producing it is very laudable indeed.—Another series of those little illustrated books of texts which of late have become so popular has been issued by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. "He Leadeth Me" is the title of a pretty little booklet containing illustrations—not only of the twenty-third Psalm, but also of the well-known paraphrase, "The King of Love my Shepherd is." In "Twilight Memories" we have a series of selections from Wordsworth, Kirke White, Mrs. Hemans, and other well-known poets. "The Voice of Nature" is a similar collection, and, on the whole, the illustrations are excellent of their kind.—Mrs. Arthur Brookfield's edition of "Æsop's Fables for Little Readers" (Fisher Unwin) is very attractively put together, the illustrations in red contrasting well with the black of the letterpress. The syllables are divided for the use of the very tiny folk who are just learning to read.

PATHS OF SERVICE.

"This is a big world," said one, bravely searching for employment; "God has something for me to do in it, and I will try and find out my work." There is a saying that "God hath His plan for every man;" it may be to mirror the Saviour's trust and patience under suffering, but, where possible, let the passive Christianity awaken into active working life. Some say they are not clever enough to teach, though in the pages of The Quiver some time ago a Sunday-school worker told of one who successfully taught the little ones of the flock of Jesus, though "hard words" in reading were to herself a stumbling-block. Some can talk of everything save the Master, though a soul brought in contact with them may be athirst for His Name—will they not try to find "a word for Jesus" sometimes, to show their colours more bravely than in past days, to serve Him not only within their own hearts, but openly by their lips? Pen, needle, and purse, may be serving Him too; and it has struck us that visiting members of our different societies for the young have almost become a necessity. Of course Sunday-school teachers are the best visitors of their scholars, but we have many meetings nowadays, such as Bands of Hope, young Christian societies, and the like, which suffer as to attendance unless absentees can be looked up, gathered back, and the causes of absence duly reported to the conductor, who is usually too hard-worked to act as visitor. Christian friends who cannot take part in the management might volunteer for this work of visitation, inspecting the attendance-list, noting absentees, and taking care they are not allowed to lapse without an effort to retain them. Even if half a dozen such absentees could be looked up weekly, our winter meetings and the children themselves would be vastly the better.

THE CHANGELESSNESS OF GOD.

"Change and decay," says the poet, "in all around I see;" whether in Nature, in our own lives, amid our friends, in every surrounding circumstance this ceaseless change goes on. A poor man of our acquaintance travelled to his native place this year to look up old friends. He had not been there for forty years, and anticipated seeing familiar faces and things again; but nothing looked the same, and of the old faces he found not one. Many of us have been through a like experience, passing the house where once we lived, the streets where we feel people ought to know us; but changes have arisen and we are forgotten, and we learn the profitable lesson that the old places have got on very well without us. Still, there would be a touch of sadness about these changes could we not be sure that wherever else we are forgotten, "the Lord thinketh upon us," and amid all these varying circumstances, God remains the same for ever, and with Him is no shadow of turning. He is Rest, though Nature may seem restless; Life, though death may appear to triumph; whatever else may come and go, our Father's name is still I AM. Mr. Spurgeon relates that he deemed it a strange thing when he saw on a country weathercock the motto, "God is Love," and he asked his friend if he meant to imply that the Divine Love can be fickle as the wind. "No," said he, "this is what I mean—whichever way the wind blows, God is Love; through the cold north wind, the biting east wind, still God is Love, as much as when the warm, genial breezes refresh our fields and flocks."

"THE WONDROUS WORKS OF GOD."

Milton reminds us

> "In contemplation of created things,
> By steps we may ascend to God."

The Master taught His love, His care, through nature, and His children may learn more and more of Him as they search out the marvels of creation even in those forms of life we call "the lower." Many a noble mind has proved that religion and science are not foes, that the earnest, honest truth-seeker is not compelled, as some appear to believe, to come to the conclusion that the various forms of life confess no God. Mr. Philip Henry Gosse, F.R.S., was an ardent lover of natural history, concerning which he published many books, and made valuable investigations and drawings; he formed collections of marine animals, studied sea-anemones and corals, and both at home and abroad he made tireless researches into the various branches of zoology and entomology. The great naturalist was also a devoted Scriptural student, having written concerning the "Rivers of the Bible," the "History of the Jews," the "Relation of Egyptian Monuments to the Word of God," and a number of helpful works, his latest being "The Mysteries of God: a series of expositions of Holy Scripture"—a book full of beautiful thought and true devotional feeling. Mr. Gosse died in August this year, at the age of seventy-eight.

THE MEDICINE OF HUMOUR.

"A merry heart," we are told on good authority, "doeth good like medicine," yet there is a latent feeling about some of us that we are not living the religious life when we are thoroughly enjoying ourselves and appreciating a witticism. Having had occasionally a guilty sense of over-fondness for the humorous, we were struck by the words of George MacDonald on this subject: "Who made laughter? did God make it, or the devil? did a man ever laugh heartily and honestly when engaged in the devil's work?" Why should we be inclined to consider, somehow, the joyous things of life as the devil's possession? Surely none should be able to smile and laugh in such genuine enjoyment as those who know they have a Father and a Friend, the Giver of sunshine and flowers and radiant colouring and everything gladsome and beautiful. No sincere disciple will give himself licence as to worldly pursuits under the plea of wholesome fun and recreation, but there is no reason why the children of the King should go mourning all their days—and Cheever has well remarked that to unite genuine humour with deep piety, to use it with chastened judgment yet spontaneously and richly, must be counted one of the manifestations of a powerful intellect. There are Christian standard-bearers among us to-day who form bright illustrations of the worth of consecrated humour.

"BRING HIM HITHER TO ME."

Such were the words of our Lord, when the poor distracted father knew not what to do with his afflicted child; and thus is He still speaking to every parent, every teacher, everyone to whom has been entrusted a child's immortal soul. What is to be done with the careless, giddy, indifferent one, the listless, stolid one, the wilful, incorrigible scholar, the black sheep of the class? Concerning every child the Master's bidding is the same—"Bring him hither to Me." Have we tried to do so yet? Mr. Moody told of a young man to whom death was drawing near: "I shall be with Jesus to-night," he said; "and, father, when I get to heaven, I shall go straight to Jesus, and tell Him you brought me to Him when I was a child." Will our scholars be able to bear witness such as this concerning ourselves? Are we using our best efforts, our prayers, our energies, to this end, that each one shall find a personal Saviour? Let every teacher solemnly, prayerfully face the responsibilities of the position. The teaching-time is very brief; let us of course acquaint our scholars as far as possible with historical, geographical, doctrinal details of the subject of our lesson, but let our central thought and aim, our direct prayer and purpose, be to bring in contact with Christ Himself every soul amid our scholars.

"THE QUIVER" WAIFS.

It has been very encouraging to see that our appeal for THE QUIVER Waifs has met with such a hearty response. From all parts hands have been stretched forth to help, and happily all expenses have been met.

We are sure that those of our readers who took this work to heart last year will rally round us again; and we trust that many others, especially among our younger readers, will join hands with us.

Let those whom God has surrounded with countless joys and benefits think awhile of the many young ones who have to begin life with disadvantages and sorrows enough to crush the heart of a strong man.

We are told that the hard, sharp flint-stones were once sponges soft and receptive: and are there not many hard, bad men going up and down the world, troubling the stream of life and making it muddy, whose lives might have been rendered noble and pure if they had known somewhat of the milk of human kindness in the pliant days of childhood?

Now to give some account of what this year has done for "THE QUIVER Waifs."

MARY JANE.

Mary Jane, whose life-story we gave last November, has crossed the great Atlantic. The money subscribed was sufficient to pay for her outfit, her passage to Canada, and for her support whilst under the care of Miss Rye. She has found a good home in her adopted land, where she will be loved, taught, and cared for, and so we may consider that she is fairly started in the way of an honest, happy, and useful life. We are thus free to hold out the helping hand this year to another little girl.

WINIFRED.

Poor little eight-year-old Winifred, bright and winsome as she looks, has a sad history.

What a volume it would make—the tragedies of humble life!

On Christmas Day—that children's day of rejoicing—her mother, wasted by consumption, lay dead. Her father, an honest, respectable man, was broken-hearted at his loss. For some time he struggled on, burdened with sorrow and the care of his children—for Winifred was not the only one—and at last, in a fit of mental derangement, he destroyed himself. It is a sad outline—who has the heart to do so can fill in the details.

Winifred has been received into Miss Sharman's Home, in South London, to be, under the care of that large-hearted lady, trained for domestic service. Who amongst our readers will help in keeping her there?

LITTLE WILLIE.

Little Willie has been boarded out in a Hampshire village, where he will remain until he is old enough to be taken into the Home in Stepney Causeway and instructed in a trade.

A few days ago we paid a visit to him at his village home. He is growing a fine, intelligent little fellow, with the same winning manners that we noticed at first.

Those who remember the portrait-sketch of him last November, with ragged clothes and matted hair, would certainly not recognise him now. We found his home a pretty thatched cottage, with a vine trained over the front and an arbour of tea-plant about the door.

It was dinner-time when we entered, and Willie was one at the table doing justice to a dish of boiled bacon and cabbage.

He seems to be a general favourite, attends Sunday-school, and sings in the church choir. At the village school he is in the second standard, which is not so bad when we consider that when rescued from his wandering life he did not even know his alphabet.

"I didn't know my a b c," he said; "they put me in the babies' class at first, but I soon got out of that."

He tells us he should like, when he grows up, to be a sailor.

"Why, Willie, you told us last year that you would like to be a carpenter."

"Yes, sir," he replied, with amusing gravity, "I've thought of a carpenter, and I've thought of a sailor. They tell me a carpenter isn't a good trade now, so I think I'd like to be a sailor. Then, if I served twenty-one years, and didn't get shot, I should have a pension, and I could work at something else, and have enough money to keep a house, and then, if I could find my mother, I could let her live in it."

Oh, yes, Willie's plans are very far-reaching. God bless him, and all those who stretch forth the hand to help such as he.

N.B.—Contributions towards the support of "THE QUIVER" Waifs will be gladly received from readers of THE QUIVER by the Editor. All subscriptions will be acknowledged in THE QUIVER, and amounts of £1 and upwards will be separately acknowledged through the post. The Music of the Protestant Reformation

BY J. F. ROWBOTHAM.

THE music of the Protestant Reformation was the dawn of a new music to the world, as completely as the great religious movement itself was the dawn of a higher faith and creed. The music that we enjoy to-day—the music of Beethoven, Bach, Mozart, Handel, all that is noble, popular, and appealing, in the secular side of the art no less than in the sacred—was set in motion when that little rill of Reformation began to run which was soon to overspread Europe with its waters. Such an assertion may seem a strange one, but when we bear in mind how thoroughly the Reformation emancipated the spirit of man from the degrading bondage to priest-craft and tradition, we shall not refuse to believe that all his faculties alike participated in the glorious birthright which it secured him.

Up till the time of the Reformation there was but one kind of music in the world—that, namely, which is known as the Gregorian. All the services of the Romish Church were arranged to tunes of this peculiar system, and when once words and music had been put together, there was no change ever allowed. Given, that is to say, the Missal and the Book of the Hours with the music noted throughout—whenever and wherever the mass was chanted or the Psalms sung, the same musical settings accompanied them. Not a single quaver was different. To change a note in the old traditional tunes was accounted a heinous sin. There was thus a fearful uniformity spread throughout public worship, which was as dull and uninteresting to the congregation as it was painful to the singers. Singing and praying had become alike mechanical; both craved for some potent stimulus to arouse them into life again. What made matters worse for music, was the fact that all the theorists and teachers of the art were ecclesiastics, who were in duty bound to frown at all divergences from and innovations on the Gregorian system. "So long as the Gregorian song remains," were the words of Pope Gregory, "the Church of Rome will remain." It was "the golden chain which bound Christendom together." Its founder had spared no pains to propagate the knowledge of it, and the Emperor Charlemagne, in his zeal for the Romish Church, had gone the length of massacring the supporters of another school of music, viz., the Ambrosian, which at first was a dangerous rival of the Gregorian. Now, the Gregorian song was the same in those days as some of us may know it now—that is to say, full of strange and unexpected turns, very difficult to follow, and which few but trained singers could sing. It was, besides, always accompanied with Latin words. And further, it was encumbered with a variety of intricate and artificial scales, so hard to learn, that choristers required a six years' course of study before they could be reckoned competent singers. Such, then, was the music which prevailed in Europe before the time of the Reformation, and we shall see what marvellous changes took place in the art before the Reformation had ended.

Luther's first care, as soon as he could find a breathing-space amid his labours of controversy and Church reform, was the publication of his opinions on the subject of music. Two pamphlets bearing reference to this theme appeared in 1520, and were, as he confesses, but the expression of views which he had all along entertained. In these pamphlets he condemns the Gregorian song in toto, and roundly accuses it of being the cause of nearly all the abuses which had crept into the Church service. Its first ground of offence in Luther's eyes was, as we may imagine, the association of Latin words with the music. "What barbarism," he says, "that music, which is the common speech of all nations, should be tied to the company of one, and that, forsooth, the very one which no ordinary man can understand!" Next, the strange and fastidious turns of the Gregorian song aroused his contempt: "Such twisting and turning," he says, "which no one can follow." And elsewhere he compares the sound of the Gregorian music to "the braying of an ass." Then its difficulty excited his censure, and he hints pretty plainly that not only is labour thrown away in learning such stuff, but those who are familiar with it had best employ their time in forgetting it. Having thus condemned as worthless the entire system of contemporary Church music, a more difficult task awaited him in proposing an adequate substitute; and most interesting is it for us to read Luther's opinions of what an ideal music ought to be, since many things that were to him unfulfilled dreams have since become realities. "Words should have a swing," he says, "and a good strong metre, so that the congregation may catch up the tune and join in with it." "The singing is for the congregation, and not for the choristers." "German words, and music that will go with German words—this is the proper song for Church service." "On high festivals," he writes, "I would allow Latin songs to be sung, but only until there were enough German ones arranged to do duty for them; and after that we would have no more Latin." A number of similar suggestions are thrown out in the two pamphlets, and for a time they remained suggestions merely. To speculate on what the new music ought to be was one thing, to carry these speculations into effect was another. For no one knew how to proceed in the work of reform. Take the simplest, apparently, of Luther's suggestions—the substitution of German words for the Latin. How was this to be effected? If the Latin were simply translated into German, after the syllables had been with much difficulty each fitted to its tone, even then the peculiar lengthenings, inflections, retardations of the Gregorian music, which suited excellently with the frequent open vowels of the Latin language, would be entirely discordant, and even grotesque, when in company with the abundant consonants and harsh gutturals of the German. Still more difficult of achievement was the task of "giving a swing to the words, so that all the congregation might catch up and join in with the tune"; for to do this, the whole of the music must be altered, and its difficult scales abolished, which were a puzzle to the singers themselves, much more to uneducated worshippers. This requirement alone, if there had been no others beside it, was sufficient to strike at the roots of Gregorianism, and make the musicians of the time turn pale with apprehension at what Luther's new music of the future might lead to.

Many trials were made to reconcile the old system with the new conditions which the essentially popular religion of Protestantism required. Nothing succeeded. Partial reform was as much out of the question in the music as in the religion. Entire separation was the only course practicable; and it was Luther himself who took the step. "Let us," he said, "bid good-bye to the music of Gregory, and take the common songs of our own people, as they sing them at harvests, at village festivals, at weddings, and at funerals, for use in our churches. Man can as well praise God in one tune as in another, and it is a pity that such pretty songs as these should be kept any longer from the service of their Maker." The effect of this bold move at innovation was immediate and electrical. Musicians took pains to search out and arrange the most beautiful of these truly national ditties, and congregations found untold pleasure in singing them. "Such singing," writes one old author of the time, "was never heard in our churches as there has been since the 'Folk Songs' came into fashion." For the first time, indeed, in Christendom for many centuries there was genuine congregational singing, and it owed its origin to the fertile brain of Luther every whit as much as did the hearty worship that accompanied it. Yet strange were the juxtapositions of sacred and profane that occurred in the hymn-books; for it was the fashion to write above the hymn its own first line, and next to this the first line of the "Folk Song" to which it was to be sung, with somewhat grotesque results at times. The principle of adaptation met with such favour that it threatened to run riot for a while; but it was too great a principle for its excesses to be feared. Good taste and the strong devotional feeling of the early Protestants curbed all extravagances, and the work of adapting went on so successfully and so surely that the secular elements incorporated into the services soon lost their old associations, and the music of religion was daily being enriched from an almost inexhaustible store.

In the height of the movement Luther enforced his teachings practically by the publication of a "Song Book." The object of the publication was partly to encourage musicians by his own example in their task of editing and arranging, and partly to show them how far discretion might go in borrowing from secular sources, and at what point a line ought to be drawn. In this "Song Book" he gave admission to numerous popular ditties of the day as chants and hymns; two or three pieces of the Romish Church music he likewise included, which had the unusual merit of extreme simplicity to recommend them, and had become familiar to the people; and the third source from whence he drew were the hymns of the Moravian Brothers, which had likewise been based on the popular songs of the day, though at an earlier date than the movement which he headed. In preparing this "Song Book" he was aided by two excellent musicians of the time, Johannes Walther and Conrad Rupff, "two good Protestants," as he puts it, "who, for the love of Christ, would undertake any toil to make our German liturgy better than the Roman." A curious feature of this earlier work of Protestant music is that the melody of the tunes is invariably assigned to the tenor part, the soprano and alto merely singing an added harmony above it. The object of this arrangement was "to allow all the people of the congregation to join in without effort, neither straining their voices to rise to the high notes of the treble, nor labouring to depress them to the deep and difficult notes of the bass." Such is the quaint reason given by an old author for this sole element which distinguished the music of Luther's "Song Book" from the ordinary Church music of to-day.

Let us now see the result of these reforms, and notice how entirely they had transformed Church music by their operation. They had taught composers to go to a new source for their inspiration—no longer to worn-out manuscripts and to quaint archaic scales which it was an effort of ingenuity to twist into tune, but to the fresh and healthy melodies of the common people, which had a strong metre and a bold swing; and, what is more, were founded on the simplest musical scale—the ordinary major and minor scale which we use to-day. For while the profound theorists of the Gregorian School had been trafficking and coquetting with all sorts of scales and modes, till their music had attained such a pitch of intricacy as we have described, the common music of the people had run on in a pure and simple stream, not poisoned by affectations or clouded by the obscure teachings of dusty science. Here was a beautiful fount for the new art of Europe to wet its wings in; and accordingly, beginning with the Church composers, and extending more and more, as music became secularised, to all branches of the art, this common and simple scale of nature came to be used, to the exclusion of all other scales. The scale in which Beethoven, Handel, and Mozart wrote their compositions was the same simple scale which was first brought into notice when Luther heard the peasants singing their melodies in it, and determined to adapt these beautiful strains to the service of the Church. Without the Reformation and its strong popular tendencies, whereby it broke down the fetters of a dull and antiquated tradition, modern music could never have come into being; for the Gregorian system was in a state of stagnation, and promised no hope for any future. Even more perhaps than the scale, the form of these "Folk Songs" was of untold value on the development of the art of music. The form was that of the simple ballad, or, in its religious dress, the hymn. The "common metre" of our hymn-books was the rhythm of most of them. But there were also some in long metre, and a few in short metre. Now let us think for a moment how ubiquitous is "common metre" in our music. Nearly every second song of the present day, if analysed and compared with a common metre tune, will be found to tally exactly. But more than this, the melodies of the great composers—such, for instance, as Beethoven or Haydn employ as themes in their most elaborate symphonies and sonatas—can in nearly every case be assigned to one or other of these hymn metres. Such was the wonderful vitality of the beautiful chants of the early Reformers, that even yet we may find their pulsations beating in full vigour amid the noblest musical works of modern times. But the Gregorian music of the Roman ritual, which consisted in interminable runs on Latin syllables, and which was formless, and devoid of all crisp metre and melody, has passed away for every purpose of art, and it would be hard to show a single piece in the range of modern musical literature which bears any affinity to it.

Such, then, was the effect of the Reformation on the art of music—to renovate and re-create it. Music has been well called the handmaid of religion. And when religion was purified by a return to the simplicity of early Christianity, most natural was it that music should receive a similar purification by a similar means. "To praise God and give Him thanks," said Luther, "let us have a voice that will enter not only into the vaults of our churches, but into the cottages of our labouring men." Such a voice was the Protestant music—a music that all could understand, a music for the poor no less than for the rich, and which, springing up hand in hand with the great Reformation itself, seems destined to as eternal a vitality.

THE SHEEP OF THE LORD.

BY THE REV. HARRY JONES, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S AND HON. CHAPLAIN TO HER MAJESTY.

IT was no strange thing for Jesus to compare Himself to a shepherd. Any leader of simple people might do that. The point of His comparison lies in the character of the shepherd. Shepherds of all sorts are mentioned in the Bible, but mostly the shepherd fills a devoted and exalted place, from righteous Abel to Him who lays down His life for the sheep. The Shepherd, too, is especially distinguished as the recipient of the Divine Word. It is the Shepherd to whom revelations are made—from Moses, who was feeding his sheep on the slopes of Sinai, to those who were keeping watch over their flocks by night. To one comes the incommunicable name and the commission of the Exodus; to the others the announcement of the Saviour, and the message of goodwill to all mankind.

Shepherds are highly honoured in the sacred story. The Bible smells of the sheepfold. David, who was following the ewes great with young ones when God took him, said, "The Lord is my Shepherd, therefore can I lack nothing." This saying has expressed the deepest thoughts of thousands upon thousands in their sorrow, and brought comfort to multitudes in their last hours. It showed the inner soul of the warrior-king of Israel. It was the sound of final peace among the memories of battle. He faces many dangers in safety, and as to the end he says, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me." When the Court Chaplain read this verse to the old German Emperor as he lay a dying, he said, "That is beautiful."

We may well feel at a loss which to follow of all the thoughts which crowd into the mind when we pause over the lessons which the shepherd is set to teach us in the Scriptures. For instance, his was a lonely calling, giving much room for meditation, which is associated in the Bible history with fresh knowledge of God, and lasting influence upon men. We might ask ourselves about the nature of our solitary thoughts, and whether we pass from them to renewed strength and usefulness of life. With us, enforced periods of loneliness and silence suggest intolerable punishment, rather than a renovation of the soul. Nevertheless, the conspicuous honour and blessing which come to the lonely watcher in the field and on the hill-side might hint to us the righteous uses which may be made of seclusion.

Many other lessons are found in the pastoral imagery of the Bible. Among them I would try to set before you a few familiar thoughts about some ways both of shepherds and of sheep. The sheep is the typical wanderer. However cared for, it is apt to leave the field in which it is kept; and when this comes to pass, it mostly loses itself. It does not find its own way back. It does not, like some other animals, know the road by which to return to its home. Thus, though in a figure it may remind us of our Divine relationship, it also illustrates our human offences. The sheep is a typical wanderer, and is held to set forth some ways of ourselves.

It is, moreover, dependent. With neither claw nor tooth, with neither tusk nor heel can it defend itself. It eminently needs to be protected. It is a type of helplessness. It relies upon the shepherd, however ungraciously it may desert him. And thus, too, after a fashion, it sets forth man. We sometimes pique ourselves upon our independence, but it is only undue reliance upon man that we should avoid. We are associated with, and rest upon, God. The very consciousness of our manifold faculties, and the sense of dominion which we undoubtedly have, should really lead us to apprehend our peculiar Divine kinship, and how dependent we are, though in no humiliating sense. Our dependence upon God shows a closeness to Him—a closeness which is exalting. We are not told this only by the Church. There are many things beside the Bible which tell us of our relationship to, or union with, an Almighty One. The very excellence of our abilities (which excellence sets us above all the rest of creation) should teach us of our nearness to the Creator. Thus, though the relationship of the sheep to the shepherd does not really illustrate the nature of ours to God, yet the nearness is very suggestive. Speaking generally, e.g., while deer do not remind us at once of the Ranger of the Park, we do not for a moment think of sheep without a shepherd. If we see a flock, we know that there must be a shepherd near at hand. Thus, in a figure, they hint at the truth that man and God go together, though with high and peculiar connection. We are conscious and (so to speak) proud of our likeness to God, in respect both of incarnation and inspiration. It is with no feeling of abasement, but rather one of gladness and buoyancy, that we say "we have no power of ourselves to help ourselves." We draw upon an eternal store, and thus show strength, not weakness, when we "are kept outwardly in our bodies and inwardly in our souls." We are near to, in union with, God after a fashion which seems to be apprehended by no other of His creatures, though the tie between the sheep and the shepherd dimly and imperfectly shadows it forth. We can hardly think of one without the other. We lose much by not realising our closeness to God.

I pass on. The sheep is fruitful in human illustrations. I will remind you of one more, which is by no means grateful to our self-esteem; which, indeed, reminds us of our most humiliating ways—ways in which we lose sight of our individual responsibility. However dependent we may be upon our fellows for instruction and support of various kinds, we are individually responsible to God, through our own consciences, for the use of such powers as we may have. Each one is in direct touch with the Almighty. In other words, as learners, workers, discoverers, creators, we can consciously use at first hand the great power of nature, which is God's. The bird in the spring builds its nest with the same skill for the first time as well as at the last. But man learns and grows. He "increases in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man." Each one does, or may.

But, too often, with what humiliating resemblance does he behave like the silly imitative sheep, which follow one another simply because one of them leads! Thus, we perceive not merely that sheep wander; a single sheep will sometimes do that. There was only one in the parabolic hundred which was lost. The ninety-nine were safe. I rather point to that curiously imitative behaviour which sheep sometimes display, when, with unaccountable impulse, they follow one another simply because one has begun to lead. With what degrading aptness does this illustrate some follies of human fashion! It seems as if, at times, those men and women who compose society (I am not thinking of any special rank, for the movement I refer to affects both sexes, all ages, all sorts and conditions of men) discharge from their minds and brains all honourable individuality; and in the formation of opinions, social, political, and religious, in the adoption of some phraseology or dress, in the taking up or dropping some way of life, show no more sense than a flock of sheep. With unconscious concession to mere fashion, and abandonment or abdication of that individuality which is a distinguishing characteristic of man, or humanity, we say that such and such a thing is "the rage." There is a panic of approval, and a consensus of agreement without any exercise of private judgment, intellectual perception, or religious need. So social parties are formed of congregated individuals who can no more give a reason of the fashion that is in them, or tell why they are gathered together, than the several sheep who compose a flock. Of course it is of little use for the Church to make a protest, since the religious world is subject to shallow impulses, and (the creeds and sacraments being still the same) omnipotent fashion frequently directs the procedure and outward equipment of worship, and the tone of ecclesiastical conversation. But whether or no this sheeplike imitativeness marks the behaviour of many in the world or the Church, it is a thing which we should strive against as degrading to the members of Christ, children of God, and inheritors of the Kingdom of Heaven.

I have said that the sheep and the shepherd are ever found together. We cannot see a flock without thinking of the keeper of the flock. And so it is with God and man. But the Gospel teaching of this truth has a fuller meaning than that of old, since Jesus has said, "I am the good Shepherd." He does not appear before us merely as one who leads, feeds, and folds the flock. A hireling does that; and in respect to these duties he does them well. Nor are they small matters. They are, so to speak, all that a flock has any right to require at his hands. The honest hireling (for no reproach is intended to be cast upon his fairness) watches the flock, sees that the sheep do not stray, and gives fodder to the cattle. He does what he is paid to do. But there is an interest in his charge that he cannot be expected to feel. And here comes in the difference between him and the good shepherd. The first mark of the good shepherd would seem to be that he owns the sheep. Here I pause to notice that the parable (for such I must call it) was not intended to apply to the modern English shepherd who receives wages for his work, who is thus a hireling, and whose own the sheep are not. The modern owner mostly knows only the number and cost of his flock. Sometimes he troubles himself merely about their breed and value in the market. Now, it is the hireling whose voice they follow. It is the hireling who has been known to distinguish each animal in the flock, and herein he often shows a marvellous gift of discernment. It is the hireling who, in lambing time, stays out all night in the bitter March wind, seeing to the ewes great with young ones, while the owner is warm in bed. It is the hireling whom the sheep follow, and whose voice they hear. The relation of the two characters to the flock is reversed in our modern experience. If he does not die for the sheep, the hireling exposes himself to discomfort in the blast and the snow-drift more or rather than their owner.

But the meaning of the old lesson taught by Jesus is plain. In his language the good shepherd not only owns the sheep, but is personally concerned in leading and tending them. And all the excellence of the owner (seen in the diligent modern hired shepherd) is found in him. Moreover, in the parable, the good shepherd knows his sheep. The hireling may know the flock, but the good shepherd calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out.

This must help us to realise the intimacy of our relation to Christ. Each one of us has the closest connection with God, in Him. If the Christian religion is essentially superior to others, it is not alone in the beauty of its sentiment, its inculcation of self-sacrifice, and devotion to truth for the truth's sake. These mark its excellence in several respects, and such as thus follow the teaching of Christ are blessed and sanctified, though they may meet with much tribulation in living so high and devoted a life. But there is a peculiar charm and value in the personal knowledge of the sheep by the shepherd. "I know My sheep," says Jesus, "and am known of Mine." This brings before us not merely the words of a departed Teacher, but the presence of a living Friend, who knows us now. And it is knowledge of His sheep by their good Shepherd that gives its peculiar excellence to Christianity; for the care of our Good Shepherd does not refer to what He did for His friends while on earth. He talks of the contrasts among His own disciples, and His plan for collecting them together in the end. "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and there shall be one flock." He goes on applying this pastoral language to the last things which shall come to pass. He represents Himself as using it on the judgment-seat. He did not feed His flock here, and then leave them to live upon the food He left behind, but He goes on being their Shepherd, knowing His sheep by name and feeding them Himself.

In this ownership, personal knowledge of, and continuous concern for, the sheep, we have one sign of the Good Shepherd as distinguished from the hireling. But a clearer mark may be seen. "The Good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." Here we have that act of self-sacrifice which leads us into the heart of Christianity. What it fully meant and means we cannot yet tell. It was an offering which cast all others into the shade; one which made all propitiation needless, and yet demanded a living sacrifice on the part of the worshipper. Thus the image of the shepherd and the sheep grows into greater value and significance. Though we have erred and strayed from God's ways, the living Christ is ever ready to lead us back, recovered and forgiven—forgiven, and restored to our place. And we need such a friend, both to face our work with freshness and hope here, and to look without undue shrinking towards the unseen which awaits us. A Friend who seeks us when we stray and brings us back; a Friend who claims us as His, though we be lost or deserted by our fellows; a Friend always ready to receive us into the fold again, though, like a bewildered wandering sheep, we can do nothing of ourselves to save ourselves, and only yield to the Good Shepherd's care.

"TO THE LIONS!"

A TALE OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS. BY THE REV. PROFESSOR CHURCH, M.A.

CHAPTER IV.—LOVE OR DUTY?

THE two sisters, Rhoda and Cleoné, did not lack admirers. Maidens so fair and gracious would have attracted suitors even had they been portionless. But it was well known that they would bring handsome dowries with them, for Dion's farm had prospered under his hands, while Dion's wife had inherited the savings which her adopting father, the centurion Manilius, had made from his pay and prize-money.

But Rhoda's admirers found it impossible to get beyond admiration. In those early days of Christianity there were no vows of celibacy for men or women; though, indeed, the feelings and thoughts that led to them were rapidly growing up. Yet no cloistered nun of after times could have been more absolutely shut out from all thoughts of love and marriage than this daughter of a Bithynian farmer. She did not affect anything like seclusion, or seek to stand aloof from the business, and even the little pleasures of daily life. She took her part in the work of the farm. No fingers milked the cows or made the butter more deftly than hers. In the harvest-field she would follow the reapers, and bind the sheaves more untiringly and more skilfully than any, except Cleoné. When the vintage came round, and the purple and amber grapes were plucked by the women for the men to tread in the vats, no one filled her baskets more quickly than Rhoda. And if a weakly calf, or lamb, or an early brood of chickens, hatched before the frosts were fairly gone, wanted care, there was no one who could give it so efficiently and tenderly as Rhoda. In fact, it was her vocation from her cradle to serve others. Every good woman has such a vocation in her degree, but some embrace it with a devotion that leaves no room for any personal ties. Rhoda was one of these rare souls; and the boldest lover soon found that she was not for him, and, indeed, had no care for any earthly suit. She never needed to repulse an admirer. A very short time sufficed to show that she was absolutely unapproachable; and she went untroubled on her way, followed by something of the awe which might be felt for an angel come down from heaven.

It was natural, of course, that her first thought should be to serve the community of believers to which she belonged. And there was a way in which this desire could be fulfilled. The early Church had the practice, lately revived among ourselves, of calling devout women to the office of deaconess, and of thus making a regular use of their zeal. The need of such helpers in the ministry was especially great when the Greek habits of life prevailed, and women were in a large measure secluded from society. They wanted helpers and advisers of their own sex who might go where men would not have been admitted. Such a helper the Church of Cenchreæ, the busy port of Corinth, had at an earlier time in Phœbe, whom St. Paul commends so kindly to his fellow-Christians at Rome. This was the office to which Rhoda inclined. It was her youth only that hindered her admission to it. Though no vows were demanded, still there was a natural feeling that those who put their hands to such a work should not go back from it, and the presiding minister of the Christian community hesitated about giving this regular call to one so young and so beautiful as Rhoda. Dion too, and his wife, though they would not offer a direct opposition to their daughter's wish, were not sorry to see its full accomplishment postponed. They were too good people to grudge her to the service of Christ and His Church; yet they could not help shrinking from all that this vocation seemed to mean. In any case it could hardly fail to take her much from their family life. Nor could they hide from themselves that, if troublous times should come, if the persecution which was always possible, and even probable, should begin, the first victims would be those who held office in the Church.

Next to her own feeling of devotion, Rhoda's strongest desire was to make her sister a sharer in her work. Nothing could have made her draw back, but the thought of not having Cleoné by her side was inexpressibly painful to her, and she banished it with all the force of her resolute will. Her best and truest course would have been to recognise the difference between her sister and herself, of which, indeed, she could not fail to have some knowledge, to acknowledge that Cleone was made for the duties of happiness and home, and to crush down all the feelings and wishes in her heart that helped to hide this from her. But, in common with many great natures, she had, to use a common phrase, the defects of her good qualities. She said to herself, "I am called to serve my Lord; this service is the highest aim in life, the most perfect happiness that I can enjoy, and what can I do better for the sister who is like a part of my own soul than to bring her to share in it? Shall I not be doing well if I can bring two hearts instead of one to Him?"

Cleoné would have yielded with scarcely a struggle to the strong will of her sister—for she was in her way not less devout—if it had not been for another influence. She had found among her suitors one to whose affections her own went out in answer.

Clitus was a Greek, an Athenian by birth, who had come to Bithynia in the train of Pliny, the Roman Governor. He had been a remarkably successful student in the University of Athens. He had been chosen, though then only a junior, to give the complimentary address with which the City of the Muses welcomed a visit from Pliny, as a distinguished Roman man of letters; and his pure Attic style and manly delivery had attracted the visitor's notice. He had been no less successful as an athlete than he was as a learner in the school of philosophy and rhetoric. No competitor could throw him in the wrestling ring or outstrip him in the foot-race. The crew captained by him had won for three years in succession—an unparalleled distinction—the prize in the boat-races in the Bay of Salamis. In the midst of these triumphs he was struck with a sudden sense of the vanity of the pursuits to which he had been devoting himself. A fellow-student, a friendly rival, who had been only less successful than himself in study and sport, had been carried off by a violent fever. He was a stranger from Ephesus, and, as none of his kindred were at hand, Clitus, as his nearest friend, had the sad duty assigned to him of putting the torch to the funeral pile on which the body was to be consumed, and of gathering the ashes for the urn which was to be placed in the family sepulchre at Ephesus. The most brilliant rhetorician that the University contained had been chosen to speak the funeral oration. Clitus listened to him with the closest attention, for he eagerly desired some word of comfort and hope. The speaker was a disciple of a well-known school, which asserted nothing and questioned everything. As long as he spoke of the dead man, of his virtues and his achievements, nothing could be better than his language, so full was it of tenderness and grace; but when he came to treat of the future, he failed. He could only disparage or doubt the beliefs of others. He ridiculed the popular faith, the gloomy pit of Tartarus, the shining fields of Elysium. He reviewed the speculations of philosophers only to express his dissatisfaction. But his chief scorn was for a doctrine which he said had been proclaimed not far from the place where they were standing, some sixty years before. "It was a Jew," he said, "who had the boldness to propound these absurdities in this city of philosophers; nor was he a man without culture. I have heard it said by one who listened to him that, though his accent was detestable, he quoted from our poets. But his teaching was sheer frenzy. Every man was to rise from his grave! Mark you, every man! Criminals, slaves, barbarians—did you ever hear such madness?" And then the speaker went on to propound his own theory, which, by the way, was amazingly like some that are being thrust upon us now. "Men will survive in their race. The individual perishes; but if he has done anything for his fellows, has been a poet, or an orator, or an inventor, he lives in the greatness of what he has done, and in the fame which waits upon it."

Clitus turned away in profound discontent. Then it occurred to him, "Can I find what I want elsewhere? There is Dion the Golden-Mouth lecturing at Ephesus. Perhaps he has something more satisfying to tell me." To Ephesus he went. But there Clitus heard nothing more than he had heard at Athens. Yet his visit was not fruitless. One day, when his restless thoughts drew him from his bed before sunrise, he fell in with a little company of men and women who were making their way through the half-lighted street. He followed them, entered with them a building in the outskirts of the city, and listened to a discourse on the subject of the very doctrine which he had heard ridiculed at Athens. "Then," he said to himself, "this wild fancy still holds its ground!" He came again and again. What he heard interested him deeply, and when he came to make acquaintance with some of his fellow-hearers, he found that, humble mechanics or slaves as they were, they had a wonderful elevation of thought, and even of language. Meanwhile, it was necessary to find some employment. Just at that time the younger Pliny came to Ephesus, on his way to take possession of his government in Bithynia, and Clitus attended his levée. Pliny, always glad to surround himself with educated men, offered employment as a secretary, and Clitus accompanied him to his province. It was thus that he became acquainted with the little community that worshipped in the guild-house of the wool-combers of Nicæa, with the household of Dion, and with the beautiful Cleoné. An opportunity had occurred of serving Dion in some matter that brought him into the proconsul's court, and the acquaintance had grown into intimacy. Clitus was now a catechumen, or person under instruction, and it was intended that he should be baptised at Whitsuntide.

In the afternoon of the day following the assembly described in the first chapter, the young Roman had found his way to the farm by help of one of the excuses which lovers are never at a loss to invent. Possibly it was not an accident that his coming was timed for an hour at which Rhoda would be busy with some errand of mercy, for Rhoda viewed the young man as a formidable opponent, and, for all her unworldliness, was clever enough to prevent any private interview between him and her sister. The elder Rhoda was busy with her household cares; Cleoné was helping her father in the vineyard. He was pruning—a delicate task, which he was unwilling to trust to any hands but his own; she followed him along the rows, tying up to their supports the shoots which were left to bear the vintage of the year. It was here that Clitus found her, and as Dion was inclined to favour his suit, no place could have suited him better. If we listen awhile to their talk, we shall see how matters stood between them. Clitus was in high spirits.

"Give me joy, Cleoné," he said; "the letter from the Emperor arrived this morning, and it grants the Governor's request. I am to have the Roman citizenship; and now everything is open to me."

The girl could not refuse her sympathies to his manifest delight; but her mind was somewhat sad, and it was with a forced gaiety that she answered, "Well, my lord—for you will soon be one of the lords of us poor provincials—how shall we speak to you? What Roman name shall you be pleased to adopt? Shall you be a Julius Cæsar or a Tullius Cicero?"

"To you, Cleoné," said the young man, "I shall always be Clitus, the name under which I had the happiness first to know you. But, seriously, the Governor is kind enough to let me take his own family name, and I shall be Quintus Cæcilius."

"And when do you leave us for Rome?" said the girl, giving all her attention, it seemed, to binding up a refractory shoot.

"Leave you? for Rome? I said nothing about leaving."

"But the career—in this poor place there is nothing to satisfy you. You said that all things were now open to you, and where are 'all things' to be found but at Rome?"

"You misunderstand me—you wrong me, Cleoné. I have no such ambition as you seem to think. I desire nothing better than to spend the rest of my days here, if I can but find here the thing that I want. I did but mean that no road by which I may find it well to travel will be shut to me when I am a citizen of Rome. But be sure that the road, whatever it is, will never take me very far from Nicæa."

The girl was silent. She had seen from the first, with a woman's quick apprehension of such things, that there was a serious purpose in the young Greek's manner, and she had tried, as women will try, even when they are not face to face with such perplexities as were troubling poor Cleoné, to put off the crisis.

Clitus went on: "I am to have the government business as a notary in the province. The Governor promises me that other things will follow. But I am afraid this does not interest you."

"I am sure," answered the girl, "we all feel the greatest interest in you."

"But you, Cleoné, you!" cried the young man, and he caught her hand in his as he spoke. "You know that this is my ambition: to have something which I can ask you to share. I came to tell you that it seems to be within my reach, and you ask me when I am going to Rome! Oh! it is cruel; and when I have been hoping all the time that there might be something to work for."

Poor Cleoné was in a sad strait. The struggle between love and duty is often a hard one; but at least the issue is clear, and a loyal heart crushes down its pain, and chooses the better course. But here there seemed to be love on both sides, and duty on both sides. Which was she to choose? She knew that Clitus loved her, and though she had never looked quite closely and steadfastly into her own heart, she felt that she loved him. And he was worthy, too. Any woman might be proud of him. Why should she not do as her mother had done before her, and give herself to a good man who loved her? There was love and there was duty here. But then, on the other side, there was the Church, its claim upon her, the work that lay ready for her hand—and Rhoda, who was her second self, from whom she had never had a thought apart, whose love had been the better half of her life ever since she could remember anything. It was a sore perplexity in which she was entangled.

She stood silent. But her silence was eloquent. Clitus, though he was no confident lover, saw that it was not her indifference that he had to fear. If he had been no more to her than other men, she could easily have found words—kind, doubtless, but plain and decisive enough—in which to bid him go. She had even left her hand in his. She was scarcely conscious of it, so full was her mind of the struggle; but the consciousness would have come quickly enough if his touch had been repugnant to her.

At last she spoke: "Oh, Clitus, this is not a time for such things as you talk of. Remember what the elder said the other day. There is danger at hand, and we must be ready to meet it. Would it be right to hamper ourselves with things of this world? Does not the holy Apostle Paul tell that they who marry——"

She paused, blushing crimson when she remembered that her lover, though his meaning was plain enough, had not gone as far as speaking of marriage.

"Ah! if you were only my wife," cried Clitus, "I should fear nothing."

"Has he not said," she went on, "that they who marry shall have trouble in the flesh? And, when I might be comforting and strengthening others, to have to think of myself! Oh, Clitus, I feel that I am called to other things. Rhoda and I are not as other women; she tells me so, and she is always right. I could not go against her."

Perhaps it was as well that just at that moment, Dion, who had finished his work for the time among the vines, advanced with outstretched hands to greet the guest. It was a relief to both to have the interruption.

CHAPTER V.—A PLOT.

ON the evening of the day when Clitus and Cleoné held their conversation among the vines, as described in the last chapter, another conversation, which was to have no little influence on their fate, was going on. The place was a wine-shop, kept by a certain Theran, in the outskirts of Nicæa, and not far from the Christian meeting-house. Theran's customers were, for the most part, of the artisan class. But he kept a room reserved for his few patrons that were of a higher rank. In this room three persons were sitting at a citron-wood table, one of the innkeeper's most cherished possessions, which only favoured customers were permitted to see uncovered. A flagon, which could not have held less than two gallons, stood in the middle of the table. It was about half full of the potent wine from Mount Tmolus, mixed, however, with about half its bulk of water. From this flagon each guest ladled out the liquid into his own drinking-cup.

One of the three is already known to us. This is Verus, the unworthy member whose banishment from the Christian community has been described. The second, to whom, it may be observed, his companions pay a certain respect, is an elderly man, in the ordinary dress of a well-to-do merchant. There is a certain air of intelligence in his face. But the keen, hungry look of the eyes, the pinched nose, the thin, bloodless lips, tightly closed, but sometimes parting in a smile that never reaches the eyes, give it a sinister look. Lucilius—for this was his name—was a man of good birth and education, but he had given up all his thoughts to money-making, and the tyrant passion had set the mark of his servitude on his face.

The third is a professional soothsayer, or fortune-teller. The fortune-teller of to-day commonly exercises his art by means of a pack of cards, while he sometimes consults a tattered book of dreams, or even professes to gather his knowledge of the future from the motions of the planets. Cards were not then invented; dream-interpreting and star-reading were not held in very great repute. Our soothsayer practised the curious art of discovering the future by the signs that might be discerned in the entrails of animals. My readers would think it tedious were I to give them the details of this system. Let it suffice to say that the liver was held to carry most meaning in its appearance. If the proper top to it were wanting, something terrible was sure to happen. There were lines of life in it, and lines of wealth. Each of the four "fibres" into which it was divided had its own province. From this you could discern perils by water, from that perils by fire; a third warned you of losses in business, a fourth gave you hopes of a legacy. This was the art, then, which the third of the three guests professed. He called himself Arruns, but this was not his real name. Arruns is Etruscan, whilst the man was a Sicilian, who, after trying almost everything for a livelihood, had settled down as an *haruspex in Nicæa. But the Etruscans were famous over all the Roman world as the inventors of the soothsaying art, and professors of it found an Etruscan name as useful as singers sometimes find one that is borrowed from Italy, or French teachers a supposed birthplace in Paris. Arruns, if he had little of the Etruscan about him in his language, which was Latin of the rudest kind, spoken in a broad Greek accent, had at least the corpulence for which the foretellers of the future were proverbial. His small dull eyes, sometimes lit up with a little spark of greed or cunning, his thick sensual lips, and heavy bloated cheeks, flushed with habitual potations, showed how the animal predominated in him.

He was now holding forth on his grievances in a loud, harsh voice, which he did not forget to refresh with frequent draughts of Tmolian wine.

"It is monstrous, this neglect of the gods! It must bring a curse upon the country. There will be nothing left sacred soon. Who can suppose that if men do not care for the gods, they will go on caring for each other? Children will not honour their parents, nor parents love their children. The sanctity of marriage, the rights of property, everything will disappear, if these atheists are suffered to go unpunished, while they spread abroad their pernicious doctrines."

"Your zeal does you credit," interrupted Lucilius, with a slight cynical smile. "But we all know that Arruns is careful of all that concerns the sacredness of the home."

Arruns was a notoriously ill-conducted fellow, whose life was a scandal to the better behaved, not to say the more pious of the heathen. His wife had long since left him in disgust, and was supporting herself as a nurse. His children he had turned out of doors. The shaft did not wound him very deeply, but he took the hint and became more practical.

"Look at the temples," he went on; "the court-yards are grass-grown. Day after day not a worshipper comes near them. To see smoke going from the altars is as rare as to see snow in summer. And when a man does bring a beast, 'tis some paltry, half-starved creature: a scabby sheep, or a worn-out bullock from the plough, which are not good enough for the butcher's knife, let alone the priest's hatchet. And as often as not, when there is a decent sacrifice, they do not call me in. They grudge me my ten drachmas—for I have had to cut down the fee to ten. 'What should a calf or a sheep's liver have to tell us about the future?' they say. What monstrous impiety! What a flagrant contradiction of all history! Did not Galba's haruspex, on the very day of his death, warn him that he was in danger from an intimate friend? and did not Otho, who was such a friend, kill him within two hours afterwards?"

"Yes," said Lucilius, a little peremptorily, "we know all about these examples and instances. But go on to your own grievances."

"Well, to put the matter plainly, it is simple starvation to me. Twice, thrice last week I had to live on beans and bread. Ten years ago there did not a day pass without two or three sacrifices. I had my pick of good things—beef, mutton, lamb, veal, pork, every day; and now I am positively thankful for a rank piece of goat's flesh, that once I would not have given to my slave. Oh! it is awful; there must be a judgment from the gods on such impiety."

"One would hardly think, from your looks, my Arruns," said Lucilius, "that things were quite so bad as you say. But tell me, what do you suppose to be the cause of this impious neglect of the gods, and this indifference to the future?"

"The Christians, of course," said Arruns; "the Christians."

"But," interrupted Lucilius, "they can be scarcely numerous enough to make much difference, and I am told that they are mostly poor people, and even slaves; so that they could hardly, in any case, be clients of yours."

"My good lord," said Arruns, "it is not so much the Christians themselves; it is the example they set. People say to themselves, 'These seem to be very decent, honest sort of fellows; they never murder or rob; they are very kind to the sick and poor; we can always be safe in having dealings with them; and they seem to be tolerably prosperous too. And yet they never go inside a temple, nor offer so much as a lamb to the gods.' What could be worse than that? They do ten times more harm than if they were so many murderers and thieves. A good citizen who neglects the gods is a most mischievous person. There is sure to be a number of people who imitate him so far. It is the Christians who are at the bottom of all this trouble."

"But what do you want me to do?" said Lucilius. "Grant that what you say is true, still I see no reason for interfering. I have two or three tenants who are said to be Christians, and they are honest and industrious fellows, who always pay me my rent to the day. Why should I trouble them?"

"Pardon me, sir," interrupted Verus, who had as yet taken no part in the conversation. "Pardon me if I remind you that there is something more to be said. This association of the Christians is an unlawful society."

"Of course it is," cried Lucilius; "we all know that; though you, my dear Verus, seem to have been a long time finding it out, if, as I understand, you have been acting as their treasurer."

"I have but lately discovered their true character," said Verus. "When I did, I hastened to leave them."

"Ah!" said Lucilius, with a sneer, "that must have been at the very time when they examined your accounts. Do you know that people have been saying that they, too, made some discoveries?"

Verus, who would have given a great deal to be able to stab the speaker, forced his features into a sickly smile. "You are pleased to jest, honourable sir," he said. "But these Christians are not quite so insignificant or so poor as you think. There is the old knight, Antistius. No one would suppose that he was a rich man. He drinks wine that cannot cost more than a denarius* a gallon, and very little of that; but we know what he gives away in alms. It is not only here that he gives. His money goes to Smyrna, to Ephesus, and positively to Rome. You may rely upon this, because it used to pass through my hands."

* One who foretells the future by the inspection of the entrails of animals.

* Something about ninepence.

"And stick there sometimes, I have heard," retorted the other, whose passion for saying bitter things was sometimes too strong for his prudence, and even for his avarice. "But what does that matter to me? What do I care for the way in which an old fool and his money are parted? It does not concern me if he feeds all the beggars and cripples in the Empire."

"You forget, sir," returned Verus, "that if Antistius is convicted of belonging to an unlawful society—and there can be no doubt that the community of Christians is such a society—his goods are confiscated to the Emperor's purse, and that those who assist the cause of justice will have their share."

There was a sudden change in Lucilius's careless, supercilious manner, though he did his best not to seem too eager.

"Ah!" he said, "there may be something in that, though I should not particularly like a business of that kind."

"Don't suppose, sir," went on Verus, "that there are not others besides Antistius. There are plenty who are worth looking after. Dion the farmer is wealthy, though one would hardly think it. And there are others who are entangled in this business. You would hardly believe it, if I were to tell you their names. And then it is not only here, it is all through the province that you may find them. I have all the threads in my hand, and I could make a very pretty unravelling if I chose."

"What, then, do you propose?" asked Lucilius.

"That we should lay information to the Governor."

"Will he act? He is all for being philosophic and tolerant."

"He cannot choose but act. The Emperor's orders are stringent. He is very strict about these secret societies. Did you not hear about the fire-brigade that the people of Nicomedia wanted to have? They were nearly ruined by the fire last December. Nothing was ready: not a bucket nor a yard of hose; and when some things were got together, then there was nobody to work. The consequence was that more than half the city, and all the finest buildings in it, were burnt. The people wanted to have a fire-brigade, and the Governor wrote to the Emperor recommending that the request should be granted. But no. Trajan would not have anything of the kind. If it was not a secret society, it might be turned into one, he said in his letter. No; if we once set the thing going, the Governor must act, whether he like it or no. We must send in as many informations as we can. There will be one from you, and another from Arruns here, who can back it up if he likes with his complaint about the sacrifices. Then there is Theron, our host here, who complains that the Christians are so sober that they are taking the bread out of the tavern-keepers' mouths. As for myself, perhaps my name had better not appear. I should not like to be seen acting against old friends and employers. But it does not much matter who signs them, or, indeed, whether they are signed or not. As long as there are plenty of them, it will be enough; and your secretary can see to that."

At Verus's suggestion, Theron, the inn-keeper, was called into council. He, of course, had a very bad opinion of the Christians. "They are a very poor, mean-spirited lot," he said; "if they had their way there would not be a tavern open in the Empire. I never see one of them inside my doors. Sometimes, when I have a late company here, I have seen them on their way to their meeting-place, one of the guild-houses in the cemetery here. They are a shabby lot, for the most part—half of them slaves, I should think. I suspect an out-door man of my own of being one of them. He never drinks, or gambles, or fights. I always suspect there is something wrong with a young fellow when he goes on like that. Yes, I should very much like to see the whole business put a stop to. If it is not, the world will soon be no place for an honest man to live in."

"Pliny received the new-comer with enthusiasm."—p. 91.

A plan of action was agreed upon. A number of memorials were to be presented to the Governor, praying him to interfere with a certain unlawful society, bearing the name of Christians, or followers of Jesus, that was accustomed to meet in the neighbourhood of Nicæa. Lucilius, Verus, and Arruns were each to send in such a document, and were to get others sent in by their friends. A number of anonymous memorials in various handwritings were also to be prepared. The more there were, the more likely was the Governor to be impressed.

When the party was separating, Arruns tried to do a little stroke of business on his own account. "This is an important undertaking," he said, in his most professional tone, to Lucilius. "Don't you think that it would be well to consult the gods?"

"My Arruns," said Lucilius, who had no idea of spending his money in any such way, "when I make an offering, I prefer that it should be a thank-offering. When we have done something, I shall not be ungrateful."

The soothsayer was not going to let himself be baffled. If he could get nothing out of the cupidity of Lucilius, he might be more successful in working on the fears of Verus.

"It would have an excellent effect, my dear Verus," he said, "if people could see some proof of your piety. They know that you have been mixed up with these Christians, and they don't all know that you have come out from among them. If there should be anything like a rising of the people—there was one in Galatia the other day, and half a dozen of these impious creatures were torn in pieces before the Governor's guard could interfere—there might be some awkward mistake. We should have plenty of people protesting that they had never been Christians at all, or had left off being so, and you might not be believed, particularly if you had anything to lose. Now, if you were to offer a sacrifice, you would be perfectly safe. No one would dare to wag his tongue against you."

Verus, who, if he had not learnt to believe Christianity, must have at least learned thoroughly to disbelieve the whole Pagan system, heard the suggestion with very little fervour, but felt too uneasy about his position to reject it. He knew that he had compromised himself, and that the danger which Arruns had pictured was not completely imaginary.

"There may be something in what you suggest," he said, after a pause. "Perhaps a lamb to Jupiter or Apollo——"

"A lamb!" interrupted Arruns, who was not disposed to be satisfied with so paltry an offering. "A lamb! the whole country would cry shame upon you. It ought to be nothing less than a hecatomb." *

"A hecatomb!" cried Verus, "what are you talking about? Am I the Emperor, that you should suggest such a thing?"

"Well," returned the other, "a hecatomb might, perhaps, be a little ostentatious for a man in your position. But I assure you that nothing less than a 'swine, sheep, and bull' sacrifice would be acceptable. It must be something a little out of the common, for yours is not a common case."

"Well, let it be so," said Verus, "only it must be done cheaply. No gilding of the bull's horns or expensive flowers; I really cannot afford it."

"Leave it to me," answered Arruns. "I will spare your pocket."

With this they separated, the soothsayer chuckling over his success, and the prospect of a plenty which he had not enjoyed for some months, Verus ruefully calculating how many gold pieces the three animals, with the ornaments and the temple fees, would cost him.

* A "hecatomb" means an offering of one hundred oxen.

CHAPTER VI.

CAIUS PLINIUS CÆCILIUS SECUNDUS, commonly known to posterity as the Younger Pliny, has just finished his day's work as Proprætor—that is to say, Governor—of the Roman province of Bithynia. It has evidently worn him out almost to the verge of exhaustion. He has, indeed, the look of feeble health. His gentle, delicate features are drawn as with habitual pain; his cheeks are pale, with just one spot of hectic colour in the middle; the lines on his forehead are deeper than befits his age, for he is but in his forty-seventh or forty-eighth year; his figure is bent and frail, and thin almost to emaciation.

The room shows evident signs of the occupation of a man of culture. Though it is his official apartment, and he has his study elsewhere, it has something of the look of a library. A little book-case, elegantly made of ivory and ebony, stands close to his official chair. Half a dozen rolls—for such were the volumes of those days—are within reach of his hand. He can refresh himself with a few minutes' reading of one or other of them, when the tedium of his official duties becomes more than he can bear; using a writer's privilege, we can see that Homer is one of the six, and Virgil another. The wall facing him is covered with a huge map of the province; and most of the available space elsewhere is occupied with documents, plans of public buildings, and other matters relating to the details of government; but room has been found for busts of eminent writers, for some tasteful little pieces of Corinthian ware, and for two or three statuettes of Parian marble. At a table in the corner a secretary is busy with his pen; but were we to look over his shoulder, we should see that he is not occupied with the answer to a petition or with a report to the Emperor, but with the fair copy of a poem which the Governor has found time to dictate to him in the course of the day.

Pliny had just risen from his seat, after swallowing a cordial which his body physician has concocted for him, when the soldier who kept the door announced a visitor—"Cornelius Tacitus, for his Excellency the Governor." Pliny received the new-comer, who, indeed, had been his guest for several days, with enthusiasm.

"You were never more welcome, my Tacitus," he cried. "Either I am in worse trim for business than usual, or the business of the day has been extraordinarily tiresome. In the first place, everything that they do here seems to be blundered over. In one town they build an aqueduct at the cost of I don't know how many millions of sesterces, and one of the arches tumbles down. Then, in Nicæa here, they have been spending millions more on a theatre, and, lo and behold! the walls begin to sink and crack, for the wise people have laid the foundations in a marsh. Then everybody seems to want something. The number of people, for instance, who want to be made Roman citizens is beyond belief. If Rome were empty, we could almost people it again with them. But, after all, these things need not trouble me very much. One only has to be firm and say 'No!' But here is a more serious matter, upon which I should like to have your advice."

The Governor handed to his friend two or three small parchment rolls, which he took from a greater number that were lying upon a table. As Tacitus read them, his look became grave, and even troubled.

"What am I to do in this matter?" said the Governor, after a short pause. "For the last two or three days these things have been positively crowding in upon me. You don't see there more than half that I have had. They all run in the same style: I could fancy that a good many are in the same handwriting. 'The most excellent Governor is hereby informed that there is a secret society, calling itself by the name of Christus, that holds illegal meetings in the neighbourhood of this city; that the members thereof are guilty of many offences against the majesty of the Emperor, as well as of impiety to the gods;' and then there follows a long list of names of these same members. Some of these names I recognise, and, curiously enough, there is not one against which I know any harm. Can you tell me anything about this secret society which calls itself by the name of Christus?"

"Yes," answered Tacitus; "it is more than fifty years ago since I first heard of them, and I have always watched them with a good deal of interest since. It was in the eleventh year of Nero—you could only have been an infant then, but it was the time when more than half Rome was burnt down."

"I remember it," interrupted Pliny, "though I was only three years old; but one does not forget being woke up in the middle of the night because the house was on fire, as I was."

Tacitus went on: "Well, I shall never forget that dreadful time. The fire was bad enough, but the horrors that followed were worse. People, you know, began to whisper that the Emperor himself had had the city set on fire, because he wanted to build it again on a better plan. Whether he did it or no, he was capable of it; and it is certain that he behaved as if he were delighted with what had happened, looking on at the fire, for instance, and singing some silly verses of his own about the burning of Troy. Well, the people began to murmur in an ominous way—you see, more than half of them were homeless. So the monster found it convenient to throw the blame on someone else, and he threw it upon the Christians. You know what a Roman mob is; as long as it has its victims, it does not much care about the rights and wrongs of a case. I did not see much of what was done to these poor wretches, but I saw enough to make me shudder to this day when I go by the place. It was at a corner of the Gardens on the Palatine. They had fastened one of the miserable creatures to a stake, and piled up a quantity of combustibles about him, but not near enough to kill him at once when they were set on fire. I shall never forget his face. It was night, but I could see it plainly in the light of the flames, which yet had not begun to scorch it. There was not a trace of fear on it. He might have been a bridegroom. Boy as I was, it struck me very much, and I said to myself, 'These are strangely obstinate people, I take it, and might be very dangerous to the State.' And that is the view I have always taken of them; and it has been borne out by everything that I have seen or heard."

"But," said the Governor, "have you ever made out that there is anything wicked or harmful in this superstition of theirs? I have heard strange stories of their doings: that they mix the blood of children with their sacrifices, that they indulge in disgraceful licence, and so forth. Do you believe that there is anything in these reports?"

"To speak frankly," replied Tacitus, "I do not. On the contrary, I believe that they are a singularly innocent and harmless set of people; that they neither murder nor steal; and that if all the world were like them our guards and soldiers would have very little to do."

"Yet," said Plinius, "you seem to speak of them in a somewhat hostile tone. If they are so blameless they cannot fail to be good citizens."

"No, this is precisely what they are not," was Tacitus's answer after a few moments' pause. "I take it that obedience is the foundation of our commonwealth, obedience to the Emperor now, as it once was to the Senate and people. No man must set his own will or his own belief above obedience. If he does, he takes away the foundation. Tell one of these Christians to throw a pinch of incense on an altar, and he will refuse. Not the Emperor himself could make him do it. The pinch of incense may be nothing. Neither the State nor any single soul in it may be one whit the worse for its not being thrown; but it is an intolerable thing that any citizen should take it upon himself to say whether he will or will not do it. Depend upon it, my dear Pliny, these Christians, though they never trouble our courts, civil or criminal, are very dangerous people, and either the Empire must put them down, or they will put the Empire down."

"What, then, would you have me do?" asked the Governor.

"Act with energy; arrest these people; stamp the whole thing out."

"But it is too horrible. It is—if you will allow me to say it—it is even absurd. Here are thieves and cutthroats without number at large; profligates who spend their whole lives in doing mischief, and villains of every kind. Yet a Governor is to leave these hawks and kites to themselves, and pounce down upon a flock of innocent doves. Forgive me if I say, my dear Tacitus, that I never saw you so little like a philosopher."

"There are times," replied Tacitus, "when one has to think not about philosophy, but about policy,

Look at the Emperor. You know what manner of man he is. He is not a madman, like Nero; he is not a monster, like Domitian, who was so fond of killing that he could not spare even the flies. But Nero and Domitian were not so stern with the Christians as he is. 'Obey me,' he says, 'or suffer for it. If I let you choose your own way, the Empire falls to pieces.' Yes, my dear Pliny, distasteful as it must be to a man of your sensibility, you must act."

"I shall consult the Emperor," said the Governor, who felt himself hard pressed by his friend's arguments.

Nor should I take much heed of artisans and labourers; but you will keep any persons of consequence that there may be, and, above all, their priests, or elders, or rulers, or whatever they call them."

The Governor pressed a handbell that stood on the table at his elbow, and bade the attendant who answered the summons send for the centurion on duty.

In the course of a few minutes this officer appeared.

"Fabius," said Pliny, "you have heard. I suppose, of certain people that call themselves Christians?"

"Do you know their place of meeting?"—p. 97.

"Certainly," said Tacitus; "it would be well to do so. I understand that he wishes to be consulted about everything; though how he contrives to get through his business is beyond my understanding. But meanwhile act. You need not do anything final, but Trajan, if I know him, would be much displeased if he were to find that you had done nothing."

"What would you advise, then?"

"Send a guard of soldiers, and arrest the whole company at one of their meetings. It will be easy to learn the place and the time. These societies have always someone among them to betray their secrets; though, indeed, this can hardly be a secret. You need not keep them all in custody. Probably many will be slaves. I hear that the slaves everywhere are deeply infected with the superstition. You can let them go, and make their masters answerable for them.

"Yes, my lord," answered the centurion, "I have heard of them."

It required all the composure—one might almost say the stolidity of look—that is one of the results of a soldier's discipline, to enable Fabius to reply without showing any change of countenance. He had been for some months a "catechumen"—one, that is, who was receiving instruction preparatory for baptism. He had been somewhat inclined of late to draw back. The new faith attracted him as much as ever, but there were difficulties which it put in his way. Could he hold it and be a soldier? His teachers differed. The eldest minister, a man of liberal views, thought that he could. Cornelius, the godly centurion, who was the first-fruits of the Gentiles, had not been bidden to give up his profession. One of the younger men, whose temper was fiery, almost fanatical, took the opposite view. The soldier was essentially a man of the world, and the world was at enmity with the Church. Nor could Fabius hide from himself the difficulties. Idolatry was everywhere. His arms, for instance, bore the images of gods; to be present at sacrifice to gods was a frequent duty; worst of all, he would himself be called upon to sacrifice by burning incense before the image of the Emperor. All this had made him hesitate.

"Do you know their place of meeting?" asked the Governor.

Fabius assented.

"And the time?"

To answer readily would have been to betray too intimate a knowledge of the Christians' proceedings.

"Doubtless, my lord," he said, despising himself at the same time for the prevarication, "I can find it out."

"Then take a guard on the first occasion that occurs, and arrest in the name of the Emperor all that you may find assembled."

"It shall be done, my lord," said Fabius, still unmoved, and, after saluting, withdrew.

No one would have recognised the centurion Fabius, with his almost mechanical rigidity of movement, in the agitated man who, for the next hour, paced up and down his chamber. It is to be feared that he wished over and over again that this disturbing influence had never come into his life. Here was a conflict of duties such as he had never even dreamed of. Could he let these men and women whom he knew, some of whom had been so kind to him, who would have done all they could for him, run blindly into danger? And yet, would it not be a breach of duty to warn them? The Governor trusted him; the charge laid upon him was a secret. Could he, as a soldier, betray it? Again and again he made up his mind, only to unmake it the next moment. At last the struggle ended, as such struggles often do, in a compromise; and here circumstances helped him. The meeting would be the next day, he knew; and it was now afternoon. There would not be time to warn all the members of the community, even had he known—what he did not know—where they were to be found. But there was one to whom word must be sent at any cost. This was Rhoda, the daughter of Dion. Fabius had been one of the many who had been struck by the girl's singular beauty. Like his rivals, he had seen that her heart had no room for any earthly love. Still, he cherished her image as one might cherish the vision of an angel. To think of her in the rude hands of soldiers, or dragged to the common prison, was simply intolerable. That must be prevented, if it cost him his officer's rank, or even his honour.

No sooner had he made up his mind to send the girl a warning message, than, as if by the ordering of some higher Power, an opportunity presented itself to him. He caught sight of one of Dion's slaves, who was driving down the street an ass laden with farm produce. To accost the man as he passed might have raised suspicion. A safer plan would be to waylay him as he returned, which he would scarcely do before evening was drawing on. And this he was able to carry out without, as he felt sure, being observed by anyone. He thrust into the hands of the old man—a faithful creature, whom he knew to be deeply attached to Dion and his family—a letter thus inscribed:—

"Fabius the Centurion, to Rhoda, daughter of Dion.

"I implore you that to-morrow you remain at home. This shall be well both for you and for those whom you love. Farewell."

"PERFECT THROUGH SUFFERINGS."

BY THE REV. NEWMAN HALL, LL.B.

"It became Him, for Whom are all things, and through Whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Author of their salvation perfect through sufferings."—HEB. ii. 10.

ALL suffering is mysterious, especially the suffering of those who trust in God, and desire to do His will. Why should He who rules the universe, and is able to do all things, allow His children to endure so many trials? Why should they suffer sickness, bereavement, disappointment, mental anguish? Why should they, because of their very piety, be often specially afflicted and persecuted?

To this question Faith replies, Even the well-beloved Son of God, the perfect Man, the Incarnate Word, even He suffered, was the chief of sufferers, was "The Man of Sorrows," suffered for His perfect goodness, needed to be perfected for His work and fitted for His triumphby suffering. We may not understand the mysteries of this, but we accept the fact. It is, therefore, a less mystery that we, sinful as we are, and needing the discipline of trial, should also suffer.

It was a "stumbling-block" to the Jews that the Messiah was poor, despised, crucified. The argument of the writer to the Hebrews is that although God had power to prevent such suffering, He not only allowed but ordained it, in order that the Christ might thus be fully qualified for His great work, and by the grief be exalted to higher glory. Every portion of the argument suggests comfort to suffering believers.

1. There is comfort in the representation given of God, "for Whom are all things, and through whom are all things." His glory is inseparable from the good of His creatures, who may therefore rejoice that He is the sole Creator, Ruler, Possessor of the universe. Everything is by Him, everything is for Him. There is no superior force to counteract, no accident or fate or destiny to defeat His purposes. His control includes "all things," small and great: the daisy and the oak, the pebble and the mountain, the rivulet and the ocean, the glow-worm and the sun, men and angels, the poorest, the youngest, the most unworthy. What confidence this should inspire! If Christ suffered it was not because His Father was unable to prevent it. "It pleased the Father to bruise Him." So He "for Whom and by Whom are all things" is able to protect all His children.

2. There is comfort in the purpose of God. He is "bringing many sons unto glory." All are His children by creation. But many, like the prodigal, are rebellious, and by self-exile forfeit the privileges of sonship. By repentance and faith they return, and become, by God's grace, His true adopted children. "As many as received him (Jesus), to them gave He the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on His name." (John i. 12.) These children He purposes to bring to glory. He is actually bringing them. He does not adopt them and then forsake them as foundlings. They are new-born as heirs of an "inheritance that fadeth not away." He destines them to glory. The sonship precedes the glory, and is a pledge of it. They are "sealed with the Holy Spirit, which is an earnest of our inheritance." (Eph. i. 14.) This promise of glory is not the privilege of a few. God is "bringing many sons unto glory." It is provided for all, offered to all, accepted by a multitude "whom no man can number"; for whom "many mansions" are prepared. The purpose of God towards His "many sons" cannot be frustrated by any sufferings which they may endure. Their adoption as "sons," their call to "glory," their being "brought" along the way by their Father, should encourage them in the assurance that no afflictions on the road shall prevent them from reaching their home.

3. There is comfort in contemplating the "Captain" or "Author of their salvation." Christ procures for us salvation by the sacrifice of Himself; as our Guide He leads us onward towards its full possession; as our Champion He fights for us against Satan, sin and death; as our Commander He directs us what to do; as our ever-present Helper He enables to say, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me"; as our Forerunner He lights up the dark valley, bursts the tomb, and "opens the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers"; as our Intercessor He pleads our cause before the throne of God. How essential that He, our Captain, should be competent for this great work, that nothing should be lacking in qualification, and that He should be preserved by God for its perfect completion! Our safety is bound up in His. His triumph is a pledge of ours. He is "made perfect."

4. There is comfort in the fact that the Captain of salvation has been made thus "perfect by suffering." As Divine He was perfect from the beginning. Morally, as man, He who was "holy, harmless, undefiled," needed no fiery trial, for there was no dross to consume. But officially, as Captain and Saviour, suffering was needed: partly as atonement for sin, "He was wounded for our transgressions"; partly as a pattern for our imitation, "Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow His steps"; partly as a sympathising Friend and High Priest, "In all things it behoved Him to be made like unto His brethren, for in that He himself hath suffered, being tempted [or tried] He is able to succour them that are tempted." (Heb. ii. 17, 18.) Thus as our Leader, Captain, Saviour, He was perfected or qualified by suffering.

Christ did not need suffering to purify from sin; but we do. Our faith is more precious than gold, but, like gold, is mixed with dross, and needs the purifying furnace. It must be "tried with fire" in order to be perfected. While thus called to suffer, let us be comforted and strengthened by looking to Him who is the "Author and Finisher of the Faith," its chief Exemplar, our Leader and Captain. He goes before us. Every step of the road has been trodden by Him. The foes who threaten us have been vanquished by Him. Through all the obstacles that threaten to impede us He has forced a passage.

His crown of thorns gave dignity to grief and royalty to woe. Let us not shrink from wearing it. By that circlet of thorns He won a coronet of stars. His groans on the Cross were preludes to the hallelujahs of heaven. His victory secures ours. If we suffer with Him we shall rejoice with Him. He beckons to us from on high, saying, "Because I live, ye shall live also." As our Captain, so also His followers; as the Only Begotten, so also His brethren —"the many sons" whom God is bringing to glory —shall be made "perfect through suffering."

Suffering was also needed for His perfected triumph. As Divine Man, He was to be rewarded, exalted, and glorified. His former glory in heaven appertained to Him as Son of God. The glory of humanity could only be His by His becoming Son of Man; and, as Man, suffering was needed for the perfection of glory. Thus we honour patriots, philanthropists, martyrs, in relation to their sufferings. They would not be so honoured had they not endured so much. Thus we behold "Jesus, because of the sufferings of death, crowned with glory and honour, that by the grace of God He should taste death for every man." (Heb. ii. 9.) "He humbled Himself, becoming obedient to death, yea, the death of the Cross. Wherefore also God highly exalted Him." (Phil. ii. 8, 9.) Sorrow was the highway to joy. The Cross was the ladder to the Crown. Christ was "made perfect by suffering." Surely there is comfort in knowing that if suffering was thus right and fit for the Captain of salvation, so it must be for all His followers.

It was not weakness in God, but wisdom, which ordained those sufferings. It "became God," as Ruler, that law should be honoured: it "became God," as Father, that love should be manifested; it "became God," in bringing many sons to glory, to provide for them a Ransom, an Example, a Sympathiser; it became Him to bring their Captain to glory by the same path along which they must necessarily walk. Can the "many sons" complain of the roughness of the road which their Elder Brother had to tread with bleeding feet and weeping eyes? If He, in whom the Father was always "well pleased," suffered, shall not we, who have so often grieved our Father? If we follow Him as our Captain, we must expect the suffering, and may be sure of the glory. Like Himself, "we must through much tribulation enter into the Kingdom." The Vale of Tears leads to the Delectable Mountains. The short night of weeping heralds the dawn of endless rejoicing. In suffering pain of body, anguish of heart, spiritual conflict and depression, we must not think it "strange," when not only all the "many sons" are sharers in the trial, but when God's well-beloved Son endured the same. His Father is our Father. What it "became Him" to appoint for Jesus we should welcome, rather than resent. Great privileges are linked with great trials. The mountain summit has an exhilarating atmosphere, and commands extensive views, but is exposed to fierce tempests and darkening mists. Shall we not endure these cheerfully when the mountain is the Mountain of God's Holiness, and the highway to His Abode?

XUM

WITH DR. W. M. TAYLOR IN NEW YORK.

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

IT was raining "cats and dogs" when I leaped down from the car of the "elevator track," in New York, on my way to the house of Dr. Taylor. From the station to his house in "Thirty-fifth" Street was but a short distance, but my great-coat was soon heavily saturated, spite of an umbrella. I was almost ashamed to present myself—though by appointment—at the house of the eminent New York divine. He met me, however, and extended a cordial welcome that made me soon forget the deluge through which I had almost had to swim. Soon I was seated in an easy-chair in his study, and enjoying the grateful warmth from an open fireplace, so uncommon in New York.

"Better take off your boots and have some slippers," said the genial minister. "Have something to eat." Declining the courteous offers, I was nevertheless struck with the kindliness that suggested them.

"Just wait a moment; I must telephone a message."

While Dr. Taylor was writing a message to be telephoned, I had a good view of his rotund figure at his adjustable writing-table. Soon he wheeled round, and, leaning back in his great easy-chair, uttered many words of wisdom, which, alas! I have not retained in memory. Scarcely had I finished the outline of a sketch and sipped a cup of tea, thoughtfully brought by Miss Taylor, when the Doctor said, "Just try that chair. That is my horseback exercise." With this Dr. Taylor rose, and, seating himself in the chair with complicated machinery beneath it, moved backwards and forwards two handles, which brought him down at regular intervals with a "dumping" sound, and with so much force that I feared the ladies in the room below would be alarmed. "Very beneficial, but very noisy, is it not?"

"I wonder the flooring does not give way. Your house must be very strong."

"It ought to be. I pay seven hundred pounds sterling for it a year. You think that a great amount: but is this larger or more convenient than the pastor of the Tabernacle Church ought to occupy?"

Dr. Taylor has a large congregation, and they pay him a large sum a year—about three thousand pounds sterling; but his expenses are great, and the demands on his purse constant. Having leading merchants, lawyers, physicians, editors, and politicians in his congregation, he must be compelled to entertain at times in a style costly and in keeping with their tastes and position. The fact is that everything is only relative. A man gets a large salary, and he has large expenses. A pastor with a salary half the amount that Dr. Taylor pays for his house told me that he could manage very well, even though living in a suburb of New York.

Since the pastor of the Tabernacle went to America and became such a success, many ministers have sought a home in the States. Many have gone over "prospecting." "Some who have failed in their own land have sought success in the new, and many have been disappointed," said Dr. Taylor. "They have then gone back to England, and given dreary accounts of things religious in America. Many thought they had only to come over, and they would find a deputation waiting at the steamboat wharf ready to conduct them to the pastorate of a first-class church. Such men, when they come, find they must take positions in the West, and learn to do home mission work. This irks them, and they soon return. But there are others doing splendid service in the home mission field, and sacrificing far more to do it than if they went to some foreign land."

Detailing how he himself was led to leave England, Dr. Taylor said, "I was brought to the point in a peculiar way. I had a brother-in-law living in New York. He led me to come over and supply for an eminent minister for three months. I had been sixteen years in Bootle. My position there was such that no other church in England seemed so attractive. I did not care to leave. When the invitation came to me, and I laid it before my officers, they said, 'There is no place in England for which we should give you up, but we dare not hinder you from taking up such a work as that in New York.' Men who said this, said it with tears standing in their eyes at the thought of parting from me. I came, and I have never regretted it. My influence here has been greater than it could ever have been in England."

Dr. William Mackergo Taylor was born in Kilmarnock. He descended from those who had suffered for their Covenanting principles. He had godly parents, who did their best to give him a good education in the academy of his native town. He entered the University of Glasgow at sixteen, and took his M.A. when he was twenty. He was trained for the pastorate at the Divinity Hall of the United Presbyterian Church in Edinburgh, and went first as minister to the village of Kilmaurs, near his birthplace. Here he laboured with such zeal that the newly formed Presbyterian Church at Bootle asked for his services, and at that place he laboured until the membership rose from forty to six hundred.

We drifted into speaking not only of the religious outlook, but of the material prosperity of America. The Doctor believes that if Free Trade became operative in the States, there would be a season of great prosperity at first for England, but that in two or three years America, having such immense resources, would beat England out of the markets of the world. "The resources of this country are tremendous, and at our doors. Look at Pittsburg smelting iron by natural gas; what can stand against that? There is nothing to pay for raising heat, as when obtained from coal. Down in the South, in Alabama, there is a place that is rivalling Pittsburg. England cannot long have the iron trade." I have been through Pennsylvania since listening to these words, and have seen the natural gas utilised in lighting in a flaring and profuse manner the various towns beyond the Alleghanies, and in heating rooms, as well as smelting iron. I strongly suspect the opinion of Dr. Taylor is not merely gaseous. So plentiful is petroleum even in Michigan, that a man who has prospered by boring for oil told me that "he can sell it at fifteen cents [7½d.] a barrel, and get good profit on the transaction."

It was pleasant to sit talking frankly with this genial minister. But time flew. The warmth of that open English grate was enjoyable, and the thought of the downpour outside repellent. I rise to go, but the Doctor insists on my inspection of a splendid copy of a "Menzies" Bible, which had been published at a hundred pounds a copy. Then he pointed out pictures of his home and of the Bootle Church, still dear. Then he took me to another room, where more very valuable books filled elaborately finished cases. Then he hunted up a photograph for me, and then led the way down into the drawing-room, where two sons and daughters were passing in various ways the eventide. One daughter, on seeing the portrait which had been given to me, protested that it was not a good one, and insisted on bringing from her album one much better. Right merrily she reminded her father that she had been at the expense of taking that "superior photo."

As I went away, the invitation was given, and the promise made, to dine with Dr. Taylor and the ministers of the Manhattan Association. So I passed into the wet street, and hurried back by "elevator railway" to the Astor House.

I was glad afterwards to see the Manhattan gathering, and to listen to their examination of candidates for the Congregational ministry. Fifty men listened, while one or two appointed examined the young graduates in theology and Church principles. Then licences to preach were granted, renewable at the end of two years. One learned how much more like Presbyterianism is the Congregationalism of the States than that of England. Dr. Storrs and Dr. Behrends, with Dr. Taylor, were among those who took a prominent part in the examination.

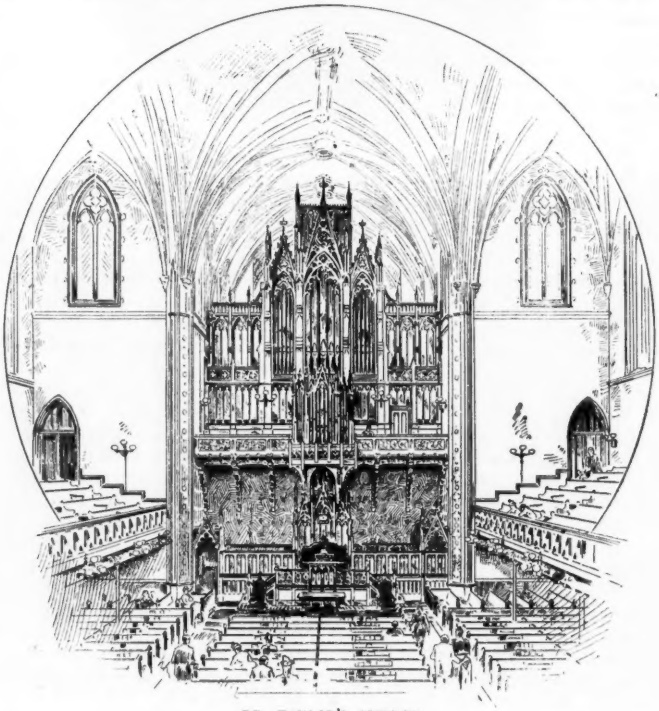
THE REV. W. M. TAYLOR, D.D.
(From a Photograph by Anderson, New York.)

The "church-parlour" in which the gathering was held is at the back of the church, and is a most convenient, well-carpeted double-room, such as should be found in connection with all churches.

The Tabernacle is a large, airy Gothic edifice, seating about seventeen hundred people, and it is filled on Sunday mornings, but in the evening only half-full. I could not but be struck with the fact that two-thirds of those present were men. Dr. Taylor is perhaps a little proud of the fact that he has so large a proportion of the male sex in his congregation. They come and listen to his masculine utterances with evident delight. He reads closely his discourse, and perhaps there is in his manner a slightly don't-care style. His accent is slightly Scotch. He is, when the velvet-edged robe is off, a typical "John Bull" in appearance, and there is somewhat of that bluntness in the pulpit. His voice is clear and strong, and his action moderate. His face beamed with intellectual fire, and was well lit-up by a peculiar gas arrangement that, while suspended over his head, did not interfere with his movements or with the comfort of the auditors in gazing at him. That arrangement, he told me, was his own device. At first I wondered as to what the ornamental box over his head was intended for. It reminded me of what I had seen in Roman Catholic churches. It was like the receptacle for the Wafer, or "Host," on the altar. The mystery was explained however, and Dr. Taylor is very proud of his invention. He could not be quite so proud of the arrangement which, allowing the quartette choir to sit behind the pulpit, does not prevent the constantly moving faces and tall, nodding bonnets from detracting from the power of the discourse. One's attention was, alas! drawn off ever and anon by the noiseless movement.

As a listener, I was struck with the great disadvantage every minister must labour under who has a choir and perhaps an organ behind him. Whoever invented the wretched system? I am coming to think that it is a Satanic device to check the power of the preaching.

But let me speak of the sermon of Dr. Taylor. It was on "God's will being done on earth." "The will of God must be either decretive or perceptive. The Mohammedan seeks to do nothing to thwart that will. If a pestilence breaks out, he says, 'It is God's will,' and allows it to run on. We should do God's will by checking it, if possible, and seeing to better sanitation. . . . The hardest words to say are, 'Thy will be done.' If we can say 'Our Father,' we can say 'Thy will be done.' . . . The true analogue of the Jewish economy is the spiritual Church of Christ. . . . There is a disposition to-day to take out of the Bible that which does not please us. The commands of God are so many pearls on a string. Disobedience breaks the string, and lets fall the pearls. . . . We have a stronger motive for praising God and doing His will than the angels have—we have had so much forgiven. We never read of an angel being too late to do what he was sent to do. God's will is done in heaven. He that delays obedience, disobeys. There is no delay, and no cavilling at or criticising commands in heaven.



. . . We have no need to seek to be as wise as God, and pry into His secrets. It may suit the purpose of anarchists and infidels to misrepresent God, but the welfare of the race can only be brought about by man obeying God. That is the solution of all social problems. That done, a sight will be presented such as Heaven will stoop to see. Combinations and brotherhoods, and Labour Knighthoods, ignore the solution of the problem which is found in the words, 'Thy will be done on earth,' and 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.'"

It is not the object of this paper to criticise the style of Dr. Taylor; suffice it to say that there is a solidity about his style that compels attention and demands thought. No great appeal is made to the emotional or imaginative in the hearers. Deep earnestness pervades the whole discourse.

Speaking once of his manner and object, he said at another time, "If I have been in any degree successful in comforting the sorrowful, or directing the perplexed, or strengthening the tempted, or encouraging the desponding, it is because I have tried to take as my motto the words of the greatest of all preachers: 'I will not send them away fasting, lest they faint by the way.' I have tried to inspire men with a new courage for the daily battle; I have sought to make them stronger for the wear and tear of character that modern business necessitates. I have endeavoured to make this life on earth sublimer by bringing to bear upon it the motives and sanctions of eternity."

It ought to be mentioned that Dr. Taylor has been a voluminous author. His occasional contributions to THE QUIVER must be within the recollection of our readers. He has published "Life Truths," "Miracles Helps to Faith, not Hindrances," "The Lost Found, the Wanderer Welcomed," "David, King of Israel," "Elijah the Prophet," "Daniel the Beloved," "Peter the Apostle," "Moses the Lawgiver," "Paul the Missionary," "Limitations of Life," "Contrary Winds and other Sermons," and "The Ministry of the Word." This last was a course of lectures which he delivered in Yale Divinity School. Then in 1880 he issued another course of lectures, given in Princeton Theological Seminary, called "The Gospel Miracles in their Relation to Christ and Christianity." For several years he edited the Christian at Work, and wrote many of the articles himself. "It was too much," he said, "to carry, in addition to the burden of a great church. I was glad when the weight slipped from my shoulders. The ministry of the Word is the one thing a preacher has to attend to."

Two young men immediately after the service came to me—seeing I was a stranger—and presented a card of invitation to a prayer-meeting in the church-parlour. It was delightful to see such evident earnestness and watchfulness on the part of the young men. They believed in their pastor, and sought as best they could to supplement his pulpit efforts by personal influence and persistent prayer. Would that every minister had such prayerful supporters!

No. 23. Israel under Judges.

To read—Judges ii. 11—23. Golden Text—Hebrews iii. 12.

I. BACKSLIDING. (11—13.) About twenty years passed since death of Joshua. Israelites continued faithful to God during time of elders who had over-lived Joshua, and had seen God's works (Josh. xxiv. 31), but now began to get remiss. What did they do?

(a) Forsook God—i.e., neglected to worship and pray—turned to evil ways.

(b) Served other gods—especially Baal and Ashtaroth (gods of sun and moon).

What caused them to do this?

(a) Forgetting God's past works, mercies, judgments.

(b) Bad example of nations around them.

Let them serve as warning. To neglect the worship of God sure to lead sooner or later to sin—choosing other things to love and honour. Examples—

Saul forsook God, was led to hate and try to kill David. (1 Sam. xix. 9.)

Jeroboam despised God's worship, made whole nation to sin. (1 Kings xv. 26.)

II. Judgment. (14, 15, 20—23.) How did God punish them?

(a) His anger was stirred up against them. What a difference between God's love and God's anger! In His love He had fed and guided them. Now He turns against them.

(b) His punishments. Allowed bands of spoilers to invade the land. Result would be loss of flocks, herds, corn, etc. Also enemies prevailed against them. No longer were put to flight as before. Remained in the country all around (ver. 21) to be a snare to them.

What effect would this have on the Israelites?

(a) To humble them—make them realise their dependence on God.

(b) To prove them—whether they would now serve God or not.

Examples of enemies turning people's hearts to God—

David after numbering the people. (2 Sam. xxiv. 17.)

Hezekiah at invasion of Assyrians. (2 Kings xix. 1.)

III. Mercy. (16—19.) God did not wholly forsake His people. Gave them Judges in their distress. What were their duties?

(a) To admonish as Samuel. (1 Sam. vii. 3.)

(b) To judge causes, as Deborah. (Judges iv. 5.)

(c) To lead to battle, as Gideon. (viii. 12.)

But not to act as rulers or kings, for the Lord was their King. (1 Sam. viii. 7.)

Notice about these Judges—they were—

(a) Called and appointed by God.

(b) Raised up only as needed.

(c) Successful only for a time.

As soon as the Judge was dead the people fell away again.

What does this show?

1. Unbelief—in trusting to man rather than God.

2. Ingratitude in so soon again forgetting God.

Beware lest we be like them. (Golden Text.)

No. 24. Gideon's Army.

To read—Judges vii. 1—8; 16—23. Golden Text—Zechariah iv. 6.

I. A Small Army. (1—8.) Recall past history of Gideon.

Was son of Joash the Abiezrite (vi. 11). At time when Midianites were oppressing Israel, an angel had appeared to him with message from God. He was to deliver Israelites. But first, must cut down altar of Baal in his father's house. Received name of Jerubbaal (Let Baal plead). Then gathered soldiers from Manasseh, Asher, Zebulon, and Naphtali, i.e., all the northern tribes of Israel, ready for battle. Now the time has come to fight.

Notice the army—

(a) It was well arranged.

(b) It was large—32,000 men.

(c) It had confidence in the general.

But the army was declared by God to be too large. Command given to reduce it. Who were to go back? More than two-thirds proved cowards. Still 10,000 left. Even this too large. The people might boast that they had gained the victory (ver. 2). So another reduction made—only 300 left! This was to be the conquering army.

What would these men need?

(a) Courage—to fight bravely.

(b) Arms—to oppose enemy.

(c) Unity—to help one another.

(d) Faith—to believe in God's presence and help.

So this little army set out.

II. A Great Victory. (16—23.) See Gideon's wise arrangements.

(a) The attack was to be at night—to take enemy by surprise.

(b) Soldiers divided into three companies—to surround the foe.

(c) All were to copy their leader exactly.

But the arms—what were they? Lanterns, pitchers, trumpets!

Truly the battle, if won, would be the Lord's!

See the events of the battle.

(a) Time—midnight, just after new watch set.

(b) Plan—trumpets blown, pitchers broken, lamps flash out.

(c) War-cry—"Sword of the Lord and of Gideon."

(d) Result—enemy scared, attack one another in the confusion. Were routed and pursued.

III. LESSONS. What would all this teach the Israelites?

(a) Humility—the victory was not their doing.

(b) Faith in God—who saved them from their enemies.

(c) God's ways not as man's ways. (Golden Text.)

2. What does all this teach us?

(a) Our enemies must be subdued—the world, flesh, and devil.

(b) The battle is the Lord's—He will fight for us.

(c) Victory is certain. We may trust and not be afraid.

No. 25. DEATH OF SAMSON.

To read—Judges xvi. 21—31. Golden Text—Job xxxii. 9.

I. SAMSON HUMBLED IN LIFE. (21, 22.) Who was Samson?

(a) The son of godly parents—Manoah and his wife (xiii. 8).

(b) Dedicated to God from his birth (xiii. 24).

(c) Moved by God's Spirit.

As a Nazarite had made three solemn vows, viz.:

1. Not to touch any unclean thing.

2. Not to taste strong drink.

3. Not to cut his hair.

God gave him great strength so long as he kept his vow. But he misused his strength, and also gave way to sin. Married an ungodly woman, who led to his fall. She beguiled him to break his vow and let her cut his hair. (Ver. 19.) At once his strength went from him, and Philistines took him prisoner. (Golden Text.) What did they do with him?

(a) Imprisoned him at Gaza.

(b) Put out his eyes.

(c) Made him do slave's work—grinding corn.

Thus treated him with insult, cruelty, humiliation.

We, too, as Christians, have made like vows.

1. To have no fellowship with works of darkness. (Eph. v. 11.)

2. To be temperate in all things. (Eph. v. 18.)

3. To be modest in hair and apparel. (1 Tim. ii. 9.)

We, like him, have had strength given from God.

We may be strong in the Lord, and in His power stand against the wiles of the devil. (Eph. vi. 11.)

Have we ever broken our vows, given way to sin?

II. SAMSON VICTORIOUS IN DEATH. (23—31.) Picture Samson kept in prison.

What did he do during his bondage?

(a) Thought over his past life—his victories and sins.

(b) Prayed to God to help him in his trouble.

(c) Let his hair grow—thus renewing his vow.

At last the end comes. A great religious festival held. Dagon the fish-god is to be honoured and Samson's God insulted.

(a) They rejoice that Dagon has defeated Samson.

(b) They make sport of the poor blind captive.

But their triumph is short. See Samson's conduct—

(a) Prayer—That God would aid him.

(b) Self-renunciation—Willing to die with the Philistines.

(c) Effort—Pulls down the temple and wins great victory.

Thus slew more in his death than in his life.

LESSONS FROM SAMSON'S LIFE. 1. Strength, health, and all bodily good things come from God. (James i. 17.)

2. God's gifts must be used for God's glory. (1 Cor. x. 31.)

3. Broken vows may be renewed with repentance and prayer.

No. 26. RUTH'S CHOICE.

To read—Ruth i. 16—22. Golden Text—Ruth i. 16.

I. A GOOD DAUGHTER. (16—18.) Who were these two persons?

Naomi. Widow of Elimelech, a farmer—obliged to leave Bethlehem because of famine—emigrated to Moab—stayed there ten years, till husband and two married sons all dead. Thus three widows left to mourn together.

Ruth. Widow of Chilion, younger son of Elimelech and Naomi; a Moabitess, nation of idolaters—knew not God—at this time a young and childless widow. Early learned sorrow, but had learned from husband's family to know something of God. Now Naomi proposes to return to Bethlehem. Why?

(a) God had again sent prosperity (i. 6).

(b) She would like to spend the end of her life among her own people.

Naomi suggests to her two daughters-in-law to return each to her mother's house. Why?

(a) Because their friends are in Moab.

(b) They would marry again among their own kindred.

Orpah leaves her—Ruth clings to her. Why?

(a) She has learned to love Naomi.

(b) She loves Naomi's God.

She will live with her, lodge with her, adopt her people, worship her God—nothing but death shall part them.

So Naomi let her stay. What does Ruth's conduct show?

1. Sympathy—Sharing the sorrows of Naomi.

2. Unselfishness—Giving up worldly advantage for the sake of others.

3. Piety—Desire to serve and follow the true God.

Such a choice comes to all at some time. Examples—

(a) Lot's wife loved this world and perished. (Gen. xix. 26.)

(b) Moses chose God's service and prospered. (Heb. xi. 25.)

"Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." (Golden Text.)

II. A SAD WOMAN. (19—22.) The old and young widows return together. Reach Bethlehem at harvest. People gather around them. What does Naomi say?

(a) God has ordered her life. The famine—leaving home—the return—all God's doing. (Ps. xxv. 9, 10.)

(b) God has ordered her sorrows. Loss of husband, sons, property, all of God. But "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." (Heb. xii. 6.)

What consolations are left to her?

(a) Many old friends to cheer her.

(b) A devoted daughter-in-law to work for her.

(c) God's presence to sustain her.

The result—a happy old age. Saw Ruth well married, and in time became ancestress of Jesus Christ.

XUM

LESSON. All things work together for good to them that love God.

No. 27. REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

HAVE been reading of the Israelites under two distinct periods.

1. Their conquest of Canaan under Joshua.

2. Their settlement under the Judges.

Five persons have been prominent, viz., Joshua, Caleb, Gideon, Samson, Ruth. What have we learned from each?

I. JOSHUA. Principal events noticed.

(a) His commission—called by God for his special work—encouraged to persevere—bidden to read God's law.

LESSONS. 1. God's grace sufficient for all duties.

2. God's law to be our guide.

(b) Crossing the Jordan. The ark leading—people following in safety—memorial stones erected.

LESSONS. 1. Victory comes from Divine protection.

2. National gratitude due for national mercies.

3. Remembrance of God's mercies to be perpetuated.

(c) Fall of Jericho. People marching round unarmed.

LESSON. The power of faith.

(d) Defeat at Ai. Achan's sin and punishment.

LESSONS. 1. All sin, open or secret, known to God.

2. Man's helplessness when left to himself.

3. Sin in one man may be visited on a whole nation.

(e) Renewal of covenant. Joshua a faithful servant of God. Exhorts the people to the same.

LESSONS. 1. The duty of setting a good example.

2. The benefit of renewing vows of allegiance to God.

II. CALEB. Received his promised inheritance.

LESSONS. 1. Gentiles to be fellow-heirs with Jews

2. Promises to be kept.

III. GIDEON. Chosen to put down idolatry—led small army against vast hosts of enemies.

LESSON. 1. No one too humble to work for God.

2. Putting down sin must begin at home.

3. God saveth not with many or with few.

4. The battle is the Lord's.

IV. SAMSON. Born of godly parents, dedicated from birth to God's service, endued with great strength, defeats enemies, breaks one of his vows, loses his strength, suffers punishment, repents, renews his vow, gains final victory.

LESSONS. 1. All good gifts are from God.

2. Vows broken may be renewed after repentance.

3. God's eye is on our whole lives.

4. The danger of least departure from God's law.

V. RUTH. Will not desert Naomi.

LESSONS. 1. Trials are God's discipline.

2. Those who seek God shall want no manner of thing that is good.

TYPES OF CHRIST. 1. Joshua—in his name (Lord, Saviour); his life as guide and captain of Israelites, leading them to Canaan. So Christ, our Saviour, leads His people to heaven.

2. Samson—received God's Spirit, defeated enemies, was taken prisoner, but triumphed in his death.

So Christ, full of Holy Ghost, overcame the devil, was taken to prison, but by His death saved the world.

QUEENIE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BEAUTY AND THE BEAST."

IT was an old London bookstall which brought her back to my memory, this dear wee child of seven, whose friendship had once gladdened a summer which, but for her bright ringing laugh and quaint sweet fancies, would have been the dreariest of my life. I had been turning over the dusty pages of the books upon the counter, and was diving into the box which was marked, "THIS LOT, 6d.," when I came across a small fat volume of poems, and, as though its touch were magic, the ugly barren streets passed from my eyes, and I was back again in the country lanes and fields, where little footsteps went trotting over the soft grass in useless envy of my own larger stride, and where a little voice was declaring, "We 'll call this our book, Mr. Wayne."

The little volume was torn and thumbed. Evidently it had seen hard service since the day when I had first hung over it with all a young man's pride in its dainty dress of blue and gold; but that was thirty years ago and more, and both it and the little child herself had well-nigh faded from my memory, when at the sight of the book they sprang again to life. I turned to the first page. "Seen in the Summer Time, and other Poems, by Maurice Wayne," said the title, and then underneath my name two words were added in a child's round hand; the pencil-marks were blurred, but I recognised them at once. I could even recall the day when my little friend had added them, sitting at the foot of the old apple-tree of whose hollowed trunk we had made an out-door desk, and with a busied look in her usually laughing eyes.

"It isn't quite fair to say 'By Maurice Wayne' only: do you think so?" she had asked; and then, with infinite care, she had added the words at which I was now looking, "and Queenie."

I secured my treasure and carried it away in triumph, and then, finding that my reawakened memories bade fair to interfere with graver work, I turned into the Temple Gardens, and gave myself up to thoughts of vanished sunshine, and of Queenie.

It was early June when I first saw her, for I had overworked at college, and had been sent down to dawdle away three months of my life at a country farm. "If you touch books or papers instead of resting completely, your sight will probably pay the forfeit," the doctors had told me; and being in those days overflowing with life and energy, the verdict seemed to me too intolerable to bear. A three months' rest meant flinging me back in the race for honours; it meant exile from all occupations for which I most cared; worst of all, it meant the postponement of a certain book of verses on the immediate production of which I had set my heart. The knowledge that the literary world would certainly survive its loss, and that I myself might gain my wish in the autumn, in nowise consoled me; and fretting against my hard fate, I began the enforced holiday, petulant and miserable.

I heard there was a second visitor staying at the farmhouse, the little daughter of a struggling London doctor, who had sent her out of town for the summer months, but I did not see her until the next day. It was a glorious morning when we first made friends. I was lying full length upon the grass, with my head pillowed upon my outstretched arms, when she came up to me. She had been wandering about the old orchard at the back of the ivy-covered house in the aimless, disconsolate fashion of a child who misses her accustomed playmates, when she came suddenly upon my recumbent figure, and an amazed little "Oh!" broke the stillness of the slumberous, sun-laden air. I rolled over on to my side, and lay looking up at the tiny white-frocked figure, and at the startled blue eyes which shone like stars under the huge sun-bonnet.

"Don't be frightened, little one. Sit down and let us make friends."

"I am not frightened," she answered, with much dignity; "but I think you are. You are crying."

"Indeed I am not!" I protested hotly, for I was still young enough to resent such an imputation even from such a scrap as this.

"Then you want to," she insisted. "You look dreadfully miser-rubble."

Having brought out the two long words to her own complete satisfaction, her serious face relaxed into a smile, and she sat down by my side, drawing up her feet, and resting her chin upon her knees.

"Do you like little girls?" she demanded suddenly.

I do not suppose I was much fonder of small children than the generality of young men, but there was a certain charm about this one in particular, with her soft voice and fearless manner, which took my heart by storm.

"I like you, at all events," I said warmly. "What is your name?"

"Queenie."

"Queenie," I echoed. "Is that your real name?"

The child considered a moment. "Perhaps it isn't," she said at last. "Oh, of course it isn't, because the big Bible at home calls me Henrietta Mary. But everybody calls me Queenie, and I like that best."

In ten minutes' time I knew all about the noisy brothers in the house at home, whose absence made her welcome me as a holiday companion, and about the little lambs in the farther field, and the old grey mare in the stable. At the end of that time she returned to her first accusation.

"You are sorry about something. Tell me what it is. I will be sorry too," she said coaxingly.

So I told her. Her own eyes brimmed with tears when I explained how mine smarted when looking at the reading of those picture-books which seemed to be her sole idea of literature; but when I went on to speak of my keen disappointment in being kept from completing my poems, it was not so easy to make her understand.

"What is poetry?" she asked me.

"It is another name for beauty, my pet. It means the same thing."

She had thrown back the big sun-bonnet which was hanging by its white strings to the soft, rounded throat, and the brows were drawn together in a puzzled frown.

"I wish you would make me understand," she said wistfully. "Father would."

The appeal was irresistible. I roused myself and sat up, slipping a caressing arm around her.

"Look over there, Queenie," I said, pointing with the other hand away to the westward; for our orchard stood upon a little hill, and the most lovely part of Kent was lying at our feet. "Don't you see how blue the sky is, and how pretty the green trees look with the sunshine glimmering through their branches? Look at the hayfields and the flower-sprinkled grass. They are all such common things that we forget how beautiful they are; but that is the poetry of God's earth. It is what they call 'the poetry of nature.' When we remember it, and are grateful to Him, that is poetry too, because we are thinking beautiful thoughts instead of only thinking about our stupid selves and what we want. Do you understand?"

"I think so," she said doubtfully; "but you don't 'splain as well as my father does. Is poetry anything else?"

"There is 'the poetry of life,' but that is more difficult still," I answered. "That is not written in a man's book. It is something he does, and very often does not know he is doing. If you are bright, and cheer somebody up when you feel more inclined to go away and have a good cry by yourself, that is poetry. Or, if you are very fond of roses, and you give away the last in your garden to a poor man who hasn't got one, that's poetry, too. It is being unselfish, and brave, and bringing happiness into other people's lives."

The little child sat looking at me intently, but the puzzled look had vanished. "I see," she said at last, with a dreamy, far-away look in her eyes, as if she really did see far more than the sunlight showed her. "Father told us about the great white angel who writes in the book. I suppose he is writing down that part of the poetry?"

I kissed the red mouth by way of answer, and before another minute had passed was engaged in a wild scamper in and out among the apple-trees, with Queenie in my arms.

"Faster! faster!" she shouted, her cheeks aglow with excitement, and I was sufficiently unused to children to be glad that she had shaken off her serious mood. It had seemed to me positively eerie to listen to her strange comment upon my rather bungling explanation, and the change was a relief. Certainly there was nothing unchildlike about her now, as she sat perched upon my shoulder, with one tiny hand holding tightly to my collar, while with the other she snatched at the leaves and blossoms overhead. "Gee up, horsie! Go on!" she cried to me through her laughter, and two vigorous little feet beat a tattoo on my chest. I am afraid I grew tired of the game before she did, and was ungallant enough to propose that she should leave me in peace for an hour, while she paid a visit to her friend the old grey mare.

"You won't get sad again if I go away?" she asked me, anxiously, and even my lazy assurance that I should probably go to sleep did not seem wholly to satisfy her. She knelt down on the grass, and stooped to give me a good-bye kiss.

"We can do all your poetry together, can't we?" she went on, still trying in her quaint fashion to insure my newly established cheeriness. "We will go about and find all the pretty things, and then, at the end of the summer, when you are quite well again, it will all be finished, and you will only have to write it down."

I was only too glad to have such a dear little companion to help me through my (as I then considered it) wasted holiday, and the good woman of the farm was pleased I should take notice of her rather lonely little visitor. So that first morning was the beginning of many another which we spent together in the old orchard, or in roaming about the lanes and by-ways of smiling Kent. As I have said, I had never hitherto been much thrown in with small children, but though half a life-time stretches between the then and now, the friendship of that little child is one of the brightest memories I can recall.

Part of this, no doubt—at all events, in the earlier days of our rambles—was due to the very material aid she gave me. I grew actually ashamed, in time, of the patronising fashion in which I had once given her the benefit of my own lofty ideas. I was mightily satisfied with myself, if not with my surroundings, in those days, and having, by dint of hard reading and the companionship of better men, attained to some glimmering of the inner meaning of poetry, I was apt to pose mentally as an enlightened seer, whose inspired utterances were denied by cruel circumstances from reaching a duller world. But little Queenie did for me what no less innocent teacher had ever succeeded in doing: she shook my confidence in my own powers. What was the use of pluming myself, for instance, upon some daring simile or neatly turned couplet, when I had only to toss this child a bunch of roses to win more dainty thoughts and pretty conceits than I could compass with a week's striving? A little tale she used to tell me, about an amorous rose who stole the golden heart of a sunbeam and hid it in his crimson breast, still chimes pleasantly in my head, although the added charm of the soft baby voice stumbling over the long words—"I am telling you a story, and all stories have long words," said Queenie—is lost to it for ever. Then there was a song she used to sing, a mere lullaby—the words were nothing, but the poetry of the little scene consisted in the child's notion that she could distinguish the various tones of that sweet, confused murmur of country sounds which she called "God's music."

"Oh, of course I can hear the birds. Anybody can hear them," she told me one day when we were discussing the matter; "but I can hear the grass too." Down went the little fair head, until it was almost hidden in its queer crown. "I can hear it going swish! swish! The wind is telling it all the secrets it has brought from over the sea. Let's p'etend we know what the secrets are, Mr. Wayne, and then you can write them in your book."

There was a good deal of "pretending" about the whole matter, and I do not know how far she believed in her own imaginings. Her delight was certainly real enough when the view of a distant field of cornflowers made her exclaim that a scrap of the sky had fallen under the hedges; but how far she credited her own tale when she declared that a certain giant, having "taken a blunderbuss and blunderbussed a fairy," had been changed into a grim-looking oak, which she therefore declined to pass, I would not undertake to settle. Sometimes I wondered idly if she remembered what I had tried to make her understand about the farther meaning of poetry; but she never referred to our first talk, and I did not like to tease her with questions.

"I want you to come with me to see Willy."

These were the words with which she met me one August day. Further questioning elicited the facts that Willy was a poor little boy with whom she had somehow made friends, and that he lived with his mother in a lonely cottage some mile or so from our farm. Willy had been poorly lately, and was feeling dull, so Queenie proposed we should go and sit with him. The idea did not chime in with my own wishes, and I tried to dissuade the child as we sat together in the shady porch, and talked over our plans for the day.

"It is such a long walk for you, darling, and look how sunny it is!" I said, pointing to the stretch of uphill, treeless road which led to the cottage in question. "Think how much nicer it will be lounging under the trees than sitting in a stuffy little room. You can't do your little friend any good. You had much better wait until he can come out and play with you."

I thought I had convinced her, for the knitted brow grew smooth, and the child's persuasions ceased. But presently she slipped from the seat and ran down the garden path, turning to front me as she reached the open gateway which led into the field beyond.

"I don't want to be disag'eeable," she said, with a touch of that quaint dignity which I often thought must have gained her her nickname; "I know it is going to be dweadfully hot, and I would much rather be under the trees with you; but I think Willy wants me most."

She waited a full minute, as if hoping I should change my mind, a dainty, white-clad figure against the fresh green; but I grudged spending such a glorious morning within doors, and felt vexed with the child that I could not bend her to my wishes.

"You can go by yourself, then: I shan't come," I answered roughly, and in another moment Queenie had gone.

Feeling too annoyed to follow her, I went back into the house to collect my books and papers, for my ten weeks' rest had resulted in an occasional wary use of my eyes; but the work might as well have remained in my desk for all the good I was able to do. The remembrance of little Queenie, and the piteous droop of her pretty mouth, stood between me and the papers, and finally I pushed them away in disgust, and started for a long solitary walk. When I returned the evening shadows were lengthening, and, anxious to make my peace, I went up to her room. The little girl was in bed, and instead of her usual joyous welcome, she greeted me with a burst of tears.

She was cross, she was tired. Willy hadn't been pleased to see her.

I soothed her off to sleep at last, but was startled at breakfast next morning to find her heavy-eyed and fretful. In the course of another few days Queenie's father had been wired for: his little daughter was sickening for scarlet fever.

It was from young Willy's mother we afterwards heard the story of that sad morning's work. Her boy had been poorly, but she had not troubled to send for advice, until Queenie herself, finding her endeavours to amuse the invalid had proved unavailing, had suggested she would go and see if the doctor had any stuff to make him well. This second walk to the village surgery had sorely tried the tired little feet, but Queenie's efforts had probably been the means of saving the lad's life.

Was her own to pay the forfeit? For many days we asked ourselves this question, while to the anxiety which I naturally felt, as the poor father's face grew more and more despairing, was added what was yet more terrible—remorse. It was idle to listen to the kindly meant consolations—that, as no one had had any idea of the real state of affairs at the cottage, I could in nowise be held responsible for Queenie's illness; the fact remained that had I possessed but one tithe of the little child's unselfishness, I should have gone with her. But I had stayed behind, because, forsooth, my mind had been running on my work and the form of that poetry of which she had so much more thoroughly caught the spirit! If I too have better understood it since then, I think it is largely due to the humbling and repentant thoughts which were sent me during the long night-watches by that tiny sick-bed.

Our prayers were answered, and the child recovered. Urgent family affairs obliged me to return to town before she had grown strong enough to renew those sauntering rambles to which I think we both had been looking forward, but our parting was brightened by the solemn promise that I would take her a copy of my poems as soon as they should appear in all the glory of print.

That promise was fulfilled in the following spring, when I snatched a few hours from less pleasant engagements to run down again to the old farm-house. An inquiry at her London home had brought me the rather dismal intelligence that its occupants were on the point of starting for Canada, where the hard-worked doctor had recently inherited some property, and where he was now hoping to end his days in peace. Queenie had been sent into the country for a week to be rid of her during the worry of packing. So it was with the sad foreboding—a foreboding which time has since verified—that I should never see my little friend again, that I went speeding out of the close, begrimed city into the cool, delicious stretches of woods and meadows which I always associated with her gentle presence.

I found her in the orchard with the soft breezes showering the pink apple-blossom upon her bared head, and the shouts of delight with which she rushed into my arms must have startled the birds in the branches above.

"Where is the book? Do let me see the book!" she cried, as soon as the first rapturous greeting was over, and it was after I had handed this identical volume, which has now come back to me after all these years, that she demurred to the title: "It isn't quite fair to say 'By Maurice Wayne' only—do you think so?"

No, I did not, so I handed her a pencil, and waited for her next proceeding. When she had written her own name under mine, she made me vow I would "keep it for ever and ever," and gave it back to me, taking in exchange a second copy which I had intended for my good friends at the farm.

"You will never lose it, Mr. Wayne?"

"Never, my darling."

The contented little nod with which she received my words, and the repeated injunctions to keep it carefully, with which later on she interspersed her tearful farewells, haunted me sadly when, some eighteen months afterwards, I moved to other lodgings, and in so doing lost my cherished volume. My efforts to trace it were ceaseless for several days, but they were not successful, and the little book and I had remained strangers until it had so unexpectedly come to light upon the old bookstall. Probably it was sold at the time by the woman who took charge of my rooms, or whoever it was into whose hands it fell, and I shall never know who were the readers who came across my book with its corrected title-page.

Those words had been written for some weeks, and the little story had been done with but the gracious memory which its recital had awakened refused to slumber again. It was as though one had chanced unawares upon an old vase of pot-pourri, and the roses which had beautified many a vanished summer had stirred their faded petals with an undiminished fragrance. So it happened that my thoughts were full of my little friend one morning when I was again sitting in my favourite Temple Gardens. Lying on the bench beside me was an illustrated paper which had been dropped by some careless owner, and, idly recalling the days when Queenie and I had so often pored over picture-books together, I picked it up and began turning over the leaves. It was apparently a paper which appealed principally to girls, and I alighted upon an essay which was entitled "Unvaunted Heroism." It was a sketchy article, and, beginning with the historical women to whose heroic deeds the world had accorded but a scanty meed of praise, it worked gradually round to instances which had been brought within the writer's personal experience. He spoke of the unrecognised courage which was so often to be found amongst that devoted band of women who toil so unceasingly in the midst of our London poor, and then, going farther afield, he thanked God that this same spirit of Christian devotion was to be found in all classes and in all lands.

"In connection with that vast emigration scheme," he continued, "which results in so many of our poor children being taken from their harmful surroundings and helped to earn a livelihood in the healthier atmosphere of Canada, the chief obstacle to be surmounted lay in the difficulty of receiving them in the first instance, and housing them until they could be finally started on their various ways. This difficulty is now a thing of the past, thanks to the energy of a certain Englishwoman, who is the daughter of a doctor who has long resided there."

The little narrative went on, but I had only time to snatch the sense of it before my eyes grew misty with delighted surprise. What did it matter? I had no need of the confirmation afforded by the writer's loving mention of the Englishwoman's name, nor of the detailed account of the wise and tender method by which she gained the hearts of her uncouth protégés. For once I had stumbled across the sequel of what I myself had written. Ardent and gentle-hearted as of old, the sweet child-nature had but fulfilled itself with increasing years; and a work in which hundreds would "rise up and call her blessed" was but the outcome of that same determination to "do the poetry" with which she had won my heart in the Kentish lanes.

And so I found my Queenie again. M. E. W.

LIFE'S LONELY CONTEST.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MURDOCH JOHNSTON, M.A., VICAR OF EAST TWICKENHAM.

"Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel?"—Isaiah lxiii. 2.

THIS is the picture of one who approaches Jerusalem from the rocky heights and the city fortress of Edom. His raiment bears the marks of contest, and is dyed in a colour prouder than the Tyrian purple. His mien is that of one who knows not what it is to be worsted, and every step he takes proclaims his victory.

"Who is he?" This is the question asked by the wondering royal city; for Edom sends few embassies of peace. Is he but a husbandman, fresh from the summer vintage upon the sunny terraces of Seir? "Yes," he hurls back in reply, "I am a husbandman, and I come from the winepress; but the winepress is a nation, and the grapes are the bodies of men."

He had done in truth a hero's deed. He went forth companionless. He outrivalled the prowess of Jonathan at Michmash, and the boldness of Joab at Jerusalem. There was work to be done and no one else to do it, and so his own stout arm, and that alone, brought him at once the triumph and the glory.

Edom lay to the south-east of Palestine, and was the land of Esau. It derived its name from the mess of red pottage for which Esau had sold his birthright, and it thus immortalised the weakness and degradation of its vagrant founder. Built upon rugged rocks where the eagles found their eyries, it spread before the sun an upland territory, fat with wheat and wine, and luxuriant in trees and flowers. It was thither that Esau retired with his wives of Canaan, and there that he was wedded also to the daughter of Ishmael. Henceforth Edom represented the separation of one portion of the stock of Abraham from the inheritance and the covenants of the chosen seed; and from the time that its churlishness drove the migrating host of Jacob from its borders, until it disappears utterly out of history at the siege of Jerusalem, Jacob and Esau lived lives of feud.

The picture is therefore rightly regarded as a description of Jesus Christ and His battle with sin. The Prince of Darkness, like Esau, was of high lineage, the lineage of angels, and every minion and follower of his bore kinship to the holy ones of God. Christ marched against them all through the Cross and the grave, and came back proclaiming to His people that the Kingdom of Heaven was at hand, and that the Word of God speaking in righteousness was mighty to save.

The doctrine is—a full and complete atonement; and the facts are—a ready Friend for the repentant sinner, and the Omnipotence of Heaven upon his side.

But Christ is likewise our example, and the pattern of all noble and holy life. To be associated with Him is one of the necessities, as it is the highest ambition, of sainthood. This passage tells, therefore, much of our own life, and is a prophecy of what it may be, or of what it is. Let us note the order of the events. They stand thus:—

1. The lonely undertaking.
2. The stern contest.
3. The permanent victory.

THE LONELINESS.

MAN'S life is rigidly, awfully individual. It is like a circle which touches a hundred others, but intermingles with none. Man is alone before God and before men, and he stands or falls for what he is himself.

But being thus alone, he is all the more allied to God. The sanction of every deed is God's will, and the impulse of it is God's help. They conceived this nobly in the wonderful Middle Ages. That was the birth-time of European chivalry, and in our own land we are told of the pledge which was given by the candidates for knighthood—

> "To reverence their king as if he were
> Their conscience, and their conscience as their king:
> To break the heathen, and uphold the Christ,
> To ride abroad redressing human wrongs."

Their courage was not mere dash and brutish bravery. It might seek Death where he ravened among his prey, but it sought first the triumph of a great cause, and every man within his own sole entity was bound to do his best.

He goes forth also in the loneliness of faith. The communion of God's people is one of the sweet lights that cheer our earth; but faith is born in us from God Himself, and each man's faith is his own. Any man who in this world's work will prove his title to a worthy place must trust to this, and this only. And it is by doing so that faith grows definite, and strong, and comprehensive, and is able to recognise not men, but God. It is then that it can understand God's mightiness in the world: that it can trace God's path athwart the world's crooked ways: that it can know of times of refreshing which are in store, when the nations shall look upon God's righteousness, and Zion shall see her salvation coming.

And what is this but the account of a strong and good man, who has rested his life for eternity as for time upon the Lord, who trusts his God infinitely and implicitly, who is ready for his duty, though he must do it alone, and who, whether in the land that foes inherit—or friends—will do what God tells him is right?

THE CONTEST.

IT was one of purpose, for his fury was roused; it was one of fierceness, for the blood-gouts had stained his raiment. But it was necessary. The eternal Easter Day lies ever behind an eternal Good Friday. The road to life is through death, and the King's Highway of good is over the moors of suffering. This holds true in everything. It is true of personal success in life. The young man who will attain to this must "scorn delights, and lead laborious days." He is bound to deny himself pleasures which are within his reach—even common comforts, which many suppose to be essential. The body must suffer, and the mind. All must lie in subjection to the purpose he has in view; and no man can control either the affairs of the world or the men who are in it, if he has not first learnt to control himself. The road to success leads through self-discipline and pain.

It is true in spiritual life. The first lesson to be learnt by the man who seeks salvation is so hard that he often refuses to learn it at all. The door of life is opened by God, but man erects another door in front of it, and closes and locks that himself. God makes salvation easy; man himself makes it hard. But repentance is no doubt an unpleasant task. It means the cutting away of much which we have cherished because it was wrong, although it yielded fascination, or was an element of pleasure. It is the dying of a portion of ourselves. It is not a merely definite act, but a continuous operation. Our soul's apparel is red from the first till the last blow in the onset.

And neither can religion be cheap. The contest against it is the mightiest that the world has known. Forces of Gog and Magog are marshalled, and, surrounding the saints, assail the outworks of the Church at every point. The operations of religion, too, are the most extensive and the most enduring. The campaigns of nations, when they last a score of years, are landmarks of the world; and yet the Church of Christ has been militant for eighteen centuries. The future is unknown. Christ may come back soon, or delay for centuries still; but so long as He is absent, the fight is bound to continue.

Besides this, the rewards of religion are the highest and most precious to individual Christians. They are certain: no man is disappointed in either attaining or enjoying them. How, then, can any expect, or is any mean enough to think, that they shall be possessed without cost? If it be a treasure to us, not locked up, but lived upon, it will cost us our best, our best of all that we are and all that we have, and we, too, shall come forth red in our apparel.

THE PERMANENT VICTORY.

ALL this means conquest, victory, and success. No force in all nature is lost. It may be transformed or translated, but it exists; and spiritual power comes back again to the faithful as truly and fully as Jesus came back from Edom. There are, however, three points to be kept in mind—

The first is to have a definite object in view. This is one of the secrets of earthly success. But too often we make earth's ambition distinct and separate from that of heaven. We find the earth is too low for that great companionship, and thus life and heart, interest and effort, are divided. In the true saintly life they are one. Death is only a rest, and not a break in the career of life. Eternity is but the development of time. Earth and heaven in the true perspective of existence are blended into one.

The second point is to pursue this object with a set purpose. Vacillation is the parent of disappointment. Spiritual life means and necessitates will, conscience, and strongly directed effort. It implies a road, and a walking on it and none other. Christ calls it a narrow road because it will admit of little wandering. The Christian needs to gird up the loins of his mind and to press on.

The third is to remember that by one method only can the end be gained. It is not by ease and the rich luxuries of earth's enjoyment. It is not by making pleasure an object or personal advantage a motive. It is by the method old as Abel—the method of sacrifice.

Do you, then, because it seems hard, fear that you may fail? There is One that speaks to you in righteousness, and Who has come back mighty to save. In the bright Lexicon of Faith there is no such word as Fail!

FINDING EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN.

BY ANNE BEALE.

ONE of the last meetings presided over by the Earl of Shaftesbury was that of the Society for the Employment of Women. It was pleasant to watch him at these annual gatherings. We see him now, seated at the unpretentious table, listening to the report read by Miss King, the secretary; and hear his appreciative comments. He was wont to say that nowhere did he see so much useful work done at so small a cost, and praised the female talent for economy accordingly. He declared that, but for arbitrary custom, he would be waited on entirely by neat-handed Phillises; and lamented the days of his youth, when none but waitresses ministered to the needs of members of the House of Commons. He rejoiced over the successful registry kept in that office for waitresses and others; as well as over the innumerable branches of employment spreading to all points of the compass from that special centre. He pointed to the walls, hung with artistic specimens of all the industries, and wondered at the progress made by women both in intellectual and manual work during the last quarter of a century. He, who never undertook what he did not understand, knew that much of this was mainly due to the Society he praised so highly, and our readers can scarcely do better than follow the example of England's Philanthropist, and examine some of the results of twenty-nine years' labour at 22, Berners Street. Most of the new occupations found for women during this period have been either established or materially aided by this parent institution, which, unnatural as it may seem, casts off her children and bids them support themselves as soon as they are old and clever enough to find food and shelter.

The first promising child of this prolific mother that we call upon outside this central home is located at 126, Strand. Here the Type Writing Office, which is a direct offshoot of the Society, is presided over by Mrs. Marshall, a lady well fitted for her work. She introduces us into the cheerful room where a dozen girls are seated before those marvellous machines which click off your thoughts, or copy your manuscripts more rapidly than many could transcribe them. In these days, when speed is everything, people yield to machine power, and allow these complicated typewriters to copy sixty-five words a minute instead of using pen and ink for the same purpose. Here are various degrees of skill—from the accomplished typist assistant who can perform the above-mentioned feat, to the plodding learner puzzling over the keys like a six-year-old pianist. Six weeks is the minimum period of apprenticeship, but a much longer time is needed to attain proficiency. Indeed, the typist should be a girl of education, and should enter into the spirit of the work copied. This is apparent from the scientific as well as amusing works submitted to our inspection. One-third of the MSS. printed are medical, many are polemical, most are abbreviated or written illegibly, and some have quotations even from the Greek and Latin. It is curious sometimes to compare the copy with the original; and one admires the patience and skill of the transcribers, or transprinters (which is it?), and understands that success in this art, as in every other, depends on perseverance and intelligence. The demand for type-writers increases, and several ladies, trained by Mrs. Marshall, are established in London as well as in Liverpool, Oxford, and Cambridge.

Although our young friends look happy, seated in a comparatively easy position at their key-boards, they rejoice at the tea-hour, and we rejoice with them at sight of the kettle on the hearth and the cups and saucers. Respite from work! how good it is! and how pleasant the flow of talk of the released prisoners! They say they like their work, which is more easily done by young than by old and stiffened hands; but anxiety to live by it is tolerably apparent. Surveying the bright young faces, in a pretty room adorned by pictures, fans, and artistic workmanship, it is difficult to realise that each individual inmate will have to struggle for daily bread. We bid them God-speed, and partake of a cup of their good tea with Mrs. Marshall in her outer chamber. She tells us how that from thirty shillings to two pounds a week may be gained by expert typists and shorthand writers, but that they should have a knowledge of one or more foreign languages. She tells us, also, of the immense progress this profession has made since her office was opened in 1884.

As type writing and shorthand writing seem to go hand in hand, we may as well proceed to inspect another branch of female industry fostered by the Society for the Employment of Women. This Society was, we believe, the originator of classes for women in shorthand, and held a class at the office weekly, until the Metropolitan School for Shorthand was established. Hither they now send their girls for instruction, and hither we will wend our way through a maze of what it is the fashion to call "vehicular traffic." We certainly find ourselves in a maze of passages; and as to the flights of stone steps we have to mount to reach our goal, we can only say that strong muscles and plenty of breath are needed for the ascent. We make it with difficulty, and are thankful to arrive at an apartment where about thirty young women are receiving the first lessons in shorthand. A master specialist superintends the writing in the strange hieroglyphics used for the purpose. The room is singularly quiet, and great is the abstraction of the learners. But this is, so to say, the infant-school. Only from thirty to fifty words a minute are written here from dictation, and instruction is slow and gradual. The other two rooms devoted to women are more lively. From seventy to one hundred words a minute is the maximum of No. 2; while in No. 3 the rapidity of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty is obtainable. It is no wonder that speed certificates are given to such as can perform the amazing feat of taking down, from the lips of a speaker, one hundred and fifty words in sixty seconds! We are told that ladies are among the most successful pupils in this school of phonography, and they can either go through the whole course by spending the day at the work, or employ their spare time in it. There are special instructors in every department; and the inventor of phonography, Mr. Isaac Pitman, examines every student's work and grants certificates to proficients. They are always sure of lucrative employment when they obtain "speed certificates;" so in these days "slow and sure" is an obsolete proverb, and the fable of the "hare and the tortoise" a story of the past. Five guineas is the charge for a complete education in shorthand; less sums are paid according to the instruction given; and pupils may attend at any hour between ten a.m. and ten p.m. Every facility is afforded to the learner, and in this wilderness of a mansion three of the innumerable rooms are appropriated to the weaker sex—weaker, it is contended, only in strength of body, but not in strength of will!

No sooner have we seen them at their type and shorthand writing than we are invited by our friend, the indefatigable secretary, to inspect the wood-engraving office, in which women are employed, in the same building. Here we find half a dozen young ladies working at this interesting but difficult art.

To acquire it, they must be able to draw well, and much skill and neatness of hand are indispensable.

"It is nice work, but it is so long before one is paid for it!" say the girls rather despondently.

The fact is that in this, as in most other arts, proficients get the lion's share of the food. An artist will scarcely entrust his block to an unskilled engraver. Still, the really competent are rarely unemployed. But it is doubtless hard for the young to sit hour after hour bending over work that they fear may not be remunerative. It is easy to advise perseverance, but difficult to persevere. At the head of the class is one who has persevered, and makes a good income, and of her the others speak admiringly. Happily they are not envious, and look very cheerful under their difficulties; though cheerfulness is almost as hard to maintain as perseverance.

We can only glance at wood-carving, plan-tracing, hair-dressing, chromo-lithography, and other branches, to which pupils have been apprenticed by the Society of which we write, because Miss King invites us to see with our own eyes how the said pupils are articled by the committee she represents. Before we proceed to the Women's Printing Office, 21B, Great College Street, Westminster, we would advise our readers to peruse the report issued from Berners Street for the current year. This gratuitous counsel given, we proceed briskly on our way.

It is refreshing to pass through quiet Dean's Yard, and to reach a rural spot, where there is actually a flower-bed near the door, and greenery about the window. Miss King is expected, and we enter the small office. Here we are joined by the secretary, one of the ladies of the committee, the young girl and her mother. The indentures are duly read and signed, and a promising young maiden of fifteen is apprenticed for three years. The premium, paid by the Society, is five pounds, but after the first three months the juvenile compositor will earn 2s. 6d. a week, rising 6d. every three months during her apprenticeship. Naturally, when her apprenticeship has expired, she will compete with others for a fixed wage.

The workroom communicates with the office, and here nine women are occupied at their high desks as compositors. Some are young, some old hands, but all are busily engaged in setting up type. The machinery is managed by a man and two boys, employed exclusively for the purpose.

"I love my work when I can get it to do," says one of the compositors. "I have been at it twelve years, and can make a good living when employed. We are here from nine till half-past six. Some printers employ women, but not all."

There is still, it appears, a latent jealousy between the sexes in this trade, but doubtless that will disappear. Indeed, competition is so keen that people have not time for jealousy. Such good and careful work is done here that customers have expressed high approval of it; and all that is wanted to insure an enlarged sphere of labour in this particular branch of women's work is the confidence and support of the public. That oft-quoted authority, Mr. Ruskin, has expressed his approval of it.

"Branches of Women's Work!" Why, they spread everywhere. We return to our starting-point, the office in Berners Street, and find one nearly opposite. This bears for title "Decorative Art Studios," and owes its growth and strength to Mrs. Louisa Avant. On the ground floor is a dazzling display of painted glass écailline, terra-cotta, Renaissance tapestry, painted satin sachets and bags, miniatures, and various other specimens of decorative art. No less than two thousand of the sachets a fabulous number of the dainty bags, and a portion of the beautiful painted glass, are about to be sent to America. On the first floor we find painted screens from designs by the lady workers, tapestry, Rhodian curtains, and painted window-blinds. We are so fortunate as to be introduced to Miss Turck, the inventor of écailline and various "mediums"—not spiritualistic, but decorative.

Écailline is a fine lustrous enamel resembling tortoiseshell, and is applied at the back of ordinary glass; and the other "mediums" appear to be colours for painting on all sorts of fabrics, from linen to glass and china. These "mediums" are used in all the artistic work we contemplate with so much pleasure. We are allowed to glance at the workers, who are just now literally "working their fingers to the bone" to complete orders received; for this is a wholesale house. Lady artists and articled pupils, as well as young girls who may be styled artistic needlewomen, are all busy as bees. Among them are several apprenticed here by Miss King and her committee, and any number of really competent helpers may find remunerative occupation. But, in this as in all other industries, unskilled hands are worse than useless. All employed here are women, and the energetic ladies who have originated and who carry on the business may be called public benefactors.

We will end this sketch where we began it—at 22, Berners Street. Yesterday we had tea with Mrs. Marshall; to-day it is with Miss King and her friend and co-secretary Miss Lewin. After this refreshment we are regaled by more work. Looking over a few pages of well-kept ledgers and registers, etc., we are amazed at the multifarious situations found at this office for women. Here are a few of them just as they arise:—"Clerk, book-keeper, housekeeper for an institution, compositor, shorthand secretary for member of Parliament, two auditors, nursery governess, dressmaker, waitress, superintendent of science and art examinations for women, upholstress;" in short, every occupation under the sun. And the registry is free, while two testimonials are required for the respectability of the registered.

And here is a page of what is called "odd office work," for which over £170 has been paid during the year:—"Addressing envelopes, directory, copying specifications, petitions, appeals, streeting boroughs, alphabetical list of voters;" we look up from the page and inquire. Neither sectarianism nor political bias admitted here! We learn that lists of voters were prepared, boroughs streeted, and cards and addresses sent at the last election for the Conservative, Liberal, and Radical candidates! Ten thousand addresses left the office, for which five shillings per thousand was received. When we consider the work done, and learn that the average income of this Society is £335 a year, we have no hesitation in pleading for increased aid to enable it to enlarge its borders. Debt is an unknown disgrace here; therefore care must be taken to "help those who will help themselves." To this end girls are trained and apprenticed, technical education having been long the object of the committee. Thus during the last ten years 642 girls have been thoroughly trained, and most of them now occupy important and useful places in this business world. Many thousands have been helped to employment, and the office is seldom void of candidates for it.

At the moment, we are roused from the consideration of registers by an influx of young women. It is seven o'clock, and nearly a score of them come in by twos and threes to the book-keeping class, held from seven to eight-thirty on Mondays and Thursdays. While they settle, we are shown their neatly written books—copy-book, day-book, petty-cash, cash, invoices, ledger, and journal. We hope the reader will understand them better than the writer, who yet fully appreciates the obligation on the learners to write a clear round hand, and to keep their figures and delicately drawn lines of red and black ink in mathematical order. These learners come from all parts, and truly they must have their "daily bread" much at heart to journey hither from Brockley, Hornsey, Tufnell Park, Barnsbury, Plumstead, Peckham, and other places. They pay sixpence a week, but the Society pays the teacher, who has won, not only their certificate, but certificates for book-keeping and commercial correspondence from the Society of Arts, and herself holds a responsible position in a large firm. She gives out the, to us, difficult problems, which are taken down by her attentive pupils, all of whom hope to gain the Society's certificate after successful examination. Several hundreds of women, so certificated, are now maintaining themselves as book-keepers, which employment is one of the most prolific branches of the Berners Street ancestral tree. While these nightingales are sheltered beneath its leaves —in less poetical parlance, while our class of future book-keepers plod on towards perfection—we take our departure, praying that ever more and more success may attend the labours of those who thus devote themselves to the welfare of their fellow-creatures.

THE WRITINGS OF ST. JOHN.

BY THE VENERABLE ARTHUR GORE, M.A., ARCHDEACON OF MACCLESFIELD.

ST. JOHN is the last of the sacred writers. His earliest work was, probably, nearly contemporaneous with the Epistle to the Hebrews; his latest closes the Canon of Holy Scripture. In our day his writings have been subjected to severe scrutiny; but this has served to confirm their authenticity, and, as a consequence, their Divine authority. And we must always most thankfully remember that to establish the authority of St. John is to establish the very foundations of the Faith of Christ. His testimony to Jesus as the Christ, as the eternal and co-equal Son of the Father, is absolutely clear and certain. Indeed, in this we can perceive the reason for the assault now delivered. Grant that St. John's Gospel was written by John the son of Zebedee and you have contemporary proof, soberly given, of supernatural religion, of the exercise of miraculous powers, especially of the great miracle of the Resurrection—in a word, of the mission of God the Son into the world. These facts could be established without St. John, but, nevertheless, everyone will feel what strong confirmation St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, St. Paul, and even St. Peter receive, when one, nearest to our Lord, sets himself deliberately to establish the true Divinity and the true humanity of the Saviour of the world.

It is noteworthy that the difficulties felt in receiving the fourth Gospel are of this internal character. The external evidence is coherent and cogent. But the contents of the Gospel are hard to accept. If it had furnished no evidence of the supernatural, if it had made no claim of Divinity for Jesus the Christ, there is no likelihood that its authorship would have been questioned, at least by the persons who now challenge it. Nay, those who now doubt would have eagerly welcomed such incontrovertible proof that one so very near to the Founder of Christianity knew nothing of any supernatural element in the religion He founded. The doubters would then have been the Christian advocates. They would have been under strong temptation to argue as their opponents argue at present. Our dearest hopes rest upon the true Divinity of our Saviour. Suppose, then, that a document were put in our hands purporting to come from the beloved disciple, and yet written expressly to prove that our Lord was nothing more than an ordinary man—we should very probably be found striving might and main against the evidence. We must not be surprised, therefore, if men who have made up their minds beforehand that there can be no such thing as the supernatural, act in the same way towards the Gospel of the Divinity. We must not be angry with them. Only this: an impartial spectator would surely say, "All this heat of controversy is to no purpose; your energies are prompted by your interests, your wish is father to your thought. If the book were the opposite to what it is, your battle would go on just the same, only you would change sides in it. That is not the way to reason. The question really is, 'Is there adequate evidence that St. John wrote the book, whatever its contents be, or is there not?' Settle that, and then you are bound to accept or to reject it and its contents accordingly." Well, the reply is that the authorship was never questioned during eighteen centuries; that it was not impugned at the epochs of the Arian and the Socinian controversies, when our Lord's true Divinity was assaulted; that the evidence which can be produced now, in the nineteenth century, is fifty times as strong, both in volume and character, as that for any secular book in the world; that the motive of the present assault is obvious and avowed, and that, such as it is, it has not stood against, it has gone down before, the counterblasts of men like Bishop Lightfoot and Professors Salmon and Westcott.

It must not be thought, however, that all rests on the adequacy of the external evidence; in some respects the internal has greater force. For one thing, it appeals to us all. We are not all learned in the Fathers; we have not all the critical faculty of weighing evidence; but we are all learned in St. John; we have all read the Gospel; we all have the faculty of knowing, or, at any rate, of feeling, whether it reads like something written by an eyewitness, or by a man looking back, say one hundred and fifty years after, through a shining but not transparent mist which magnified into heroic proportions men and things moving in and beyond it. Do the figures loom large and ill-defined, or are they clear, unexaggerated, natural?

Let us realise the alternative. Our opponents ask us to believe that the Gospel was written in the latter half of the second century,* perhaps one hundred and forty years after its events, and one hundred years after the destruction of the Temple. Between-times, great and terrible things had happened. Jerusalem had perished by an awful destruction; and the Jewish nation, after unparalleled sufferings, had ceased to exist as a nation. But meanwhile the Christian community had grown in numbers and in knowledge. By this time it had—circulated very generally among its Churches—its New Testament, including even the Apocalypse, but, of course, not the fourth Gospel. Its knowledge of our Lord's life was drawn from and, as one may say, fixed by the first three. It had quite ceased to depend upon oral tradition. The Apostles and apostolic men were all gone, but they had left behind their sacred literature, the inspired books. After this interval, with this literature before him, someone writes the fourth Gospel. Who he is, no one has told us. He must have been a man of transcendent ability; a profound thinker on the things of God and man; and, at the same time, with a dramatic power more vivid and realistic than Scott, or even Shakespeare; for certainly no imaginative picture ever looked so like simple life as this. Intellectual giant and genius as the man was, he has left nothing behind him but this one wonderful book—nothing, not even his name. He wrote the Gospel; he put St. John's name upon it years after the death of the Apostle; he published it in a Church where the other Gospels were known and received, and publicly read; and his work, appearing then for the first time, took its place at once without the slightest controversy among the public documents, as having come down—through those years which knew it not — from the son of Zebedee! Truly, the credulity of incredulity is wonderful! On this hypothesis the creation of the Gospel by human genius would be the greatest miracle on record, were not the creation of the hypothesis itself a greater miracle still. Here, then, let internal evidence speak. Think of the Book. Are the incidents such as a fabricator would have chosen? Are they treated as a man would treat them, who could only look back hazily through the glorifying mist which supernaturalised every commonplace occurrence? The little lifelike touches, quite easy to a spectator, sure to start out vividly in the memories of old and loved associations: are these possible to an inventor or constructor of a "Life"? We may test the question where we will: the call of the disciples in the first chapter, the wedding at Cana, the interview at Sychar, the familiar acquaintance with and reference to the Temple and its ritual, the story of the raising of Lazarus; above all, the trial, the cross, the grave, the garden on the morning of the Resurrection: these appeal to everyone. The simplest, equally with the most learned, can pronounce a verdict: can determine between the uniform tradition of the Church and the conjecture of the nineteenth century: between the unknown and impalpable novelist (if I may use the word) and the disciple whom Jesus loved.

* The Bishop of Derry (Introduction to first Epistle of St. John, Speaker's Commentary) gives a résumé of Renan's theory, dating the Gospel earlier—125; and regarding it as the outcome rather of the "Ephesian School" of tradition than as the conception of one man, though doubtless compiled by one editor, and ultimately written by one writer.

What did St. John write? The Gospel, the three Epistles, and the Apocalypse. The Gospel and the first Epistle go together. They are plainly the work of the same hand. In these latter days, indeed, a minute criticism has sought to separate them, but it has carried no conviction to any unprejudiced mind. The motive for the attempt is plain, and weak as criticism of the kind commonly is, it becomes weaker much when it has an end to gain; and here, the end is obvious. The existence of the Epistle, side by side with the Gospel, makes the forgery theory more than doubly difficult.

In this relation, too, the second and third Epistles become important because, to speak paradoxically, they are unimportant. A pretender to St. John's name might have a motive strong enough to induce him to attempt to write the Gospel; suppose he succeeded, he might even be so foolish as to imperil his success by adding the first Epistle. But what man, in his senses, would go on to indite the minor Epistles? We can understand their being preserved simply and solely because they were prized and precious relics of so divine a man; otherwise they would have perished. We argue thus:—Because they have lived, they are St. John's; because they are his, they give us a glimpse of his style both in pen and thought; and because their style is the same as we everywhere recognise in the more important works, these also are his. Truly the Gospel and the Epistles stand together; each of them an indubitable witness for the authenticity of the others.

Can we say the same of the Apocalypse? Here, indeed, we might launch on a limitless ocean of controversy, did not the wholesome restrictions of space keep us in bounds. Alike in style! Nay, so contrasted are the styles of the Apocalypse and the Gospel, that any conclusion based on the contrast has been thought to carry enormous weight. It is curious to note how different these conclusions have been. After the Decian persecution, about the middle of the third century, some persons were inclined to derive Chiliastic or Millenarian doctrines of a very corrupting tendency from the Apocalypse. They were vigorously opposed by Dionysius, the Bishop of Alexandria, a good and fair-minded man. But in his zeal against the doctrines, he does not hesitate, although expressing a certain admiration and reverence for the book, and a belief that it contains deeper meaning than he can fathom, yet to question that St. John was the author; and his argument rests on the difference of style:—"I would not easily agree that this [John] was the Apostle, the son of Zebedee, the brother of James, who is the author of the Gospel and the General Epistle that bears his name. . . We may notice how the phraseology of the Gospel and the Epistle differs from the Apocalypse,"* and so on. His contention is:—The Apostle John certainly wrote the Gospel and Epistle, and therefore he could not have written the Apocalypse. In our day the line of argument is the same; but the conclusion is reversed. Our opponents are quite ready to assign the Book of the Revelation to the eagle-eyed seer. "No doubt," say they, "St. John wrote that; but then the same man could not have written the Gospel."

Now it is plain that arguments of this kind, "He never could have done so and so," are by no means demonstrative. Indeed, they are very precarious. They need sifting. We must be patient and set things in order, in true perspective, before we can assign them their proper weight and value.

Before coming to a decision in this instance, two considerations ask for careful attention. In the first place, the mental condition and the circumstances of the writer were widely different in the case of the Apocalypse and the Gospel. The seer of the Revelation was "in the Spirit," and beheld marvellous pageants, whether of heavenly splendour or of horrific terror, the description of which taxed the powers of language to the utmost. The Gospel, on the other hand, is a beautifully calm and deliberately thought-out survey of the Divine work of Christ. It is quite possible for one and the same mind to be subjected at different times to these contrasted influences, but it would be quite impossible for the same mind to treat such dissimilar subjects in the same style. We should expect, in fact, the very difference to which Dionysius points: the Gospel he describes as "most elegant in diction, in the argument, and the whole structure of the style." In the Apocalypse he finds "not very accurate Greek, barbarous idioms and solecisms." But these may, surely, be due in large measure to the stress and strain of the effort to speak of heavenly things in earthly words.

The other consideration to which we must pay regard is the question whether any long interval of time elapsed between the two compositions. Here we are met by a difficulty of no slight importance. At first, the question seems settled for us with absolute certainty. Irenæus, who in his youth often heard Polycarp speak about his master, John, and who was himself separated from the Apostle by not more than fifty years, writes explicitly: "If, however, it were necessary to proclaim his [Antichrist's] name openly at the present time, it would have been declared by him who saw the Revelation, for it is not long since it was seen, but almost in our times, at the close of Domitian's reign." Domitian died in the year 96. If we accept this statement, the date is fixed absolutely, and no important interval of time can have separated the two books. But then all circumstantial evidence exclaims loudly against such a conclusion, and circumstantial evidence is often more convincing than personal. A witness may be mistaken; circumstances, rightly before us, cannot. Irenæus, or Eusebius, who quotes him, or a copyist, may have written a wrong word; but an argument raising itself upon facts, and these independent of one another, is hard to overthrow. A few words from Professor Westcott will place the heads of the argument before our readers. "The Apocalypse is less developed both in thought and style, . . . to go back from the teaching of the Gospel to that of the Apocalypse . . . seems to involve a moral miracle which would introduce confusion into life. The Apocalypse is after the close of St. Paul's work, . . . shows a close connection with the Epistle to the Hebrews (2 Peter, Jude). And, on the other hand, it is before the destruction of Jerusalem. . . . The Gospel is the spiritual interpretation of the Apocalypse. The materials of the Gospel were treasured up, pondered, illuminated as time went on. . . . The study of the Synoptists, of the Apocalypse, and of the Gospel of St. John in succession enables us to see under what human conditions the full majesty of Christ was perceived and declared—not all at once, but step by step, and by the help of the old prophetic teaching." The learned professor's whole argument deserves attentive perusal, and it leaves little doubt on the mind. Its effect is to date the record of the great vision about the year 69, some quarter of a century before the Gospel. If some natural hesitation is felt in accepting this conclusion, because it happens to be the one arrived at also by M. Renan and by the school of Christian apologists (in the wrong sense) who give in to his view of prophecy, that hesitation will be at once dispelled by Professor Salmon in his observations on "The Date of the Apocalypse"; than which no finer piece of criticism ever pounded into dust the imaginative structures of modern unbelief.

We may now set down the probable history of St. John's compositions.

We know that he spent his later life in Ephesus, and the letters to the Seven Churches remind us of the patriarchal supervision which he exercised. The storm of persecution under Nero had scarcely subsided. Babylon the Great, the mother of abominations, was still drunk with the blood of the saints. Jerusalem was indeed standing, but the thunderclouds of doom were gathering round her. St. John's own soul was being weaned from all expectation of the restoring of the kingdom to Israel. Charged with the memory of his Lord's words, "Then shall there be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world," "And immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, . . . and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven," he had been seeking to pierce the gloom. He was mindful, too, of his own deep interest in the second Advent. Had not his Lord said, "If I will that he tarry till I come"? And the time seemed at hand. Peter had already glorified God by his death. Often must the prayer have been breathed, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Nor was he forgetful of the Old Testament prophecies which spake of the coming. Fourteen years after the former temple had perished, Ezekiel had seen, in vision, the heavenly minister measuring another temple, chamber by chamber, gate by gate, court by court; he had seen the land re-assigned to the tribes; he had witnessed the healing waters issuing from under the threshold of the house of God, and they became a great river of the water of life, and at the bank of the river were very many trees on the one side and on the other. "It shall bring forth new fruit according to his months, because their waters issued out of the sanctuary; and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine."* Daniel, too, had lived amidst the clash of mighty nations, and when the time of redemption drew on, visions had been granted to him, visions of appalling terror; he had seen the beast exceeding dreadful, with teeth of iron and nails of brass, making war with the saints, and prevailing against them until the Ancient of Days did sit, and behold one like unto the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven before the Ancient of Days, and to Him was given dominion and glory, and a kingdom which should not pass away, that all people, nations, and languages should serve Him.†

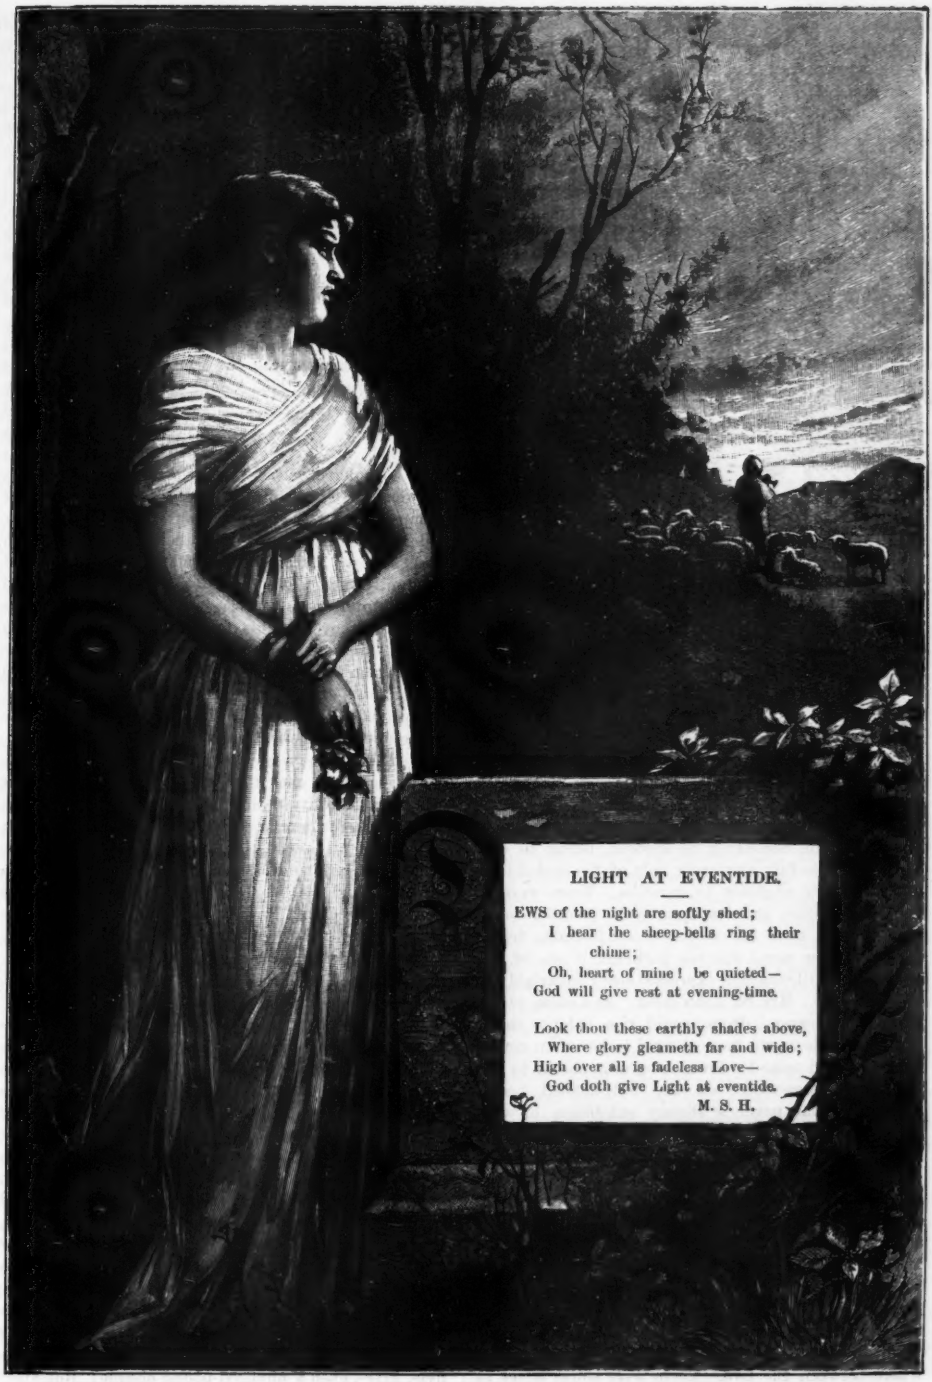
These ancient visions were gone, but they had promised what should not pass away. They asserted the abiding power of God and of His Christ. He it was who shook not the earth only, but also the heavens, and yet were these things which could not be shaken—a new heaven and a new earth, wherein should dwell righteousness. And now, the terrors, the shaking of heaven and earth, had come again, not without warning from the Lord. Should not the promise also be fulfilled? Should not the sign of the Son of Man be seen? The wave of tribulation had even reached St. John himself; he is an exile in the lonely isle of Patmos. There, on the Lord's Day, a diviner vision than any vouchsafed to ancient seer falls on his entranced sight. The old scenes are re-enacted; the heathen rage, the people imagine a vain thing, the kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord and against His Anointed. Hideous forms of beast and devil rend and slay; false prophets rise against the true, the synagogue of Satan against the synagogue of the Lord; men accept the brand of the beast who have not in their foreheads the seal of God. To the seer's eye it is but the King of kings making the wrath of man to praise Him. Watch the vision out—"Old things are passed away; behold, I make all things new." The new heavens and the new earth appear, the heavenly city is revealed and measured, the Lord God and the Lamb are her light; the river of life flows, the tree of life yields her fruit month by month, the leaves are for the healing of the nations; the troubles are past, and they have not harmed the saints: these have come out of the great tribulation, they have won the victory, they inherit all things. As the vision fades, the cry ascends again—"Even so come, come quickly, Lord Jesus."

As it was necessary that the disciples should descend from the mountain of Transfiguration that they might bring the heavenly glory nearer to the children of men, so must St. John return to and tarry upon earth, that he may reduce to order and expound the Vision, that he may elevate the material into the spiritual, that he may make the eternal present for all generations. Not amid the turmoil of conflict, not even with the pæan of victory, must the Canon close. Time was needed that the unrivalled experience of the Apostle—from the day when the Baptist pointed him to the Lamb of God to that in which he saw the Lamb alive for evermore before the Throne—might flood his soul with the true glory of God.



And time was given—a quarter of a century for thought and meditation, and prayer and teaching. Then the disciples gathered round the old man, and besought him to write what he had taught. "St. John last," writes Clement of Alexandria, "when he saw that the outward [bodily] facts had been set forth in the [existing] Gospels, impelled by his friends, [and] divinely moved by the Spirit, made a Spiritual Gospel." Ruggedness of thought and speech are gone. Though searching the deep things of God, all is simple, clear, calm; and the authority and certainty are those of one who knoweth that he saith true. The truth has unfolded itself upon his mind; the teaching of Christ has come out to him in the fulness of its meaning. To him, the old things are passed away, all things are become new. The heavens, once unveiled, can never more be closed. The Church in heaven and earth is One. God's people have already passed from death unto life; they have been born of water and of the Spirit; they have entered into the Kingdom; they drink of the Water of Life; they eat of the true Bread from heaven; they are already sons of God; they have an unction from the Holy One, and they know all things; they walk in the light of God; their fellowship is with the Father and the Son. "If a man love Me, he will keep My words: and My Father will love him, and We will come unto him and make Our abode with him." Eternal life is already theirs, because they know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He sent.

Thus, even now, the Apocalypse has its fulfilment: the new heavens and the new earth are revealed, and the Tabernacle of God is with men. The "Come, Lord Jesus," is answered. "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding that we may know Him that is true; and we are in Him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God and Eternal Life."

But the end is not yet. "I go to prepare a place for you." "I will come again and receive you unto Myself." "Beloved," comments the Apostle, "now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is."

Here is the undying hope: "He that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself even as He is pure."

LIGHT AT EVENTIDE.

EWS of the night are softly shed;
I hear the sheep-bells ring their chime;
Oh, heart of mine! be quieted—
God will give rest at evening-time.

Look thou these earthly shades above,
Where glory gleameth far and wide;
High over all is fadeless Love—
God doth give Light at eventide.

MISS HILARY'S SUITORS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A WILFUL YOUNG WOMAN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

"THURSDAY will be my daughter Hilary's birthday. This note from Miss Humphreys tells me she is not equal to a dinner, so people are invited to luncheon. Of course we are expected."

So somewhat pompously spake Mr. St. John across a remarkably untidy breakfast-table. An equally untidy wife responded from behind a murky, unpolished coffee-pot.

"You can go, Reginald; it is perfectly clear that I cannot."

"Why not, Maria?"

"Because, as you very well know, though no doubt you have forgotten, I have no dress fit to meet the people who will be there."

"My love, you would offend Miss Humphreys by stopping away!"

"I can't help it. It will be better than disgracing her by going shabby."

"Nonsense, Maria! you must find means of getting a dress."

"Well, Reginald, will you find money to pay for it?"

Then, no reply coming to this pertinent question, Mrs. St. John, according to custom, began to cry. She cried, this fair, slatternly lady of five-and-thirty, upon the very slightest provocation. Tears were to her what gesture and ejaculation are to other folks. If a servant gave her notice, or an intimate friend died, or a new novel was too pathetic, or one of her children fell ill, emotion expressed itself invariably in the same way: Mrs. St. John cried. In a calm, placid manner the crystal drops would rise, balance themselves, tremble on the hay-coloured lashes, then gently falling, would meander down the plump cheeks to lose themselves somewhere on the well-defined bodice below. It was never a stormy exhibition of woe. Mrs. St. John's nature scarcely furnished depths sufficient for storms. These mild, habitual showers were quite sufficient relief to her spirit through every phase of trouble, and when she had wept her quantum her natural easy-going calm would re-assert itself; she would clear up her countenance from distressful signs, and accept the situation, whatever it was, without the slightest effort to better it. This affecting habit gained Mrs. St. John, according to people's acquaintance with her, the character of "a sweet woman" or "a poor thing." The real individual hovered somewhere between the two. There were worse wives in the world than Mrs. St. John, though as a housemistress she could not easily be excelled for incompetence, but was as hopeless a muddler as ever entangled weekly accounts or neglected mending her children's stockings!

Such as she was, however, she fortunately suited Mr. St. John. A higher spirited woman such as Hilary's young mother had shown herself during their brief married life might have urged him to work—kept him at it, very likely, up to the present time—would have repudiated the gentlemanly do-nothing life he had enjoyed at Brainford for some dozen years, and insisted on his earning the wherewithal to help his children's future. This would have been remarkably disagreeable—repugnant to his constitution, mental and physical. That constitution of Mr. St. John's was made answerable for the wavering, and what some considered unsatisfactory, lines of his life. It had declared itself pronouncedly against the air of Hampstead and the regular hours of the War Office, and had sent him to enjoy, unemployed, the fresh Essex breezes at Brainford, "the very air to ward off his family enemy, gout"—so at least he had assured Miss Humphreys, who, suspecting other motives, was ineffably annoyed at his taking up residence within half a dozen miles of Abbotswick. Further, his constitution required unlimited hours of languid thought, out of which, being a man of some ability, he evolved beautiful theories for the remunerative employment of the million; occasionally a pamphlet, printed at his own cost and loss; inventions by the score, ingenious ones too, but all stopping short at that practicability which might have turned them into money, for here his constitution stepped in again, forbidding all association with trade. "The St. Johns," he said, "never cared to go out of their own sphere;" and the St. Johns, he impressed upon the common herd of Brainford, were people of blue blood, though his own branch and generation were not overburdened with means.

His limited resources were a sad trial to poor Mr. St. John's constitution. "Coming of the stock I do," he would lament, "a small income is positively distressing;" but as he persistently shirked any sensible effort to increase it, it was an affliction (meaning some four hundred a year, mostly his wife's) which became a permanent one; though Mrs. St. John, who among her mild excellences had profound belief in her husband's talents, never gave up expecting a sudden influx of wealth through the channel of one of Mr. St. John's clever schemes. Someone to whom he had written concerning his wonderful Smoke Preventer, or his Lift that was to supersede staircases for ever, would unexpectedly offer him an immense sum down for the patent, and send a sort of retaining fee perhaps with the first communication. The credulous lady always examined the outside of her husband's letters with deep interest. Might not one contain a five-, fifty-, even a hundred-pound cheque? But, alas! no such small Golconda had repaid her yet. In their stead, unpaid bills had a habit of intruding themselves by post, and a sheaf of these unwelcome reminders was lying among crumbs and egg-shells and coffee-stains on this very mid-September morning. Therefore did Mrs. St. John see an infinitesimally small chance of getting properly clad to Abbotswick for Hilary's birthday, and therefore did she weep.

Thoroughly accustomed to these lachrymose episodes, Mr. St. John attempted no consolation, but his thoughts revolving round the fact that it would look awkward for him to appear at the festivity without his wife, he fell back on a device which had often before now got him out of an uncomfortable corner.

"It would reflect upon Hilary for you to absent yourself upon such paltry grounds, my love. She would be mortified when she came to know about it. She would far rather pay the few pounds your costume would require than permit you to stop away. I shall take upon myself to order you something from Corder's; and if the worst comes to the worst, I can but—er—h'm—consult my dear daughter about the payment."

Mr. St. John pushed away the pile of bills (a sadly overdue one from the long-suffering Corder among them), and walked off with the serenely magnificent air he always wore when alluding to this "dear daughter," and the depths of her purse present or future. The worth of that purse had been steadily increasing ever since he came to Brainford: in plain truth, it had considerably guided his constitution in selecting that locality for a home, and once there, he used it as much as he could venture to his own advantage.

A legacy of some few thousands he had naturally expected for his child when the rich Miss Humphreys had descended on his widower's quarters, near nineteen years before, and relieved him of the baby with whom he knew not what on earth to do. "I will bring up poor Helen's child, and educate her, and leave her a suitable provision," the middle-aged benefactress promised; and on the strength of this he had willingly agreed to leave the little mortal in her distant kinswoman's hands, maintaining over it no more supervision than was afforded by a quarterly visit of one day and night while he still kept his employment in London. But when it became clear to him that his youthful daughter was being brought up as luxuriously as a little princess, and that the mistress of Abbotswick (a pleasant estate entirely in its owner's control) thought the best of everything scarce good enough for her petted protégée, then Mr. St. John's expectations enlarged amazingly. Although re-married to an affable little blonde doll, and the father of other children, his paternal feelings began to draw him strongly towards Hilary—so strongly that he threw over the office, conveyed himself and his household to the nearest town to Abbotswick, and disgusted Miss Humphreys intensely by appearing there one fine day, clasping Hilary to his broad bosom, assuring them he could not endure to be so distant from his ever dear Helen's child, and for her sake, therefore, had made this startling move.

Miss Humphreys met this outburst of sentiment with business-like coolness.

"My dear sir," said she, when the little girl, who had been crumpled and caressed till she grew impatient ("her own darling mother's liveliness," murmured the fond father), had been trotted off to the nursery, "My dear sir, if you long for Hilary so much, perhaps you had better have her for good and all. No?"—as this proposal was hastily declined,—"Then, if you please, she remains on the old footing: under my management, and no one else's. Of course she can see you all now and then. Once a month will be sufficient, in my opinion; but don't think there's to be constant running backwards and forwards between the houses. I can't allow that, so let us understand one another distinctly."

Miss Humphreys had never liked her second cousin Helen's choice, and was not a woman to conceal her opinion. Mr. St. John felt she was a trifle rough on him now, and was somewhat chagrined. But it would be obviously so unwise to offend the old autocrat that he accepted her conditions with the best grace he could, and made no attempt to infringe her arbitrary rules; for the time was coming assuredly, if slowly, when he would be requited for this forbearance. Miss Humphreys was thirty years his senior, if she was a day. When his dear daughter reigned at Abbotswick—as it was clear to himself and all the world she would do some day—then Mr. St. John saw himself invested with what was delightful to anticipate. Hilary would undoubtedly double his income—make it a thousand, probably. He would become adviser, manager, controller of the young heiress's possessions—no one fitter for that office than her own father! In prospect he relished the position mightily, and though he had just enough discretion not to brag of it openly, Mr. St. John permitted himself hints in various directions, which purchased for him somewhat higher status in Brainford than he could otherwise have held. His "fine old relative at Abbotswick"; his "dearest daughter whom he had partially resigned as an infant, having no right to keep her back from the enormous advantages offered to her;" these gained him some little prestige in the shifting military society at Brainford; got him invitations to mess, gave him grounds for holding his head high at the select club to which (by the use of the same lever) he gained an entrée, and primed him with lofty patronage towards tradespeople, who willingly gave long credit to a gentleman through whom by-and-by they might secure the custom of the Abbotswick household. Thus using these social props with more freedom as he saw how Hilary took firmer root year by year in Miss Humphreys' regard, Mr. St. John lived contentedly about a twelvemonth's income in arrears, and if a small shopkeeper pressed inconveniently for settlement, or any other need for cash arose, the depression which overcame his constitution at such calls would invariably communicate itself to his manner the next time his dearest Hilary visited Park Villa, and Hilary, being as free-handed as sunshine, would forthwith restore "poor papa" to cheerfulness, even though that entailed a scolding from Aunt Phil for coming to an end of her handsome quarterly allowance in six weeks!

In readiness for important Miss Hilary's visit to her father's home, Park Villa would be made to look its smartest. Mrs. St. John would have all the buttons on her dress, and her hair neat, which it rarely was at other times: the fair braids having a habit of hanging down unfastened like tufts of tow. The two elder boys wore their Sunday suits, and behaved themselves respectfully towards their step-sister, who, their father constantly dinned into them, could make men of them if she liked; the little twin girls and a brother of eight—the family baby—waited upon her assiduously, quite sure that chocolates or new sixpences would reward them before her departure. The servant always curtseyed when she opened the door to Miss St. John, and a youthful daily drudge peeped awestruck from the back to see the grand young lady go away in a carriage or "on a hoss."

So Hilary-worship was a growing form of idolatry at Park Villa, and never did Mr. St. John feel more serenely sure of the base it rested on than when, that September morning, he stepped down to Corder's, silk-mercer and draper, and condescendingly ordered a few of the best brocades to be sent up for Mrs. St. John to select from. "They were going to Abbotswick next week, on a festive occasion—his dear daughter Miss Hilary St. John's birthday. The principal county families would be there to keep it."

Mr. Corder thought, with a pang, of an eighteen months' account still running. But of course there was no risk with such a close connection with the rich Miss Humphreys—the father of the heiress. So the order was executed—Mrs. St. John furnished with a birthday robe; and Mr. St. John felt the expenditure so justifiable that he did not scruple to mention it casually to some dozen friends in the course of the day.

"She sat in dreamy thought."—p. 125.

CHAPTER V.

On her birthday morning, Hilary came down blithe as a lark. Aunt Phil would not appear yet awhile. Her toilet was a lengthy mystery, carried on under the security of bolted doors. There was a whisper in the house that some of the mistress's silvery curls—which added so much to her striking appearance—were hers by purchase, not by growth. But Joyce was discreetly mute on this topic, and Hilary never enlightened thereon.

To-day she sallied forth for her free hour after breakfast, singing as she strolled about the park-like meadows that stretched some half-mile north and south of the house. Right and left of the Abbotswick hall door ran gravelled drives, one opening on the Brainford road, the other on the broad lane that led to Mosswick and profound country depths. In the thatched lodge by the town road dwelt Pullen; some of his juvenile brood always ready to admit carriages. Three of his bairns were making ostentatious bobs to Hilary as she strolled by this morning, and Mrs. Pullen, who had formerly had the honour of waiting on Hilary's upper nurse, hurried out from the wash-tub to curtsey greetings, and "humbly wish her many happy 'turns of the day."

Hilary smilingly accepted the homage as a matter of course, only just halting to say, "Pullen will bring your dinner down from the house to-day: it shall not be forgotten." And then she went her way, unnoting the woman's disappointed look, unhearing her bit of soliloquy—

"I'd sooner she'd give me a bit of talk, kind like, than any dinner, that I would. But Miss Hilary's getting the very moral of the old missis; the more's the pity!"

Unwitting of this criticism, Hilary strayed towards a cluster of beech trees, where she had a favourite seat—a combination of hillock, gnarled root, and moss. Under the thick boughs, scarcely touched yet with September gold, she sat in dreamy thought, her hands clasped round about her knees. The autumn morning was lovely: just one of those when summer makes believe it has no thought of going. Happy little white-breasted swallows were flashing through the soft upper air. An old squirrel was instructing a young one among the branches in the art of opening beech-nuts. Some handsome pheasants stepped daintily along, fully aware that no murderous guns ever scared them out of their wits in this agreeable woman-ruled domain.

Some years before, Mr. St. John had weakly yielded to a passing whim of ostentation. He had invited three or four young officers to look through his relative's covers at Abbotswick, without due licence from the lady first. Miss Humphreys austerely permitted the one day's sport, never opened her lips to Mr. St. John for six succeeding months, and, as a sure way of preventing such another liberty, gave her tenants leave to look after the game themselves, paid off her keepers, and preserved no more.

Hilary looked lazily forth over the goodly stretch of property, and if fancy wafted her to the far-off future, when all should be her own, who shall wonder? Inference, if not positive proclamation, had marked her the young heiress ever since she could remember. Power in prospective is amazingly sweet to young nineteen. Hilary's imagination took flight quick and changeful, as birds upon the wing. Would she some day, somehow, be on the full tide of a London season? Captain Cavenham's sisters had talked to her of its fascinations till she had even ventured upon sounding Miss Humphreys about it; but her suggestion had been met with stony indifference, and the bright vision went out in darkness. But some fine day!——

Ah, and papa too! poor papa, who, somehow, never got on with Aunt Phil, and yet was so exceedingly clever! Often he said he could make tens of thousands if he had capital to spend as he wished. But Miss Humphreys turned a deaf ear to these hints. She would not lend what might be the making of him; still, that could be righted—some day! Papa was so fond of his daughter, he was always wishing they two were in one home. Well, there might come a time when he could be here with her—here, perhaps—and then would she not make up to him for all these years of uncongenial economy?

Economy! Odious virtue! down went the corners of Hilary's pretty mouth. Instinctively she glanced along the chestnuts from house-front to St. Michael's Church, the shaky edifice which the obstinate man in charge would not suffer to tumble about as Aunt Phil desired. He had to be economical too. What a combination of disagreeables! Would he be here when—well, by-and-by? Then she should have to say to him, "As lady of the manor, I cannot allow my clergyman to vegetate on such an income. I have ordered your stipend to be doubled." Hilary laughed to herself, and then blushed. She knew exactly what that man would say—for never a farthing would he be beholden to her. For all his gentle, friendly ways with parish people, he was a-bom-i-nably proud! Then, she must help him somehow else; find him a well-dowered wife, perhaps, as Aunt Phil was always wanting. But every young woman who presented herself to Hilary's mind was rapidly dismissed, wanting in some important particular; and before Mr. Stafford's thoughtful young patroness had lighted on a suitable helpmate for him, the white curtains of Miss Humphreys' window were drawn aside—signal that dressing was over—and Hilary jumped up to run indoors and meet Aunt Phil's birthday salutation.

"Well, child, so you're nineteen, and I'm not to make a baby of you any longer," said she, standing erect in gala dress of grey satin, and presenting her cheek to be kissed. "Are you prepared to be prudent and staid, and everything that everyone expects, eh?"

"I don't care a bit about 'everyone,'" answered Hilary gaily, "if I can manage to be what you expect, Aunt Phil; and I think I can easily do that."

"Humph!" grunted the elder lady, eying this confident young person rather oddly: "remains to be proved, my dear, remains to be proved. Come, now, are you wondering what I've got for you to-day?"

Hilary hesitated. Then said she frankly—

"Yes, Aunt Phil, I am."

"Good girl," said Miss Humphreys, with an approving nod; "tell truth and shame—someone we won't talk about! Well, I've nothing for you but this"—drawing from her hand an amethyst ring, least valuable of the ornaments she always wore—"and this you are to keep and wear, and recollect what I tell you about it. I might have married the man who gave it to me, but we jangled over money. Money; remember, I'm not sure I should not have been a happier woman, and perhaps a better, if I'd not been always rich. Don't forget that, Hilary. Run off with your ring, child; I must save our conversation for our company. This isn't going to be one of my best days."

This signified Miss Humphreys was somewhat out of sorts, either in body or mind, but unless voluntarily more explicit, Hilary knew well she resented all inquiries, so she went obediently off to busy herself among the drawing-room flowers, leaving her kinswoman to nurse her strength for their luncheon guests.

Miss Humphreys, however, was very fidgety that day. An era long expected is not always satisfactory. This nineteenth birthday had been talked of from afar. From scores of hints, it had seemed to her household, to Hilary, and Hilary's father, that it would be a formal recognition of the young heiress, an introduction of her to the county people nigh who called at Abbotswick some twice a year, perhaps, but had many of them hardly yet seen Miss St. John.

Something like this Miss Humphreys had once intended, but had now changed her mind. Why, it would have taken a brave person to ask. The day once come, she seemed herself hardly content with her own arrangements, and restless over every detail. She must needs inspect the luncheon table, find fault with the Wedgwood service being used, then scold when she found it replaced by something commoner. "You ought to know I wish Miss Hilary to have the best of everything, whether she appreciates the old-fashioned crockery or no," cried this unpleasable mistress; so her unfortunate domestics had altogether a bad time of it, and Miss Humphreys was in far from a complacent mood when the first of her guests, the St. Johns, arrived.

They drove up in a Brainford "fly," feeling themselves, through Hilary, of much importance. The gentleman entered with his most ingratiating air—his wife in a very smart costume. Miss Humphreys eyed them both disfavouringly.

"I'm afraid," said she to Mr. St. John, when he had left off embracing his daughter, and was looking rather ruefully round the room, "you expected a large party. Only a few are coming. Mrs. St. John need not have—well, bought a new gown for this."

"Oh, don't mention it," said the gentleman, with a determined smile. "Dearest Hilary and yourself would have been enough for us—wouldn't they, Maria? Though I had—er—fancied——"

"Oh, don't fancy anything about me," said the old lady drily. "I'm like a kite: change about with currents that you people who stare up at me don't feel; and I'm afraid," with a malicious chuckle and another glance at the offending ruby-coloured robe, "the tail of my kite thereby gets confused."

"The—the tail, dear Miss Humphreys?"

"Yes, to be sure," sharply; "meaning all you who come sailing after me. You get in a muddle with my twists and turns; but, however, you must get out as well as you can."

"Meaning we must pay for that new gown without her help," thought Mr. St. John, walking off much snubbed; but he soothed himself by gazing from the window, and settling what alterations he should suggest to Hilary when this erratic high-flying kite had sunk to earth for good and all, and another—part, so to speak of himself—soared aloft in her stead.

The Dasents, people from the Heath at Mosswick, came next. Hilary had to leave her stepmother—who was unaffectedly afraid of Miss Humphreys, and had edged off to a remote corner—and be introduced to a singularly beautiful young woman, ten years, perhaps, her senior, and her tall husband—chief friend of Mr. Stafford in those parts. The curate followed, and was for joining the Dasents as soon as he had shaken hands, but Miss Humphreys stopped him.

"To be sure you've a compliment for Hilary's birthday, my good sir! Aren't you going to wish her happiness, and so forth?"

He halted a moment, embarrassed.

"Please don't try to extort good wishes for me, Aunt Phil," said Hilary, reddening.

Another expression swept over his features, not easily concealed, for he was close-shaven, and he bent towards her half-offended face—

"May all your years be as glad as I wish them for you," he said quietly; then passed on to Mr. Hugh Dasent.

Hilary's nerves vibrated curiously. Her defiant air melted away. Sylvia Dasent, who had learnt vivid sympathy through much sorrow, saw the swift change, and by intuition suspected suddenly a hitherto sealed chapter in their curate friend's life. She was sorry when her own relatives, the Cavenhams, appeared; and the young man pouring out a stream of ready compliments, Miss St. John responded gaily, her softer mood suffering total eclipse.

A wealthy rural clericus and his deaf wife followed; then the hostess's trusty friend and family lawyer, Mr. Milroy, a genial, grey-haired man, for whom all had a welcome. With him was the only stranger invited to this gathering, the son of a former partner in Mr. Milroy's firm, who, having finished his articles elsewhere, was now on probation at Brainford (and on inspection at Abbotswick), prior to possibly standing there professionally in his father's shoes. This Mr. Bevis, a carefully dressed young man, with observant light eyes, and an earnest desire to appear at ease in society to which he was scarcely accustomed, completed the party, and luncheon was duly announced.

But the banquet was not successful.

Mr. St. John was aggrieved at the onset. Instead of being waved with dignity to the foot of the table, which he considered his due, Miss Humphreys nodded

Mr. Milroy to that post, while he sat sulkily next the rich rector's wife, who did not even know he was Hilary's father.

Mrs. St. John was made miserable early in the meal by a salad capsizing down her dress. A few crystal drops, tribute to this calamity, had to be smuggled away before she could swallow a morsel. Then Captain Cavenham was too pronounced in his devotion to the hour's heroine, and between what he whispered and what he implied, kept calling up blushes such as exasperated another man opposite all the more because he knew himself such an egregious ass for noticing them at all. Mr. Milroy was cheery enough; Gertrude and Mary Cavenham were women of the world, who allowed no dulness near them; yet over all hung a sense of expectation, a waiting for some special reference to the day, and even Wilkins lingered with folded hands and benevolent expression by the plate-laden sideboard while the Abbotswick muscatels were being praised, expecting every minute that Mr. Milroy would order the old Burgundy round to a toast of "Miss Hilary the Heiress."

But Miss Humphreys was an unaccountable old lady. She gave the signal for withdrawing without a syllable on the subject, and bade her guests come out and see Bell's late asters, as though they were the uppermost interest of the occasion.

"I would rather hear you play than examine any flower in the world," said Captain Cavenham to Hilary as they passed by the drawing-room. "Gertrude," to his sister just behind them, "doesn't Miss St. John play Chopin? Isn't he the fellow I admire and you murder so?"

His sister laughed. George cared as much for music as for astronomy! But her brother was a second son who wanted providing for, so she answered amiably enough—

"How horribly uncomplimentary, sir!—Do gratify us, though, Miss St. John; I have noticed your music about when we have called, and long to hear you."

Then this obliging sister walked to the instrument, followed by her luncheon escort, Mr. Stafford, who, being dropped out of the conversation, walked to the window by himself. "This piece is charming," said Miss Cavenham. "Turn over the leaves, George;" and, with her back to the piano, she composed herself to listen.

With a touch as light as air, Hilary made the notes sing through the first quaint movement—one that was a simple foretaste of the passion in its later pages. Then, with some quick bass chords of questioning, she suddenly stopped.

"Charming! delightful!" murmured the Captain, rapturously.

"Delicious!" chimed in Miss Cavenham; "but surely that is not all?"

Hilary waited a few seconds. There was another person who had not said even, "Thank you." Certainly she had taken no notice of him since he had entered the room; but he was showing himself boorish, and should, therefore, not have another note. Having discovered that she somehow held the power to annoy this offender, Miss Hilary mischievously gloried in doing so.

"The rest is difficult," she cried, springing up, "and I always shirk difficult things, for I hate them. Let us go in the garden now;" and thither she led the way.

"Our performer maligns herself, does she not?" said Miss Cavenham condescendingly to Mr. Stafford as they went on.

"Likely as not," he answered; "Miss St. John is given to doing herself injustice."

Hilary heard him. She knew he meant rebuke. He was impertinent, and she would get away from him. But first chance offered the inexpressible pleasure of provoking him again. Mrs. Dasent met her on the lawn.

"I have been asking Miss Humphreys when she will spare you to us for a day, Miss St. John: a long, homely day with us and our children. We are leaving England before long, so will you come very soon?"

Hilary's eyes dilated with fun. Norris Stafford was close by, and she well knew he had a smile for every child who could toddle.

"With you, yes!" she cried. "With your children, oh no, no. As a rule, I quite abhor small boys and girls, and I'm invariably repellent to them. Please never ask me to the Heath till after their bedtime;" and shaking her head in pretended terror, she ran off to an arbour deep cut in thick yew, where sat Aunt Phil talking with Mr. Milroy. But the moment she had joined them was unpropitious to her fancy.

Miss Humphreys had chosen to unburden her mind of official grievances anent the curate. Every fault she could find with him she did, and Mr. Milroy was warmly defending the absent.

"If he would do as I order, I would give him double doles at Christmas to fritter away among his insatiable poor," said the old lady, who had been accused of caring more for her cattle than her cottagers; "but he won't, so I consider he robs his flock."

"Fifty times likelier to rob himself," retorted Mr. Milroy.

"And pray, what is your ground for such high opinion?"

"Why, simply everything I've ever seen of him. Our office, you know, had done the legal work of this living for forty years. We collect the income now, send Legh the share fixed on when he was allowed non-residence, and pass the rest on to Norris Stafford. That rest has not been up to his proper stipend for the last four quarters, but he won't have poor old Legh harassed about it. I don't think you half know what a thorough good fellow he is; asking your pardon, if he were more of a prig you'd think more of him. He may not make much hand at currying favour with you ladies, but the better I know him the better I like him, and upon my honour I'm sorry he seems bound to be poor all his life. I don't know a man alive who better deserves to be rich."

"Very—fine—indeed," said Miss Humphreys, nodding sagaciously. "There, Hilary! mind, after that, you treat the curate more respectfully."

"The less I have to treat him anyhow, the better I'm pleased," said the girl wilfully; "and, Aunt Phil, if you sit here longer you'll be catching cold."

XUM

"Ah! there's a sharpness in the wind that makes the sunshine dangerous, doesn't it, Miss Hilary?" said the lawyer, getting up.

"What put that in your head?" said Miss Humphreys crossly; then, without waiting for an answer, "See if coffee is ready, Hilary; I shall not move till I choose.—Well, Mr. Milroy, how do you and your partner that is to be get on?"

To this Mr. Milroy responded by limited praise of Mr. Bevis: he was "cautious, prudent, professional, made the most of his opportunities——"

"But you're not devoted to him, I can see," said the shrewd old woman; "neither am I, good sir; I don't like his eyes." And while they thus talked, the subject of their conversation was being marshalled about by Mr. St. John, who, with a stranger, and out of other folks' hearing, was in his element for the first time that day.

Abbotswick, its boundaries and its value, he dilated on importantly, sowing hints as to the cares which would devolve upon him "when his dear child yonder came in for the place." And attentive Mr. Bevis took time by the forelock, and strengthened his hold upon the agency by deferential politeness to the father of the coming owner. That charming young lady had vouchsafed him but scant notice to-day; when needed for business, he might have the pleasure of making her pay for this want of courtesy. Meanwhile her parent took the sensible young attorney's arm, and discoursed so confidentially with him that Mr. Bevis learnt what splendid schemes were born in Mr. St. John's fertile brain, wanting only capital to turn them into gold; and Mr. St. John found that this worthy young man had apparently so husbanded his own resources that he had a few hundreds open to eligible investment.

Talking of which, the cypress tree shadows grew longer on the lawn; chilliness rustled up on a western wind that scattered golden birch-leaves on the green, people gathered into the house, and adieux were being made.

The St. Johns rumbled off in their fly, the gentleman disgusted by not being pressed to stay to a family dinner. The Cavenhams' showy wagonette and greys, Mr. Milroy's tall dog-cart, and the Rector's brougham had rolled on their separate ways, and the Dasents were on the point of starting, their ponies fidgeting mightily while their master tucked rugs carefully round his wife, when Hilary hurried up, very rosy and rather shy, and perched herself on the low step by Sylvia Dasent.

"I want to speak only to you," she said, in a whisper that brought her face caressingly near her hearer. "Indeed, that was nothing but nonsense just now about—about your children. I was a goose, but I'm not quite so horrid as I said. You will let me come one day soon?"

"That you certainly shall," promised Madam Sylvia, her kind lips for an instant touching the warm young cheek; and as they drove off she told her husband, "Yonder pretty girl would be very fascinating if she were one shade less spoilt."

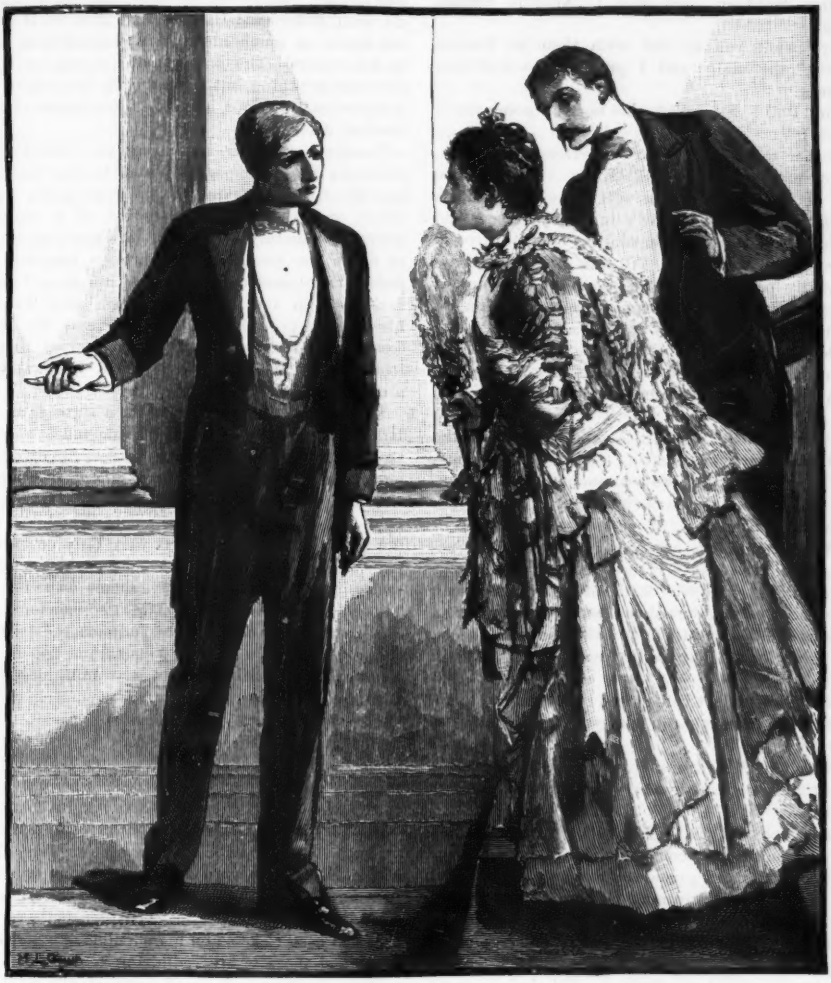
"George Cavenham won't mind that one shade, though," laughed Mr. Dasent; but his wife stopped him quite indignantly.

"George, indeed! Oh, you dear, stupid Hugh! Most positively he is not to have Hilary St. John!"

CHAPTER VI.

ALL guests departed, and Hilary went slowly back through the low-pillared hall towards the drawing-room; but at sound of voices within she halted by the half-open door. Aunt Phil had once more ensconced herself in the basket-chair which always seemed her domestic throne, and was thence haranguing Mr. Stafford on an offence lately discovered.

"Mr. Milroy let it out assuming that I knew it. You actually went to those wretched labourers' meeting! My good sir, do you understand what that commits you to? Do you want to be looked on as a demagogue—one of the mob? I never heard of such a thing in the whole course of my life; my parish clergyman to counsel rabble of that description; surely as one of US, Mr. Stafford—for you are a gentleman——"



The curate, who was standing for this lecture, made a droll little bow.

"Surely you will relieve me by pledging yourself never to attend these tag-rag-and-bobtail gatherings again!"

Miss Humphreys finished quite out of breath. Hilary stood listening for the answer to this tirade. Keeping his temper admirably, but resolute, as usual, with his testy old squiress, the curate quietly responded.

"I'm afraid I cannot promise that, Miss Humphreys. I went among our men as a sort of peaceable make-weight; perhaps in that capacity you will allow I was not wrong in being there. We won't go into politics, please; they part the best of friends, you know; but it's only honest for me to give notice that I can't be called a party man either way; you must not grudge my keeping free on these questions if I think our people's interest——"

"A fig for our people's interest!" broke in the old lady crossly; beyond a not illiberal amount of beef, beer, flannel, and Christmas-boxes, she refused to recognise "the people's" right to any interests at all. Hilary stole off laughing to herself at the tussle within, conscious of a certain glow of satisfaction that, storm as Aunt Phil might, Norris Stafford would not budge one iota of his ground. If he felt in the right, neither threats nor bribes stirred that man, though he was poor. "Is that your spiritual past-awh?" Captain Cavenham had said to her half an hour before. "Curate, isn't he, on about a quart-ah of a quart-ah of a thousand per annum? Po-ah, begg-ah!" and just then her glance lighted on the "po-ah beggah's" overcoat on the hall stand. It was old, much worn, and a button was nearly off, hanging only by a thread. Hilary looked at it shyly; how too bad of his housekeeper servant to neglect him so! Then she seized the offending garment, bore it off to the morning-room, had much trouble to find a needle and silk stout enough for such unusual purpose, but at last stitched the button safely on, and returned the coat to its place. Then she slipped off into the garden, and only went back to Aunt Phil when quite sure that Mr. Stafford had departed.

All that evening through, Miss Humphreys seemed weary with the unwonted effort of the day's entertainment. Once or twice she complained of chill, but flatly refused to acknowledge she had stayed in the garden a minute too long. For some time she sat thoughtfully, with Hilary's hand in hers, finding a good deal of fault with the girl's fingers, which, though pink and dimpled at the knuckles, she pointed out had not the symmetry of her own. "Still," she mused aloud, "you're almost a Humphreys, one way and another. You were named Hilary, you know, to please me: that faded little Holbein on the gallery was a Hilary—one of a generation that nearly lost their all under King Hal because they could not run with the hare and hunt with the hounds cleverly enough for those times. But the story says she was a brave soul, and bore misfortune full as well as she did prosperity: very likely it did her good. Her name was Hilary, too. Go and play me something." Then, when a floating, dreamy lied was ended, "Child, what do you think of Captain Cavenham?"

"He ad—ad—mires him—self ex—tre—ee—me—ly," sang Hilary, striking into another melody with covert amusement.

"And you admire him too?"

"Not very particu—lar—ly: except his most lovely mousta—a—a—ches," quavered out the girl, rippling over into laughter; and Miss Humphreys seemed satisfied.

"They want you to stay with them at Steeple Forncett," she said, "and I promised to send you this week."

"Aunt Phil! Send me! Are not you going too?"

"Not I."

"Neither shall I, then," very positively.

"You most certainly will, Hilary. I want to be alone. I intend you to ride over to-morrow. Maria and your luggage shall go over in the morning. And you shall come back on Tuesday."

This was extraordinary. Till now Miss Humphreys had hardly permitted Hilary one single day out of her sight. But on this incomprehensible occasion she cut short all expostulation, refused all remonstrance, accepted the girl's lingering good-night caress almost without return, and then relapsed into one of those brown studies in which she had been indulging so often of late.

This mood lasted with little intermission till the very hour Hilary was starting for the Cavenhams'. Then it relaxed, giving way to such alternate petulance and petting, that even at the last minute the visit was nigh discarded. When Hilary bade her good-bye, Miss Humphreys appeared absorbed in her accounts, and answered her most curtly, but as she mounted Daphne and was on the eve of starting, such a curiously anxious, left-alone face peered out from the short old-fashioned blinds of the morning-room, that Hilary sprang from her saddle and ran in again.

"Aunt Phil, I don't believe you really like me to go. I won't do it. Let me stop with you! You can't get on without me."

But though Miss Humphreys permitted herself a post-ultimate hug, she was not going to weakly alter her mind.

"Fudge! child, I shall be best without you. Go when you're bid, and come home when you're sent for," she said, her tone more gracious than her words, "and don't worry me with any more good-byes." Then, when the girl was really off, the last sound of Daphne's cantering quite lost, she finished a note interrupted by these farewells, sent it into Brainford by a groom, and retired to her favourite room and chair to await an answer.

When this arrived, Miss Humphreys was half-asleep. "As I haven't never seen her all these twenty years," said Wilkins to Joyce. "Either she's worritin' after Miss Hilary now she've sent her away, or else she's ill, mark me." The message brought in made her extremely angry.

"Mr. Milroy away to-night, and Mr. Bevis come instead!" she exclaimed fiercely, starting excitedly into wide wakefulness. "Impertinence of the young man! Of course I require my own solicitor for important business, not a boy of his description. Say, with my compliments, it's a pity he came. I hope I may see Mr. Milroy as early as convenient in the morning."

Wilkins trimmed this message into polite shape before delivery, but Mr. Bevis drove off affronted. He was not to be honoured by confidential communication, was not he? Very well, let them wait till he was the Co. with Milroy and Gibsone, and then see if he did not know as much about this cantankerous client as his seniors. The young man's sharp, small eyes glittered anything but agreeably as he turned from Abbotswick Hall door, and set off townward after his bootless drive.

Promptly, however, answering the second urgent summons Miss Humphreys posted to him that evening, Mr. Milroy appeared the following noon, and his client and he had an interview of a couple of hours, of a disturbing nature. Wilkins took on him to opine for going in to announce luncheon. He found "the mistress settin' as up as a Empress, drummin' on the table with them thin hands of hers like a prowoked old rabbit; and Mr. Milroy toasting hisself in front of the empty fireplace, lookin' about as pleased as if he'd just swallowed a dose of pi'sonous physic."

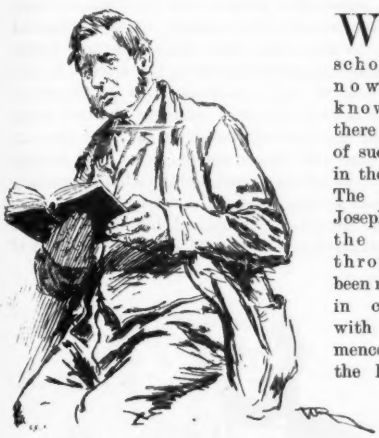
Safely away, however, from these signs of discord, Hilary was meanwhile being made much of at the Cavenhams', and found the process amusing and agreeable. General Cavenham, a not over-amiable old man usually, donned his mildest manners, and paid her innumerable compliments, which she could hardly be expected to know were only cover to an earnest desire for the settlement of his heretofore rather unruly son. The Cavenhams were not rich. This young heiress was a perfect godsend for George. His sisters sang his praises judiciously. "He was so popular in his regiment, so generous, and so affectionate. It was delightful to have him quartered at Brainford, whence he could often come to his home." He could be there pretty constantly while Hilary was a guest at Steeple Forncett, it appeared, and he made such excellent use of a long walk one day, properly accompanied by Gertrude, who was always in the rear collecting tinted leaves: and a longer ride with Mary in attendance, who never could quite keep up with the other two: and he went so well behaved beside Miss St. John to church on Sunday (where his presence was so uncommonly rare that the whole congregation understood its cause as distinctly as if the fact had been ticketed on his shoulders!): and was so more and more openly admiring and devoted, and withal as "proper" as if none of the wild tales anent him which Brainford whispered and was shocked at, were correct, that Hilary's instinct began to mistrust itself. Perhaps it had been foolish of her to prejudice Aunt Phil by laughing at this young man's moustaches! The dash of coquetry in her composition was flattered; her head just a trifle turned. As to the heart——!

Well, this visit, which she was enjoying immensely, loth though she had been to make it, was all too short for her to burden its moments by dissecting serious questions. These hours were for fun and frolic. Thinking would do for Abbotswick by-and-by. There was to be a reception at the Cavenhams' on Monday: first a dinner of unusual splendour and numbers, then a gathering of county neighbours, crême de la crême only! Hilary wrote to Aunt Phil a letter sparkling with anticipated pleasure; and the anticipations were more than realised.

The evening was charming. George Cavenham's pronounced attentions, the flattery of admiration from the men, the glamour of her first social success, mixed a deliciously intoxicating draught for Hilary. Her eyes were brilliant; her cheeks flushed with girlish triumph; her ears besieged by some soft speech of George Cavenham's, whispered as they sat together in a deep bay window, half curtained off from the throng of guests when a servant, threading his way to the couple, brought one of them an unexpected summons.

"If you please, could Mr. Stafford speak to Miss St. John immediately?"

"The parson!" ejaculated the young man; then, under his breath, "The nuisance!" He had been on the edge of proposal; it was an exasperating nuisance to have it deferred, even for half an hour. But Hilary quickly followed the servant. Her partner, making his way more slowly to the hall, found his prospects matrimonial—he would have given every penny he possessed if he had made them sure ten minutes ago—must assuredly be set aside some little while.



The Abbotswick carriage stood without. From Pullen on the box came startling tidings.

His mistress, Miss Humphreys, was dead, and the scared household had sent to fetch home Miss Hilary, the heiress!

OUR ADULT SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

BY A MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

THE "STOLID" SCHOLAR.

WHAT an "adult school" is, is now well known, for there are scores of such schools in the country. The name of Joseph Sturge, the philanthropist, has been mentioned in connection with the commencement of the largest of these schools, and a characteristic story is told of him. When a young man whom he could influence settled in Birmingham, he would ask him to "help to teach" in the adult school. Possibly the diffident youth would reply that he did not feel capable of teaching older men than himself. To that Sturge's reply was usually, "Canst thou make straight strokes?" and, on an affirmative answer, "Then thou canst teach some of our men who have not yet learnt how to do that." In the early days of the adult school movement, reading and writing were not as universally taught in this country as now they are, and the schools secured many scholars by being willing to teach upgrown men, who felt their deficiencies, the mysteries of reading and writing; and many a morning has seen long rows of old men painfully tracing at the desk "straight strokes, pot-hooks, and hangers." The knowledge furnished in the adult school did not terminate there: men who came to learn the rudiments of knowledge remained to read, to listen, to study, to benefit, and at times to pray. The schools are undenominational: men of many shades of belief are found therein; and one reason for their usefulness and acceptance has been the fact that the religious society which has largely fostered the movement "does not proselytise."

What have our adult schools done? Let us go north, and try to find an answer. It is a busy town: in the week, furnace and forge give a resonant sound; engineering works send out their hissing steam; and one of the textile trades gives employment to many men and girls. Sunday morning stillness shows itself in the closed shops, the idle works, and the quiet streets; but before the children begin to troop to morning Sunday-school, a number of men, from early manhood to old age, have quickly passed through the streets to their school. There are engine-drivers, iron-workers, labourers, gardeners, bricklayers—men of many trades, and some of none at all. Teachers—in this case, all Quakers—are there; and when half-past eight has arrived, the long and rather narrow general assembly-room of the school has perhaps eight-score persons in it, added to by laggards as the time passes. An opening hymn is sung—some schools have their own hymn-book, but we prefer the familiar "Sankey," because it is better known—and then for the bulk of the scholars there is writing at the desk. With us, each provides his copy-book, and the teacher, by himself or a deputy "writing-teacher," has previously set the text or other suitable copy-head; and it is an interesting sight to notice the few who write easily, the many who slowly trace their letters, and some of every age who are only learning the first strokes.

Meantime, there are secretaries of clubs and organisations busy at work. A librarian finds his task no light one, for most of the scholars take out books, and the work of exchange is effected in school hours, the books being of a religious, biographical, or similar character. A temperance society is worked in connection with the school, and it entails some labour; and a sick-club for the members demands more. These and other kindred inner organisations take up the time of the officials; and in due course the period for reading is arrived at. The classes, which have had loose lines of demarcation, now entirely separate—for one or two separate class-rooms are provided—and what may be called the special work of the adult school of to-day commences. There is no stereotyped order of lessons, but each teacher and class choose their own, and usually the chapters of a book in the Old or New Testament are taken on consecutive Sundays. After the reading of the verses, there is time for comment, discussion, criticism, the teacher leading with explanation; but the experienced teacher will guide rather than drag the conversation, for it should be such. Very interesting are the remarks of the adults, for their training, their work, their habits of thought, suggest remarks that in the ordinary Bible-class would not be made. Figurative expressions are taken literally, till explained. The "publican" of old is usually classed as a drink-seller; the good Samaritan has before to-day been described as "stingy," because of the smallness of the sum—judged by present pence—he left with the innkeeper; and on one occasion the grasp of the character of Solomon was unusually summed up—"He had a lot of wives," said a scholar. But allowing for these traits of directness of thought, there is a simplicity and straightforwardness of trust in the narrative: an attempt to picture the reality (though the colours on the mental palette are not always accurate) which gives pleasure to the beholder. Paul's life was once being read, and his famous description of "all the nations" as of "one blood" was aptly applied to a slave circular then much canvassed; whilst an additional remark from a cabinet-maker was "there was no renver on that man." The scholar is not so apt to seize on the outer husks—he tries to get to the kernel in his estimate.

Variation of position has been spoken of in regard to the scholar; it applies also to the teacher. In the northern school thus glanced at, the Parliamentary recess gives usually one member of the House of Commons to his class; and tradesmen and clerks, bankers and compositors, share in the work. It goes on from year to year; summer gives its excursion, winter its annual meeting; and the months bring with them the monthly meeting, whereat the attenders make the school appointments, the savings funds accounts are canvassed, and the whole machinery of the school is supervised. The school wins its way; it offers to the adult educational, biblical, and other advantages absolutely free; and the large numbers of men who rise early in the morning—often after a long day's work—is noticeable. This teacher lives two miles from the school, and must walk thereto; this scholar was engaged engine-driving till past midnight, and had his own breakfast to prepare before he came; but punctually both were there; and their cases are types of many others.

We are able to see some of the fruits of our labours in the adult school. We see the rudiments of learning acquired by some who were ignorant; we hear the acknowledgment that the sick-fund and the savings fund have been of use in enabling some of the members to "tide over" periods of illness or dull work; and we know that there are higher benefits. A "scampish" man has been made steady; a fuddler has become temperate; and at some of the meetings of religious bodies there have been acknowledgments that conviction and conversion have followed at times the Bible lessons given. In the early days of adult schools, the attenders were very often unable to read and write, and a not inconsiderable part of the time was taken up with the elementary education; now that ignorance is less common, more of the time is allotted to attempts — not intrusive, and never sectarian—to quicken the spiritual appreciation of the scholars, and to lead to the "Kindly Light."

There are diversities of character and discouragements in our adult school work. We have the stolid scholar; the argumentative, who persists in introducing doctrinal points, and who is usually logical, and often excitable; the political, who persists in leading up to party questions, and is in turn sat upon and encouraged by others; the diffident, who form a large portion of the score of members in our class; and the humble, teachable, happy soul, who brings quiet and content with him, and has the soft answer and the appropriate text to close the argument of the denominationalist. So the adult school work has mostly pleasant memories: of many an attempt to dig out the Truth by horny-handed men; of pleasant visits to their homes, after absence from school; of a death-bed where the teacher became the taught in the presence of the great shadow and the "lore," no longer "mystical," that that sunset of life brings to those who cherish hope humbly, and look for grace to find mercy. By the one religious body which may be said to have introduced the adult schools, more scholars are taught than there are members of that body of all ages. From these schools recruits to most Churches have been sent, and out from them many have gone, in the years, to "enter in through the gates into the City." Many denominations are now taking up that adult school work which offers so wide a field, and in the increased labourers therein, those of the past rejoice, and desire for their successors increased prosperity and deepened spirituality.

THE THRONE AND THE TEAR.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

"And He shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." New Version: "And He shall wipe away every tear from their eyes."—Rev. xxi. 4.

WE have here brought together, not in contrast, but in connection, something which all profess to make the most of, and something which, alas! so many make but little of — the "Throne of God" and "a human tear." From the Throne there proceeded a great voice—a great voice—a voice which could have shaken the universe itself: and its utterance had to do with a silent tear, and with what makes tears.

God himself—and mark that expression—God himself will be with them, and be their God, and He will wipe away every tear—mark that too—all tears, and every tear, from their eyes; and He will put an end to mourning and crying, and death and pain will be no more.

It was a great voice which St. John heard—not a still, small voice, such as the solitary prophet heard on Horeb, dispirited and crushed, and wishing only to die. To him there came such as he could bear—a still, small voice. But this was a great voice, and it comes direct from the Throne, with a great announcement of a decree and purpose of God, with great authority. It was a proclamation—not pleading with and comforting one despairing man, but offering healing and tear-staunching to hundreds, thousands, millions. The great voice was meant to penetrate, to echo through all the deepest, darkest caverns of human woe, to ring all down the ages, to roll from Patmos here, saying amongst us—amongst us to-day—God Himself shall wipe away every tear from their eyes.

Nor am I concerned as to whose this voice is—whether God Himself spake from the Throne, or Christ, as the Lamb slain, from out of the midst of the Throne, or an angel making proclamation by command. For our purpose it is all the same. What concerns us is not who speaks, but what is said and it is this, "God Himself shall wipe away every tear from their eyes." He shall wipe, not they shall be wiped; not, "an angel shall kiss them away, touching the scorching balls with lips light and cool as the falling dew"; not, a sunbeam shall cast his ray upon those swollen lids, and bring back the symmetry of their curves again; but, "God Himself" (as you see in the third verse) "shall wipe away every tear from their eyes."

Common as the word "wipe" is, it is a beautiful word here. It makes the whole thing so homelike, as though God said, "Do not be afraid of Me. I am willing to stoop to the humblest of your necessities. My Son wiped the disciples' feet; I will wipe My children's eyes."

And now mark this: This could not be done except at a great price. And what was that price? The fact that Jesus' tears were not wiped. When He agonised in Gethsemane, bearing our sins, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews tells us that He "called on God with strong crying and tears." Those tears were never wiped away. They were doubtless, as the Psalmist says, "put into God's bottle;" but wiped away they were not. An angel from heaven was sent to strengthen him, but the angel did not wipe away His tears. He must die temporally, that we should not die eternally; He must suffer pain, that there may be no more pain; He must weep, with eyes undried, that God might be free to wipe away every tear; He must cry with a loud voice, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" that way should be made for that great voice to come out of the Throne and proclaim what we have heard to-day—"God Himself shall wipe away every tear from their eyes." A great voice of misery must ascend from the cross, from earth to heaven, before the great voice of mercy could come forth from the Throne, from heaven to earth.

"Every tear!" I like that translation better than "all tears." Just as when it says, "Now, Jesus loved Martha and Mary and Lazarus," it is far better than if it said, "Now, Jesus loved the family at Bethany," for it tells us how each one individually had a place in His heart. So here—every tear—each tear, as it were, one by one, is noted, and is to be wiped away. For when it says "every" tear—i.e., "each" tear—does it not say that He Who reads the unwritten records of human woe (seeing often a volume in a tear) will enter into the particulars of human sorrow; into the people's sorrows one by one; into each one's grief as separate from all other people's grief; into the nerve-throbs of the heart or of the frame, which wrung the scalding, briny drops from—shall I say your eye, or rather from your very soul itself?

This is what I want. Coarse lumping of human woe, with the officialism of a workhouse, will not do for me. I know that nothing will do for my race, but that they should be treated one by one. I know that nothing will do for myself, my troubles, and my tears, but that they also should be treated one by one. The law of our individuality is strong upon us. We are one with all mankind, but we are also each man by himself. "The heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger intermeddleth not therewith."

There is a wealth of certainty for you, in that it is said "every tear" and "God himself"—God himself will wipe every one away. For though there are kind hearts who feel for us in many an earthly sorrow, and depression, and weeping time; and many kind hands to wipe away, and perhaps even loving lips to kiss away our tears, and say to us "Don't cry," —aye, and as they say it, so tender and sympathetic are our friends, that their own eyes fill as though they would reflect our tears and overflow into a weeping with them that weep—still there are many tears which we shed, or which we distil in our hearts but never shed, with which no friend can sympathise, because no friend can understand.

We are not meant in our individuality to be thoroughly understood by any fellow-creature, only by God.

> "Nor e'en the dearest heart, and next our own, > Knows half the reasons why we smile or sigh."

It is of supreme importance to me that it says "God Himself," and "every tear," otherwise I must be left alone with some sorrow; and forasmuch as this great voice speaks for eternity, how could I dwell in eternity with an abiding sorrow? The leaving of one tear unwiped would savour not of heaven but of hell, where there is weeping—"weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth."

The sorrows which have headed themselves up in tears, and said to tears, "Relieve me, express me, give me vent from the scorching prison of my heart," will be known no more. God will have ended them; the night will have passed, and day-dawn will have come. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." God will not say to tears, "Begone, dry up;" but He will wipe them away, and the ugly stain-marks of our suffering humanity will be gone, and our face will be like the flesh of a little child. It will not be in this case as in the first creation, when waters were divided from waters; or as in the crossing of the Jordan, when for a season that rushing river stood up as in a heap; but it shall be a drying up of those bitter waters for ever. As in the new creation there shall be no more sea, so for those who dwell therein shall there be no more tears.

But now, what about our present tears? I am poor, I am sorry, I am hurt, I am low, I am weary, unsettled, unsatisfied; I am yearning after it may be I know not what; is there nothing for me in hand? will not God do anything for me now? Yes! something, but not all. Now for the present it needs be that we are often in heaviness by reason of manifold temptations; this is earth and not heaven, and in earth's conditions we must needs live.

And here there are many tears, and many kinds of tears; but God knows them all, and according to the present dispensation in which we live, and for as long as we live in it, will He be merciful to us in our tears.

Some have soul tears, and some heart tears, and some body tears, if I may describe all those tears by the sources whence they come. And some of these tears are dry tears like internal hemorrhages; they are like those bleedings which no one sees—the sheet is white, with neither spot nor stain, but the one it covers is bleeding, bleeding fast to death. And these cry to me and say, "Prophesy not to us of the future alone, but tell us what will help us now; is the God who will do all this hereafter, unwilling to do anything for us now; must we weep on alone?"

Here is one who has soul tears of remorse, like Esau weeping after his birthright; here is one who has heart tears, like David weeping after the babe whose tiny life had fleeted from him—or the strong man, the beautiful young man Absalom, whose life was rent from him. Here is one who has lost the presence of the Lord; like her to whom He said "Woman, why weepest thou?" Here is one who mourns because he thinks all must remain dark, like this same John, who wept much because no one was found worthy to open the book; or one like his brother apostle Peter, who was faithless in the hour of trial, and received an unutterable look from Christ, and went out and wept bitterly. Here is the lone widow, here the orphan child; here is one looking dreamily into the fire seeing a face which it would have been well for her heart's peace if she had never seen—a place, which for her heart's peace it would have been well if she had never been at; here is a poor man with scarce a fire to look into, the cold, black, irresponsive bars lending no help to fancy, but grimly and glumly witnessing to his misery; here are those to whom sympathy is life, to whom no one cares to offer sympathy. Has this "God Himself" nothing for them, and for all such now? He has: but it is only the earnest of the inheritance. He tells you that He puts your tears into His bottle; He says, "You do not weep, you are not sad, unknown to Me. The time for all tear-drying is yet to come;" weep out your sorrows ON the bosom, and INTO the bosom of your God.

What God has for you now is sympathy—the bringing of the future as a mighty power into the present; so that as one of old endured, seeing Him that is invisible, we too, in the power of what is to come, are comforted in what we have to bear now—comforted, mind, not of man, or by man, but by this "God himself." The portion of God's people in trial is this—God himself is with them. You must not try to force the hand of God; you must not antedate His dispensations; you must not seek to project yourself out of the dispensation which now is, into one which is to come. He is spoken of as "The God of all comfort." He himself says, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." I take in the simile—I understand it, for long even after my own hairs were grey, and I have cried with pain, I would have laid my head on the old mother's lap, before all others, if I could only have had her back again. The wife is good, the child is good, the friend is good, but the mother at such a time seems somehow to be the best of all. Understand, then, what you are to have now—the sympathy, the comfort, the upholding of God Himself. You, if you be Christ's, are to have it as the world has it not, and cannot have it. You shall find Him, even here, wipe away many a tear, but not every tear. Some must dry upon your cheeks, and leave there their blurring marks. Some must often start afresh—it may be at the remembrance of sin, or loss; but the tear-marking God, who saw poor Hagar weeping, and said, "What aileth thee, Hagar? Fear not," and showed her a fountain of water; and who listened to Hannah when, in the bitterness of her soul, she prayed unto the Lord, and wept sore, sees and listens to you. Unquestionably, many a sorrow will He remove, many a tear will He dry, but not all yet; but for the tear which cannot yet be dried, there will be the same comfort as for the thorn which could not yet be removed: "My grace is sufficient for thee."

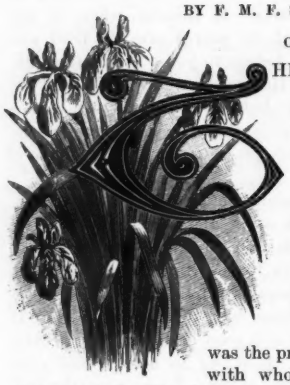
Have strong assurance of a good time coming. Be positively certain of it, and have the sustaining power of it. We can bear poverty, if we know that we shall soon come in for a fortune; and pain, if we know that we shall soon have relief; and thirst, if we know that we shall soon have drink; and absence, if we know that there will soon come presence. Smile through your tears. Look up to heaven, and your tearful eye will reflect a sun. Look away through the shower, and you shall see a bow.

Believe in the sympathy of the Throne—in its sympathy now. Have your thoughts of God, not frightful, but beautiful. I know that out of the Throne proceeded lightnings, and thunderings, and voices—awful thought for you who are not in Christ!—but I know, also, that from that same Throne there came forth a great voice, saying, "God himself shall wipe away every tear from their eyes." Your God is not kind to you because of weakness of sentiment, for the lightnings and thunderings and voices are there still (but not for you); for you in Christ it is a great voice, saying, "God himself shall wipe away every tear from their eyes."

Remember that tears with God in them are different from tears without God in them—those tears of human petulance and passion here, the weeping, and the wailing, and the gnashing of teeth hereafter. Honour your God by taking Him into your confidence, and let Him be the God of your tears as well as of your smiles; not only of your sunshine, but your cloud; not only of your hallelujahs, but of your sighs.

Never weep alone—always before God. When your eyes are full of tears, let the Spirit of God move over the face of those waters. Say with the Psalmist, "Hear the voice of my weeping." For Him, to hear will be to help. Ask Him not to hold His peace at your tears. Lone weeping is sore weeping—yea, very sore indeed.

Let the voice of the Throne be with you—a great voice. Hear it above the murmurings of discontent, the cries of despair, the whirlwinds of passion, the carpings of the infidel, and the gibes of the scoffer, and the honest sobs of your own pain or woe. It is meant to be louder than them all, and to comfort you here, and now.



It is with a great voice that God binds together the Throne and the tear, and says, "God himself shall wipe away every tear from their eyes."

IN THE VALLEY OF ACHOR.

A COMPLETE STORY IN THREE CHAPTERS.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

THE Valley of Achor is said in Scripture to be first "a place of trouble," and then "a door of hope," and such, in the experience of Arnold Lyle, was the wild, remote valley in the North of England which had been his home from infancy. It was the property of his father, with whom he lived in the substantial dwelling-house which belonged to the estate; but it was not a family inheritance. It had been bequeathed to Mr. Lyle when a young man, struggling to make his way in the world, by Mr. Penrhyn, the last proprietor, who had no near relations of his own. Mr. Lyle had married immediately on coming into possession of the place, but his young wife died soon after the birth of Arnold, their only child, and he himself gradually fell into bad health, and became finally a confirmed invalid. The father and son were devotedly attached to each other, and had never been separated, although Arnold had received an excellent education by means of tutors resident in the house so long as they were required. He was a thoughtful, high-principled young man, whose great wish had been to become a clergyman, but he felt that he could not adopt a profession which would have necessitated his leaving his father, to whom he was absolutely necessary. Mr. Lyle, a refined, intellectual man, was subject to fits of great depression of spirits, during which he could not endure to be left alone, though he shrank from all society save that of his son. Arnold had long been aware that there was some secret trouble of a serious nature which weighed upon his father's mind, and rendered him reserved and misanthropical; but he had failed utterly to gain any clue to the mystery. Some attempts which he had made in former years to induce Mr. Lyle to confide in him on that point, had so excited and irritated his father that he had been obliged to desist altogether from any allusion to the subject.

It was on a certain sunshiny morning in the early summer that the beautiful valley first became to Arnold Lyle in truth a place of trouble, more bitter and cruel than any pain he had ever known in his life before, though in one respect it had always been a source of anxiety and regret to him, inasmuch as it possessed no church or place of worship of any kind for its very considerable population. As Mr. Lyle was the sole proprietor of the land, Arnold felt that it was incumbent on them to make some provision for the spiritual wants of the people; but his father had always told him curtly that he had not means to do anything of the kind, since the income he derived from the valley only sufficed for their own maintenance. He affirmed that the most he could do was to give permission to missionary preachers to come from time to time, and hold open-air services on the hill-side.

Arnold always welcomed these rare opportunities of public worship with great delight, and on the morning of the day which was to witness the sudden destruction of all the peace and happiness of his former life, he told his father that he understood a new and eminent preacher was coming to the valley that day, and he was looking forward with much pleasure to hearing him.

"A new man?" said Mr. Lyle, who never attended these services himself. "Do you mean that you are not to have the same clergyman who has come once a year for a long time past?"

"No; he is ill, I believe. I hear that he is to be replaced to-day by an elderly man of some celebrity, who has been a missionary in various parts of the world."

"What is his name?" said Mr. Lyle quickly.

"I do not know—I forgot to ask; but I shall be sure to make his acquaintance this afternoon."

Mr. Lyle was silent for a moment; then he said, with a certain uneasiness visible in his manner, "Must you go to this meeting, Arnold?"

"Why, father, I would not miss it for the world! We really live here in a state of religious starvation, and I am too glad to seize any opportunity of being present at a service. It is more than a year since we have had a preacher in the valley. I mean to go early, too; for I hope to see Evelyn for a little while before the people assemble. She told me she would be there in very good time."

"Ah! that is an attraction I can better understand," said Mr. Lyle, with a smile. "When are you and she going to come to an understanding, Arnold? It is very evident that she fully returns your attachment."

"I think we understand each other perfectly well as it is," said Arnold, while his face brightened with a glow of happiness. "My Evelyn is too frank and noble a girl to wish even to leave me in ignorance of her feelings; but she always playfully keeps me back when I want to bring matters to a point, saying we can hardly be happier than we are, and we had better enjoy these golden days a little longer. Really, however, I know that it is because her feeble old aunt requires all her time and care for the present."

"Ah, well, she will not long be an obstacle in your way. Our doctor had been with her when he came here yesterday, and he told me the poor old lady could not last long. You are a fortunate fellow, Arnold, to win such a treasure as Evelyn Orme; and I can look forward to your marriage with perfect satisfaction, for she has let me see that she means to be a true daughter to me, and will never wish to separate us."

"There is no one like her in the whole world!" exclaimed Arnold enthusiastically. "She has but one fault in my eyes, and that is that she is richer than I am, with her fine estate and her grand old castle. I should like her to have nothing at all of her own, that I might give her all I possess. Better still, I should like to work for her, and earn her bread and mine."

"Nonsense, Arnold; you are talking senselessly," said Mr. Lyle angrily. "I have known what it is to work for my bread, and it is misery and wretchedness if those you love are dependent on you. I idolised your dear mother, as you know, but I could never have asked her to marry me if I had not had this good home to offer her, with a suitable provision for her comfort."

CHAPTER II.

A few hours later Arnold Lyle was walking with a quick, elastic step up the valley towards a wide grassy slope on the hill-side, where the people were already assembling to meet the preacher, many of them coming from a considerable distance. The young man was a pleasant picture to look upon, with his tall, well-knit form, and handsome features brightened at that moment by the light of joy which shone in his dark eyes as they fell on the fair face of Evelyn Orme. And it seemed, in truth, to himself as if he then had reached the very height of happiness and prosperity. He knew of no trouble, present or prospective, to mar his contentment, and the one love of his life was there by his side, blushing and smiling under his ardent gaze.

Miss Orme had driven to the spot in her low open carriage, drawn by a pair of fiery ponies, whom her little hands could scarce have held in, if a groom had not stood at their heads. She was still seated in it, talking to the preacher, who had just accepted her invitation to stay at her house till the following day; and as Arnold came up to greet her, she introduced him to the missionary, whom she had known before, saying, "I want you to come and meet Mr. Moore at dinner at my house this evening. You will do so, will you not?"

"Most gladly," he answered. "We might walk there together, after service; if that will suit you," he added, turning to Mr. Moore. "It will be a great pleasure to me to have such an opportunity of making acquaintance with you." He was somewhat surprised, as he spoke, to find the missionary's eyes fixed on him with a rather peculiar expression.

"I beg your pardon," said Mr. Moore; "did I hear right that your name is Lyle? Are you not the son of the"—he paused, then went on—"the proprietor of this valley?"

"Yes," replied Arnold. "I am sorry that my father is too great an invalid to be present with us this afternoon."

Mr. Moore said no more, but moved away to take his place on a moss-clad rock, from whence he was to address the people, and there was no time for any conversation to pass between Arnold and Evelyn before the service began—yet he was supremely happy as he stood by her side, for her sweet blue eyes had met his in a look which told him what he had known for some time, that all the love of her true, pure heart was his unchangeably. It was in truth the first strong affection of her life—for she had lost both her parents at an early age, and as the heiress of Castle Orme and the large estates surrounding it, she had been delivered over to the care of guardians and governesses, who had been in no sense calculated to draw out the strong feelings of which her ardent nature was capable. From the time—two years before—that her majority had made her independent, she had lived in her own home, with only an aged aunt to keep her company, already fast sinking into second childhood, but the attachment which had sprung up between herself and Arnold Lyle, who was some years her senior, had shed a golden light of promise over all her future, which filled her already with a happiness greater than any she had ever imagined in her brightest dreams.

Mr. Moore's address to the people, founded on the solemn question as to "what it shall profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul," was a most powerful and heart-stirring appeal, and no one present was more deeply impressed by it than Arnold Lyle. It touched him in some ways very closely, for the preacher spoke in strong terms of the reprehensible state of religious destitution in which the valley was left, and his words seemed to imply that some great wrong had been done to the widespread population who were thus neglected. The valley, after Mr. Lyle's death, would be Arnold's own inheritance, and he resolved to ask Mr. Moore's advice as to any possible plan in the future which might enable him to benefit the people, for he knew that while his father lived he had nothing in his power.

When the service was over, Arnold only waited to see Miss Orme drive away in her little carriage towards her home, after bidding him follow with Mr. Moore as quickly as he could, and then he eagerly joined the preacher for the five-mile walk which would bring them to her castle. He began at once to speak on the subject which had so long been a source of distress to him, and asked Mr. Moore if he could suggest any expedient for supplying the people of the valley with more frequent means of religious worship and instruction than they had hitherto possessed.

"It seems incumbent on my father to make some effort to remedy the evil, as he is the sole proprietor of the valley," he said; "but he is really powerless to do so, for he possesses nothing but the very moderate income which he derives from this land, along with the house in which we live, and these just suffice for our own wants, modest as they are."

Mr. Moore turned round and looked fixedly at Arnold, maintaining perfect silence for a few minutes while he scanned the young man's frank, noble countenance with searching eyes; then he placed his hand firmly on his shoulder.

"Arnold Lyle," he said, "I exonerate you from all blame in the cruel wrong which has desolated this valley, and starved the souls of the people for well nigh thirty years; I see that you are in complete ignorance of it."

"Of what wrong do you speak?" exclaimed Arnold, greatly startled by his solemn words.

"Of a deliberate robbery from God! Can there be a greater? I did not know that John Lyle had a son to whom an appeal could be made, as I have been for years absent in Africa; but now that Providence has brought you to my side, I feel that it is my plain duty to tell you all the truth. Are you willing to hear it—though it will cause you bitter pain?"

"Yes," said Arnold faintly, for his heart seemed to contract under a sudden terror of some dark evil impending over him. Mr. Moore passed his arm through that of the young man, and then spoke in slow, measured words, which smote on his ear like the strokes of a passing bell.

"Thirty years ago I came to hold a service in this valley, as I have done to-day, and spoke then as now with grief of the religious destitution of the people. Mr. Penrhyn, the last proprietor, was present, and was deeply moved. He knew that he had a fatal malady which would soon terminate his earthly existence. He took me home with him after the service was over, and told me that as he was childless, and had no near relation with any claim upon him, he had resolved to bequeath the whole of his property to the service of God; the land should be sold, and with the proceeds a church should be built and endowed, while his dwelling-house should be separately bequeathed to be the parsonage of a resident clergyman. He hoped that I would see these dispositions of his property duly carried out, and that I would either myself fill the incumbency, or appoint a proper person to do so. I highly applauded Mr. Penrhyn's resolution, and often thought afterwards with great satisfaction of the inestimable benefit which I hoped had been secured to the valley. It happened, however, that immediately after my interview with Mr. Penrhyn I had a sudden call to a mission in Africa, and I was absent for three years in a remote part of the Dark Continent, where I could have no communication at all with England. On my return at the end of that time, I found a letter awaiting me from Mr. Penryhn, written on his death-bed more than two years before. It stated that in my absence he had made over his property in trust to a young man to whom he had fully explained his purpose with regard to it, and who had undertaken to carry out his wishes to the letter. He was to sell the land, see the church built, and instal a suitable clergyman in the house destined for him. Mr. Penrhyn added that he had given to the young man in question, whose name was John Lyle, a paper of distinct directions, and a small sum of money for himself in compensation for any trouble which might be involved in the arrangements."

Mr. Moore paused and glanced at Arnold, who was walking with his head bent down, so that his face could not be seen.

"Go on!" he said, in a choked voice; and the preacher resumed, with great sadness in his tone—

"Immediately on the receipt of this letter from the good man who had already lain in his grave for two years and a half, I came to this valley. I found no church, no clergyman, but John Lyle, as sole proprietor, was living in the house which should have been the parsonage, with his beautiful young wife, who was then just expecting the birth of her firstborn child, and no one had the least suspicion that he had not rightly inherited the property from Mr. Penrhyn. I will not harrow your feelings by describing the scene which took place between your father and myself; he, a penniless young man, devotedly attached to the lovely girl whom he could not otherwise hope to marry, had succumbed to the temptation which offered him a home and a maintenance for her. He took possession of the valley and the house as his own, destroyed the paper of directions Mr. Penrhyn had given him, and remained the undisputed owner of the place, for no one save myself had known the purpose to which it was destined. I showed Mr. Lyle the letter I had received; I spoke to him in the strongest terms of the guilt he was binding on his soul by such a fraud; but all was in vain; he snatched the letter from my hands and flung it into the fire, declaring that in any case it constituted no legal proof. He asked me if I supposed that any power on earth could drive him to cast his young wife and her child from their home and give them up to destitution. He bade me go and leave him in peace. I went, shaking the dust from my feet on his threshold, and feeling——"

Mr. Moore stopped without finishing his sentence, but Arnold suddenly turning to him a face white as death, and contracted with agony, flung up his arms and exclaimed, "Feeling that the curse of God must rest on that house—a curse," he added hoarsely, "which can only be removed by an act of restitution that would bring ruin and anguish and humiliation on the father I love and revere; an act surely impossible for him—for me—while he lives."

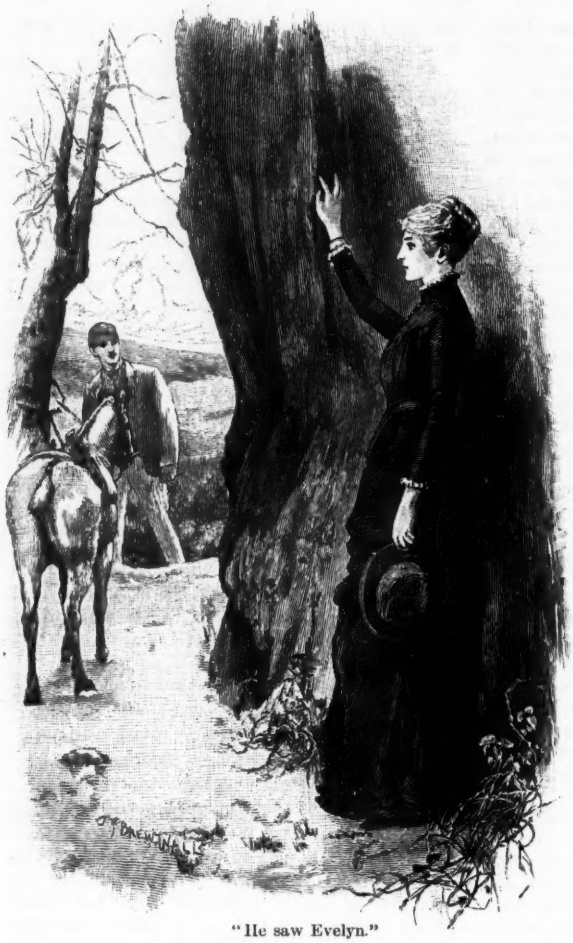
Then staggering like a man who had been almost knocked down by a sudden blow, Arnold turned aside and leant against a tree which stood near the path, with his face buried in his hands.

Mr. Moore looked at him with deep compassion, but remained by his side without speaking. After a time, the young man lifted his head, and turned to the preacher with quivering lips, and eyes full of a wild distress and perplexity.

"My brain is in a whirl," he said; "the terrible revelation you have made to me seems to have cast all the conditions of my existence, past and present, in ruins round me. I cannot analyse my position. I cannot think—I can only suffer. I must be alone to look the truth in the face. You must leave me, Mr. Moore, and go without me to Castle Orme. Tell Evelyn—Miss Orme—that a cruel, strange calamity has befallen me, and I have not courage to go to her house to-night."

"Mr. Lyle, I feel for you most deeply," said the preacher; "I know that I have been compelled to deal you an overwhelming blow; but I see that the only kindness I can show you now is to leave you to take counsel with the Divine Guide, who will not fail you in this dark hour."

"Dark indeed!" he said; "I know not from whence any light can come to me; but remember, Mr. Moore, I pledge myself to nothing—not even that I will tell my father I know his secret, much less that I will force him to restitution, which would make him a pauper. It might kill him in his present weak state. He may not have long to live."



Mr. Moore made no reply; then he moved away, saying gravely, "I will give your message to Miss Orme." And so they parted.

CHAPTER III.

Arnold Lyle was left alone in the valley, which had now in truth become to him a place of grievous trouble. Upright and honourable as he was, his conscience told him that there could be only one right way of dealing with that which had indeed been a robbery from God, as the preacher had said. He ought at once to insist on the restitution of the house and property to the sacred purpose for which they had alone been entrusted to his father, and refuse himself to remain any longer under that misappropriated roof, unless the surrender were made at once.

But from such a course he utterly shrank. He loved his father with a passionate affection — till Evelyn had roused an even deeper feeling, he had been his dearest upon earth. Could he first humiliate him to the very dust by telling him that his own son knew of his fraud, and then drag him out from his home to a condition of beggary and destitution, under which his feeble frame would surely sink very speedily? Arnold might try to support him, but he had no profession. He could but work as a day-labourer; and, for himself, the deepest anguish his broken life could ever know would be involved in such a cruel measure; for it would cost him Evelyn, the darling of his heart! He could never ask her to be the wife of a disgraced pauper.

For hours Arnold paced to and fro in the chill night air, torn by conflicting feelings; and then, lest his father should be alarmed at his absence, he went home to startle Mr. Lyle by his white face and wild, despairing eyes, merely saying he felt fatigued and unwell, and would go at once to bed. He shut himself into his room, there to pass a night of perfectly sleepless misery.

Arnold had come to no decision when he went down soon after sunrise next morning, and walked out on the lawn to let the fresh air cool his burning temples. He had not long been there when he was surprised at seeing a groom from Castle Orme galloping up the avenue at that early hour. He was the bearer of a note which he gave him at once, and quickly trotted away again. It was from Evelyn, and contained only these words—

"I must see you before Mr. Moore leaves my house. Come, as soon as you receive this, to the preacher's rock on the hill-side. I will meet you there."

Arnold did not lose a moment in obeying this summons. The rapid walk of two miles to the spot indicated, seemed to give temporary relief to his distracting thoughts, and as he drew near the rock he saw Evelyn leaning against it, while the pony on which she had ridden from her house was tied to a tree at a little distance. She had taken off her hat, and the morning breeze had swept back the soft brown hair from her charming face, so that she stood there in the sunlight as fair a sight as could well have been seen. Arnold's whole soul went out towards her in boundless love, but she gave him no time to do more than clasp her hands in his, before she said—looking straight into his face with her clear blue eyes—

"Arnold, I know all; the preacher has told me the whole truth, as he told it to you."

He let her hands drop, while a flush of intense shame dyed his face.

"He had no right to betray my father," he said bitterly.

"He thought I had a right to share your troubles," she said, with a vivid blush; "and I compelled him to speak. When he told me you were in too great grief to come to me, I could not bear it. I told him I must know the cause, and when I heard it I could not rest till I had seen you, because of the cruel doubts Mr. Moore cast on what your course of action might be. Arnold, tell me what you are going to do. Surely, it is not possible, as the preacher seems to fear, that you hesitate to make this righteous—this needful restitution! It is for you to decide; you know your father will not resist your will."

"Evelyn, think of all it involves," he said, in a tone of anguish. "My father ruined, disgraced, a homeless beggar, and I—I——"

He looked into her face, as he spoke, with eyes eloquent of the despair it would be to him to lose herself, the love and treasure of his life. She understood him, but she did not flinch from her high purpose in sustaining his tottering steps on the one straight path of duty. Her clear voice rang out almost sternly, as she said—

"My friend, remember the old Latin proverb—Fiat justitia, ruat cælum—let justice be done though the heavens fall! What path of light exists for us in this twilight world but to do the will of God, cost what it may, and leave the results to Him? Can you not trust your Redeemer?" she added more softly. 'Has He not said, 'Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you?"

An hour later, Evelyn Orme returned home the bearer of a message from Arnold to Mr. Moore, to beg that he would remain in the valley till arrangements could be made for the full restitution of the entire property to the service of God, according to Mr. Penrhyn's righteous bequest; and Arnold, ashamed of his first hesitation, went boldly to lay the entire matter openly before his father.

The momentous interview was at first intensely painful, because of Mr. Lyle's bitter shame and grief at being thus disgraced before his son, by the revelation of his dishonesty; but in the end, to Arnold's thankful surprise, it appeared that it was a great relief to him that the truth should be known, and the property given up which he had so fraudulently acquired. He owned that he had for years been tortured by remorse, but he had not moral courage to make the avowal which must impoverish his only child as well as himself. Within a very short time all the necessary steps were concluded. The building of the church was commenced, and Mr. Moore was installed in the Lyles' former dwelling as the permanent clergyman of the valley. Arnold and his father were not, however, homeless, though their social position was greatly lowered. The post of land-agent on the Castle Orme estate had become vacant a short time previously, and Evelyn half-deprecatingly offered it to Arnold, who could only thankfully accept it as a means of supporting his father, and providing him with a very modest home in the land-agent's little cottage. There Mr. Lyle passed the last year of his life in deep and humble penitence for the sin which had so long burdened his conscience. He died peacefully, blessing the good son who had enabled him at last to leave this troubled world with the hope which shines through the shades of death on all true repentance.

Left alone, Arnold came to a great resolution which caused him infinite pain. Thankful as he had been to act as Miss Orme's agent for his father's sake, he had felt with exceeding bitterness that it had totally altered his position with regard to her. He had practically become her servant, and during the year when she was thus his employer and superior, he had taken care to show her that he well understood he could nevermore dare aspire to the dear tie he once hoped might unite them. He had treated her simply with a distant respect, and, indeed, avoided her presence as much as possible. What pain he suffered in this manly course of action cannot be described, but it became at last unendurable; and, since his father's death had left him free, he determined to go quite away from all possibility of seeing the beautiful face which never failed to arouse in him an agony of passionate regret. He would sail for the colonies and seek his fortunes there, caring very little what became of him.

Having resigned his post as land-agent, he went to see Miss Orme, that he might tell her of his intended departure, and take a final leave of her. The habitual reserve of his manner with her had reacted on herself, and produced a certain constraint and embarrassment which kept her very silent while he spoke. It was evident, however, that she was painfully affected by the announcement of his intention to leave England for ever, which he made without alluding at all to their former relations, as there had never been any recognised engagement between them. When he rose to go, at last, and in a voice choked with emotion bade her farewell, she became extremely pale, but seemed unable to utter a word. He had reached the door, and turned to give one last look on her who had been his first and only love; but as she met his despairing eyes, her lips parted in a sudden cry—

"Arnold! Arnold! come back to me!"

He started, and retraced his steps a few paces, then stopped, bewildered and silent. She turned her face from him, crimsoning to the temples, while she said breathlessly—

"You drive me to do that to which no woman should ever be forced, but I cannot let the happiness of both our lives be sacrificed for a scruple. What does a fancied difference in our position signify, when we have been all the world to each other for this long time past?" Then, half-laughing, though tears stood in her eyes, she whispered—"If you will go over the seas, you must take me with you!"

A few weeks later, their marriage ceremony was performed in the newly built church by Mr. Moore himself, and thenceforward the valley became to Arnold Lyle not only a "door of hope," but an entrance into fulness of contentment, and enduring happiness.

YEA OR NAY?

IN trembling doubt a maiden stands,
Scarce knowing what to say;
Longing to speak as speaks her heart,
Yet fearing lest Life's nobler part
She thus may cast away.

Can she trust all her life to him
Who pleads so for her love?
Can they be one in heart and soul,
Striving through all to reach the goal—
The Heavenly Home above?

She feels that he is good and true,
Faithful in God's behest;
And in one faith, one hope allied,
The Holy Book their daily guide,
They surely must be blest.

What then does Duty bid reply?
Shall it be Yea or Nay?
Trustful she lifts her blushing face,
And, clasped at length in his embrace,
She needs no word to say.

GEORGE WEATHERLY.

MASTERS' WORRIES.

BY THE REV. FRED. HASTINGS.

"I WISH you would write an article on Masters' Worries," said the wife of an employer of labour to me. "I read your article on 'Workmen's Worries,' and I can tell you that only one side of the question has been given. Workmen's worries, indeed! they are nothing to those of the master."

"Or of the master's wife," said another lady. "Just think of the worry when you get a bad servant; a nurse that frightens your children, or neglects them, or lets them lie in a perambulator in the full sun-blaze; or a cook that wastes good food, who pretends to cook and can't, or who sells 'her perquisites' to the rag-shop, or who gets up late, and is always unpunctual with the meals. Nobody knows how a mistress gets vexed, and her husband soured, by a bad cook. Then think of the worry of having them go off in a tiff, and leaving you to do all the work yourself. You may do it very well for half a day; but you soon tire of washing dishes after dinner, and lighting fires, and brushing carpets, and cleaning the linoleum."

"Bad mistresses make bad servants, sometimes," was here interjected.

"It is not so with mine," continued the latter speaker. "I do all I can to make them comfortable. I have no sympathy with those who would crush them; and yet they do not always appreciate my efforts to make them happy. There was a mistress whose servant wished to leave. She had no reason to give for her wish other than that she 'did not feel happy.' Her mistress said to her, 'Happy! A servant want to be happy! Why, it is hard for a lady to be happy, and how can servants expect it?' That woman ought not to have had a servant; I don't wonder that she was worried. I am not like her."

Said the former speaker, "There is too much fault-finding with servants. Coaxing is better than crossing."

"Yes," said the latter: "but coaxing is no use when they are so inefficient that they cannot do the work properly. Oh, it is a shame that they mislead you so! You go to an agency or a registry office, and secure a girl. She brings a written character, or gives you references. You write, and get very equivocal replies. You are in a hurry. You know mistresses don't care to write severely, even if they speak harshly. Then, if you advertise for a cook, your advertisement will possibly be seen by one who will come over and promise to take your situation, and then ask you for the fare from some little distance, as she has run short of money, and must pay up lodgings before she can leave with her box."

There was a laugh at this among several in the room who were listening to the conversation. I here ventured the remark, "You spoke of masters' worries, and it seems to me that I have heard thus far only of those of the mistress."

Now spoke up the first: "My husband can get plenty of work, but he cannot get the men to do it. There are "hands" enough, but if they are put on and sent to a job, they make a bungling affair of it, and often have to be discharged. Then, if they know their business, directly the master's back is turned they don't go on with it."

"Ah!" said another, "if they come to colour your ceilings, they will bring trestles, pail, and brushes, make a muddling mess, then go away, and you don't see them again for hours."

"My husband had," said another, "to go and discharge five men the other day. He had sent them to a job, and when he went to see how they were getting on, found all five at the public-house, and they had been there for a couple of hours. There's worry!"

I knew much of what was said had real foundation of complaint. The drink is the great nuisance. Customers are often so unwise, too. They will give drink to men, or money to get it. They think they will by this means have their work done more speedily, but they mistake. When once a working-man has entered the public-house, he finds it hard to get away from the tap and his companions. Then men are often very "uppish." They will say sometimes to the employer, if a word of disapproval is uttered, "Well, give me the ha'pence and I'll go; somebody else can finish the job." I have seen men fling down tools or spade, and speak in that fashion. Even a man whose wife and six children were dependent on him, and at a time of slackness of employment, acted in that foolish way. He would not hear a single suggestion.

Another, who had been long out of employment, for whom I obtained a situation, had not been in the place over a fortnight when he went off with more than belonged to him, and I had the worry of having the employer come to complain of my recommendation.

Talking with various employers, I find that they have to put up with considerable annoyances. Here is one who sends a messenger to the other side of London. He is anxious to have a reply to some question, and thinks it better to send a man to bring the reply, and the article wanted. His man goes home to change his working-day clothes for Sunday garb, delivers the message from his employer, but does not take back the reply until the next morning. As he had to pass the Crystal Palace en route, he "thought he might as well have a good time there," although his master should have to wait and be worried.

Another employer whom I had persuaded to give work to a man in my district had to come and tell me of the dreadful swearing habits of the man, and of his violence to some boys whose work he had to superintend. That man was discharged. He had a wife and children half-starved, and yet he could not control his temper. He was incessantly worrying his employer, and then he worried me to find him another.

Often a man goes and "views" a job and takes only part of his tools. He has to go back for them, or for some little thing he knew he would want, but did not choose to take. Plumbers' men are very apt to forget something that will be needed. A half-day or more will slip away before the work is resumed. Gas is escaping or water overflowing. The householder writes, and is angry at the delay. Thus the master gets worried.

"I don't let the heads of my firm know half my worries with men," said a foreman to me. "When we are busy we have to put up with such men as we can get. If they are inefficient we cannot help it, but when we are slack we soon discharge them. It would pay the efficient to pension off the inefficient. Union men are not so dependable as they were at one time. If a man pays his subscription, and can get someone to propose and endorse him he can get into some unions. There is no test of efficiency. This does not apply to all trades. Plumbers who work a couple of years without having been apprenticed, it is said, can become full members. It would be well if the apprenticeship system were restored."

Some employers do not carefully investigate the character and antecedents of some of those whom they appoint as foremen. They ought to know that they have served an apprenticeship. Much worry is caused because they do not know their work fully. The men in charge of different works are called "cods." They have to keep the time of the men, make out the time-sheet, and superintend the work. Each "cod" may have under him ten or eleven men, and it pays, or should pay, an employer to have one man to look after the rest. He is not expected to do any work beyond sending for material or tools, and seeing that everything is at hand. For this they receive extra pay. "These men," said an informant, "often get corrupted, and lower themselves by accepting drinks from the men. They then fail to discharge or report to the head man the lazy and inefficient." This is a great worry to the employer. It is most painful not to have men whom one can trust. I have known a contractor lose greatly on an undertaking through the carelessness and untrustworthiness of the "cods."

Fear of strikes is another worry at times. If a man has a contract he may be ruined by a strike. One man said, "When I had a strike on I have known men to haunt the precincts of my house from six in the morning to ten at night, to see that I did not employ outsiders. If I had a number of outsiders taken on, and left them for a time, when I returned I have found that all were gone. The others would cajole, intimidate, or 'square' them somehow." The trades councils have fortunately scowled down this intimidating process, but still the dread of a strike is a nightmare to an employer.

Moreover, the wish of customers to have estimates is a worry. When they get it they often want more done than is in the estimate; or there are alterations of plan. These involve expense, and then when settling time comes there is disputing over the extras. Further, some are so slow in paying. If a customer does not pay up, how can an employer give the men their wages or meet his bills for timber and other things? Then the percentages which an employer has to pay and the fees he has to give are a worry. For instance, if the house of one of the upper class is redecorated or cleaned, the butler and the housekeeper must, it is said, have fees or gifts, to compensate for the "trouble they are put to by having workmen about." If they don't get a satisfactory fee they can so easily complain of the work to the owner. Thus great annoyance will be caused. A housekeeper will say, "I have spoilt my dress against the paint." The contractor knows what that means: "he must hand out the coin for a new one."

Then some architects—going right against the known wish of the Institute—will require commission not only from the one for whom an edifice is built, but from the contractor as well. The one who gives in an estimate has to add the architect's percentage to the amount for which he could carry out an undertaking. He knows that may risk for him the loss of the work, but he must do it, as the architect can give him endless trouble over details in a building. "We have to close our eyes to a good many things, or we might close our shops," was the remark to me in this respect of one worried employer.

But, said another, "Think how the big men—the men with large capital—monopolise everything, and cut down prices, so that you cannot compete with them. It becomes then a worry even to make ends meet."

Another was telling me of his worry. He had finished a large job, paid great amounts for material and wages, and then found that the buildings he had erected were in the lawyers' hands, and the one for whom he had built was in the Bankruptcy Court. "Over ten thousand pounds loss! Ah, that's the sort of slap in the face that a poor employer gets!"

Perhaps owners of ships find as much to worry them as any class of men. Their captains have so much power put into their hands, and necessarily go away from under the owners' sight. They can delay a ship, linger in port, waste provisions, incur demurrages, run into dangers, and do damage to other vessels by carelessness. They can let ropes and canvas get rotten and mildewed by oversight, and the owner, when he overhauls his ship after a voyage, finds that he is a great loser. Perhaps freights are low, and the time spent over voyages long. Insurance goes on, and the captain may have been whistling for fine weather. While he was whistling his owner was worrying. Ah! in every calling there is enough to trouble men. Workmen or masters, shopkeepers and ship-owners, all have something to try them. This world is a worrying world, but it is, after all, the place that God intended should be a school of discipline to us. We must, in every sphere, "let patience have her perfect work." We must learn not to worry and fret, especially if surrounded by "evil-doers."

THE TWO COATS.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., ETC.

"He made him a coat of many colours."—GEN. xxxvii. 3.

"Moreover his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice."—1 SAM. ii. 19.

A FAMOUS author wrote a book upon the philosophy of clothes. Each rank and office has its own appropriate dress. We know the profession, or trade, or position, of a man from his garb. There is a great deal of meaning in clothes, and the Bible shows this from the frequent spiritual use it makes of them. It assumes that clothes express character, and hence it speaks of the pure linen, white and clean, which is the righteousness of saints; of the garment of praise given to those who mourn in Zion; and of the white robes which represent the character and state of the redeemed in glory. It significantly shows to us how healing virtue flowed from the hem of Christ's garment; how His very raiment on the mount was transfigured with His glory; how from the body of St. Paul were brought unto the sick at Ephesus handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.

Nature distinguishes with some special adornment or colour the most significant parts of plants and animals where special vitality and use are concentrated. In human life it is equally true that new garments belong to all initiations. The raw recruit puts on the uniform of his regiment in token that he is to become a soldier; the ignorant pupil dons the academic gown in token that he is to become a scholar; and the best robe is put upon the repentant prodigal in token that he is to become worthy of his father's confidence and love. Clean clothes give a dignity, and impose a responsibility of dignified behaviour, which do not belong to sordid clothes. Our garments smell of the ivory palaces; and grace—like the rare perfume of an Oriental phial, which makes itself strongly felt through all its wrappings—imparts its sanctifying power to our very raiment. Our very clothes can be washed in the blood of redemption. The purity of our spirit will issue in the modesty and propriety of our dress; and through our meek and quiet garments, the salvation of our souls will flow with healing virtue to others, winning them by our example from the besetting sins of pride, ostentation, and vanity.

JOSEPH'S COAT OF MANY COLOURS.

SUCH being the profound meaning of dress, let me proceed, in illustration of the general truth, to show the significance of the coat that was made by Jacob for his son Joseph, and of the coat which Hannah made for her son Samuel. Let us look first at Joseph's coat. We can understand in some measure the grounds of his father's special love for Joseph. He had personal qualities of a peculiarly engaging kind; he was the child of the dearly loved Rachel whose untimely death Jacob never ceased to mourn; he was the second-youngest child in the family, whom it behoved him, therefore, to guard with special tenderness and care. In token that he was to be saved from the toilsome work which his brothers had to perform as shepherds among the hills, Jacob made him a long, loose garment of white linen, embroidered on the edge of the skirt and sleeves with a broad border of crimson hues—the special dress worn only by persons of fortune and distinction who had not to earn their living by the sweat of their face. Esau, we are told, had the same kind of garment as the mark of the dignified place which he occupied in his father's household; and Rebekah took this goodly raiment of her son Esau, which she had with her in the house—Esau having put it off when he went out to hunt for game in his working-clothes—and she put it upon her younger son Jacob, when she wished him to take his brother's place and get the blessing of the eldest son from his father. In putting upon Joseph a similar robe — probably on some great occasion, such as his coming of age—Jacob showed that he meant to bestow upon him the family inheritance. Jacob did not seem to have learned any lesson from the sad effects of favouritism in his father's house, for the very same thing which Isaac and Rebekah did was done by himself; and the results were, as they could not fail to be, precisely the same—a sense of injustice and alienation, a household divided against itself, elder brothers bitterly resenting the father's preference for the younger, and brooding over wild schemes of revenge.

It is not difficult to see how injurious was the effect of this partiality upon Joseph himself. It is not good for any child to be taken out of its own place in the family and made more of than its brothers and sisters. It inevitably spoils the child. It would have been better for Joseph if he had been made to bear the yoke in his youth; and, when he was old enough, sent out to do the work of the fields with his brethren, instead of being pampered at home in idleness. For in that case he would not have needed the sore trials that came upon him afterwards to take the conceit out of him and make him strong and brave and thoughtful for others. We all know the effect which fine clothes have upon a vain person. He is fond of displaying them, and imagines that every eye is looking on with admiration and envy. The goodly robe of Joseph excited in him such feelings. Whatever weakness of character he had formerly displayed was now intensified. He formed ambitious thoughts regarding himself and the great things he was to do in the world. His magnificent coat inspired magnificent dreams that not only his brethren, but even his father—the prince of God—were to bow down before him and to do him honour! His head was turned by the new dignity conferred upon him.

It is evident that had Joseph continued to wear his long robe his life would have been ruined, and we should never have heard of him. But God had purposes of love towards him, and would not suffer his life to be spoiled in this way. Through the wearing of that robe, and all that it meant and led to, the envy and hatred of his brethren were stirred up; and they first put him in a pit and then sold him to the Ishmaelite merchants, who carried him down to Egypt as a slave; while his beautiful white robe was stained with the blood of the kid into which his brethren had dipped it in order to conceal their crime, and make their aged father suppose that his son had met with a violent death. Jacob had deceived his father Isaac by putting around his neck and hands the skin of a kid; he is himself now deceived by Joseph's coat dipped in the blood of a kid. Because he had foolishly made a coat of many colours for his son, and unjustly raised him above his brethren, he himself had to rend his clothes and put sackcloth on his loins, and to pass through a terrible agony of sorrow.

Thus the coat of many colours disappears after having wrought such dreadful mischief. Stripped of the fatal robe, and clothed with the mean dress of the slave and the prisoner in Egypt, Joseph became a far nobler character. It is very remarkable how his fortunes should always be intimately connected with his dress; for his garment which he left behind in the hands of the temptress rather than relinquish a good conscience was again used for deceiving others, and preparing the way, through the prison-house, for his freedom and exaltation. His adversity corrected the faults of his foolish upbringing; and he was fitted by the hardships and trials through which he passed to wear, with becoming dignity and greatness of soul, the royal robe and the golden chain of Pharaoh's prime minister. He was qualified to rule the land of Egypt because he had first learned to rule his own spirit. Under the gorgeous robe of his exalted rank, made perfect through suffering—wise and thoughtful for others, through much wrong and evil done to himself—we see none of the weaknesses that disfigured his youthful character when he wore the coat of many colours. And so his ambitious dreams were fulfilled to the letter; not, indeed, in the easy way he expected, but by the hard and thorny way of suffering; not by wearing a long, loose robe of idleness and vanity, but by being clothed with humility, and girding himself for the stern task of enduring wrong and overcoming his native faults and besetting sins.

There is a lesson in all this for us. We have seen what a dreadful evil was caused by Joseph's coat of many colours. And such evil is still done by it; for though the actual coat has perished thousands of years ago, it has left behind something that represents it, and reappears anew in every generation. Every young spirit puts on such a robe as Joseph wore—a robe of pride and self-indulgence and vanity, and dreams the same dreams of worldly greatness in it. This robe is so long and loose that it hampers one's movements, and trips one at every step. When a young man has it on he cannot do any work. He sees a lion — an insurmountable difficulty in the way of every duty. A lazy mood will find many excuses for its idleness, many reasons why it cannot work. And it is a curious thing that the more idle we are the more we dream dreams of the greatness and happiness that are to be ours some day. And this robe has the same evil effect upon the character which the coat of many colours produced in Joseph's case, and works mischief as great. Dejanira, the wife of Hercules, the mythical hero of the old Greek story, on one occasion imagining that her husband loved another woman more than herself, sent him a dress which she was told had the virtue of reclaiming anyone who wore it from unlawful affections. But the tunic of Nessus was poisoned, and was meant by an enemy to be an instrument of revenge. No sooner, therefore, did Hercules put it on than he fell into a dreadful disease. He tried to pull off the fatal dress, but it clung tightly to him, and it was now too late; the poison that was in it had entered his blood, and he speedily died in great agony. Now the robe of false pride, of idleness or vanity, will cling to us in the same way, and will infuse its virulent poison through our whole being. It will produce pains and penalties of its own. The sins that it incites to will be punished in kind. The coat of many colours will be defiled with the mud of the pit, and stained with the blood of passion and sin. The high hopes we cherished in it will be disappointed; the dreams of future greatness or happiness we dreamed in it will vanish like morning mist. We shall find instead the bare, hard realities of life, and the stern imprisonment of circumstances.

SAMUEL'S LITTLE COAT.

IT is a great relief to turn from the coat which Jacob made for his son to the little coat which Hannah made for her son. Samuel's mother was a woman of exceptional gifts and goodness. She was worthy of a high place in the household of faith. She dedicated her child to the Lord before he was born, and made him from his earliest infancy a Nazarite. When he was old enough to enter upon some child-like service in the tabernacle, she brought him to Shiloh. She gave to God the gift she had received from God. The priests, who took a deep interest in the little boy entrusted to their charge, gave him a garment called an ephod ; a close-fitting coat made of white linen, like that which the high priest wore ; and thus he became an acolyte, and his special duty was to put out the sacred light of the golden candlestick that had burned all night, and to open the doors of the tabernacle at sunrise. But in addition to the ephod, his mother made him a little coat and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up to Shiloh with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice.

This garment was very different from the coat of many colours which Jacob made for Joseph. That was a long, loose robe, such as was worn by the sons of kings and noblemen, and marked out Joseph for a life of ease and indulgence. But Samuel's little coat, on the other hand, was a miniature of the priestly robe which the high priest wore when he was performing his sacred duties. A priest is one who first of all sacrifices himself, denies the self-will that is in him, crucifies the selfish passions of his nature ; and thus self-sacrificed he offers to God the sacrifices of worship. We are told how Jesus put off His garment and girded Himself with a linen towel and washed the disciples' feet. He acted in this service as a priest. He humbled Himself, sacrificed His own self-will ; and the linen towel was the priestly dress of service and sacrifice—the righteousness of true obedience to God. It was like the dress which Samuel wore when he manifested in the service of the tabernacle the spirit of humility and self-sacrifice which Jesus displayed. He was a candidate for the priesthood ; and the word candidate comes from a Latin word which signifies white. It reminds us of the custom of the early Christians, when young communicants were clothed in white garments and were therefore called candidates for the membership of the Church. Their dress was meant to be a parable to them, impressing upon them the necessity of being white within as well as without, having pure hearts as well as clean hands. And Samuel's little white linen coat marked him out as a candidate for the service of the Lord, and preached to him the necessity of being pure in heart and in life.

What could be more touching and beautiful than the fact that Samuel's little coat was made by his mother ! How full of meaning it is ! The Waldensian mother carries in her bosom the flask of water which she gives to the officiating clergyman on the occasion of the baptism of her child. She thus warms the ice-cold glacier water of her native valleys with the vital heat of her own heart before it touches the face of her child ; and the ceremony is thereby invested with a new and most beautiful significance. Equally significant was the provision of the little Hebrew priest's robe by his mother. We can picture the pious Hannah at home preparing the little coat. She could not buy the linen of which it was made. Each Israelite had to grow on his own farm what he needed for himself and his family, food and clothing and fuel. And doubtless Hannah's husband, in his field around Mount Ephraim, sowed and reaped the flax which she spun and wove and bleached into the linen web, out of which she shaped and sewed the little garment which she presented to her son. Year after year, a part of the produce of the flax harvest was consecrated to this pious use. In "The Light of Asia" it is mentioned that the mother of the great founder of Buddhism, in gratitude for the birth of her noble boy, made an offering to her god in a silver dish, of rice grown from picked seed, each grain like a pearl, sown in new-broken ground, boiled with sandal and fine spice in the milk of the six best cows of the herd, who were fed with the milk of twelve, who had previously been fed with the milk of twenty-five, who had in their turn been nursed on the milk of fifty white cows, who had been nursed on the milk of a hundred mothers newly calved.

The thread which the modern Jews use for some specially pious purpose, such as forming the wick of candles offered in sacrifice, or sewing a prayer-mantle, has acquired a sacred value from having previously been employed to measure the burial-ground of the family in the cemetery. On the anniversary of the death of a person, his two nearest relatives measure the borders of the ground in which he is laid. Each carries in his hand a separate reel, on each of which the same continuous thread is rolled. They begin the ceremony by holding the two reels closely together, singing in unison a mournful anthem appropriate to the occasion. One then marches round the enclosure, while the other stands still ; and chanting as he goes, with slow, grave footsteps, rolls round his own reel the thread which is unwound from his companion's till it comes near the end. Standing still, the other in turn proceeds to march round the enclosure, singing as he goes, and filling his empty reel by unwinding his friend's. This ceremony is performed three times, and a mysterious efficacy is supposed to be imparted to the thread by the powers of the unseen world.

A more legitimate sacredness, we may suppose, was communicated to the little robe which Hannah made with equally scrupulous care. Her husband would ask the blessing of God upon the sowing and the reaping of the flax ; and many a pious thought and prayer would Hannah form as she spun and wove the linen web, and shaped out of it the pure white linen coat for her son. We can think of her sewing the little priestly robe that was to be employed in the service of God, cherishing fond thoughts of her little boy, far away beyond the hills, and dreaming as she sowed, as mothers always will, bright dreams of his future. And many a wish did she frame, and many a prayer did she utter, that her boy might be honoured of God to serve his generation nobly, for the times were sadly out of joint, and those who loved the Lord were indeed few and faint.

A MOTHER'S OFFERING.

IT is good when a mother makes the tiny garments that cover the bodies of her little ones. No more appropriate hands can shape them; and it is a happy task, for many a bright hope and loving thought are sewed up with every stitch. But it is better still when she makes, as she alone can make, the clothes of the immortal young souls committed to her care. The first clothes of the soul, whatever may be said regarding the first clothes of the body, are made by her. The first influence that comes to the ductile character of the child is from the mother; and whatever great and good things have been done in the world may be traced to the impulses and the teachings received from a mother's lips and a mother's heart. It is her character that is most deeply impressed upon her child; and it has been often observed that the great majority of the human family "take after the mother."

The biographies of those who have been most distinguished for talent and virtue reveal the fact that they have been the children of remarkable mothers. To the mother's hand in infancy they have owed the sowing of the good seed whose growth and fruiting have been a blessing to themselves and to the world. Eithne, the mother of the great St. Columba, who was among the first to bring the Gospel to our country when it was in heathen darkness, like Hannah, dedicated her little Samuel to the Lord from his birth. Before he was born, she dreamed one night that an angel presented to her a garment of the most beautiful texture and varied hues. This gift, however, he afterwards took away; and as it flew through the sky it continued to unfold and extend itself over mountains and plains, until at length it covered a space which her eye could not measure. Finding what she had once possessed thus gone out of her reach, she was grieved exceedingly at her loss; but the angel comforted her by saying that the expanding garment was a symbol of the teaching of the child that should be born to her, which would spread over all Ireland and Scotland, and clothe an innumerable company of souls with the garment of salvation. Blessed are those who, like Samuel and St. Columba, are early taught the piety which has its root in mother's love; who are not only wrapped in the mantle of maternal affection, which, better than all others, protects the young from the evils of the world, but who are also clothed by a mother's hand, by her teaching and example, under the blessing of Heaven, with the robe of Christ's righteousness—that robe which from the very beginning makes them kings and priests unto God and the Father!

The coat of Samuel lasted all his life. I do not mean the same identical coat; for we read that every year, we do not know for how long, while Samuel ministered in the tabernacle, his mother prepared and brought up for him a new coat. The old one was worn out each year by the work of the year, and required to be replaced by a fresh garment, which was made larger to suit his growing size. All the time that he acted as priest in the tabernacle at Shiloh he wore nothing but the robe that was spun and woven and made for him by his mother's hands. And when the prophet's call came to him, and the tabernacle of Shiloh was destroyed, and he had to go out and carry on the solemn work of a seer in Israel, he still wore a coat like that of his early years.

We do not know whether his mother lived to see her son exalted to the highest position in Israel, or whether she continued to make his robe when he became a judge. But this we do know, that all the rest of his life he wore a garment made of the same stuff, and fashioned after the same pattern as the little coat which his mother used to make for him when he was at Shiloh. It is the same peculiar Hebrew word me-il—differing from all the other words descriptive of dress—that is persistently used for Samuel's coat throughout the Scripture narrative. That coat was invested with too many hallowed memories and associations to be ever abandoned. It was the symbol to him of his mother's love and care. It was the robe of religious consecration, to be kept ever sacred. Everywhere we see him dressed in it. It was always appropriate; for while he was a prophet and a judge, he had never ceased to be a priest.

We see him offering sacrifice on public occasions for the people; we hear his loud cries and prayers to God on behalf of Israel in times of danger and distress. In his own house at Ramah he built an altar to the Lord; and whatever he did, whether ministering at the altar as a priest, or sitting in the chair of justice as a judge, or denouncing doom against the evils of the people as a prophet, he wore the same mantle, and the people looked upon him with the same profound reverence with which their fathers had regarded Moses. He was known by his peculiar mantle wherever he appeared. Saul laid hold of its skirt when he finally parted from Samuel at Gilgal; and as it rent in the unhappy monarch's hand, the awful words of doom were pronounced, "The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine that is better than thee." By the peculiar appearance of his mantle, Saul recognised him in the vision of Endor, when he exclaimed, "I see a god ascending out of the earth." Thus we find that the little coat which his mother gave him—enlarging its size to suit his advancing years—marked him out as a consecrated person from his childhood to his latest days. He was true all his life to the purpose for which that robe set him apart. The service of God, to which his mother dedicated him from his infancy, was the service in which his whole life, from the beginning to the end, was spent. He identified himself so completely with his mother's coat, that it became in all after ages the mantle of the prophet—the peculiar distinguishing dress of every seer and teacher among men.

THE CHILD THE FATHER TO THE MAN.

AND what an encouragement is there in all this to parents to train up their children in the way that they should go, assured that when they are old they will not depart from it! We have in the Bible examples of persons who, in their earlier years, went to great excesses in wickedness, and who were restored by sudden and violent conversions; but the examples upon which it loves most to dwell are those of persons, like Samuel and Timothy, whose goodness was devoted and continuous; whose days were bound each to each by the same piety, without any abrupt transition. And observation teaches us that the religion that has passed through critical experiences is usually destitute of that calmness and well-balanced moderation and wisdom which belong especially to the religion that has grown up uninterruptedly from early beginnings of purity and goodness.

If parents were only faithful, this continuous goodness, free from the memories and associations of evil which sadden even the renewed life of those who have been converted from a wicked course, would be the normal, instead of the exceptional, experience of their children. In the matters of the soul, the child would be father to the man. Should not parents, then, seek above all things to make for their children in their infancy, with their own prayers and instructions and examples—as the solan-goose plucks the down from its own breast to line the nest of its young ones—those spiritual garments which will grow with the growth of the soul, and increase with the years of those who wear them; which, like the miraculous clothes of the Israelites, wax not old in all the passing years, and which will fit life's latest days as they fitted its earliest hours.

How delightful to walk with Christ in white all through life; to keep that white robe unstained by the world and unspotted by the flesh; to wear the same priestly dress of love to God and service to humanity through the varied duties and experiences of life from the beginning to the end! This was the reward that Hannah had for her pious labour; this is the reward which every Christian parent will have who, instead of giving his child the fatal Joseph's coat of worldly pride and vanity, which must soon be stripped off and exchanged for the degrading dress of the world's slave and prisoner, gives him Samuel's priestly coat of devotion to the service of God, which will last throughout life, and which will become the white robe with which the redeemed will serve God day and night in His Temple.

FALSE SHAME OF YOUNG MEN.

YOUNG men who come from the country to the town, and who get on in the world, are often ashamed of their parents, of the rustic dress they once wore, and of the simple but honest and kindly ways of their childhood. And too often when they assume the fashionable clothes and adopt the fashionable ways of their new friends, they leave behind them the religion of their childhood and forget the piety which they learned at a mother's knee. They have outgrown the priestly dress in which their mothers dedicated them to God, and think her religion old-fashioned and worn-out. This is false shame. It is a sin against the dearest and most sacred instincts of our nature. So far from being manly, it is mean and dastardly. Depend upon it, the man who will have most of the esteem of his fellow-creatures and of the favour of Heaven, will be he who keeps unchanged all through life the mantle of heavenly devotion with which his mother clothed him. He who makes the religion of his youth the habit of his life—his garment and way of acting all through—will come to honour, and will enjoy the proud blessing of consistency. His life will be a gracious verity, like that of Samuel; it will have one steadfast purpose running through it all. The outer life will be of one piece with the inner; one part will not reproach the other; and what he seems, that he ever is.

"Be clothed with humility," says the Apostle Peter; and he uses a word for "clothed" in the original which reminds us of our Lord's girding of Himself with the linen towel when He washed the disciples' feet, and is a striking proof how deeply the action and consequent words of our Lord had sunk into the disciples' hearts. The word implies, moreover, such a clothing of ourselves with this grace that we cannot easily divest ourselves of it; that it will adhere to us wherever and however we are engaged. Let this garment be our favourite dress, for which we would not take in exchange the fabled magnificence of Chosroe's robe with all its gold and jewels. Better far be among the number of those who wandered in sheepskins and goatskins, or left their garments with the pursuer and fled away naked, if so they could honour good principles and lead noble lives, than go clothed in purple and fine linen and live without honour in selfish ease and indulgence! There is no robe like that which the father put upon the prodigal son when he returned home confessing his sin and throwing himself upon his father's love—the robe of penitence, the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit. That dress will pass through the fire of the troubles of the world like the garments of the three Hebrew children, and the smell of the fire will not pass upon it; not a thread of it will be singed. The virtue of our Saviour will go out of its hem to the poor and needy; and in it we shall oftentimes wash the disciples' feet. Not only shall we dream great dreams in our lowly dress, but we shall carry them out in works of faith and labours of love. This dress will last when all other garments of earthly glory and beauty shall be consumed by the moth and the worm. We shall be exalted in it to a higher rank than ever Joseph attained. Clothed in fine linen, white and clean, we shall follow in the train of Him who is clothed in vesture dipped in blood, and Who has on His vesture and on His thigh a Name written—King of Kings and Lord of Lords.

A NEW BOOK OF MARTYRS.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

I.—SUCCESSORS OF JOHN HUSS AND JEROME OF PRAGUE.

GOOD old John Foxe, in his "Book of Martyrs," tells the story of Huss and Jerome, their noble testimony, and their glorious victory over all the terrors of a most terrible death. It was on his birthday, the 4th of July, 1415, that Huss suffered—a day which has since become illustrious as a birthday of freedom in a continent of which Huss had never dreamt. Neither he nor Jerome died in his native country, but on the banks of a Swiss lake, in a land which had already conquered for itself political freedom, and which was destined, in the following century, to contribute many noble witnesses for the faith of the Gospel. Not even the ashes of Huss were allowed to be carried back to his native Bohemia; they were cast into the Rhine and borne away northwards in the opposite direction, lest they should carry infection to his countrymen, and, by some strange virtue, turn them into heretics! Little did his murderers count on the ways in which infection travels! All Bohemia was filled with indignation; indignation bred sympathy, and sympathy was followed in a multitude of cases by conversion. One would have said Bohemia was a happy country, getting the Gospel a century before Luther. But no country has had more of struggle and bloodshed in connection with religion for well-nigh five centuries. If Huss and Jerome have had many successors in Bohemia as witnesses for the truth, they have had an exceeding great number as martyrs too. We pass over a period of two hundred and six years from the martyrdom of Huss; and on the morning of the 21st of June, 1621, we find a tragedy enacted in the Grosse Ring, or public square of Prague, the capital of Bohemia, which shows how the people of Huss had caught his spirit, and how the same Gospel that had given strength and courage to him at the stake, ministered the like virtues on that occasion to more than two dozen of his martyred countrymen.

Bohemian history shows a rather painful mixture of spiritual struggles and political conflicts, inevitable, probably, in the circumstances, but somewhat complicating the position of those who were called to suffer as Protestants. The martyr scene we are now to describe arose out of a contest about the throne of Bohemia. The Roman Catholic party were for Ferdinand of Austria, the Protestants were for Frederic, Elector Palatine. Frederic had shortly before married the Princess Elizabeth, "first lady of Scotland," the only daughter of James VI. (I. of England), who was born at Falkland Palace in 1596, and married to the Elector amid great splendour in London in 1613. In 1619 they accepted the Bohemian crown; in 1620, at the battle of the Weisse Berg, or White Hill, near Prague, their forces were utterly defeated, and they had to fly in terror from the country where they had expected to enjoy a royal career.

This was really a religious war. Frederic being the champion of the Protestant party, and attracting to his standard all the earnest and influential Protestants. And when the Protestant army was defeated, Ferdinand determined to make an end of the whole generation of Protestants. The Jesuits reigned with unmitigated rigour; nobles were executed, pastors banished, Bibles and all Protestant books burned, extreme penalties inflicted, and the most rigorous measures adopted to stamp out the cause. Protestants were excluded from the guilds, and even from lawful marriage; no man was obliged to pay his debts if his creditor was a Protestant; their dead remained unburied, their children were Romanised, their poor ejected from the hospitals, and their wills declared invalid. To conceal a Protestant was a capital crime. Protestants were shut up in stalls and cages, and tormented with lewd jests; mothers were bound to posts with their babes at their feet that they might see them die of hunger unless they should renounce their faith. The exodus from the country was like the exodus from France at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, sixty-four years after, and the country was reduced to a corresponding condition of emptiness and desolation.

Special means were taken immediately after the collapse of the party to secure the ringleaders who had been most active in the war. For this purpose the wiles of Jesuitry were brought into play. As Amos Comenius, the Protestant historian of Bohemia, says, quaintly: "The pipe maketh sweet music while the fowler catcheth the birds; for more than three months, nothing is heard but fair promises of favour, and hope of impunity for all bygone offences; insomuch that some came out of their lurking-holes, and some that had been sentenced to exile returned." But the hopes raised by this show of clemency were short-lived. "Suddenly, and in one hour, which was the first hour of the night (about supper-time on 20 Feb., 1621), they laid hold of and took prisoners as many as they could; for all being in their houses, they received visits from the Captain of the City of Prague and the Emperor's officers, and were ordered to mount a waggon, in which some were carried to the castle of Prague, and others to the prætor's lodgings."

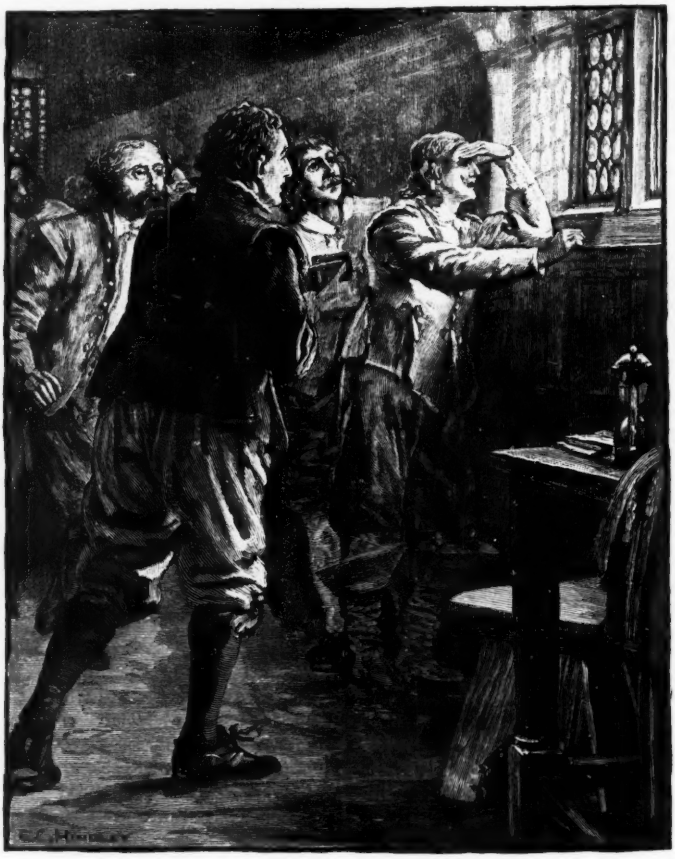
It was not till May that the trial took place of the noblemen and other gentlemen of whose persons they had so easily but so unfairly got possession. The sentences passed against them in most cases condemned them to death, with added accompaniments of great barbarity. These sentences were reviewed by the Emperor at Vienna, and to produce an impression of clemency the barbarous accompaniments were in some cases remitted. Count Schlikio, who had been sentenced to have his right hand cut off and his body quartered, was, as a special favour, allowed to be simply beheaded, and thereafter to have his hands and his head affixed to the tower of the bridge over the river. Caspar Kaplirz, an old man of about ninety, who had become very obnoxious, "had the favour" (as Comenius puts it) "to have his head cut off, and to stand with the rest for a spectacle." A physician named Jessenius, who had been sentenced to have his tongue cut out while he was alive, then to be quartered alive, and the quarters and head to be exposed at several places where two ways met, was, through the Emperor's clemency, killed first; his tongue was then cut out, and his body quartered. Nicolas Dionysius, a senator, was sentenced "to be burnt, his tongue being first cut out, yet his punishment was so mitigated that he was only to be nailed to a gallows for the space of an hour, and to depart from that place."

The judicial proceedings being over, the nobles were confined in the inner prison of the castle, and the citizens in the prætors' houses. Three days in advance they were informed that the execution was to take place on the morning of the 21st of June. They were allowed to choose their spiritual advisers, either a Jesuit, or a Capuchin, or a Lutheran minister, but not any of the United Brethren, which was a great disappointment, for most of them belonged to that order. With one consent they rejected the Catholic clergy, and spent the Sunday and Monday with the ministers in singing hymns, conversing on God's Word, and celebrating the Communion. On the night before their execution, while singing the 86th Psalm, the last verse of which contains the prayer, "Show me a token for good," one of them broke out into a petition, "Show therefore unto us, O God, some token of Thy goodness, whereby we, Thy unworthy servants, may be strengthened, and our enemies confounded." On this one of them remarked, "Be of good cheer; we shall have a token that we are suffering for God's cause." The Protestant minister who was present assured them that it would be token enough that death, which was always bitter to the wicked, would be made sweet to them.

Early in the morning, having washed and dressed, and, as the historian says, cut their collars, that the executioner might not have that to do, they were struck by observing, as they looked out, a rainbow of unusual colour round the sun, though no rain had fallen for two days. In their sancta simplicitas they looked on this as the answer to their prayer—as the token for good which God had given for their encouragement. Some fell on their knees, some clapped their hands, some shouted for joy; one bade them think of Noah's rainbow, another of the rainbow round the throne in the Apocalypse, a glorious evidence that Christ was King, and, notwithstanding the injustice and cruelty of men, would deal righteously and faithfully with His servants. One might fancy the feelings of relatives and friends drawn to the spot by a ghastly fascination, and the excitement of the crowd prevented by drums and trumpets from hearing anything, and restrained by the soldiers from interfering with a tragedy that tore their very hearts. The only circumstance in the square that had any affinity to the brightness of the midsummer morning and the iris that surrounded the sun, was the noble bearing of the victims and their spirit of calm resignation and holy hope.

The signal for the commencement of the execution was the firing of a gun. As soon as it was heard the victims saluted one another, exhorting and encouraging one another to suffer manfully, remembering Him who had borne death for them. One after another their names were called out—twenty-seven in all—and each in turn responded cheerfully, as if he were going to a banquet or some other place of enjoyment. As they marched out they addressed their brethren in words like these: "Most loving friends, farewell! God give you the comfort of His Spirit, with patience and courage, that what you have already testified with heart and mouth and hands, you may now testify by a glorious death. Behold, I am going before to see the glory of my Lord Jesus Christ; and you will follow me, that we may together behold the face of our Father." The others responded, "God in Heaven, to whom you are going, prosper your journey, and grant you a happy passage from this vale of misery to that heavenly country! And may the Lord Jesus send His angels to meet thee. Go, dear brother, to the Father's House, your Father and ours. We shall soon be after you; we have this confidence through Him in Whom we have believed."



After the execution the ministers told how valiantly and fearlessly the martyrs had encountered death, much to the joy of their fellow-Protestants, who needed themselves to be strengthened for what they had soon to endure.

Charged, as most of them were with political offences, it is instructive to see from their last words how strong the faith of Christ was in their hearts, and how vehemently they protested that it was solely to protect the liberty of religion that they had taken up arms.

When Count Schlik, of Holeytsche, heard that he was to be quartered, he remarked, "The loss of a sepulchre is but slight." Going on the scaffold, and observing how brightly the sun was shining, he prayed, "Christ, Thou Sun of righteousness, grant that through the darkness of death I may pass into Thy eternal light."

Baron Wenceslaus, a great traveller, and eminent

"They looked on this as the answer to their prayer."—p. 151.

for his high honours in the State—"the glory of his country, and the bright shining star of his Church"—being asked in prison by an officer of State why he had taken such a course, said it was due to religion and conscience. Referring to what might be his fate, he said, "I am here, my God; dispose of me, Thy servant, as seemeth good in Thine eyes. I am full of years; take from me my life, that I may not see those evils that are coming on my country." Another time, being told a report that he had died from very vexation, "What, me?" he said. "I have never known such happiness as I have now; behold my paradise [holding up his Bible]. It never yielded me so much nectar and ambrosia as now." One night he had a dream, and thought he was walking in a pleasant field, and thinking, with a heavy heart, of what was going on. Someone came and presented him with a book. When he opened it he found it consisted of white silk leaves, on which nothing was written but the fifth verse of the 37th Psalm, "Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also to Him, and He will bring it to pass." Then another person came to him with a white robe which he cast upon him. As he went to the scaffold he said to his servant, "Now I go covered with the robe of righteousness to appear before God, in whom I trust." On the scaffold, two Jesuits came to him saying they would fain save his soul. "Save my soul?" said he; "would you were as sure of your salvation as I am of mine! The Lord be praised, who by His Holy Spirit has assured me of my salvation by the blood of the Lamb." They represented to him that it was against Scripture for a man to feel assured of salvation. He challenged them to show the passage. They thought it was in the Epistle to Timothy. "Fools," said the Baron, "to pretend to teach me the way of salvation, when you know so little of the Word of God." As he walked to the block, he stroked his long white beard and said, "Grey hairs, what an honour it is for you to be crowned with the crown of martyrdom!"

Lord Otto de Losse, when he received his sentence, remarked that he had seen barbarous nations, but he never saw or heard of such cruelty as this, that his head should be sent one way, his hands another, and the other parts of his body to various places. "But send one part of me to Rome, another to Spain, another to Turkey, the rest beyond the seas where you please; I do believe that my Saviour will gather them again, and will clothe them with my skin, that I may see Him with these eyes, hear Him with these ears, praise Him with this mouth, and rejoice with this heart for ever." In prison he had a great desire for the presence of his minister, and thinking how much he would enjoy his services, he fell asleep; "and behold," he said, "my Saviour appeared unto me, and said to me, 'My grace is sufficient for thee, for I purify thee with My blood,' and then He infused a drop of His blood into my heart, on which I awoke and leapt for joy." And then he added, with his hands lifted up, "I give Thee thanks, most merciful Saviour, Who hast been pleased to fill me with so much comfort, and to assure me so much of Thy grace! Now I fear death no longer; I will die with joy."

There were many more testimonies of the same kind on that scaffold. The number executed was twenty-seven. Others were sentenced to lifelong imprisonment, or banishment from the country with confiscation of goods. The heads of those executed were carried to the neighbouring bridge, the Carlsbrücke, and continued for ten years to be exhibited there.

It is an interesting circumstance that two hundred and fifty-seven years afterwards some Bohemian students residing at Edinburgh purchased at a public auction what purported to be an "Executioner's Sword." They found engraved on the blade in German characters the names of twenty-four victims, and on the hilt of the sword the initials of the executioner, with a statement in Bohemian, "The sad deed was done on the 21st of June, 1621."

The hundred and sixty years, from 1621 to 1781, was an unbroken period of deadly persecutions in Bohemia. All outward memorials of the Protestant faith were swept from the country, and the severest punishment was inflicted on any who were suspected of Protestant leanings. It was not till 1781 that an edict of toleration was granted by the Emperor Joseph II., son of the famous Maria Theresa. Five generations of deadly persecutions had not destroyed the cause. The Protestants seemed to rise out of their very graves. Since then the Protestant cause has subsisted in Bohemia and Moravia with varied fortunes; in our days the prayers of the martyrs have been answered anew, and though the Protestants are still but a handful, many of the pastors are devoted, earnest men, and the cause of the Gospel is reviving in their hands.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

CHRISTMAS SUNSHINE.

WASHINGTON IRVING remarked that it is a great thing to have one day in the year, at least, when one can be sure of a welcome everywhere, and find, as it were, "the world all thrown open." Certain it is, however some people may sigh, or affect to sigh, when Christmas Day comes round, and talk about the infliction of Christmas holidays, annuals, and bills, and declare Christmas is a good time for nobody but the children, the world cannot but be happier and better for the fact that at this festival of thanksgiving hearts grow gentler, hands are opened, memory seeks the absent, and many who were severed through the working-days come homeward now. After all, it is no small matter that it is a good time for the children, rich and poor, and that the little faces are glad and expectant around us. The effort will not go unblest, if we awaken smiles among the little children, for the sake of Him Who came to earth as a child. As we grow older, it is only natural that the excitement and rapture should fade somewhat; but our faith in the Incarnate Lord has deepened, and, even as our gaze wanders to the empty chair amid the feast, we own our loved one is safer with Him, and we look forward to an eternal meeting in the tearless land. Some are bewildered, hedged in, troubled even at Christmas-time; but they need all the more its sunshine and comfort. Did not God Himself become a pilgrim upon earth's wayside, was He not once a Man of Sorrows, and does He not understand their whole life-story, across which, even now, He is writing the angels' message, "Glory to God"? The recipe for a happy Christmas is a very simple one—Make somebody happy, forget self, and bless another; fill up the cup of a neighbour with joy, leaving personal needs to the Almighty. Let us be very sure that He Who in the fulness of His love gave up His own Son to be our Saviour, will with Him freely give us all things.

"THE QUIVER" WAIFS.

We have cheering news of our Waifs to give our readers. The little girl whom we adopted from Miss Rye's Home last year has been sent, by the generosity of our readers, to Canada, that land of promise for strong young folk, and has found a new home there. Of little Willie, Dr. Barnardo writes:—"I am delighted and encouraged to think that your readers maintain their active interest in their rescued protégé. Our lady visitor (who, I may say, is a qualified doctor) last visited Willie Rush on 29th September. She then reported him as 'properly cared for and very happy,' and his behaviour was stated by his foster-parents to have been 'very good.' On October 9th, too, I have a report from the Vicar, in which he says:—'I never saw a child more improved than this boy.' Nothing, I am sure, could be more satisfactory than these statements, and they ought to deepen your satisfaction at having undertaken the maintenance of such a hopeful little fellow." Miss Sharman writes to thank our readers for the promised help in the maintenance of our other Waif, little Winnie. Thus two little mites are secured comfortable homes, good food, and protecting friends for another year. But we are anxious to extend the work of this fund, and to offer shelter to more of these homeless little ones. Who among our readers—among our younger readers especially—will help us to carry on this work and to broaden its sphere, that others of Christ's little ones may be protected, fed, and taught aright? On page 160 will be found a list of further subscriptions to THE QUIVER Waifs Fund, and the Editor will be glad to receive and acknowledge others, even the smallest.

"WILL A MAN ROB GOD?"

"I never feel the need of religion," said a young man blessed with health and prosperity; "I never feel that I want to pray—I get on very well without." We heard a speaker tell how he once called on a man for his vote, and his wife settled the matter thus: "He don't mean to vote one way or the other; he don't see as he'll gain anything if he does vote." The speaker remarked that our own personal "getting on" is an ignoble motive indeed for action or inaction; we must not forget what we owe to others—still less must we forget what we owe to God. That young man, who carelessly remarked he got on all right without prayer, was the son of praying parents; he will surely yet awaken to the comprehension that years of irreligion have been robbing his Saviour of love, thanksgiving, talent, and service consecrated to Himself, and that, though he thought he needed no God, the Lord had need of him, and was day by day grieved by his coldness and selfish hardness of heart. We would not measure God's pity even at the eleventh hour: we know of a case even now in which a poor suicide, in drowning extremities, cried out to Him for pardon, and asserted that she felt His forgiveness even as she sank. That life was restored, and from that time was completely changed; she has lived ever since as a trophy of pardoning grace, evidencing that the prayer she believed her dying one was accepted by her Saviour. But let none presume on a case like this, or on the record of the dying thief. We owe our Master our full and early consecration—not a death-bed appeal alone, but the vigour of our lives. A contemporary lately related a story of a minister, who, conversing with a man, elicited that he gave nothing to God's cause and attended no place of worship. "The dying thief never went to church, nor did anything of the sort," said he, "and he was saved." And the outspoken minister remarked, "The only difference I can see between you is, that he was a dying thief and you are a living one." Are we robbing God of time, of service, of public confession of His Name, of full and entire consecration? Many are the claims upon our hearts and lives, but there is no claim like our Saviour's. Let us no longer delay in making this our life-motto—"All for Jesus."

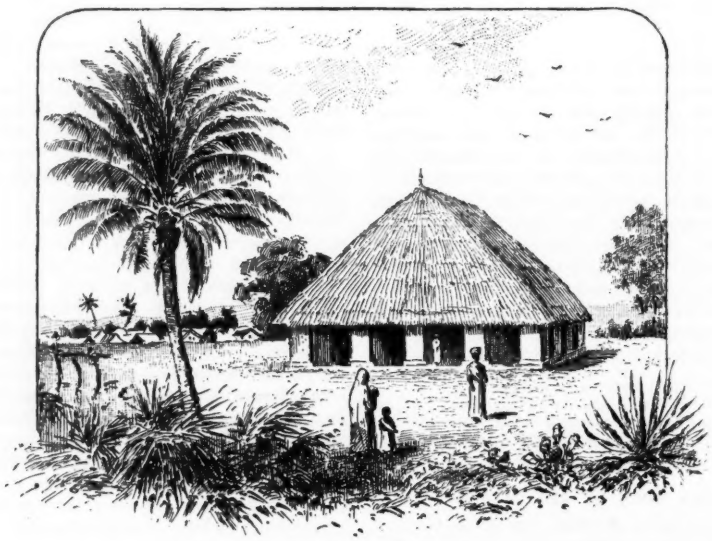
A NEW DEPARTURE.

We have sometimes drawn attention in these columns to the enjoyable seasons spent by the girls from "Working Girls' Homes" when invited by kind friends to tea and a musical evening, but the report of Garfield House, Brixton Road, now chronicles a new departure, for the inmates decided they could brighten the lives of some poorer sisters, and they resolved to endeavour to help girls between eleven and fifteen, hundreds of whom sell flowers and toys, clean steps, or earn a precarious living, and return to needy homes. Cards of invitation were distributed among these children; thirty-four arrived the first evening, and not only listened to helpful, kindly words and joined in hymn-singing, but partook of a substantial tea, and entered with spirit into several games. Ere they left, their hostesses invited them twice a week, from 8 to 9.30, and twenty-two appeared on the following Monday, to spend a social, recreative evening in the spirit of true charity and religion. We note that other girls entertained aged women, and little orphan children; it is thus evident that the love that has been caring for them is bearing holy fruitage, and inspiring them to feel for others, and to share God's kindnesses.

"Brighten the lives of some poorer sisters."

> "For all are brethren, far and wide,
> Since Thou, O Lord, for all hast died;
> Then teach us, whatsoe'er betide,
> To love them all in Thee."

LAYING HOLD OF THE MASSES.



In our consideration of "Christian life and work," it is impossible to ignore the progress of the Salvation Army, which God has owned to the uplifting of so many, and which may teach each one of us lessons of prayerfulness, devotion, self-denial, and persevering work. The Salvation Army results from the fact that General Booth, while living in the East of London, was dismayed by the carelessness of the masses concerning religion, and he resolved to devote his life and energies "to making these millions hear and know God." Out-door meetings are held, prisons, houses, and taverns are visited, services are held in theatres, music-halls, and factories; and it is sought to make every true convert a witness and worker for Christ. In the height of their enthusiasm some of the leaders may at times have been injudicious, but we believe it is universally understood that sick people are not to be disturbed by noise, and, as a rule, the various processions now take their way in good order and unmolested. Rescue work has been specially blessed; more than eight hundred girls have been placed in rescue homes, and the "Slum Brigade officers" are well known amid the lowest neighbourhoods, where, indeed, they have chosen to live. Mission work is now carried on, not only in our own land, but in France, Germany, Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, Canada, the United States, India; nor does the mention of these places exhaust the list of Salvation Army stations. Many clergymen, ministers, and leading philanthropists have come forward to wish the Salvationists "God speed." "Our great business," say the latter, "is to make men holy;" and in the track of their Christian life will come improvement socially and morally. Cordially do we echo "God speed" to every movement that has for its aim the glory of God and the uplifting of mankind. Minds and constitutions vary, and the methods suited to certain minds would not commend themselves to others, or prove helpful just now in their present state. There is, therefore, room for all who love God to labour in the cause of salvation, and, while we may not see eye to eye with our friends of the Army in all respects, we can but thank God for the work they have done in opening doors of brightness and hope to hundreds who once lay low in shadow.

"HEROES OF EVERY-DAY LIFE."

This is the title of a most interesting little volume, by Laura M. Lane (Cassell), in which are gathered the records of the brave deeds done in peace during Her Majesty's reign. We are glad to see that the list is headed by Alfred Collins, of Looe, one of THE QUIVER Heroes, but we are somewhat surprised that no mention is made of THE QUIVER Medal, although it is shown in the excellent portrait of the fisher-hero. — Two pretty stories for children, from the same publishers, are "Bunty and the Boys," by the author of "Doddlekins," and "School Girls," by the late Annie Carey, who unfortunately passed away before her work was ready for publication. Sunday-school librarians should make a point of securing both these volumes, which are sure to be popular.—The same may be said of "The Child of the Sea," by Kathleen M. Smith (Hodder and Stoughton), and of Dr. Thain Davidson's, "Sure to Succeed." This latter work is a collection of the preacher's well-known sermons to young men, and should be very useful in this form to leaders and members of young men's Bible-classes.—Another work issued by the same firm, and addressed to young men, is the first part of "Tempted London," in which will be found words of timely warning on the dangers of London life, and of advice as to the best paths to pursue. — A somewhat similar though not so comprehensive work is "Notes for Boys (and their Fathers), on Morals, Mind, and Manners" (Elliot Stock).— It would be hard to speak too highly of "The Good Shepherd," which is the title of an exquisite book of verses, by our contributor Mr. F. E. Weatherly, illustrated by Alice Reeve, and published by Messrs. Hildesheimer and Faulkner. But this work is only one of many beautiful ones issued this season by this firm. Among the others we have only space to notice "The Harvest Moon" and another, and larger, work of Mr. F. E. Weatherly's, entitled "Sunbeam." Two very tiny booklets, "The Light of Yule" and "The Bells of Yule," would form charming souvenirs at this season for distant friends. The latter is really composed of illustrations to three well-known Christmas hymns, and is all the more welcome on that account. Among the cards which are issued by Messrs. Hildesheimer and Faulkner, the photographic opal designs certainly claim first place; but many people will prefer the tasteful little groups of children's heads, accompanied by most appropriate verse. An exquisite series of text-cards is that designed by Mr. Henry J. Stock, R.I., and published by the same firm.—Mr. J. Bass Mullinger's "History of the University of Cambridge, in Messrs. Longmans' "Epochs of Church History," is a worthy companion to the history of the sister-University which preceded it in the same series. Englishmen of all classes owe Cambridge a great debt for the part she has taken in University extension; they see for her a future full of hope, and recognise a present that can only fully be understood in a study of her past.

"GIVE TO GOD THY BEST."

"When I first came to the district," says Pastor A. Haegert, Bethel, viâ Jamtara, Bengal, "there was not a single Christian here, and to-day we have eighteen churches, and Christians in forty villages." Among the first converts were people who six months before had been sacrificing to demons, and the priest who presided at the sacrifice became a Christian preacher: often the missionary was in loneliness and difficulty—"the nearest European twenty miles off, and I did not see bread or butter for eight months out of the twelve;"

THE FOREST HILL DAY NURSERY.

(From a Photograph by Mr. Hallier, High Street, Sydenham.)

but he bears record that his happiest days have been spent among the Santhal hills, healing the sick, preaching the Gospel, and teaching the children of Jesus. Twelve men, trained by Mr. Haegert, are now helping him in medical work, labouring in nine dispensaries for the well-being of patients who have been accustomed to seek recovery by offering goats, sheep, and cocks to idols. People have come for medical aid a distance of ten and even twenty miles—Hindoos, Santhals, Mohammedans come bowing at the Christian hospital: "Oh, that they may bow to Christ!" is the yearning of those who dwell among them as His ambassadors. There is a training-school for boys connected with the mission, where teachers are trained, and the scholars are exercised in agricultural work; another school exists for girls, and educational work is carried on in seventeen villages. "When I was a young man," said a patriarch of eighty to the missionary, "there was no Jesus in our country—we never heard His name," but the old man, his son, and his daughter-in-law have heard of the Saviour now, and become His followers. One of the first converts has lately died, and his dying words were these: "I find Him good!" Well may Mr. Haegert bear witness that God has done marvellous things among the Santhal race, and express his conviction that the whole district at last will confess the Lord.' It is a privilege to help in carrying on a work like this; may many an alabaster box be broken, that the fragrance of thank-offerings may arise round the mission-field, and practical sympathy, cheerfully rendered, may come to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

BEGINNING WITH THE INFANTS.

In London poverty and wealth frequently lie on each other's borders, and though the Forest Hill Day Nursery is situated, so to speak, within a stone's throw of the Crystal Palace, it serves the wants of a very poor neighbourhood. It was opened in April, 1882, at 13, Rojack Road, within three minutes' walk of Forest Hill station. It was intended to relieve poor working women of the neighbourhood from the care of their children during the day. The first week only 13 children were left at the nursery; within three weeks the number had increased to 30, and during 1883 an average of 16 children a day, 3,438 altogether, were taken care of. The first committee were Mr. A. Chaplin, Miss Sack, and Mrs. Turner, who continue to take a keen interest in what has proved an exceptionally successful work. Babies just over a month old are taken in and tenderly cared for, and all the while the self-respect of the mothers is preserved by stated payments of fourpence a day for each child—such payments, however, being modified or made more nominal when the circumstances seem really to require it. Older children also are taken care, of, provided that due arrangements are made for their attendance at school. And in many cases this has been found a great boon to poor but careful parents, who have thus been able to leave their humble homes all the day for work at a distance, feeling secure that the child or children they had left at the Day Nursery would not only be duly sent to school, but would be preserved from the contaminating influences of the streets. The children playing together in the nursery present a happy picture, and the influence exerted upon the parents has been most beneficial. The Committee and the Matron insist on the most scrupulous cleanliness and tidiness of the children while in the nursery. Seeing their little ones so well tended, the mothers have been led to take care of themselves, and they, as well as in many cases the fathers, have been inspired with new heart and hope. Visitors are welcomed on any weekday at any hour from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m., and contributions in money or in suitable children's clothing, toys, etc., will be welcomed by the Matron at 13 and 14, Rojack Road, Forest Hill, S.E.

WHEN THE DAYS ARE SHORTEST.

When the days are shortest and the nights are longest is the time when we most appreciate new books, and it is the season at which the largest number are issued in view of Christmas and the New Year. Of books intended purely for gifts, one of the prettiest we have seen for a long time is a charming volume issued by Messrs. Nisbet, containing "Threefold Praise," and other of Frances Ridley Havergal's beautiful verses, brightly illustrated in colours.—From the same publishers comes Mr. R. M. Ballantyne's "Blue Lights; or, Hot Work in the Soudan," which tells the story of one of Miss Sarah Robinson's "Portsmouth Blue Lights." The work is interesting to all who know Miss Robinson's labours (and who does not?), and to all boys who love to hear what soldiers have been doing.—"Houses on Wheels" (Nisbet), by Emma Marshall, is admittedly suggested by the published results of the work Mr. George Smith of Coalville has been carrying on so long amongst gipsy children. The story is a pretty one, and is sure to please children whose lives are spent under happier conditions, and if it lead them to take some sort of interest in the work among their neglected little compeers it will not have been written in vain.—The frontispiece to the winter number of Little Folks (Cassell) is a coloured plate entitled, "A Friend in Need." The magazine loses none of its interest, though many of those who were little folks when the magazine was first published have other little folks of their own now.—We have two volumes by our contributor the Rev. Frederick Langbridge before us. The first is, "Sent Back by the Angels" (Cassell), a collection of ballads of home and homely life, in which, perhaps, the prettiest and most touching is "How the Light came to Jim." The second volume, "The Happiest Half-Hour" (Religious Tract Society), contains a series of Sunday talks with children. Both verse and prose are represented, and the work is abundantly illustrated.—Messrs. Cassell have just issued another new edition of Dr. Landels' charming work on the "True Glory of Woman." A better companion work to his "Marriage Ring," which we noticed a month or two back, could not well be imagined.

THE JAILOR OF PHILIPPI: WHO WAS HE?

Dr. R. F. Hutchinson has forwarded to us the following communication on this interesting subject:—"The New Testament, I think, gives us sufficient evidence for identifying and naming this most interesting official. Let us examine what is recorded of him, and then see if we are justified in naming him. He first appears in Acts xvi. 23, as 'the jailor' (δεσμοφύλαξ) of the prison at Philippi, a Roman colony in Macedonia, and that he discharged his duties rigorously is, I think, evident from his thrusting Paul and Silas into the inner prison, and making their feet fast in the stocks (Acts xvi. 24), and this for no offence against the State. The same night the earthquake occurs, and, appalled by its horrors, he seeks the side of those strangers whose recent mastery of the 'damsel possessed with the spirit of Python' had placed them under his rigid care. If they could pluck her from the grasp of Python, they could save him from Seismos. 'Sirs' (literally, lords), 'what must I do to be saved?' Personal security was all he then sought, and his soul's welfare was not then his consideration. The reply, under the circumstances, of the Apostles, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved,' must have puzzled the stern jailor, and it was not until Paul and Silas had spoken unto him 'the Word of the Lord,' that faith, showing itself in work, saved the affrighted official. 'He took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes; and was baptised, he and all his straightway' (αὐτὸς, καὶ ὁι αὐτοῦ πάντες). As the jailor now belonged to the 'sect . . . everywhere . . . spoken against,' it is not likely that he would be allowed to retain his appointment, or would voluntarily do so; therefore we may now consider him a member at large of the Christian Church, and, perhaps, moved from Philippi. These events happened probably in A.D. 53. Six years after, in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, from Philippi, we find St. Paul deprecating the contentions which had arisen among them, and showing convincingly that his mission was more to preach than to baptise; and taxing his memory, he could only recall two of their number, Crispus and Gaius, whom he had admitted into the Church; and, in addition, he recalled 'the household of Stephanas' (τὸν Στεφανᾶ οἶκον), 1 Cor. i. 16; and this household is further (1 Cor. xvi. 15) alluded to as 'the first-fruits of Achaia.' Now, who was this Stephanas but the jailor of Philippi? The two phrases are so like one another as to admit of no other solution; 'the household' and 'the house of Stephanas,' contrasted with the 'he and all his' of Acts xvi. 33. Leaving Philippi, in Macedonia, and entering the southern province of Achaia, he would be the last fruits of the former, and the first fruits of the latter. All that we know about this saint is that he was with the Apostle when he wrote his First Epistle to the Corinthians from Philippi, where he had been scourged and imprisoned, and that he was actually one of the scribes who assisted in writing, to the dictation of the Apostle, the glorious and comforting truths of the Resurrection, his fellow-scribes being Fortunatus, Achaiacus, and Timothy."

IN A GARDEN OF ROSES.

One deeply interested in the work of the Bible Society sends to its report a description of how a garden of roses was pressed into its service. "Let us utilise our gardens," says he; and we may add, "Let us utilise our music-rooms, and drawing-rooms, and the apartments we have filled with artistic beauties," for happy meetings now and then that will prove rich supplements to the "annual sermons," whereby our neighbours are made acquainted with various channels of Christ-like work. Even among children we find that definite information as to good works increases zeal in subscribing: "The money may get lost going over," said a juvenile pessimist, shaking his head, when reminded of the missionary-box; but tell such a child of "something attempted, something done," some life won to Jesus, some church raised up for Him where the people used to be idolaters, and his ardour and interest are aroused far more than if only asked to give to "the missionaries." Just so adults need to be informed concerning the Bible Society and kindred good works, and the kindly owner of a certain rose-garden has for many years thrown it open to his neighbours when the roses are at their best, that by a sort of "Bible Garden Party" interest and zeal in the Bible Society may be roused throughout the country. A gathering like this—whether in garden or drawing-room—may easily become a dead failure; we do not want to increase subscription-lists at the expense of freezing people by formality—many of those present, being comparative strangers, need the kindly thought and remembrance that thaws the ice, and greets them as fellow-sympathisers in the spread of Christ's Kingdom. But "the heart at leisure from itself," mindful of the courtesy prompted by Christian love, will make the whole place bright as summer even in wintry weather; and what scene can be fairer or more inspiring than a happy, sociable circle of neighbours, drawn together by interest in religious work, listening to recitals of what the Lord has done, and not only giving thereto with goodwill, but in many cases making personal resolves of helpfulness that will prove "twice blessed," enriching worker and society alike.

XUM

THE DUBLIN SOLDIERS' HOME.

THE DUBLIN SOLDIERS' HOME.

The Irish Exhibition in London has deepened our interest of late in our neighbours of the Emerald Isle. Evidences of art, skill, and industry have shown the powers of Ireland, and what sunshine of increased prosperity the future may yet awaken. But Erin's chief hope, as that of every other land, must be the work of God in her midst, and, among other branches of Christian and helpful activity, the Soldiers' Home, Dublin, is proving a blessing to many, having now carried on its good work for about twelve years. There are reading and coffee-rooms, a lecture-hall, dormitories, and a library. A notice of the Home is distributed throughout most of the regiments in Ireland; and the workers earnestly seek to provide a counteracting element against evil and temptation, and to set forth to the soldiers the messages of God's love. In one year the number of daily visits (including the boys from the Military School) was over 53,000. Many religious and temperance meetings are carried on; friends have also helped by giving texts, books, flowers, and papers; and the military choir of the Institute has made the Home more widely known by giving services of song in the neighbourhood of Dublin. Better even than the encouraging statistics of attendance is the testimony as to spiritual blessing, to which end the work has been established and maintained.

THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

Professor Finlay's commentary on this Epistle in the "Expositor's Bible" (Hodder and Stoughton) more than maintains the unusually high standard of this most excellent series. In his chapter on "Sowing and Reaping' the Professor gives us this beautiful thought which we quote at length for our readers: "Each act of faith, of worship, of duty and integrity, is a compact between the soul and God. We commit our souls in well-doing unto a faithful creator (1 Peter iv. 19). By every such volition the heart is yielding itself to the direction of the Divine Spirit. It 'sows unto the Spirit,' whenever in thought or deed His prompting is obeyed and His will made the law of life. And as in the soil, by the Divine chemistry of nature, the tiny germ is nursed and fostered out of sight, till it lifts itself from the sod a lovely flower, a perfect fruit, so in the order of grace it will prove that from the smallest seeds of goodness in human hearts, from the feeblest beginnings of the life of faith, from the lowliest acts of love and service, God in due season will raise up a glorious harvest for which heaven itself will be the richer." Those who would learn more of the Professor's treatment of his grand subject should turn to the volume, which will amply repay careful study.—Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have also sent us a delightfully suggestive volume by the author of "The Gospel in Nature," on "The Women Friends of Jesus," which we commend most heartily to all who are in any way working among women.—"Vermont Hall" (same publishers) is a strong temperance story by M. A. Paull, very suitable for a Band of Hope prize.

THE CHILDREN'S HAVEN.

For seventeen years the Crèche, Stepney Causeway, has been helping mothers to go out daily and earn the children's bread, satisfied that their little ones are in safe and tender keeping; and we are told that the applications for admission to Mrs. Hilton's Home are now more numerous than in the past. Little children are brought to this haven from many causes; the parents perhaps are out of work, or the father is left a widower and has none to care for the infant, or perhaps a widowed mother has to go into the hospital, and is anxious to know that her baby is "all right" before her case is attended to. "We have our times of rejoicing," says Mrs. Hilton, "when the mother comes back for her baby, refreshed and strengthened, or the struggling widow succeeds in making a home, and gathers her children about her." A widowed mother was trained as a nurse while her child was kept in the Home, and in course of time she could thus earn enough to support herself and her little one. "My children are continually speaking of the kindness with which they were treated at your Home; God bless you and your noble-hearted work!" writes one whose children were kept till she was in a position to give them a home. The little ones in the school-room have come in for some treats, such as an invitation from a lady to visit her garden and row on her lake, on which occasion nobody cried except a little girl who could eat no more cake. Santa Claus comes every New Year laden with gifts, and one of the children remarked concerning him, "He must be a kind old gentleman!" Mrs. Hilton remarks she would like to be able to translate the prattling sounds that issue from the lips of her infant family. "Doubtless," says she, "they are songs of thanksgiving which are borne upwards, and will descend in blessing on those who help to provide their home of brightness."

"THE QUIVER" WAIFS FUND.

List of contributions received from August 23rd, 1888, up to and including October 24th, 1888. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

A Reader of THE QUIVER, Evesham, 5s.; U. T. K., London, W., 10s.; J. J. E., Govan, eleventh donation, 5s.; J. H., Nottingham, 2s. 6d.; J. J. E, Govan, twelfth donation, 5s.; Chelt, 5s.; Miss R., Hampstead, £2.

BLIND AND HELPLESS.

We have received the following additional subscriptions since August 23rd, 1888:—

A Friend, Shrewsbury, 10s.; M. S. C., Brighton, 5s.; Mrs. D., Glasgow, £1; M. Moore, East Dulwich, 5s.; Never too late to mend, 5s.; Mrs. J. P., Hyde Park, £5; Mrs. E. Whylock, Folkestone, 10s. 8d.

The list is now closed, and the balance has been handed to the treasurer of the fund.

The Editor begs to acknowledge, on behalf of Dr. Barnardo, the receipt of 8s. from "Jerseyman," and 5s. from "Chelt."

"THE QUIVER" LIFEBOAT FUND.

The Editor begs to acknowledge the receipt of £5 from Miss Marston, of Bareilly, India, towards this fund.

CHRISTIAN WORK AMONG THE CREE INDIANS.

BY THE RIGHT REV. JOHN HORDEN, D.D., BISHOP OF MOOSONEE.

BISHOP'S COURT, SCHOOL-HOUSE, AND TENT.

AROUND the great Hudson's Bay lies a region of vast extent very little known to the civilised world, cut off as it is from contact with the outer world, and holding communication with it but seldom. My experience there dates from the year 1851, when, early in the month of June, and just married, I sailed in the Honourable Hudson's Bay Company's ship Prince Albert from Gravesend. After touching at Stromness to complete our cargo, we made our way across the Western Ocean, meeting with no interruption until we came to the Hudson's Straits. Here we became enveloped in a thick fog, which caused the captain much anxiety, for we were among ice. Suddenly the atmosphere cleared, and a grand and brilliant sight met our view. The land on either side was high, bold, and picturesque; the water, as smooth as a mill-pond, was of a deep blue, whilst its surface was covered with blocks of ice of every conceivable size and shape, and of most brilliant colours. The captain, having got rid of a load of anxiety, was perhaps the happiest person among us. But it was not long before a change took place; the ice became thicker, and the fog once more gathered around us. An ice-deck, which is some ten feet above the ordinary deck of the vessel, was erected, and this was always occupied by one or two of the ship's officers, generally including the captain. Many a heavy blow we received, notwithstanding all the care exercised, causing the good ship to shake from stem to stern; but she was prepared for the encounter, being built expressly for such work as that in which she was engaged. Ice now surrounds us on all sides, no water is visible, and we lie quietly for many hours. The ice, acted on by the tides, again opens, and we once more slowly pursue our way. Here we meet a mighty iceberg which overtops the topmast of our ship, and we greet its appearance with pleasure, for from it we are able to draw a supply of fresh water.

The Straits are now left behind; we are in clear water, and may be at our destination in a week, says the captain. But presently something looms on the horizon—a cold grey streak; the temperature falls, ice is once more ahead. We sail east and west, trying to round it, but it cannot be done. We force our way into the pack, and make a little progress, and again all is still. Day succeeds day, and we are still imprisoned. We get chilled to the bone; hands and feet are covered with chilblains—despondency seems to take possession of all on board. At length, when three weeks have passed, there is movement among the ice, and lanes of water appear here and there. Every sail is set, for a strong wind is blowing; a venture must be made. In six or eight hours we are once more bounding southward in a sea wild and rough, but without a particle of ice on its bosom. Within three days we are anchored in the Moose Roads, and can see a little land in the far distance. It did not look inviting, but it was the land I had chosen, and here I determined to remain as long as I could be of any service to the inhabitants thereof.

A boat soon came for us, and after being taken a few miles up the Moose River we were landed at Moose Fort, where we received unbounded hospitality. I was in a new world. I found a few gentlemen and labouring men who could speak my own language, but the mass of the people spoke in a tongue unknown to me. It was the Cree language, with which I must become acquainted before I could expect to carry out my desire of bringing them into the Christian fold.

Moose Fort, or Moose Factory, is the depôt of the Honourable Hudson's Bay Company for South Moosonee, whence are distributed all the supplies and trading goods needed in the various districts. Here, too, are brought all the furs and oil collected throughout this vast extent of country. This makes it a place of great importance, and more people are congregated here than are to be found at any other station in the country. The staff consists of a chief factor, a doctor, an accountant, and two or three clerks. The servants used to be mostly Orkney men and Highlanders, but now principally half-castes are employed as coopers, blacksmiths, carpenters, boat-builders, and labourers; and during the summer season, when every Indian trading at the post is likewise employed (and that at fairly remunerative wages), the place is as busy as if it were situated in the midst of the civilised world. The Indians live in birch-bark or canvas-covered tents, which can be rendered very comfortable in winter when the snow is dug out, the poles erected and covered, and the bottom strewn with a plentiful supply of pine-brush. A few now reside in houses permanently at Moose, but the bulk of the Indians still have the tent as their only winter dwelling, and necessarily so; for being continually engaged in hunting, they move from place to place according to circumstances. The animals hunted for their fur are the black bear, the lynx, the beaver, the otter, the marten, the fox, the mink, and the fisher. The Indian hunters, if at all successful, make a very good livelihood; and as the price of furs has of late greatly increased, some of them may be said to be almost in affluent circumstances.

At Moose I found myself called upon to labour to two different peoples. I had come primarily for the benefit of the Indians; but the Europeans and half-castes who spoke the English language must not be neglected. For those I at once opened school and conducted the usual English services, but the Indians received my principal attention. I assembled them, and through an interpreter told them the object of my mission. They were overjoyed, and promised to attend on my ministrations. But I was not long in discovering that an interpreter is a poor substitute in conveying the truth of revelation. He but imperfectly understands your meaning, and to the Indian often conveys but a parody on what you had intended. I therefore determined that as soon as possible I would be my own interpreter by mastering the language. The language, which is polysyllabic in its character, is difficult of acquisition from the great length of its words and the peculiarities of its verb.

MOOSE FACTORY.

AGED CREE MAN.

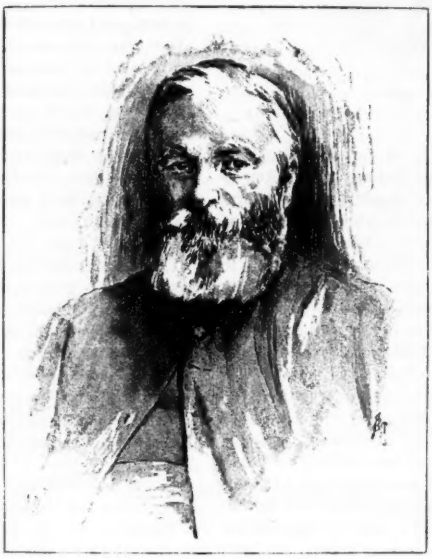
It is, however, very regular in its formation, and its study not only gave me deep pleasure, but likewise filled me with wonder that a people without literature should possess a language as philosophical as if it had been the united work of a band of sages. I made progress rapidly, and in six months was able to converse freely with the Indians, and to deliver my addresses, which I carefully committed to writing, correcting my manuscript with the aid of an interpreter.

The instruction of the Indians in reading and writing was my next employment; in this I was greatly aided by the use of a system invented by the late Mr. Evans, a Wesleyan Minister, who had been many years in the North-West Territories. By this system the difficulty of spelling was entirely obviated, each character standing—not for a separate letter, as in English—but for a whole syllable; thus the Indian word for God is KICHEMUNETO, which is represented by five characters—one for each syllable. And the system is so easy that a person of ordinary intelligence would learn its principles in an hour, and be able to read, although not fluently, in the course of a single day. Reading soon became pretty general, and the providing of books, all written by hand, became a heavy tax upon me. As soon as I found myself capable of doing the work satisfactorily, I prepared a translation of a portion of our English Prayer-Book, and sent it home to my friends of the Church Missionary Society, requesting that a thousand copies might be printed and sent out to me by the next ship.

The word "ship" recalls many reminiscences, some of a painful character. Our ship is looked for with deep interest, and should it not arrive at its accustomed time, our minds become filled with anxious forebodings. But in the year when the books were looked for the ship arrived somewhat early.

Large cases were consigned to me which I had hoped would be filled with books; but what was my amazement, on opening the first, to find reams of unsullied paper, a fount of type in the syllabic character, a printer's roller, a drum of ink; while in the second case were what appeared to me the parts of a printing-press, and many other things, of the use of which I had not the slightest conception. It then dawned upon me that my friends had sent me out everything necessary to set up a first-class printing and bookbinding establishment, but had entirely forgotten to send out the printer and the bookbinder. What was to be done? It would never do to allow these things to remain idle, so I set to at once to see what I could do with them. I selected a smart little boy from my school, and we at once began our work. We were first carpenters, and made the frames to support our fount of type; and then we looked at the parts of the printing-press, and the sight seemed to fill us with dismay. But we were not to be easily beaten, and after many trials the completed press stood before us an accomplished fact. I now took my composing-stick in hand, and stood before my frame dropping in type after type. It was at first slow work, but became more rapid as I proceeded, and I felt extremely proud when I saw my first page tied up and put aside. But I had to set up sixteen pages before I could be assured of success, such being the number required for a single sheet, and this occupied me many days.

All this time the Indians were watching me, and they noticed that I was extremely silent, and that my look was anxious. Thoughts soon arose in their minds, and those they soon expressed in words: "The minister has troubled himself so much about his books he has gone quite mad." I made no reply, but kept steadily on at my novel employment. At length all was ready, and I had the satisfaction of seeing the result of my work in a proof in which the characters were as clear and bright as in any book I had ever seen. With my sleeves turned up, I took the printed sheet in both hands and rushed out of doors, among a body of Indians assembled outside, crying out, "PACHE KUNAWAPATUMOK OMA, PACHE KUNAWAPATUMOK OMA!" ("Come and look at this, come and look at this!") They came, they looked, they stared; I was no longer a madman, but the greatest conjurer they had ever seen. And now sheet succeeded sheet, until the work was completed. I next had to undertake bookbinding.



AGED CREE WOMAN.

In this I was equally successful, and by the end of May, when my Indians returned from their hunting-grounds, I was able to present each of them with a well-bound Book of Common Prayer, after which our services gradually assumed the form of the usual church service. A Hymn Book followed, and that again was followed by a Bible History in the form of a Catechism; after which the four Gospels, which made a volume of considerable size, passed through the missionary press.

Books in the Ojibbeway language then occupied my attention, and afterwards a service book in the Eskimo; for by this time both Ojibbeway and Eskimo had sent their first-fruits into the Christian Church. But my readers may inquire, What effect had all this on the spiritual condition of the people? Did a changed life follow? Did heathenism become replaced by the Christian faith? Yes, and that very decidedly. Now our own holy religion is that likewise of Cree, Ojibbeway, Chipewyan, and Eskimo, who rejoice in the Fatherhood of God, as made known to us by His Son, Christ Jesus. Of the Crees, there is scarcely one unbaptised; a large number are communicants, marriages are duly celebrated, and the marriage tie is as highly respected as in any part of the world; while when the missionary attached to any post is absent on a journey, the church services are conducted with regularity by the Indians themselves. The Mission has become reproductive; some of the sons of the soil are now numbered among the clergy, and among my own pupils (all natives of Moosonee) I can number two archdeacons, two clergymen in full orders, besides teachers and catechists. In my work I have been nobly assisted by the clergymen sent out to me by the Church Missionary Society. The Crees were the first to receive the light; then came the Ojibbeways, who for a long time resisted the truth, many being quite content to follow the superstitions of their forefathers. But when one of their number had been ordained, then a change took place; the handle of the axe had been cut from the native tree, and soon the trees of ignorance and superstition were levelled to the ground, and trees of the Lord's own planting took their place.

In the instruction of the Ojibbeways I found of very great use a translation of "Peep of Day," made by the Rev. John Sanders, one of the missionaries above referred to. The book is highly prized, and has conferred a lasting benefit on the whole of the Ojibbeway tribes in Moosonee. Mr. Sanders' district, in which there are no Indians but Ojibbeways, is of large extent, and through this he travels twice every year—in the winter on snow-shoes, in the summer by birch-bark canoe. Besides the Ojibbeways in Mr. Sanders' district, we have three large tribes in the Albany district, which is under the charge of Archdeacon Vincent, who has to make very considerable journeys to come into contact with them, travelling up the Albany River to Martin's Falls, and thence to Osnaburgh. His success, too, has been very great; all the Indians of Osnaburgh are baptised, many are communicants, and all contribute towards the support of the Mission; for I make it a point of bringing our converts to feel that great responsibilities attach to the privileges of Christianity. The archdeacon's journeys are attended with great danger, and two years since he nearly lost his life in descending the Albany River. It will not be long, I think, before civilisation will overtake Osnaburgh, the most western station in Moosonee; and then the shores of the large and beautiful lake on which it stands will become covered with the homes of a busy multitude, where now silence and solitude reign supreme.

(From a sketch made by A. Dickson Patterson, R.C.A.)

The Crees occupy the whole country around Hudson's Bay, but their dialects vary very considerably, and when the different tribes come into contact they have at first much difficulty in understanding each other. At Moose the pronoun "I" is represented by NELA; at Rupert's House, a hundred miles east, by NEYA; at Albany, a hundred miles north, by NENA; while at Churchill, in North Moosonee, it is NETHA.

Many of the Indians attain to a great age, and I have buried several who must have lived at least a century. Those whose portraits form two of our illustrations are very fair types of aged Cree Indians; the man represented was the best shot in the country, and bore the euphonious name of Richard Butterfly.

It is a source of great joy to us to see our cathedral in its present condition. We have lately added to it a chancel, gaining thereby nearly a hundred seats, and even now there is no unoccupied space when our Indians are all here in the summer. The building is all I could desire. It cannot, of course, vie with the cathedrals of England; it was never intended to do so; yet comparatively it is as good as any of them, and as well adapted for every part of Christian worship. We have not to do with thousands; a few hundreds are all who can ever enter within its walls, and there all find everything done decently and in order; a bright, happy service, and such as is calculated to draw the hearts of the worshippers towards the God of their salvation. I have to thank several English friends for the assistance they gave me in supplying the necessary furniture, as well as some beautifully written texts in the English and the Indian languages for the embellishment of the walls.

Perhaps at some future time I may be able to give some account of our work among the Eskimo, and take my readers to North Moosonee, where we have stations as deeply interesting as those of which I have here written; we shall see men as keenly alive to the Master's interests as their brethren who live in a comparatively milder clime, and enduring great hardships as uncomplainingly as any in the whole missionary field. This is my joy and crown of rejoicing—that I am so thoroughly well supported by those who labour with me in the Lord. Were it otherwise I could never have remained so long amid the dreary solitudes of Moosonee; but when I have felt that every labourer in the vast vineyard was, trusting in God, doing his very best in the work committed to his charge, I have gone on from year to year, joyfully and thankfully assured that the Lord had made good His promise of companionship to me, and had given me the grace and strength necessary to support me in every day's trials and anxieties.

JOHN MOOSONEE.

A SERMON ON SALT.

BY THE REV. MICHAEL EASTWOOD, NEW BROMPTON, CHATHAM.

"Let your speech be seasoned with salt."—COL. iv. 6.

THESE words are homely as the kitchen and mystical as heaven.

Those two elements, indeed, make up our religion—heavenliness and homeliness; so that, at the risk of an improper introduction to my sermon, I am tempted to pause and address you, my sister, who may be borne down with the cares of the household. Don't feel vexed and ashamed if you are too weary to remember the sermon: remember the homely text. Let it remind you of Him who is not too great to use the words of the kitchen itself, and who, even in His resurrection glory, bent over the fire, preparing a fish-breakfast for His tired hungry "boys," as He called the Apostles. Think of that, and let it season your dull daily life with its own sweet influence.

But while one is struck with the homely voice of the text, who can fail to detect something else? The words are simple as St. John's; they are also mystical as St. John's; and they contain the word Logos—now familiar to most sermon-hearers. It means the WORD; it means Christ. In the text, however, it is applied to ourselves; to our self rather than to our talk. And the Apostle Paul means: "To be like Christ, to have your life as a holy discourse, it must have been touched through and through with saving grace."

We did not make a mistake, then, in allowing our text to lead us straight to Christ. Christ is salvation, and "salvation" is, both literally and figuratively, the state of having been salted. The Christian life, then, is one that has been seasoned and interpenetrated with something independent of itself—the saving power of Christ.

1. This being so, our life, our "speech" is COMPLEX. Like salt itself, which is not a simple substance (salt is a metal and a gas: sodium and chlorine blended together; a solid foundation and a subtle element upon and within it), it is a mysterious union. It is the work of God. As the Logos, the Word, equals humanity and divinity, distinct yet blended, so our "speech," our life, must have Christ within it, really, truly, mystically.

Let it be clearly understood, then, the text does not primarily mean our talk, but ourselves. Our self is to be united to Christ. Then our speech, our talk, will be reformed, as a matter of course; and of us it may truly be said, "The style is the man."

2. But do not forget the idea with which we started: that our discourse is to be HOMELY. Again like salt, for common every-day use and by common every-day people. This glorious mysticism is not monopolised by the great or the learned; into its secrets the lowliest persons may be initiated, and such are in the majority. Some of the most charming speech in this country is to be heard amongst our working people, as we call them—bright, picturesque, vigorous, solid, and subtle. The novelist himself feels that his book is a failure without such an instance, and I have heard both great preacher and learned professor acknowledging with tears their indebtedness to our working men—men who can talk like John Bunyan. May God multiply them! May He give us grace to imitate them!

Oh! for more Saxon speech—pure, mighty, and homely as our forefathers' in the German forests ages ago! How often we forget that one of the first canons of art is that the grander the thought the simpler the speech!

We should laugh at anybody who (outside a laboratory) talked of sodic chloride instead of salt. It is accurate—but it's silly. And yet we are often equally silly in the pulpit and elsewhere with our stilted phrases. Oh! for more salt—more of the spirit of Him whom the common people heard gladly.

3. As already hinted, if our speech is homely it will be PURE. Home, sweet home!—there is purity. And not, indeed, until a language has become saturated with the saving salt of Divine grace does it contain a word for "home." We may have "houses," but not homes, without Christ.

The dazzling whiteness of salt should ever tell us that our life is not only to be pure, but purifying. It has been already stated that salt contains chlorine—a pungent gas, most aggressive in its silent methods, killing disease-germs and bleaching all it touches. Does not this remind us of the odour of sanctity that invests the humblest Christian, even when he does not say a word? In such an atmosphere, iniquity pales its purple face, and moral disease-germs shrivel up. This is in the pungent odour of sanctity—not the odour of cant, in which iniquity grows rampant.

So we are reminded at every step that mere outward salvation is a farce. The assumption of a new attitude, the adoption of a new kind of talk, ever tells its own story. Religion is to begin at the heart and work its way through the whole man. Then the right speech follows as a matter of course.

From salt and purity the mind instinctively turns to the thought of corruption: a word that preaches a very solemn sermon, for it tells, not of mere loathsomeness, but of breaking up—dissolution. Thus grains of salt are diamond links that bind together the elements they preserve. Without these our life is rapidly breaking up—a mere heap of carrion on the sands of time, on which the black vultures of God ever swoop down; nay, not of God, but of our own retributive imagination.

4. But, again, salt SPARKLES; and so should our Christian speech. It does. A thorough Christian is glad. Every word of his you will find like a grain of salt—a diamond—going about its office with a conscious flash of joy. The speech of Christ's most devoted servants has never been dull and insipid; it has always been full of humour, flavour, and attractiveness. Such words are treasured in books. Such men are interviewed by the press, and their words—bright and beautiful—are sown broadcast over the land. And when such men die, their sayings are preserved in little volumes called "table-talk;" and everybody is eager for a pinch to flavour his dish.

5. Nor is this inconsistent with TEARS. Tears are salt. The true Christian cannot talk long without some word of simple, mighty pathos. For the flavour of Christian speech is got from the deep salt sea that moans with tearful emphasis by day and by night; it is got from the Eternal Rock, whose grave sweet face is baptised with the same baptism; it is got from the caverns of sorrow, where the tears trickle down, unseen by man, but stored by God Himself, who pours them out, sweet and *sal*utary, for the good of the world.

Ah! those tears: coming down from heaven, they clash together, and make our sweetest music; they catch the sevenfold light of the sun, and make our noblest pictures; they shine from our hymns, and sparkle from our humorists; they patter gently upon our mightiest sermons when the thunder has rolled away; and yet in every drop lingers lightning enough to leap out and scathe the tents of wickedness. "Jesus wept!"

Friend, when once you have been baptised with those tears, you are a new creation, a new creature, a new man, a new child; and your life, be you the most silent man that ever lived, is a "speech seasoned with salt."

BIRTHDAY HYMN:

FOR ONE BORN ON CHRISTMAS DAY.

MY star is the star of Jesus,
I was born 'neath its glorious ray;
My hope is the hope of Jesus,
Which leads to the endless day.

My path is the path of Jesus,
I'll walk by the way He trod;
I'll follow the lead of Jesus—
He leads to the throne of God.

I'll think of my Saviour Jesus,
If the way be rough and drear;
I know if I look to Jesus,
He will make it smooth and clear.

I'll lean on the breast of Jesus,
Till my time on earth is o'er,
Then, borne in the arms of Jesus,
Through the azure sky I'll soar.

When, washed in the blood of Jesus,
I stand before the Throne,
I'll know that the love of Jesus
Has brought me there alone. M. H. B.

MISS HILARY'S SUITORS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A WILFUL YOUNG WOMAN," ETC. ETC.

"'Let me go home directly, please,' was the answer, as Hilary laid her arms on the table."—p. 170.

CHAPTER VII.

HILARY hastened to the library, where Mr. Stafford had been ushered, bright, expectant—truth to tell, rather inclined to be rebellious.

Nothing more serious occurred to her than the possibility of being suddenly called home before her stay at Steeple Forncett was completed. She was quite accustomed to free rein one hour and a sharp taste of the curb the next. Aunt Phil had thoroughly trained her protégée to receive metaphorically a sound cuff one moment, to be promptly atoned for by unlimited indulgence. Likely enough, therefore, she was to be snatched away from her first triumph, Cinderella fashion, by some freak of her beneficent old fairy, and then perchance her obedience would be rewarded by a ten times grander function at Abbotswick; which was all very well, but she did want to stop where she was a little longer—her steps were hovering about such wondrous regions; it was hard to be plucked thence, and planted again within the prosaic boundaries of the spinster-ruled home yonder. Hilary's expressive mouth was drawn into wilful protest when, looking her most attractive in a soft dress of lace shrouding some shimmering stuff that matched Aunt Phil's amethyst ring, she appeared before Norris Stafford, expostulation in her first words.

"What an untimely hour for a call!" she exclaimed. "I have the greatest mind not to shake hands with you till I hear what you have to say. If it is that I am to go back to-night, I shall be inclined never to speak to you again, Mr. Stafford." Then she lifted her soft rounded arms, linking her fingers behind her head. "Now, please, why have you come?" she demanded. "I must hear before I know how to behave."

Mr. Stafford felt as though set wantonly to crush some winged creature, happy, harmless, and so fair that any but a callous brute must be fond of it. From the bottom of his heart he wished those frightened servants had sent any but himself on this errand; and yet thankful was he that no one rougher than himself had the task of making her acquainted with sorrow. The child—resolutely he kept her removed from him by age as well as by other differences fate had cast between them—the poor child had never known a single care in all her young days. She must be gently dealt with now. He met her imperative question evasively, drawing a chair forward for her as he said—

"I am afraid I must get into disgrace with you, then, for you are wanted back at Abbotswick."

"Oh! too bad," cried Hilary impetuously, retreating from the unwelcome message as though inclined to hie away whither the sound of music invited her. "Whatever does Aunt Phil——?"

"Hush!" said Norris Stafford kindly, but very gravely.

A something in his voice quenched Hilary's protest; an instinct of terror warned her what was coming. She had been forgetting, in the whirl of these last few days, the curious reluctance with which Aunt Phil had parted from her—the shadows on those firm features, which always scorned to show signs of ailment or age. Now she remembered all too vividly. Coupled with this midnight recall, it meant——

"Does Aunt Phil want me?" she questioned, coming eagerly forward. "Shall I go to her now, directly?"

"They will be glad of you—home," said the curate; "but——"

The silence of those next seconds told her all. He could see how she trembled, and stretched his arm out towards her. She caught his strong ready hand in both hers.

"Oh, Aunt Phil! Aunt Phil!" she cried. "She was so good to me, and I was away from her." The colour swept from her cheeks, and, absolutely unthinking of aught save this strange new desolation, she bowed her head upon his arm with a great sob.

Some men might have made capital out of the moment; but not such a one as Norris Stafford. Her sorrow fenced the girl about with reverence. And, more than that, she had come into her dominion now; and all those Abbotswick acres and thousands put a great gulf between him and her, that never had seemed so deep and so unbridgeable as in this hour, when a passion, hitherto repressed as madness, would keep surging up in his breast, and he scarcely dared comfort her lest he should betray his unspeakable folly.

Poor Hilary's foibles, her rough-shod riding over his tastes—wilful or careless, be it which it might—her fits of ill-judged generosity and girlish domineering, were all condoned, as her brown head lay—now so sadly bowed—close to his heart. He had had some schooling in self-restraint, and needed it to the full, when the mere mannish impulse in him was to gather her to him and soothe her pain with true love's tenderness. If he was not to say and do now what commonsense told him sternly he would repent all his life long, he must hold fast to mere official ground, and remember he had come to this heiress as parish curate, nothing more.

"I will do anything I can for you; what will you wish?" he asked, guiding her to a seat; the warm clasp of her fingers was more than he could bear.

"Let me go home directly, please," was the answer as Hilary laid her arms on the table, her face hid within them, not weeping—tears were very rare with her—but stunned, self-reproachful, and bewildered.

Mr. Stafford freed himself with a sensation as of a narrow escape, rang for Miss St. John's maid, and left the room to arrange for the homeward drive.

The Cavenhams met him in the hall, knowing already what had brought him over. Music was silenced now—the party preparing to depart out of deferential civility to their rich bereaved young neighbour.

"Horridly sudden, wasn't it?" said the General curtly, button-holing the curate with quite an affronted air. Miss Humphreys was slightly his junior. Any acquaintance who quitted the world under fourscore, the old officer considered cut off untimely, a discredit to their class—the Cavenhams having as a family a keen appreciation of this world's enjoyments, and a most mortal aversion to renouncing the same. "What the goodness did she die of? Bronchitis? Caught cold at her luncheon the other day?"—keeping up a running commentary on Mr. Stafford's brief account. "Oh, h'm—heart too. Syncope. Nasty complication, I suppose. Should have thought a Humphreys had more stay in her, though. She's the last of a tough stock. Miss Hilary yonder founds a new dynasty, eh? Send us notice of the funeral. I shall—er—shall—er—send George over to it. Daresay Miss Hilary won't care to see me before she goes. My daughters can make my condolences. Bother those fellows! why don't they keep the door shut? Draughts play the mischief with my gout. Good-night to you, Mr. Stafford." And off limped the old man, with as juvenile a step as he could assume, solacing himself with the reflection that his own grandfather and father had been octogenarians, and he was not a whit behind them in vigour. "Though I question," he meditated in his own sanctum, "if George will make as good a record, if he doesn't pull up. Dreadfully unlucky, this happening. Another day and he might have squared matters with the heiress. Astonishingly awkward! The girls must contrive to keep about her, though, and play George's cards for him, before other fellows cut in after her money. I'll give them a hint presently."

The young ladies, however, were plying Hilary with affectionate attentions. Gertrude was anxiously offering refreshments to fortify her for her hasty drive. Mary, with her arm about her young guest's waist, was solemnly repeating such disjointed scraps of pious consolation as she could rake out of her memory on the spur of the moment. Grateful for their proffered remedies of all kinds Hilary knew she ought to be; but, faint and sore-spirited, their ceaseless buzz of consolation half distracted her.

"Oh, by-and-by I can talk, but not yet," she pleaded wearily. "Isn't Pullen ready? I do so want to get away now;" which was really not at all grateful of her, as the ladies commented later on, though at the present moment they only said—

"Dear girl, she must do exactly as she chose." And one ran up-stairs to fetch a down-lined cloak in which to enfold the young mourner, whispering, "You will let somebody come for it one day very soon;" and the other—saying, "Poor George is waiting to take you to your carriage; he is so distressed for you, dear"—beckoned her brother to the library door, and with farewell embraces gave Hilary to his keeping thence to the hall steps.

"I know you must be awfully down, and in fact—er—so—er—am I," said Captain George, piloting her with elaborate care. "I shan't be easy till I know how you get on. I must just ride round and hear to-morrow. You won't object—er—Hilary?" dropping his voice, and venturing to press her hand expressively as she sank back among the soft wraps which Maria had ready for her.

Hilary made no answer, but she did not forbid his call, and the young man saw her depart in a state of comparative elation. He had no rival in the field as yet. Before he retired to rest that night this confident suitor was calculating how many hunters could be accommodated at Abbotswick, and which apartment in the old mansion would be best fitted for a billiard-table.

So plunged in sadness and thought was Hilary that they were half-way home before they spoke. Then remembering who had come for her, "Where is Mr. Stafford?" she said; and Maria answered—

"He is on the box, 'sides of Pullen, miss—ma'am—Miss Hilary," uncertain how to address her new mistress.

And outside in the chill fog and darkness of night, simply caretaker of her within the carriage, as he kept telling himself grimly, Mr. Stafford drove up to Abbotswick. Even there he let Wilkins and Joyce come forth to receive their young lady with tearful ceremony, without himself appearing to the fore.

All tended Miss St. John assiduously. Mrs. Wilkins had a fire lighted for her in the room where she last saw Miss Humphreys.

"We knew you'd sure come back shivery, miss," said this thoughtful housekeeper.

The Netley doctor was waiting to explain deferentially how none could have foreseen, nothing possibly averted, this fatal event. His own call on that very day had merely been by accident, to speak about some cottagers on the estate. Miss Humphreys, poor lady, had quite resented his hint that she was not looking in her usual health, and had totally declined any advice.

"Same as she wouldn't have us send for you, miss, in the afternoon," put in Joyce, with a curtsey. "I spoke of it more than once—I did indeed; but poor mistress seemed so put out and flustered like. She'd been wonderful uneasy sin' Saturday, miss, and wouldn't take a word from no one; so I do hope you won't lay not seeing her to me."

Then the doctor took respectful leave. He knew little of Hilary, save by sight. Possibly he might keep his foot in Abbotswick, though under her rule; so he was profuse in offers of any possible assistance. Wilkins came in, asking apologetically if he might trouble Miss St. John to say "Whether she would like a carriage sent for her papa in the morning? A groom was stopping up for orders."

All recognised her now as their head. All looked for direction to Hilary; and to herself even it seemed perfectly natural they should do so.

It was an hour before, very white and tired, attended obsequiously by housekeeper and maid, she went through the hall on her way up-stairs. Then her forgetfulness struck her a second time. "Mr. Stafford is gone?" she said, looking wistfully round, as if half expecting he might emerge from one of the dark oak chairs.

"Yes, miss; as you were busy, and did not seem to want him particular, Mr. Stafford would not have you interrupted," Joyce answered.

She was utterly fagged and overwrought, for his so going actually gave her an extra pang; though in simple propriety he could hardly remain. Many a time she had evaded his good-bye. Why was it that now, among all the kind words that people had been showering on her, she so missed a few from him, and went to her troubled rest the sadder for that want?

CHAPTER VIII.

Tidings of what had occurred at Abbotswick reached Mr. St. John the following day, and threw him into a mixed state of mourning and elation, the one difficult to maintain, the other more so to conceal.

"Bless me, what news!" he hastily exclaimed, scanning Hilary's brief note. "How sudden! How—dear me, yes—how very lamentable! Maria," to his wife, "be calm; we have lost our dear relative: Miss Humphreys is taken from us. I must go at once to my poor child. She will want me immediately, at once, though she doesn't say so.—Jane," to an extremely slatternly domestic, "draw the front blinds down. Is that"—glancing out of the window—"the postman? Oh, no—butcher."

"Come about his bill, I expect, sir," said Jane bluntly; "he was here again last night, only I said you was out."

"Ah! poor fellow; wants his money sharp to the quarter perhaps," said her master carelessly. "Tell him I'll attend to it as soon as I am released from Abbotswick. Mention what has happened, and say I am off there at once. And—er—h'm—tell—yes, Miss St. John's groom to walk the horse up and down till I'm ready; I shall return with him. And, Jane, Mrs. St. John is much upset, as you see"— the lady, looking rather more helpless than usual, was weeping according to custom—"of course, she sees no callers. If anyone comes, explain our bereavement; and relieve your mistress of housekeeping as much as possible."

"Yes, sir," said Jane, with becoming gravity. As a matter of fact, the housekeeping generally resolved itself into whatever joint Mr. Perkins chose to send, and whatever pudding the children plagued her for. But to-day a solemn grandeur had fallen on the family, and she was quite equal to donning her share of it. The old lady who used occasionally to drive up for Miss Hilary in the fine carriage with what the maid's unheraldic tongue dubbed "a sort of bear a-showing of his teeth" on the door-panels, had not manifested particular affection for the household—never, indeed, having once entered the villa walls; still, it was a fine thing to be connected with the demise of an individual who had sat behind such a fine pair of prancing steeds. So Jane went off and repeated her orders with due importance, prompt'y feeling herself afflicted to the degree of expecting a black dress for Sundays, with bonnet to match.

Mr. St. John continued his directions while, upstairs, he made a carefully hurried toilet, his wife shedding salt tears over his garments as she handed them to him.

"I daresay, when the news spreads, people will come up out of curiosity to hear what Hilary is worth now. Don't see more than one or two, Maria. We won't be uncivil to anyone—the St. Johns are above that—but we shall have to drop the town people now. My daughter Hilary will prefer our associating exclusively with the county set. Don't cry on my necktie, my love; satin marks so. The little girls need not go to school. Send word what has taken place to Miss Fish, and say that Frances and Philippa" (the small maiden had been named, without leave, after Miss Humphreys, who had resented the liberty by never taking the slightest notice of the child) "may have to come with you to their sister's, at Abbotswick.—Black coat, my love. It's shabby, but I shall order another suit for the—end of the week—as I go by Bond's. Tell Bertie to be punctual at the office this morning for once." (This was the eldest lad, edged, on the strength of the Abbotswick connection, into Mr. Milroy's office; sorely against his will, though, for he longed to be a miller, or somehow employed among farm produce!) "Now ring for the dog-cart to draw up. If my dear girl desires it, I shall order the brougham over for you presently; so be prepared."

Then Mr. St. John descended, tying a scarf round his neck with an appearance of agitated speed, to impress inquisitive neighbours; stepped up beside the groom, drove all down London Street with folded arms and gloomy importance on his countenance, returned with abstracted air the salutations of a few acquaintances, explained at the club, lest anyone should want him there to-day (which was not in the least likely), the mournful reason of his absence, and drove rapidly towards Abbotswick, feeling under his lengthened visage in such tremendously high spirits he had much ado to keep himself from chuckling.

Once at the house, actually in deputy possession, Mr. St. John was in his element. "My poor child, my dear Hilary, leave everything to me," he begged. "Suggest your wishes; your father will see them carried out. I will be by you through this melancholy week; it is my duty, and, without the faintest disrespect to the generous, noble-minded relative we have lost, it is my pleasure too. Never have I dwelt on what it cost me to be separated from you, Hilary; but there are moments when a father's feelings cannot be suppressed, and I dare say now, without giving offence to anyone, how often I have longed that you and I could live together more as father and daughter. Trouble and joy are strangely mixed in this world; even in the midst of this grief I cannot help rejoicing that you and I can now be more with each other, and to each other, than heretofore."

Hilary, unrested from broken sleep, and missing Aunt Phil most acutely this cheery autumn morning, took her father's help unhesitatingly. Unused to any form of trouble, business was positively repugnant to her now. Uneasy, moreover, under her father's frequent embraces, for which she felt somehow less grateful than she ought, she willingly passed her power into his hands, desirous only of being left silently to nurse the grief which was assuredly Aunt Phil's due.

So Mr. St. John took the reins from the young châtelaine; and sent for his wife to superintend clothing the establishment suitably. "Joyce knows everything, I should think; but mamma can come if you like," Hilary had said, caring nothing about it either way. And under their joint directions telegrams flashed up to London, and lavish orders flowed into Brainford.

The important parent sat in the half-shuttered library and interviewed tradesmen, housekeeper, butler, and bailiff. He was condescending to all, but distinctly masterful—feeling himself, as more than one remarked, "somebody now, and no mistake;" and this delightful mood was in full swing when Mr. Milroy was announced in the afternoon.

"Very glad to see you," he said languidly, putting forth a hand without rising, as if worn out with his labours. "Sad, isn't it? Extremely. How little we know what a day may bring forth! Won't you take a glass of wine? No? Well, sit down—sit down. I don't think we've left much for you to trouble about. My dear child and I have made all arrangements."

Mr. Milroy put his grey head on one side and reflected some half-minute. Then he said, "May I ask what your arrangements are?"

And Mr. St. John with pompous relish recapitulated all preparations for the last rite to be performed on the Thursday following.

The lawyer listened, gravely stroking his chin at each item, rather elevating his eyebrows when he heard of Mrs. St. John and the twins being already quartered at Abbotswick. "Miss St. John desired that very much?" he questioned.

XUM

"Naturally, my dear sir—naturally," was the reply. And Mr. Milroy nodded, as if reassuring himself on that score, which somewhat provoked Mr. St. John, who concluded loftily, "So till Thursday I may say we shall not have to trespass on your time any more. I presume you will attend then, and we shall hear from you the last injunctions of our honoured relative."

Mr. Milroy got up slowly.

"Yes," he said—"yes, I shall be here. One o'clock, you tell me? No doubt you've consulted Mr. Stafford?"

"Consulted Mr. Stafford!" repeated Hilary's father, entirely superior to consulting anyone at all except himself; "dear me, no. On such occasions the—the—er—party's time has to be the clergyman's. Besides, he is only the curate."

"He's a gentleman," said Mr. Milroy drily, "and represents the rector. He ought to be asked if the hour suits him, before fixing it finally. I'll walk down and name it to him myself, if you like."

But Mr. St. John held jealously fast to every scrap of patronage. "I think," he answered, "it may, on the whole, be best for me to see the young man. I'll send for him to come up here presently."

Which he accordingly did, and, carrying down from Hilary a message, "Would Mr. Stafford please have everything just as Aunt Phil would like it?" found the curate, though mortifyingly unpatronisable, so ready and anxious to be of service that Mr. St. John affably made considerable use of him. It was a small glorification he much enjoyed, this having the parish pastor to convey his messages and behests. So though Norris Stafford found little to like in Hilary's father, still, the fact of his so being, and the dear delight of working in some way for her comfort, took him willingly backwards and forwards to Abbotswick during the next two days, and thereby were sown seeds of apprehension in another man.

On Wednesday, as on Tuesday, Captain Cavenham rode round to inquire after Miss St. John. As he trotted down the drive he caught sight of a tall, square-shouldered figure coming up the avenue. "Who's that on yonder?" he asked the groom who came to his horse's head.

"Mr. Stafford, sir, if you mean him that's just left the house."

"Left? Oh! been calling like myself, I suppose?"

"Don't know, sir. Mr. Stafford's comin' and goin' pretty often; he've been up three times to-day. You see, he's one everybody looks to about here when they're in a fix; though, to be sure, Miss Hilary have got plenty of others about her. Here's Wilkins, sir."

Captain Cavenham sent in the most anxious-sounding message he could invent; received in reply nothing warmer than "Mr. St. John's compliments, he was happy to say his daughter was fairly well;" then rode away, plunged in unpleasant thought. What if this curate fellow took it into his head to make up to the young heiress? to turn his position as parson, consoler, and so forth, to his own advantage? He certainly looked at her very oddly that luncheon day; Gertrude had noticed it, and women were sharp about such things. What if he made a bold stroke to secure Hilary in these early days of seclusion, when she was shut off from other would-be suitors?

The very thought was enough to give a man a fit of jaundice. The Captain revolved it moodily all the way home, then found out his favourite sister, and laid the untoward aspect of the case before her.

"I'll tell you what it is," he ended desperately, "if this falls through, it's all up with me. A chap with my allowance can't do in the cavalry, unless he's closer-fisted than I ever shall be. If this confounded curate has spoilt my game, I shall throw up my commission, slope off to the colonies, and live upon my wits. That's what will have to be done if I lose Miss Hilary."

Gertrude was deep in her younger brother's confidence, and knew that the credit side of his accounts stood at next to nil, while the debit side, alas! ran into alarmingly lengthy figures. But she was fond of him, and almost believed what she was constantly telling her father, "that of course he would pull up all right if he were once married." To that end she set herself to work now to aid him, and suggested as the best thing to be done that he should outwit the presumptuous curate by proposing without another hour's delay.

"You don't like the idea of losing her; you'd give anything if you had her safely engaged to you, if you might see her a minute, or write to her, or anything of that sort," she said. "Well, just think hard of the situation, and of what a horrid nuisance it would be to let her slip, and then sit down and dash your sensations off in a letter. If it's incoherent, that does not in the least matter. We'll send it over this evening. That's the only thing I can think of, and I believe it's your best chance."

"Sharp work, isn't it? before the old dame's exactly—er—done with?" demurred her brother, gnawing his moustaches in his perplexity; "and I'm such a duffer at letter-making."

"Then manage somehow else for yourself," said his sister severely.

"You know very well I can't," he retorted in desperation; "so come along and help me, there's a good soul."

And the upshot of much consultation and a great many spoiled sheets of paper was a note which Joyce handed to Hilary just as that day began to close.

No unluckier moment could have been hit upon for its arrival. She was leaning on the balustrade that crossed the hall window, looking at the churchyard; a sort of fascination hung about the work-people still busy there.

"From Captain Cavenham?" she said, almost incredulous, and read the missive by the waning light.

"Dear Miss St. John" (it ran),—"It was with difficulty I could leave Abbotswick to-day without begging to see you. It seemed so hard to let you go on Monday without saying what I wanted. Indeed, though I fear I ought to be more patient, I positively cannot wait through a whole formal week without telling you plainly what I think you must have already guessed. I feel sure you know you have my happiness in your keeping. I am thoroughly wretched till I hear what hope you will give me. A single line, a single word, just the dear promise that I long for" ["I say, Gerty," said Captain George, coming to this passage, "draw it mild!"—"Go on," said his sister peremptorily, and on he went], "will make me the happiest of men. The right to share your present" ["Income," said the Captain.—"If you've no sense of decency in you," said Gertrude, "finish your letter by yourself," and after that he joked no more] "trouble will be a cherished privilege. Dear—may I not say 'dearest'?—Hilary, give me leave to do this, and to be ever, as now, yours devotedly,

"GEORGE CAVENHAM."

Hilary's colour deepened at each line. Attention, admiration had been very sweet; by-and-by she was not unwilling to think she might taste them again. But this other strange mystic elixir! She dared not, would not for one instant suffer herself to think about it now. It jarred upon every better feeling of her nature, this proffered love-making under the very shadow of her kinswoman's death, within sight of her empty grave. What George Cavenham could be to her or she to him hereafter, she would not permit herself to dwell upon. He ought not to have spoken of it so soon. It was difficult for the girl to feel anger against the first man who had asked her to be his wife; but there was rebuke in the brief note the messenger took back:—

"DEAR CAPTAIN CAVENHAM,—Indeed I cannot give you any answer yet. "H. ST. JOHN."

And the young man used unparliamentary language when he found he had got nothing by his forced move.

CHAPTER IX.

UNDER Mr. St. John's directions the chief event of the next fateful Thursday expanded into an imposing and largely attended ceremonial.

All the forenoon through, a solemn bustle pervaded the old house. For tenants and such-like a repast was spread in the steward's room. In the dining-room an elaborate funeral feast waited those of higher degree. The self-constituted major-domo of the day's proceedings harassed the servants half out of their senses, and himself into a feverish state of pompous excitement. "I wouldn't have another such day," spoke Wilkins, when Miss Hilary's father had rung the library bell for the tenth time in an hour, to remind the old butler of something a boy in buttons at his first place could not possibly have forgotten—"I wouldn't go through all this again—no, not for double what my poor missis may have left me!" And, indeed, the active gentleman felt that his exertions were earning solid requital at his daughter's hands so soon as she should have the dispensing of her coming wealth.

At noon he took it upon himself to receive all comers "in his dear daughter's stead," and sunned himself amazingly in the respectful attention his vicarious position gave him. The tenants all rose as to the landlord in propria personâ when he went the round of their table. He waved them magnificently to their seats, thanking them in Miss St. John's name for their attendance. Captain Cavenham was sedulously polite to him. Mr. Bevis, who had worked his way into the party rather against Mr. Milroy's inclination, handed Mr. St. John his hat in the hall, and helped him on with his new overcoat, and would have cheerfully brushed his boots had he wished it. This prudent young man would bind himself by any civility to a prosperous client. And then Hilary's parent headed the long black procession down the avenue with an afflicted stateliness—he was a fine and personable man—that was quite the crowning piece of his perfunctory acting.

"Mrs. St. John stays with our dear child," everyone was informed; but in fact that lady stood peeping through the Venetian blinds of the hall window at the moving train tramping away over the fallen chestnut leaves. The good lady was much excited in her own mild way, and had so worried her rich step-daughter with gushes of obsequious condolence that Hilary had pleaded to be left alone till really wanted; and now, to get free of small Frances and Philippa (whom, beautifully arrayed in fashionable mourning, their mother was continually sending with smelling-salts, eau-de-cologne, or a large-type prayer-book, and other tormentingly officious attentions), she made her way to the garden, hid herself in the old yew arbour (Aunt Phil's favourite resting-place), and there sat listening, all alone, while the slow beat of the church-bell floated up across the hazy meadows.

It ceased presently; and filled with living, youthful dread of what that silence signified, Hilary sat, her hands lightly clasped, thinking with a great aching in her heart of that wide past which this moment cut finally off from her life. Poor Aunt Phil's cranks and quips of temper, as of tongue, faded clean out of mind: nothing remained to memory but her great generous goodness to the one she had adopted. Tears slowly welled up in Hilary's dark eyes as she recalled her sometime impatience of her kinswoman's curb, her flat defiance of her rules. Ah! if the lost could only be recalled, how differently she would show herself now, thought Hilary, longing vainly after that past which can never be re-handled by the touch that would fain be tenderer, never re-moulded by a spirit taught wisdom—perchance by wholesome pain. And while she was so longing, minutes sped by; feet came rustling back under the fading trees; the enshuttered house received some of the returning company; and Mr. St. John, his very step elastic with anticipation, came down the broad path, looking for his daughter.

"Milroy rather officiously suggested," he said, bestowing on her an impressive salute, "that I should hear the last testamentary directions and repeat them to you, my love. But I overruled the proposition. 'It is Miss St. John's right and duty to be first apprised of these,' I said; 'she ought certainly to be present.' So I have come to fetch you, my child. There are only just ourselves—except, indeed, the curate. As Mr. Milroy took upon himself to invite him back, I bade that other well-behaved young man, Bevis, join us too. He may become your legal adviser in time, so you won't mind him. Of course I shall be by your side. These scenes affect the St. John constitution acutely. Doubtless I shall suffer for this week when it is over; but now my dear daughter commands me, regardless of consequences. Do you feel equal to coming?"

Hilary felt equal to anything rather than this rush of words. Instantly she rose, and, not noticing her father's offered arm, walked erect towards the house, giving her head a quick backward gesture, as if to order away the unusual weakness that dimmed her eyes. Mr. Bevis, watching her approach from the low window of the drawing-room, commented silently on the movement: "Carries herself like a young duchess. Called me 'Mr. Medis' the other day. Should think she'll have forgotten my name altogether now. It's a fine thing to be born lucky. Shouldn't find it hard to give myself airs under similar circumstances; don't I wish I had the chance!"

Entering from the garden, Hilary caught sight of a figure on the other side of the hall, and her momentary glance was met by a bow that spoke a whole chapter of expectation and entreaty. She looked quickly away, blushing and vexed; keenly conscious that Captain Cavenham's marked presence there at such an hour was a violation of all good taste. Her father saw her rising colour, and apologised for the suitor, who had used five minutes returning from church to such good purpose that Mr. St. John was of opinion Hilary might do worse by-and-by than take this member of a county family with only three weak lives between him and an earldom.

"Captain Cavenham would not intrude upon you for worlds, my child; but he was so deeply anxious to know how you had borne this, I myself permitted him to come and wait a message, possibly a few words with you."

"Not to-day, papa—not to-day," said Hilary, peremptorily, and passed swiftly into the drawing-room.

"Ask the Captain to stay and join Mr. Milroy and myself at coffee in a few minutes," Mr. St. John desired Wilkins, as he followed his daughter. If Hilary had no taste for the cup of congratulation in its first freshness, he had!

Mr. Bevis was quite right. Miss St. John not only forgot his name, but overlooked his very presence this morning. Something seemed suddenly to unnerve her in the portentous stillness of the big room, where the tall basket chair was set away up a distant corner, and everyone ceased speaking as she entered. Inheritance and wealth were alluring enough from a vague distance, but it did seem so cruel of her to step now into enjoyment of what Aunt Phil could nevermore share. When Mr. Milroy came forward to greet her kindly, she could only answer with an uncertain smile; and the hand was trembling that she laid in Norris Stafford's brief clasp.

Regardless of the deep velvet lounge which Mr. St. John was wheeling forward as fitting for the queen of the occasion, Hilary seated herself close to where the curate stood. He seemed the oldest friend she had there. Even her father she had seen less often than him, and knew less well. Mr. St. John, with an air of appropriation, planted himself behind her. His wife took the vacant lounge, gave a jump when Mr. Milroy said, "H'm!" and began to cry in a most suitable manner, little shining drops falling on her beautiful jet passementerie in a gentle shower that developed into a heavy downpour before the business was over.

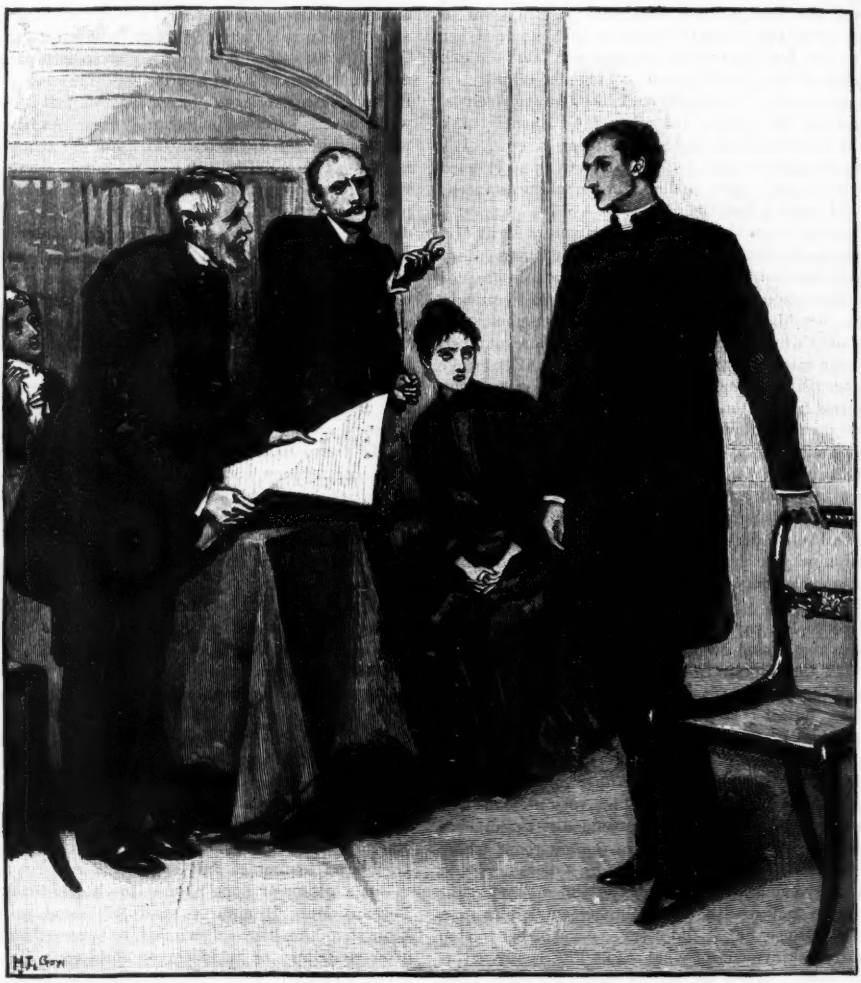
"A—hem," said Mr. Milroy again, puckering up his lips and rubbing his eyeglasses, as he took a chair slowly by Miss Humphreys' office table (Mr. Bevis, in the rear, balancing himself carefully on a milking-stool, mentally adjured him to "hurry up"), "I—feel—some—little difficulty—I might almost say, some little pain—in making known these last instructions of my late client. By most extraordinary—chance, may we call it?—this will was only executed on Saturday last. As friend as well as solicitor to the testatrix, I am not ashamed to say it was executed contrary to my advice; but Miss Humphreys was not a lady easily diverted from any purpose, and I was unable to influence her in the slightest degree. Had she lived a little longer, it's extremely probable she would have reversed this disposition of her property, which I have now no choice but to communicate to those concerned." Then he broke the seal of a huge envelope, unfolded the enclosed document, and running rapidly through the first few clauses, which dealt only with unimportant legacies to servants, came to the paragraph for which Mr. St. John waited with anxiety, fanned by the lawyer's preamble into half-frenzied impatience:—

"To the distant relative whom I have brought up from her infancy, and provided thus far with a good home and a liberal education, I bequeath the additional benefit of a small independent income. I desire my executor to place the sum of two thousand five hundred pounds in Government stock producing four per cent., and to pay the income arising therefrom to Hilary St. John in half-yearly instalments until she shall attain the age of twenty-one, when the principal may be made over to her in full."

"O-h!" ejaculated Mrs. St. John, feebly. Hilary—startled, but hardly comprehending what she heard—turned pale, and bent ever so little towards Norris Stafford. To Mr. St. John the room spun round and round—floor, ceiling, people, pictures, all in one giddy whirl. "A hundred! A beggarly hundred a year! Only that pauper's portion to his child?" He grasped the back of Hilary's chair, his hands cold, his face clammy, such a passion of rage coursing through him from head to foot as half unsensed him.

But a gleam of hope pierced the horrid blackness. Perhaps Miss Humphreys had left some worthier bequest to him, his very own self, to be passed on hereafter to Hilary or to his other children. She had given no sign of such intention, but was odd enough for anything. At any rate, let him hear all.

"Go on, sir," he said hoarsely to Mr. Milroy, whose involuntary pause of a dozen seconds had seemed so many minutes of torturing suspense to some of his hearers; and the lawyer continued—



"The remainder of my estate, personal and real"—here followed a cruelly lengthy list of possessions, houses, lands, and stocks—"I give and bequeath to," Mr. St. John felt nearly suffocated as he listened—"to my tried friend Norris Stafford, clerk in holy orders, curate in charge of the parish of Netley. And I hereby appoint the said Norris Stafford sole executor and administrator of this my last will and testament."

"Which was drawn up by my own hand, signed, witnessed, and sealed in this house the same day by the testatrix's urgent wish," said Mr. Milroy; and he laid the will down, feeling that in all his forty years' practice he had never been in the thick of a stranger upset than the present.

There was dead silence for a minute. The fortunate legatee stood simply dumfoundered by what he heard. Mrs. St. John whimpered forth a little plaintive sob. Then Mr. St. John, livid with uncontrollable rage, turned to the curate—

"So, sir, this, I presume, is the excellent use you have made of your opportunities as parish clergyman—inveigled yourself into the favour of a woman whose fancies almost amounted to insanity, and got such an ascendency over her as to defraud her relatives, to lead to this monstrous, infamous, iniquitous disposition of her property! I pronounce it robbery—robbery of my daughter, robbery of myself—a disgrace to yourself, sir, and the cloth you wear!"

"'So, sir, this, I presume, is the excellent use you have made of your opportunities.'"

Hilary sprang to her feet. Her own impoverishment was indistinct as yet, but she felt a thousand times more humiliated by this outburst than by the vanishing of any brilliant prospect on earth.

"Father," she flashed out, "don't—pray, don't—speak till you have got over it. Mr. Stafford"—she turned to her supplanter, her pretty, girlish figure drawn up in new dignity, "my father is disappointed, and does not quite know what he says. I am sure you will excuse him."

The curate could not command his voice. He had no power to answer her. What was all this going to end in? The whole thing was so deliriously unreal, he could no more grasp his sudden enrichment than Hilary could her loss. In this overwhelming agitation he dared not even look at her. Mr. St. John caught his daughter by the arm and drew her roughly towards her stepmother.

"Make no apology for me, I beg. What I have said I shall maintain to the end of time. By every act and deed of her life Miss Humphreys led the world to believe you would be her heiress. Nothing short of undue influence can have altered her. Mr. Stafford is a lucky and unscrupulous schemer, whose appropriation of her property will be rank, gross robbery."

He was Hilary's father. Norris Stafford kept his lips fast shut with that recollection, though he burned to hurl back the false words. Mr. Milroy stepped into the breach.

"No one feels surprised at your disappointment, Mr. St. John; but let me strongly urge you to say no more till you are calmer. Meanwhile I can positively assure you that you are wrong in your idea of Mr. Stafford having wittingly biassed Miss Humphreys' disposition of her property. Only last week she complained to me in no measured terms of his—what I believe to be conscientious—unwillingness to please her, to pay her the exact sort of deference she demanded. I ventured to remind her of this last Saturday, but was bidden to attend to my own business and nothing else."

"Then, if I'm to credit this, what on earth induced her to make him her heir?"

"That's chiefly Mr. Stafford's concern," said the lawyer. "I believe her reasons are embodied in a letter which Miss Humphreys wrote with considerable care while I was drawing up her will. Here it is, exactly as she gave it to me," producing from the envelope a smaller one, sealed with the Humphreys crest, the last time it was to be used in that house. "My directions were to give this to Mr. Stafford immediately after the reading of the will. I now do so."

The curate moved forward, took the small missive, "brief sentimental supplement to the far more important business document that made him wealthy," thought Mr. Bevis, watching him enviously. Then he drew back again to the hearth-rug, and in full view of all began scanning the explanation of this his life's wondrous change.

For a page he read gravely on, betraying neither emotion nor surprise. Then all in an instant he swung quickly round, and leaning his arms on the mantle-piece, so finished perusing the letter. When he had done, he stood motionless as a statue, buried in profound thought.

Mr. St. John's exasperation was still at seething-point. The ticking of the gaudy French clock plagued him beyond expression. Could he have smashed the hideous thing, that might have eased him. Failing that relief, speak he must, spite of Hilary or anyone else.

"Well, sir," he said, with ironical courtesy, "having mastered the whys and wherefores of Miss Humphreys' proceedings, may we be informed if they furnish you with" (sarcastically) "conscientious motives for accepting her preposterous bequest?"

The curate faced round once more, but looked blankly past them all. Something had strangely, deeply affected him.

"They—do," he said.

He spoke with visible effort. A greyness, as of illness or age, had overspread his features. The kind old lawyer felt for the new-made heir almost as keenly as for the dispossessed heiress, who sat by, silent now, with tight-knit fingers, and wonder in her eyes. The sooner this conclave was broken up, the better.

"I think," he said, addressing Mr. St. John, "we are free to disperse now. About subsequent business I can communicate with your daughter or yourself later on. I am sure I only forestall Mr. Stafford when I say that Abbotswick is open to Miss St. John and—yourselves—any length of time that suits her convenience."

"Most certainly," said the curate, still gazing in curious abstraction beyond them all; but Mr. St. John resented this willing concession with a final spurt of passion.

"And most certainly, sir," he exclaimed, bowing ironically at Mr. Stafford, "my daughter shall not for one hour be cast upon your hospitality. I shall not suffer her to remain a night longer under the roof of which she has been defrauded. Unhappily, I must trespass on your new acquisitions," with a sneer, "to get away. I presume we shall be allowed a carriage in which to return to Brainford?—Hilary, be ready in half an hour!—Maria, see that I am not kept waiting!—Mr. Bevis, I wish you good afternoon."

Mr. St. John strode out of the room with this, to meet mortification of his own devising in his minute's interview with George Cavenham, who, in blankest unconcealed dismay, got out of the house with his ill-tidings as fast as he could.

Mr. Milroy folded up the miracle-working deed, and crossed over to where Hilary sat.

"My dear," he said, taking his leave, "I won't say what I think of you; but I should be proud of you if you were my daughter.—Good day, Mr. Stafford.—Now then, Bevis."

This last gentleman politely bowed his farewells; then Hilary was left alone with the new owner of Abbotswick.

She had declared, but a few days before, he was a man she disliked right thoroughly. Now, when he had gained everything she had lost, she had every reason to do so, and yet——

Her father's unbridled words had filled her with acutest shame. Somehow she knew they stabbed cruelly and undeservedly. Of the two, she was sorrier for the lucky man than for herself. She looked steadily and straight at him. There was no triumph written on his face, only pain; and the pain must be for her! She got up, and held her hand out to him bravely.

"Don't mind," she said; "Aunt Phil was right to do as she chose with her own. I'll never grudge it to you, and"—just an instant's faltering—"and I hope you'll prosper in the dear old house. Good-bye."

He held her hand like a vice for half a minute; then let it fall.

"Good-bye, little Hilary," he said; "God bless you."

In less than the half-hour they were all gone. Norris Stafford stood in his own house—a rich man; but in all his life never had he felt more joyless.

2.

Father, source of all compassion,
Pure unbounded grace is Thine;
Hail, the God of our salvation,
Praise Him for His love divine.

3.

For ten thousand blessings given,
For the hope of future joy;
Sound His praise through earth and heaven,
Sound Jehovah's praise on high.

4.

Joyfully on earth adore Him,
Till in heaven our song we raise;
There, enraptured, fall before Him,
Lost in wonder, love, and praise

GOD'S PREVENTING GOODNESS.

BY THE REV. HENRY ALLON, D.D.

"Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness."—PSALM xxi. 3.

HAT a characteristic note of the Old Testament this is! Its conception of God's rule was a stern one. The feeling of righteousness was very strong, the records of righteous retribution were very terrible, and the suffering experiences of life were very mysterious and severe, provoking outcries of remonstrance from men like Job, and David, and Jeremiah. But the feeling of God's goodness was the strongest feeling of all; nothing could repress it. It suffuses the Psalms with a wonderful sentiment of faith and joy. A new religious speech has to be created for the expression of it; such terms as "loving-kindness" and "tender mercies" are invented. Whatever the gloom, this light breaks in upon it; the thought of God's tender mercies turns every mourning into dancing. Psalms that begin as a Miserere, rapidly change into a Jubilate. The difficulties of a Job and a David find a religious solution. Job breaks out in passionate remonstrance, but still he adds, "though He slay me, yet will I trust Him." David complains of the prosperity of the wicked, and says for himself that he has "cleansed his heart in vain, and washed his hands in innocency;" and yet through the simple rising up of religious feeling, without anything happening, or a single word being said to him, the dark mood is chased away, and he sings of God's goodness. "Nevertheless, I am continually with Thee; whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee."

The feeling of God's goodness must have been amazingly strong to have prevailed, in that dispensation of imperfect knowledge, against the stern revelation of righteousness, against the dark mystery of providence.

There is nothing like it in the feeling excited by Pagan deities. Which of them—Baal, Rammuz, Moloch, Zeus, Jupiter, any one of the Olympian deities—is even thought of as a god of goodness? How is this Jewish conception—so vivid, so persistent, so predominant, so marvellous in its contrast—to be accounted for?

Here the conception of God's goodness is very remarkable; there is a kind of exuberance about it. "Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness:" a significant word, which the Revised Translation has wisely preserved to us, although its earlier meaning has been somewhat modified. It literally means "to come before," but the sense now commonly attached to it is that of hindering or obstructing. We "prevent" the thing that the man would do.

But to "come before" does not necessarily mean to hinder; its more exact meaning is to anticipate, and that is the sense in which it is used here: Thou anticipatest me with the blessings of Thy goodness; they come before my prayers, even before my anxious needs. Thy blessings wait upon our necessities.

It is a striking conception of the Divine benignity: that goodness in God is so characteristic and so spontaneous, so eager for expression even, that He does not wait for the expression of our desires, nor measure His blessings by the exact requests that we make; goodness is so pervading and powerful in His disposition that it finds expression of itself, foresees and calculates our necessities, so that when the moment of necessity comes and we begin to pray, we find that, before we call, God has answered—His protecting arm is already stretched out; the necessary supplies are already garnered. He anticipates the necessities of our lives, the desires of our hearts, "crowns our lives with His loving-kindness and tender mercies," so that room for prayer is scarcely left. In the words of another Psalm, "How great is the goodness which Thou hast treasured up for them that fear Thee;" a provision of goodness as in a garner or a storehouse. Here the idea is—that God ever gets beforehand with us; we never suffer lack through His forgetfulness or negligence; upon our arrival at each successive stage or experience of life, we find all needful blessings awaiting us, our necessities anticipated, so that at length even prayer itself gives up the effort to keep pace with God's forecasting and affluent provision, and we can only with a kind of discomfited and overflowing gratitude exclaim, "Thou preventest me with the blessings of Thy goodness." Our cup runneth over, and still God's bounty poureth on.

It is a remarkable conception of God, full of religious inspiration and power. It is a great deal more than merely saying that God is good—that He supplies and helps us when we need. It represents His goodness as so fundamental to His character, as so intense in its feeling, that it devises purposes and provides rich blessings beforehand. What an inspiration the conception is to our grateful love and trust, to our strenuous obedience and endurance! No good thing fails; the habit, the law of God's dealings with us is to prevent, to anticipate us with His blessings.

That this is a great deal more than a religious imagination, or an excited personal sentiment, may be seen in the records of the entire Bible history. The feeling, the representation throughout, is of eager, anticipating goodness.

Take the representation of the first sin—

> "Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit
> Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
> Brought death into the world, and all our woe,
> With loss of Eden"

—not to speak of the Eden itself, prepared for the newly created man, and enriched with every fitness, blessing, and beauty—the home of his abode, the temple of his worship—so as to be pronounced by the Creator himself to be "very good."

Not waiting for man's penitence or prayer. In the very utterance of his condemnation or sentence there is the promise of a Deliverer; a blessing is introduced into the curse. Unsolicited, unexpected, unthought-of Mercy lays its hand upon the uplifted arm of Justice. God's foreknowledge of human sin has quickened His love as well as His righteousness. The purpose to save is represented as being "from before the foundation of the world." God does not wait until sentence has been pronounced, until penalty has extorted the cry for mercy. He anticipates the retribution and its misery; before the guilty man can utter even a prayer for mercy the promise of it is eagerly added to the sentence.

Whatever the intrinsic character of the representation—literal history or religious parable—it is a marvellous and a touching conception of God's preventing goodness. While the sentence was a righteous necessity, the promise was a glad and eager goodness—"He delighteth in mercy."

So in the records of personal relations. In every instance the blessing anticipates the prayer, often the very sense of need. God tells the Jews that He chose them to be a special people, not because they were more in number than any people, but because of His love. He was "found of them that sought Him not." He said, "Behold Me! unto a nation that was not called by His name."

So the entire conception of the Gospel redemption is that its preachers are to carry it not where men crave it, but where they need it. God's yearning pity is chiefly excited by men's unconscious need. Sin has done its direst work when it has destroyed the sensibility to sin, just as slavery does its direst work when it produces the heart of a slave. "Not that we loved God, but that God loved us." "Even while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." The Gospel of salvation is to be preached amongst all nations. From first to last it is the supreme illustration of the great characteristic of anticipating, preventing goodness. And in the diffusion of the Gospel through the earth, this has been the great law, the only law possible to it. Its preachers did not wait until the cry for the Gospel came to them; they "went forth everywhere preaching the Word." Thus it came to us here in the far west; thus it is now sent by us all over the world. Wherever the Gospel comes it comes as a preventing mercy; the only beseeching for it is the dumb, inarticulate cry of man's sin and misery. Its first process is to make men conscious of their need of it. It creates the sense of sin for which it is the remedy. Is it not a striking phenomenon that our great missionary societies, our home evangelising agencies, are all the spontaneous inspirations and seekings of Christian pity and philanthropy?

So with all Christian preaching. It comes as a preventing mercy to the individual hearts of men. Its first salutation to the individual man is, "Salvation is come to thine house." It awakens the feeling of need that unconsciously craves it, and the faith that lays hold upon it. Thus it came to Peter's hearers on the day of Pentecost, "pricking them in their heart;" to Lydia, "opening her heart;" to the gaoler at Philippi, awakening his solicitude to be saved. Thus it came to Saul, the arch-persecutor, "who was before a blasphemer, but who obtained mercy." We do not choose Christ; He chooses us. He "takes away the stony heart out of us, and gives us hearts of flesh." He comes "to seek and to save the lost;" His saving mercy prevents us.

The meaning of all this is—that among the religions of the world the religion of Christ alone is a great inspiration of this amazing quality of God himself. He yearns to bless men with His goodness—makes provision beforehand, that His goodness may be partaken. He is "the blessed God," because He supremely delights in blessing. The highest enhancement of His blessing lies in its spontaneousness; its supreme reason in the goodness of His own yearning heart to us sinful men. It is goodness in the supreme form of mercy, so that His grace stands in an inverse ratio to our deservings. Precisely in the degree in which we forfeit our claim to the natural rights of a creature, it pours forth its tender yearnings and beseechings; "not that we loved God, but that God loved us." Do we, think you, realise this distinctive characteristic of the God of the Bible, of the mission of Jesus Christ, of the entire Christian life of His disciples in the world? It is not merely that God is good, but that He is spontaneously good. His goodness provides beforehand for our blessing. Surely, in any comparison of the religions of the world, this is the transcendent quality of the religion of the Bible.

The field of illustration is too vast for more than general remarks and indications. We might take the physical universe, the world of things and properties which we inhabit. It is a prepared treasury of blessings, the ordinary things of everyday use, the products of the earth, trees and flowers and harvests, the economy of the heavens, sunshine and rain, the changes of the seasons, the products and forces of nature, the hidden riches of the earth, the properties which science is every day disclosing; every discovery, even to the latest, being a blessing to men, an additional ministry to men's service and happiness. Surely it is not a mere accident, that, of the myriad hidden properties of physical nature, slowly discovered through the long centuries, every one should be a minister of help and blessing, not one should be malign; and all this the work of the Creator before man appeared on the earth; so that every physical need of the human creature was provided for before he came! God "prevented him by the blessings of His goodness." What a sermon from this great text of nature physical science has to preach!

So in the providence that rules the world—the orderings of human life—we see the same great characteristic of blessing; the affluence of thoughtful love which provides for the manifold wants and movements of human life; the blessings which attend our waking and anticipate our sleeping. He "compasses our rising up and our lying down, and is acquainted with all our ways." Unspeakably wonderful is the Divine thoughtfulness and tenderness that attend our daily steps. At every turn mercies are provided, without which life would be impossible or intolerable. How absolutely dependent we are upon the thousand minute provisions of what we may call God's active providence—the due admixture and supply of vital air, the minute and complex functions of our bodily organism, the varied necessities of its sustentation and healthfulness, the uniformity of great laws, and the freedom with which they work! Our dependence, again, upon the habits and good faith of myriads of fitful and wayward men around us, so that through a long succession of years life should be lived, and not one of these conditions should fail; that God's watchful eye should never for a moment be averted, His supporting hand never for a moment be withdrawn.

Talk of miracles! it were far less a miracle for God to repeat the wonders that He did by Moses, or the greater wonders that He wrought by Christ, or for God to work out for me signal deliverances in great exigencies, or to bestow upon me in sudden profusion a costly blessing:—all this were far less wonderful than this constant "holding of my soul in life;" this "visiting me every morning and trying me every moment;" this constant forecasting for my welfare, this waiting of His mercy upon my common necessities, so that the cravings of every moment shall find waiting and preventing blessings.

And then the problem of life is so perplexed by the fixedness of natural law and the freedom in which it works; and the economy of life, is so perplexed by the wickedness and wilfulness of men, who violate God's great laws, and in their awful prerogative of freedom rebel against Him! Men who would bow God out of His universe are eager to note the law; but they forget to account for the violations of it. And yet the order of the world continues! It is too wonderful for me. I have not credulity enough to be an atheist. A thousand problems there are in human suffering which I cannot even glance at; but, I am bold to say, their solution is easily suggested by the freedom and evil of the human creature—they are in their remedial purpose parts of the profound wisdom and goodness that orders all the great issues of human life. In our own individual lives we are perpetually working out the great problems of a wise and beneficent Providence.

The Bible, again, in its rich provision for the moral and spiritual life of men, would supply another affluent series of illustrations of this characteristic of the Divine goodness in its preventing or anticipating blessings. The wonderful history of its formation, extending over thirteen centuries; "holy men of old speaking as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;" but chiefly, the marvellous character of its teaching—full of reserved wisdom and power—so that the wiser and more experienced religious men become, the fuller of meaning and help and sufficiency the teachings of the Bible are. The Bible is more to this generation than it was to any generation before it: the more holy and spiritual men become, the more the Bible is to them. God's light and truth are continually breaking forth out of His Word. All other books become less and less, as knowledge and thought overtake them, all other systems are exhausted or superannuated; "the Word of the Lord endures for ever." Is not this, again, a miracle—a miracle of God's preventing goodness?

I have already alluded to the crowning proof of all—the redemption of Jesus Christ. If I do not further dwell upon it as an illustration of the preventing goodness of God, it is because its vastness makes it impracticable, and your familiarity with it makes it unnecessary. "Not that we loved God, but that God loved us." Or we might turn to practical religious life—prayer, for instance, which works so wonderfully in the economy of God's providence of life. It is its great characteristic—both in Scripture and in experience—that God "does for us exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." Even when prayer is the condition of blessing—when He "will be inquired of to do it for us"—when is God's blessing measured by our prayer? It comes abundantly, full measure, pressed down, running over. This seems to have been the Psalmist's special thought: "Thou hast given him his heart's desire, and hast not withholden the request of his lips: for Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness."

> "Beyond our utmost wants
> His love and power can bless;
> To praying souls He always grants
> More than they can express."

"He delighteth in mercy."

Is it not a great conception of God? What an inspiration of religious life there is in it! It is a characteristic of goodness that has a wonderful effect upon its recipient. The goodness is enhanced and augmented by the manner of it. Even of human benefaction we say, "He gives twice who gives quickly." Whatever the constraint of simple goodness itself, it is made more constraining by this spontaneous, eager manner of it. "The love of Christ constraineth us," not merely because of its benefits, but because of its pitifulness, its yearning sympathy, its eager relief. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us." "We love Him because He first loved us."

It is the direct expression of His own essential

Nature—hasting towards us in its goodness, eager for its own blessed satisfaction—that delights in the affluence and eagerness with which it enriches us. "He forgiveth all our iniquities, healeth all our diseases; He redeemeth our life from destruction, and crowneth us with loving-kindness and tender mercies: He satisfieth our mouth with good things, so that our youth is renewed like the eagle's."

And all this is made certain to us by the life and character and love of Him who is the "brightness of His Father's glory and the express image of His person," whom when men saw, they saw the Father—an embodiment of perfect, tender, infinite love, a Fountain of affluent, ineffable goodness. Whatever mystery about the Father's goodness there may be in the mingled good and evil of physical life, of human experience, there can be no doubt about the perfect, pitying, unspeakable goodness of Him whose love passeth knowledge. We cannot doubt the goodness of the Father when we see the character and mission and history of the Son.

What an inspiration of life it is! How perfect our trust may be—amid all the darkness, and the struggle, and the sorrow, to know that "Perfect Wisdom, perfect Love,

Are working for the best!"

How calmly and strongly we may do the work and bear the trials of life! What an inspiration of gratitude it is—the strongest, the most blessed of all human feelings; the highest, intensest form of love itself; "calling upon our souls and all that is within us to bless the Holy Name of the Lord"—to remember obligations; to record instances of mercy, in which God has anticipated our wants and exceeded our expectations. We "forget not all His benefits."

Thus we inspire and sustain our love to Him; our worship and our service; we "present our bodies a living sacrifice;" we "live not unto ourselves, but unto Him who has so loved us."

Above all, we try to be like Him; to be perfect in our ministering love as He is perfect. We forgive others their trespasses as He forgives us; we do good to all as He has done good to us: for this is our Lord's own great teaching in the Sermon on the Mount—that in the greatness and ministering of our human brotherhood we be "perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL LESSONS.

THE MISSION OF ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST.

To read—St. Mark i. 1—11. Golden text, ver. 3.

I. ST. JOHN A HERALD. (1—3.) Begin New Year with new course of Scripture lessons on life of Christ. Four accounts of Christ's life, all containing the "Gospel" (or good news) of His life and death. This Gospel written by St. Mark, friend of St. Peter, from whom probably learned much he has recorded. Also a friend of St. Paul, with whom he travelled on missionary tours. (Acts xii. 25.)

Begins Gospel by telling of Whom he is going to write. Notice the three names—

(a) Jesus (or Saviour) as foretold by angel to Joseph. (St. Matt. i. 21.)

(b) Christ (the Anointed One), anointed with Holy Ghost for His work as Prophet, Priest, King. (St. Matt. iii. 16.)

(c) Son of God, as declared by God himself. (St. Matt. iii. 17.)

Before great persons came, in olden time, two things to be done.

(a) Messenger sent on before to announce coming.

(b) Royal road prepared—hills levelled—valleys filled up.

Much more would God's Son need announcing and preparing for.

St. John foretold as messenger (Mal. iii. 1) to tell news of Christ's coming—to come in spirit and power of Elijah. (Mal. iv. 5.) How was he like him?

(a) Both stood up alone for God amongst ungodly.

(b) Both confronted wicked kings, Ahab and Herod.

(c) Both lived hard, austere lives.

(d) Both met with great success.

II. ST. JOHN PREACHING TO THE PEOPLE. (4—8.) St. John foretold as "preparing the way." (Isaiah xl. 3.) How did he do so? He preached repentance, viz.—(a) Confession of sin (ver. 5).

(b) Contrition for sin—i.e., true godly sorrow.

(c) Change of life. Publicans to leave off fraud, soldiers violence, etc. (St. Luke iii. 12, 14.)

Thus turned heart of people from sin to holiness, from Satan to God.

As sign of new life, must be baptised. Water, pure and clean, cleansing and refreshing body—sign of grace of Holy Spirit cleansing soul. (1 Pet. iii. 21.)

St. John also bade the people believe on Christ—called Him the "Lamb of God who takes away sin." (St. John i. 29.) How does he describe Him?

(a) Mightier than himself—able to heal and save.

(b) Baptising with fire of Holy Ghost.

LESSONS from St. John's mission—

1. Repentance from sin.
2. Faith in Christ the Saviour.
3. Confession of Christ before men.

III. ST. JOHN BAPTISING CHRIST. (9—11.) Why was Christ baptised?

(a) To commend baptism to His people.
(b) To be made one with His brethren.
(c) To set example of obedience.
His baptism followed by signs of God's favour.
(a) Opening of the heavens.
(b) Descent of the Holy Spirit.
(c) God's voice speaking.

LESSONS. 1. Submission to authority gains approval of God.

2. Lowly spirit will be filled with God's Spirit.

A SABBATH IN THE LIFE OF JESUS.

To read—St. Mark i. 21—34. Golden text—St. Luke iv. 16.

I. TEACHING. (21, 22.) Christ and His disciples go to Capernaum for the Sabbath. Sabbath ordained as day of rest. (Gen. ii. 3.) All labour forbidden by which man earns his living; but Christ was to teach that works of mercy might be done. But first He goes to the synagogue for worship.

Service consisted of "reading the Law and Prophets," reciting psalms, and saying prayers. Also instruction by rulers of the synagogue or others. (See Acts xiii. 15.)

Christ invited to teach as at Nazareth. (St. Luke iv. 18.) What did He teach, and how?

(a) His own mission to the world. (St. Luke iv. 18.)
(b) With authority as having come from God.

II. HEALING AN UNCLEAN SPIRIT. (23—28.) What a contrast between peaceful service of prayer, praise, and reading, and the ravings of a lunatic!

Notice the power of the unclean spirit.
(a) He tore the man so that he had no self-control.
(b) He knew who Christ was.
Notice the power of Christ.
(a) He silenced his ravings.
(b) He cast him out immediately.

Thus showing His human sympathy and His Divine power.

Are people thus possessed now? Evil tempers, drink, lust, etc., like demons. How can they be cured? Must seek Christ in same way, in His house, in prayer. His power still the same.

No wonder His fame spread!

III. HEALING THE SICK. (29—34.) Service over, Christ with four disciples enter St. Peter's house. What a blessing Christ is to all the houses He enters!

(a) Multiplied wine at the marriage-feast.
(b) Sympathised with sisters of Lazarus.
(c) Healed St. Peter's mother-in-law.
Notice (a) Christ touches her—no fear of infection.
(b) Heals her at once—showing acute sympathy.
(c) Accepts her services—approving of gratitude.

So the day passes on, but Christ's work not yet done.

At sunset, so as not to break (as they thought) the Sabbath—and in the cool of the evening—all the sick from neighbouring houses brought in. All—sick in body and mind—at once healed, but devils not allowed to say they knew Him. Why not?

Christ wanted to be acknowledged, not out of fear, but love. Accepted love and ministrations of Martha cooking food, Mary pouring out ointment, and others, but cares not for forced recognition.

LESSON. World still full of sin and misery. Christ, ever the same, sees, heals, knows, pities. We may take our suffering friends to Him. He will help, and also accept our services.

HEALING OF THE LEPER.

To read—St. Mark i. 35—45. Golden text—ver. 42.

I. PRAYER AND PREACHING. (35—39.) How tired Christ would be after long day's service in synagogue—talking to groups of fishermen—healing numbers of sick. How glad of rest! Most would sleep late and long after such a day. What did Christ do?

(a) Rose very early.
(b) Went into solitary place for retirement.
(c) Began the day with prayer.
What an example to us! Why did Christ do this?
(a) To prepare for day's trials and disappointments.
(b) To prepare for the day's duties.

Disciples seek Him—tell Him how popular He has become—crowds seek Him. Why does He not return?

He must not seek praise of man.
He must preach to as many as possible.

LESSONS. 1. A busy life needs most prayer. Remind of David the king, Daniel the statesman, Nehemiah the steward—all men of prayer.

2. God's work can never stand still. Success should lead to farther effort. Christ always went about doing good.

II. HEALING THE LEPER. (40—45.) Leprosy fearful disease. It was—(a) Foul—covering the body—making whole unclean.

(b) Infectious—requiring lepers to live alone—worship in screened corner of synagogue—keep "afar off" from others.

(c) Incurable by ordinary means. (2 Kings v. 7, 15.)

This man heard of Christ. What did he do?
(a) Came to Him—showing faith.
(b) Besought Him—from a sense of need.
(c) Knelt—in worship to Him as God.
How did Christ treat him?
(a) Pitied him—showing sympathy as man.
(b) Touched him—as priest.
(c) Healed him—by His power as God.
Then gave him two commands—
(a) To be silent as to his cure.
(b) To offer the thank-offering commanded in the law. (Lev. xiv. 10.)

LESSON. Leprosy always been regarded as type of sin. Sin also is—

(a) Foul—infects whole man. (Isaiah i. 5.)
(b) Infectious—spreads over the world. (Gen. vi. 5.)
(c) Incurable—by man's own effort. (Hos. xiii. 9.)
But the same Saviour is ours.
He is able to save to the uttermost. (Heb. vii. 25.)
He is willing to save all who seek Him.
He did forgive the penitent thief. (St. Luke xxiii. 43.)
Shall we not seek forgiveness?

FORGIVENESS AND HEALING.

To read—St. Mark ii. 1—17. Golden text—Psalms ciii. 3.

I. THE SICK OF THE PALSY. (1—12.) Describe an Eastern house, and how it differs from English one.

(a) Built round an open courtyard.

XUM

(b) Windows opening inside and not outside.
(c) Roof flat—used for sitting, praying, etc.
(d) Staircase outside from roof to street.

Courtyard in day covered with a kind of tarpaulin to protect from sun. Under this a large crowd assembled, blocking up whole space even to very doors.

Procession approaches house—sick man carried on his mattress-bed by four friends. Doorway to courtyard blocked up, so carry him by outer staircase to roof—uncover the tarpaulin—let him down by ropes into Christ's presence. Notice four classes of people.

(a) Man, sick in body and soul.
(b) Friends, sympathetic, bringing man to Christ.
(c) Christ waiting to be gracious.
(d) Scribes looking on and sneering.

Christ first heals the man's soul—then his body.

How did Christ show Himself to be God?

(a) He knew what the Scribes were thinking.
(b) Also what the man most wanted—forgiveness.
(c) He cured the man's disease.

Therefore had Divine Power; could forgive sins.

Thus confuted the Scribes, and showed Himself indeed the Son of God.

LESSONS. 1. Faith blessed to others. When Christ saw their faith He blessed the sick man. Similar cases—

Centurion came on behalf of his servant.

Syro-Phœnician for her daughter.

2. Type of our Lord's all-prevailing intercession for man. (Heb. vii. 25.)

II. THE CALL OF LEVI. (13—17.) What made him become a disciple?

(a) Had heard Christ's teachings by the Lake.
(b) Had seen the paralytic cured.
(c) Had learned to believe in Christ.

How was his faith shown? By—

(a) Obedience—followed Christ at once.
(b) Hospitality—made a feast for Christ.
(c) Zeal for souls—invited fellow-publicans.

Who came in and saw the assembled party?

Scribes—writers of the Law.

Pharisees—trusted in themselves that they were righteous.

Both these despised the Publicans as sinners, heathen, and outcasts.

What did Christ say? His mission was to sinners.

LESSONS. Sinners alone obtain salvation. Christ came to seek and save the lost.

THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER.

To read—St. Mark iv. 1—20. Golden Text—Verse 23.

I. THE PARABLE. (1—9.) Notice the circumstances.

Great crowd collected to hear Christ—eager to learn.

Christ sits in St. Peter's boat—convenient pulpit—willing to teach.

Congregation stand on shore, or sit on sand.

A sower comes in sight on hill opposite. His work with its failures and successes turned into a parable—teaching from nature.

Notice four kinds of ground.

(a) Wayside—seed soon trodden down or picked up.
(b) Stony—little earth—small plant—soon scorched.
(c) Thorny—full growth, but no fruit—choked by thorns.
(d) Good, i.e., prepared—properly ploughed—clods broken up—weeds removed—watered and cared for.

The seed the same in all—good.

The result—failure three times, success once, but in three degrees, 30, 60, 100-fold.

II. THE MEANING. (10—20.) Christ asked by disciples and others for explanation.

Two classes of people—those who care and those who care not to learn.

(a) Disciples (or learners)—seekers after truth, shall be taught.

(b) Others—careless, dull—see not, nor wish to see—become duller, less able to learn—gradually blinded like the Pharisees. (St. John ix. 41.)

This Parable simple—easy to understand. Notice—

1. The Sower, i.e., the teacher. Christ and His disciples.

Ministers and teachers. All who in any way teach others about God.

2. The seed—God's holy truth—the Word of God—sown at different periods of life.

(a) In childhood—often makes no impression.
(b) In youth—quick impressions soon lost.
(c) In manhood—impression effaced by other things.

3. The ground—man's heart—able to receive.

But there are four kinds of ground—

(a) Wayside, i.e., stubborn heart—not receiving Word at all. Why not? Satan on watch—suggests other thoughts—drives away words sown.

(b) Stony ground, i.e., hard hearts. At first hear joyfully—Gospel sounds pleasant—but persecution comes—laughed at, etc. No root—no firmness—religious habits, such as prayer, etc., dropped—no result.

(c) Thorny ground, i.e., sordid hearts. Plant formed, i.e., person apparently decided for Christ, but no fruit of good life. Why not? Other things occupy heart—pleasure, cares, money-getting, etc.

(d) Good ground, i.e., sordid hearts. Sin put away—evil thoughts checked—bad habits given up. Then hearts ready to hear truth—it will sink in—show result in lives spent in God's service. Fruit in all—more or less abundant. (Gal. v. 22.)

LESSON. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

SANTA CLAUS AT CLIFF COTTAGE.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

"SISSY," said one rather mournful little voice, "will there be any Christmas here?"

"Oh yes, Gertie, to be sure there will! When Christmas comes, it's Christmas everywhere—right round the world!"

"But, Sissy," began another voice, not quite so plaintive as the last, but still decidedly dismal, "will there be any turkey and roast beef and plum pudding here? It won't seem like Chrstmas without."

Poor little Sissy! She was only fourteen, and so small and slight as to look much younger, yet already the care of two little brothers and one tiny sister seemed to have devolved mainly upon her. Less than a year ago, as their sweet mother lay dying, she had called her eldest daughter to her side, and asked her to try and be a "little mother" to the three younger ones, the eldest of whom was only eight; and "Sissy," as she was always called, though her real name was Madelaine, had promised earnestly to do her very best, though little guessing how hard the task would be.

The mother's death proved to be only the beginning of troubles. Mr. Dean, the children's father, was a clergyman of very small private means, who had for many years occupied the post of curate-in-charge of a wide rustic district in the midlands, which gave him a pleasant house and a comfortable income. But he was not at any time a robust man, and he was always disposed to work too hard and to spare himself too little. The shock of his wife's death affected him so seriously that it brought on an affection of the throat, which had occasionally threatened him before; and to make a long story short, he had been obliged to resign his curacy and retire with his four young children to a remote district in South Devon, where the climate was likely to be beneficial to him, and live there as best he might upon the interest of the £3,000 that comprised the whole of his fortune.

Possibly they might have been absolutely unable to "make both ends meet" had Mr. Dean and his little daughter been left quite alone to face this change of fortune; but the children's faithful nurse, Martha, had insisted on accompanying her nurslings and her kind master into their exile, and somehow, with her thrift and managing ways, the household was clothed and fed, the rent paid, and the quarter's bills settled, and there was yet a small margin, though a very small one, of the quarter's income to be laid by "against a rainy day."

Sissy was quite old enough to understand the change in the fortunes of the family, and sufficiently womanly to do her very best to cheer the spirits of her father, and to keep the little ones happy and amused; but sometimes during these short, dark autumn and winter days, it was an uphill battle, and the children, unable to find amusement out of doors, and confined within the narrow limits of one tiny parlour, without any new toys or books to enliven them, would often grow fretful or depressed, and tax to their utmost limit the powers and the patience of the brave little sister-mother.

In justice to the little ones, it must be admitted that they were docile, sweet-tempered children, seldom actively troublesome or boisterously rude, and more disposed to be depressed and aggrieved than angry. Still Sissy's lot was not always an easy one, and her earnest wish to see the little ones happy made the pain all the greater when she could not quite succeed.

Her busy brain had been hard at work for many days over the vexed question of "Santa Claus." She was too wise a little maiden to expect the socks and stockings to fill themselves, or to be filled by a fairy in furs who came down the chimney. She knew that mother had made or bought all the pretty little trifles that had so delighted them Christmas by Christmas; and now that those kind, skilful, busy fingers were at rest for ever, and there was no money in the household purse to be spent in toys or trinkets, how could the row of little socks be filled on Christmas Eve? How could Santa Claus be brought to Cliff Cottage?

Something must and should be done: and Sissy had cudgelled her brains, and Martha had helped her by more than one suggestion or promise: and at last a gleam or two of hope had lighted up the darkness: so when the eager cry met her ear, "Will there be any Santa Claus?" she smiled and nodded, and looked mysterious, but finally said they must "wait and see."

The little ones augured well from this. Of course Sissy knew, and she wouldn't have looked like that if no Santa Claus was to be expected.

"I don't expect the Santa Claus down here is a rich Santa Claus," she hastened to explain, fearing to awaken too much hope. "He'll be a regular country Santa Claus, I daresay, and won't have the things one buys in shops, because the shops are so far away; but I expect he'll come, and we'll hang our stockings out for him. I don't think he'll quite forget us just because we've come to Cliff Cottage."

This conversation took place about a week before Christmas Day; and upon the following afternoon, which chanced to be very bright and warm and fine, Martha took the three younger children with her on an expedition to the farm which supplied the little household with milk and butter (a place they much delighted to visit), and Sissy, who, much to the surprise of the little ones, had declined the walk, watched them start with a smile on her earnest face.

The moment she was alone she ran into the kitchen, and took from a cupboard there two good-sized baskets, evidently placed there in readiness, together with a strong knife and a ball of string, and loading her small person with these things till she looked something like a donkey between panniers, she started off with a look of resolute purpose in the direction of a wood that lay about a mile distant.

On the farther side of that wood—to which place, in fact, the wood belonged—stood a fine old manor-house, often spoken of as Cliff Manor, in which lived an elderly childless couple—General and Mrs. Munroe. They were very quiet people, going little into society, and only entertaining their neighbours some two or three times in the course of the year. They were liked and respected in the county, but no one was intimate at the Manor. They had had many troubles in the course of their life, especially in the loss of the two fine lads who had once made the old house ring with life and gaiety. This sad loss (both boys had died in the same week, of scarlet fever) had greatly aged the parents; and although they were not really old, they seemed to have retired from active life from that time forward, and to live in the past as few people do who have only lately passed the meridian of middle life. General Munroe was about sixty years of age, and his wife a few years younger. They were still active in their movements, and often walked long distances together; but they seldom left the confines of their own somewhat extensive property, and their visits were paid more to their own tenants than to their social equals.

On this particular afternoon they had been on a round of some extent. They had wished to satisfy themselves personally that all their people were able to enjoy Christmas in a comfortable and substantial fashion; and in cases of need or sickness, to supplement the family's resources by appropriate and discriminating assistance. The General and his wife were very kind people, and very wise too (unluckily these two qualities do not always go together), and whilst very severe towards those guilty of wilful idleness, extravagance, and self-indulgence, they were exceedingly gentle with those whose poverty was genuine, and very thoughtful for all who were honestly seeking work and suffering for lack of it. They were returning from one of these charitable rounds when the General chanced to say to his wife:

"Shall we take the path through the wood, my dear? It is wonderfully dry under foot, and things are looking very pretty in their winter garb."

Mrs. Munroe assented, and very soon they were walking through the lonely pathway that led through the little wooded dingle. The owners of the pretty place did not often pass that way themselves. Their boys had made it one of their favourite haunts, and for the parents it was too full of sad and tender associations to be a spot frequently visited by them.

When they were about half-way through it, the General suddenly paused.

"Hallo! what's that?" he exclaimed. "What a quaint little figure, to be sure!"

His wife's eyes followed the direction of his glance, and rested upon the stooping figure of a little girl in a very old black frock, who was kneeling on the ground beneath a spreading oak-tree and gathering acorns with great assiduity.

Two baskets stood near to her: one appeared to be full already—too full, indeed, to be shut down—and from the open mouth protruded a number of green rushes. The other basket stood wide open, and from time to time the little girl emptied into it the acorns she had collected in her frock.

Now, it was no uncommon thing in the winter months for the poor people of the place to send their children out to collect acorns to give to their pigs; but this little girl did not look like a cottage child. She had a delicate, refined face, with big brown eyes full of thoughtful purpose, and a sensitive little mouth, the lines of which gave something of wistfulness to the character of the countenance. The dress, too, though very plain and poor, had that air of neatness and finish which is seldom seen in the attire of the peasant class. Altogether there was something quaint and unusual in the appearance of the small intruder that attracted the attention of the General and his wife, and aroused their curiosity.

"Have you any idea who she is?" whispered Mrs. Munroe.

"Not the least; but I mean to find out. She seems to have an odd collection in that basket of hers; yet she looks too serious and staid to amass rubbish as young children do. I mean to inquire into it."

General and Mrs. Munroe advanced from beneath the shelter of the intervening trees, till the rustle of their steps upon the dead leaves caused the child to spring up and turn round. They saw her more plainly then—a quaint little figure with an earnest, startled face, and a certain look of quiet self-possession that sat oddly upon her diminutive person.

"Well, little woman," said the General kindly, "and what may you be doing out here in my wood, eh?"

Rather a nervous quiver crossed the child's face, but the answer was quietly spoken.

"I hope I'm not intruding. I thought anyone might come here. Indeed, I don't think I've done any harm."

"I am sure you have not," Mrs. Munroe hastened to say; "but what are you doing, my dear?"

"Oh, please, I'm collecting Santa Claus," was the not too intelligible answer; "for the children, you know," she added, after a pause, as if to make all clear.

"Collecting Santa Claus, my dear!" repeated the lady, somewhat mystified; whilst the General, who caught the child's meaning more distinctly, laughed and said—

"But doesn't Santa Claus come of his own accord to little folks like you, without having to be collected first?"

But Sissy shook her wise little head.

"The children think so," she answered cautiously. "That's why I can't bear to have them disappointed, just because we are poor. There won't be any turkey, you see, and Christmas dinner won't be very much like Christmas, and there won't be any proper presents; but I can't bear that there should be no Santa Claus when they wake up. It would be so dreadful if Christmas began with crying, and they will cry if the socks are all empty: at least, Gertie and Bertie will, if Freddie doesn't. So I'm going to make Santa Claus for them myself if I can. It won't be quite the same, but it will be something, and much better than nothing."

"And what are you going to make?" asked Mrs. Munroe; and the genuine ring of interest in the tone unlocked Sissy's lips, and caused her to become communicative at once.

"Well, you see these rushes here? I can make little baskets out of them—baskets and mats and dolls' hats; and with holly-berries sewn on to them they look quite pretty. Martha is going to make a lot of little tiny buns to put in the baskets, and she is going to get a few sweetmeats too, and I shall make little bags for them out of odds and ends of print and silk, and that makes a kind of beginning, you know. Then acorn-cups and holly-berries strung together make lovely chains and necklaces and things for Gertie, and I've made a new frock for her best dolly too. It's more difficult to arrange for boys, but they like playing horses, so I'm going to make them a whole set of double and single harness, made out of acorns threaded on string, and some scarlet braid that Martha can spare. And I'm going to make them a set of ninepins, too, out of their old broken set. I've got fir cones for the heads that all got broken off. And the carpenter, Long (he's such a kind man!), he's going to stick them on firm, and I am to go to-morrow to his shop and paint them all with his paints, and the balls too, and make them like new. Acorn-cups do for dolls' tea-cups too, and one can do a lot of things with holly-berries, and hips and haws, and fir-cones, and gall-nuts, and acorns, and beech-nuts. Martha's going to help me. We've got some pictures and some coloured and gold paper, and odds and ends often turn up and work in. And after the children have gone to bed these next nights we are going to set to work as hard as ever we can. We shall make frames for some of the pictures, and we can make animals out of old pieces of rag stuffed with bran—with berries for eyes, and bits of red flannel for tongues, and shoelaces for tails. Martha is very clever; and there are a good many things I can do, from watching mother other years, and looking after the children when she died. Oh, I think we shall be able to collect and make them a real nice Santa Claus, and if they have that, I know they'll be as good as gold all day. A very little makes them happy now. They've had so few new things since we came to live here."

"Where do you live, my dear?" asked the lady gently.

"Over there, in the little house they call Cliff Cottage, about a mile away from the village."

"And how long have you been living there?"

"We came at the end of September. You see, after mother died, and father lost his voice, and was ill, and couldn't do clergyman's work any more, we had to leave the nice place we'd lived in, and come where it was warm and cheap. It's made father better already, not having to use his voice or to go out in the wet and cold. I think he might soon take duty again; but he says he may not be able to get it when he wants it. I think he could, because he is so very good, and because I'm sure God would hear him when he asked for things. But then, of course, as father says, some very good men have had very great trials and troubles to bear, as he has. However, father always knows that whatever happens is right, and though he can't help being anxious and sad sometimes, he is never really unhappy. That is a great comfort," pursued the little woman, who appeared to find it a real relief to talk, with the frankness of a child, to these truly sympathetic strangers. "He does not really mind being so poor except for the children—no more do I. And now that I've collected things enough to make them a nice Santa Claus, I don't feel as if I minded anything. I'm so much obliged to you for letting me have things out of your wood. I hope I haven't done any harm. I don't think I have. And now I think I must be going home. Good-bye, and thank you very much."

"What is your name, my dear?" asked the lady, as this small morsel of humanity lifted up her two baskets, and prepared to trot off with her load.

"Sissy Dean. Good-bye, sir; good-bye, madam."

"Dean—Dean," repeated the General, as the slight, childish figure disappeared amid the trees. "The name recalls nothing; yet that child's eyes and face and whole manner seemed strangely familiar."

"It did not strike me."

"No? I was haunted all the while she was talking by some memory that eluded me persistently. I mean to make some inquiries about them. A broken-down clergyman, in poverty at our very gates, ought not to be a stranger to us. But the troubles of distressed gentlefolks are the last that ever reach our ears."

"Indeed, yes, and yet are generally the hardest of all. As you say, we will make a few inquiries; and it shall not be our fault if these poor dear children do not have a brighter Christmas than they anticipate."

"I thought of that myself," answered the General, with a smile upon his face. "How glad I am that we came this way to-day!"

Christmas Eve had come. The day had been a very busy one for all the inmates of Cliff Cottage, for there had been the little rooms and tiny hall to decorate with holly and greenery, the house to "clean down," as Martha expressed it, in readiness for the coming festival, and a number of simple preparations to make, in order that Christmas should be as cheerful as possible to all within that humble home.

The children had gone to bed at their usual hour, quite tired out by all the labours of the day. A row of stockings hung suspended from the foot of the little cribs, the small owners of which were in great hopes of having them filled in the night from the wonderful sack of the beneficent Santa Claus. Freddie was somewhat exercised in his mind because there was no chimney in the large double attic room that served as night nurseries, for he fancied the fairy always came down the chimney; but Sissy had comforted him by the assurance that if the little fur-capped man meant to find his way into the attic he would not be stopped by so trifling an obstacle as the want of a chimney.

So the children had gone to sleep in a state of glad anticipation, and Sissy was putting the last touches to her labour of love at the kitchen table, which looked quite gay with the array of pretty and ingenious trifles that busy brains and willing fingers had manufactured for the little ones up-stairs, so that Christmas in Cliff Cottage might not be too entirely unlike the same season in the former home.

"I heard such a funny noise a little while ago, Martha," remarked Sissy, as she surveyed the result of her labour of love with a not unpardonable pride. "It was when you were up-stairs with the children. It sounded like coal being put into our shed, only, of course, it couldn't be, because we've got to make what we have last a long time yet."

"To be sure we have," answered Martha briskly. "Coal's dear in these parts: we must be economical with it. Luckily, 'tisn't so cold by a long way as up farther north, so things are about as broad as long."

"I won't take the things up till quite late," said Sissy, her face smiling all over as she surveyed her pretty array of little toys and ornaments and cakes, "because they might wake up and see me. We never saw mother do it. We always thought Santa Claus came down the chimney with the things. Martha, don't they look pretty! I'm so glad we've got a real sort of Santa Claus for the children! They'll go on thinking he's a real fairy now for ever so long. I wish I could think so too. It used to be such a nice feeling," and Sissy gave a little natural sigh of regret for the lost illusions of her vanished childhood.

Just at that moment a curious rumbling as of wheels became audible in the diminutive paved yard which lay just outside the back door. Martha and Sissy both raised their heads to listen. Certainly there was something outside—something on wheels. It seemed to stop just at the back door. A single blow was struck upon the panel, and Sissy, whose hearing was very acute, fancied that she heard steps cautiously retreating, and then running away fast down the road. Martha had risen to her feet.

"'Why, child, I can't think what it all means.'"—p. 189.

"Gracious goodness! Who can be at the door at this time of night?" she cried, and went to undo the bolts and lock. Sissy stood just behind her, half-expectant, half-frightened. When the door was opened, no living thing appeared in sight; but just outside stood a sort of porter's trolly heaped with parcels and baskets; and in full view, as they stood astonished at the apparition, was a great card, on which was printed in large letters—"A present from Santa Claus to the little folks at Cliff Cottage."

"Gracious me!" cried Martha, looking vainly round for some farther explanation of the puzzle; whilst Sissy clasped her hands in silent ecstasy, and said to herself softly—

"Then there is a Santa Claus, after all—a real Santa Claus—and he's come!"

Martha meantime had stepped out with the lamp to look round for some more practical explanation of the puzzle. She came back very quickly, however, with a look of even greater bewilderment upon her face.

"Why, child, I can't think what it all means. The shed's as full of coal as it can hold, and there's a great pile of logs against the wall, as I've not seen this many a year. The fairies seem to have been at work. I can't make head or tail of it, anyhow!"

"It's Santa Claus!" cried Sissy, her pale face aglow. "Oh, Martha, don't you understand? There is a real Santa Claus, and he's come to us! Oh, do let us see what he has brought!"

Sissy looked years younger all in a moment. The grave, careworn expression that so often clouded the natural gaiety of the child's face was quite gone now, and smiles and dimples chased one another round the laughing little mouth. Martha looked again at the card, and gave up trying to find a natural solution to the puzzle.

"Well, it all seems plain enough. Yes, to be sure, child; carry anything in you like. It's all for you and the children. We may just as well have a look at the things first."

What a wonderful unpacking and inspection that was!

Out of one long cardboard box came a lovely wax doll, almost as big as a baby: a doll with clothes that would take off and put on, and with a wardrobe that would have done credit to a duchess. Then there was a wonderful horse on wheels that could be ridden like a tricycle; and a mechanical locomotive, that when wound up could pull a whole set of trucks after it. There were boxes of sweetmeats and a great frosted Christmas cake; little toys and big toys, bricks and games and puzzles; and nearly at the bottom was a big box labelled thus: "For the little girl who made Santa Claus for the others;" and when Sissy, with a beating heart and glowing cheeks, lifted the lid and looked in, she saw that it contained a work-box and a writing-desk in satin-wood, beautifully fitted with everything she could possibly want, and underneath lay a selection of tempting-looking story-books in bright covers, the very sight of which made the child's eyes glisten with delight; for Sissy loved reading, and she had not had a new book since last Christmas Day.

Altogether, she was so much overwhelmed that she sank down upon the floor, hugging some of the new books in her arms.

"Oh, Martha!" she cried, "I'm sure it's all a dream! Oh, I do hope I shall keep on dreaming it for hours. It is so lovely!"

But getting no reply, she looked round, and saw that whilst she had been unpacking the toys, Martha had found occupation over a couple of big hampers, and that the dresser was groaning beneath the weight of the load laid upon it; and with another great "Oh!" of unmitigated astonishment, Sissy drew near to see the wonders that had been unearthed.

First there was a huge turkey, all stuffed with sausages just ready to pop into the pot; and beside it was a great ham ready for table, even to the frill round the shank-bone; then there was a huge plum pudding, quite the grandfather of all Christmas puddings, and a big dish of mince-pies, and another of snowy meringues. And there was a basket of new-laid eggs and a large jar of clotted cream, a pot of preserved ginger, and some lovely rosy apples and great yellow pears. Oranges and crackers were amongst the children's things, and as the astonished servant and her little mistress stood in the midst of all this wonderful profusion, they could only look at one another in blank astonishment, whilst Sissy said, with a deep-drawn sigh, "I never in all my life knew such a delightful Santa Claus!"

Sissy had certainly never looked forward to such a happy Christmas Day as the one spent in Cliff Cottage that year. Even the piled-up fires and the grand Yule logs seemed to share in the general delight of the young folks; and the father, who had heard all about the wonderful Santa Claus from the faithful servant overnight, put aside his own sadness to join in his children's happy enjoyment; and though much perplexed to account for the wonderful gifts showered upon them, had resolved, despite a momentary shrinking of sensitive pride, to accept them in the spirit in which they were evidently offered.

Sissy was very politic in her method of dispensing the fairy gifts. The stockings were duly filled with the simple trifles of her own manufacture, which greatly delighted the recipients without unduly exciting them. Then upon the well-laid breakfast-table, beside the unwonted luxury of eggs and ham, was a box of sweetmeats for each child, that evoked a clamour of pleased surprise.

Then came the walk to church and the beautiful joyous service, into which Sissy entered heart and soul, and which all the little ones enjoyed; and Gertie whispered to her sister that "she thought the angels helped to make things nice at Christmas, because it was Jesus's birthday, and He liked everyone to be pleased."

The walk home through the bright frosty air, and the wonderful dinner which followed that hungry exercise, were both enjoyed in turn, and the children exchanged puzzled glances as they took their seats at table, whilst Bertie gravely asked if the turkey had "comed of his own self," which greatly delighted his brother and sisters.

But the grandest moment of the day was about dusk, when the little ones were called across into father's room, where the table had been pushed on one side, and the toys spread out in tempting array (ticketed with the name of the new owner) in the light of the roaring log fire.

Oh, what a hubbub of delight there was! what a shouting and laughing, and hugging and scrimmaging, as the little ones claimed their wonderful presents, and shouted aloud in the joy of their hearts. It was long indeed before the tumult subsided, and the little ones were able to listen, with grave and absorbed faces, to Sissy's story of how Santa Claus had sent a truck-full of things, as well as a cellar-full of coal, and how the truck had vanished in the night as mysteriously as it had come. Six eyes, round with awe and astonishment, were fixed upon Sissy's face as she told the tale, and three earnest faces grew grave with the intensity of interest; but at the end Bertie heaved a great sigh, and summed up the family feeling in the following remark—

"Well, I do think he's a dear, nice, kind Santa Claus; and I hope he'll go on coming to see us every Christmas for ever and ever."

Three days later Sissy was surprised to be told by Martha that a lady and gentleman had called to see her father, and as he was out, had asked for her. Callers were so rare at Cliff Cottage that Sissy was a good deal surprised and rather frightened, but she knew she must go if asked for, and with some trepidation approached the door of the little room opposite the dining-room, which her father used as a study.

The moment she opened the door she recognised in the visitors the lady and gentleman who had surprised her in the wood the other day. The gentleman had in his hand a miniature portrait of her mother which always stood on the mantle-shelf, and he was talking to his wife with some excitement.

"My dear," he said, the moment the little girl appeared, "I want to know who you are."

"I—I am Madelaine Dean, though they always call me Sissy," answered the child, in some surprise. "You see, mother's name was Madelaine, and they began it to make a difference. Since mother died——"

But the old gentleman had turned, in visible excitement, to his wife.

"There! I was certain of it. If she had said Madelaine the other day I should have got the clue at once. My dear, was not your mother's name Madelaine Trevor before she married your father?"

"Yes," answered Sissy, opening her eyes wide. "Did you know her, please?"

"My dear, she was my cousin, and, as children, we loved each other dearly; but families get broken up, and I was abroad soldiering for many years after I entered the army, and lost sight of many friends and relatives, Madelaine amongst them. I knew she was married years ago, but her married name had long escaped me. Your face recalled hers, though I could not recollect at first of whom you reminded me. My dear, we are relations of yours—the nearest, perhaps, that you have. We must not be strangers any longer;" and Sissy was taken in the arms first of the gentleman, and then of the lady, and tenderly kissed and caressed.

And after that visit, somehow things began to be different at Cliff Cottage, and strange and pleasant things happened one after another in regular succession. One of these was a long visit to the Manor House, which was quite a new experience for the children, and which completely restored the father to his wonted health and strength; and very soon afterwards came the news that he was made rector of a small country parish not very many miles away. Sissy was old enough to understand that that meant the end of the pressing poverty they had suffered once, and a restoration of her father to the duties he loved so well and prosecuted so zealously.

Long before another Christmas came round, the Deans were established in their pretty new house, of which Sissy made a capable and quaint little mistress, and very happy are all the family, and very grateful to their kind kinsfolk and friends, to whom, in one sense, they owe it. But Bertie always boldly asserts that "Santa Claus began it all." One of the stories they never tire of telling to each other is how Santa Claus came to Cliff Cottage, and what wonderful things he brought with him.

EVELYN EVERETT-GREEN.

THE JOY OF CHRIST.

BY THE REV WILLIAM BURNET, M.A.

WE are perhaps too much accustomed to think of our blessed Lord as only the "Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief." Such undoubtedly He was, and this aspect of His character has ever been a source of exceeding great comfort to His tried and sorrowful people. Still, we should seriously err if we were to regard His life as one of unmitigated suffering and shrouded in unbroken gloom. It is mentioned in a letter of very doubtful authority, said to have been written by Lentulus to the Roman Senate concerning Jesus Christ, that "He was never seen to laugh, but that He has been observed to weep." This remarkably accords with the inspired accounts of the New Testament, where He is thrice said to have wept and only once to have rejoiced. There are, however, other considerations which point to a juster and more complete conception of what He really was. Since He was at once perfect God and perfect Man, His must have been in the highest sense a joyous spirit. From the very harmony of His own being, and as the Source and Fount of happiness to His creatures, God must be supremely happy. He who was "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of His person," even when He tabernacled on earth in human nature, must have participated in that happiness. His deep and inexpressible griefs were, therefore, ever counterbalanced by a Divine, ineffable joy. Sorrow is the fruit of sin. Whilst, then, contact with sin in others, and the sight of suffering of every kind around Him, could not but cast an ever-deepening shadow over His pure soul, the consciousness of stainless purity within, as well as constant communion with His heavenly Father, would at all times irradiate His Spirit with Heaven's own sunshine. The Founder, too, of the only really joyous religion which the world has ever known must have experienced even here in their highest degree that peace and joy which He communicates to others. It may help us to sympathise more with our Redeemer in His gladness as well as in His sorrows, if we reverently inquire into the sources of His joy on earth and of His joy in Heaven.

I. Strong, deep natures are not demonstrative. The shallow stream, as it ripples over the stones, babbles noisily and makes loud music wherever it goes, whilst the broad, deep river moves along in majestic calmness. So the most profound emotions do not lie upon the surface, and are not always ready to be expressed by the tongue. It was pre-eminently thus with our Lord. He seldom spoke of His own sorrows. He thought much more of the sorrows of others. His own were too great for utterance. In Gethsemane His bursting heart found momentary relief in the truly human appeal to the sympathy of the chosen few: "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death; tarry ye here and watch with Me." At other times in silence and solitude He poured out the heavy burden of His grief into the ear of His Father. It is not, then, surprising if He was as reticent of His joy. His silence about it is no proof of its absence. On the contrary, we feel sure that He, whose first miracle at Cana was wrought to supply the wants of the guests at a wedding-feast, and Who adorned and beautified with His presence the holy estate of matrimony, was in fullest sympathy with the innocent joys of society. His love for children is another sign of a bright and cheerful temperament. "The heart of childhood is all mirth," and they shrink from the gloomy and morose. But the little ones seem to have been fascinated by His grave yet tender aspect, and were easily won to His embrace.

Then His delight in Nature is an evidence of a keen appreciation of the beautiful closely akin to joy. How often did He borrow illustrations of spiritual truths from the outer world. The genial sunshine, the warbling birds, the gaily painted lilies, the seed cast into the ground, the lightning flashing across the sky; these and the like images show how familiar was the Divine Teacher with His own fair creation, and how He delighted in it. How many, too, of His parables derive much of their point from the occasions of human joy. Thus, we have the shepherd's joy in rescuing the stray sheep, the poor woman's joy in finding the lost piece of money, the father's ecstatic delight in the prodigal's return, the marriage feast, with all its joyous accompaniments. The choice of these indicates a genuine sympathy with the brighter side of life. We may add that His regular attendance at the Jewish feasts, and His joining in the Passover hymn—probably the same still sung at the Paschal Supper—were a fulfilment in the spirit as well as the letter of the injunction to "Rejoice before the Lord."

But, happily, we are not left to conjecture on this important matter. We have it recorded that on one occasion "Jesus rejoiced in the Holy Spirit." (St. Luke x. 21, R.V.) The seventy had returned with joy from their first missionary journey. They had even exceeded their commission by casting out devils, and were unduly elated with their success. Very solemnly did He warn them against the danger of spiritual pride; and yet He rejoiced that these babes in grace had so far grasped the mysteries of the Kingdom as in His name to gain those victories over evil, whilst these things were mercifully hidden from the wise and prudent, who might have turned them to their own destruction. Thus His deepest joy was derived from His full acquiescence in His Father's will and His conscious fellowship with Him. "Even so, Father," He adds; "for so it seemed good in Thy sight."

Nor was this, although so profound, altogether a solitary joy. On the evening of His Passion, even when the powers of darkness were gathering round Him for their last terrible assault, after speaking of the mystical union of His true disciples with Himself, under the image of the Vine, He said: "These things have I spoken unto you, that My joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." Immediately afterwards, in His intercessory prayer, He pleads thus: "And now come I to Thee; and these things I speak in the world, that they might have My joy fulfilled in themselves." Joy, then, is one of the richest and sweetest elements in the fruit of the true Vine, which flows from Him into the hearts of all that abide closely in Him. Like their Master, the true followers of Christ are ever solving in their varied experience the seeming paradox of being "sorrowful, yet alway rejoicing." Their purest happiness, like His, flows from submission to their Heavenly Father's will and simple reliance upon His love. Joy and peace are found only in connection with faith in Christ's finished sacrifice and completed work. Whilst earthly joy is like lightning, short, fitful, transient, leaving greater darkness behind it, such spiritual joy resembles the bright, warm sunshine, and is healthful, vitalising, enduring.

II. So far, we have obtained a faint glimpse of the deep spring of joy in Christ's heart even on earth. Now let us strive to look higher, and to measure, so far as we can, the boundless height of His unalloyed, unshadowed joy in heaven.

> "Hope's precious pearl in sorrow's cup
> Unmelted at the bottom lay,
> To shine again, when, all drunk up,
> The bitterness should pass away."

The first Easter morn must have been an occasion of unutterable relief to Him who came forth victorious from the tomb, to die no more, all His sufferings ended, His bitter Passion past, His atoning work accomplished, His sacrifice accepted, and Himself the living Witness of the fact. Yet more joyous to Himself, as to His people, would be His triumphant Ascension, when He returned on high "leading captivity captive, and receiving gifts for men." Then, especially, was the Psalmist's prophecy fulfilled, and He was "anointed with the oil of joy above His fellows." This, indeed, is joy utterly beyond our loftiest conceptions and our most glowing imaginations. Nevertheless, if we are faithful to Him, we shall, according to our measure, one day know it. In the parable of the talents, He represents the Master as saying to those who by zeal and diligence shall have doubled their trust, "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

See you that stern and venerable veteran: his iron frame is scarred by many a wound. His massive brow is wrinkled by care's deep furrows; but his expressive eye is lighted up with all the fire of youth. He has just concluded a long and hard-fought campaign, and returned home decked with laurels and exulting in success. How deeply does his bosom swell with the joy of victory! In that earthly victor's triumph may we not discern a true, though most imperfect, image of the exultation of the great Captain of our Salvation, when He had dealt their death-wounds to Satan and his myriad hosts, and He ascended on high bearing the trophies of victory to His Father's Throne? And, oh! how infinitely will that joy be enlarged, when He shall be revealed in His final glory, and a subjugated Universe shall bow beneath His feet. The same in kind, though immeasurably lower in degree, shall be the joy of every faithful soldier of Christ who shall have fought manfully under His banner against the world, the flesh, and the devil. They, too, shall be more than conquerors through Him that loved them. Again, the Lord's is the joy of Rest. Like their Master, His followers are a laborious people. He recognises no idlers as His own. Some spend their days in bodily labour; and they perform it as in His sight, and often feel it lightened by His approving smile. The employments of others are of a higher order. All are workers who have the power to work; and, although not weary of well-doing, they are at times weary in it. How sweet to all such, after a life of earnest, if not altogether successful, service, will be the rest which remaineth for the people of God! Arnauld, one of the Port Royal divines, requested one of his brethren to assist him in a new work. He declined, saying, "We are now old; is it not time to rest?"—"Rest!" replied Arnauld, "have we not all eternity to rest in?"

Then there is a third and a principal element in our Redeemer's joy. It is that foretold by the Prophet: "He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand. He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied." It was with this joy set before Him "He endured the cross, despising the shame." Nor has it yet been attained by Him in all its fulness. It is daily receiving fresh accessions as His Gospel wins its way into sinners' hearts, and one and another soul is added as gems to His crown. Such, too, shall be the joy of those who are careful in improving their talents for the spiritual good of others. A physician, some years ago, in his closing days, was brought to a personal knowledge of the Saviour. So fully did he realise its comfort that he longed to impart the same to others, and he said, "If I could only bring one soul to Christ, I should go mad with joy." But it was then too late! Saved himself, he had no time or strength left wherewith to save others. Happy they who, having found the Saviour in health, can tell the glad news to their fellow-men, and win even one soul to Him.

Such is the joy of the Lord, into which He will invite His faithful ones to enter. "It is but little," wrote Archbishop Leighton, "we can receive here—some drops of joy that enter into us; but there we shall enter into joy, as vessels put into a sea of happiness." The vessels receive just as much of the ocean as they can contain; so the capacity of our renewed nature will be the measure of our future bliss. The greater our spiritual receptiveness acquired here, the more fully shall we enter into the joy of our Lord.

ON THE LAKE OF THUN.

UP beyond the châlets
Browse the sheep and kine;
Down amid the valleys
Ripen corn and vine.
Honey-bees are humming
Through the glowing noon;
Summertide is coming
On the Lake of Thun.

Pleasant 't is at even,
When the sun is low,
And in western heaven
Skies are all aglow;
When the lake is gleaming
In the light of June,
There to lie a-dreaming
On the Lake of Thun.

Dreaming, yet not sleeping,
In the evening still,
I watch the shadows creeping
Down the thorn-crowned hill
Of Stockhorn, where yet linger
Latest beams of light,
That tip with roseate finger
The cone of Nissen's height!

I linger till the daylight
Fades from out the sky,
And evening with its grey light
Drapes the heavens on high.
And so I lie a-dreaming
Until the rising moon,
With soft radiance beaming
Silvers the Lake of Thun.

"Silvers the Lake of Thun."

Awake, yet still a-dreaming
In the drowsy air,
I see the light still gleaming
On the landscape fair,
Where homesteads white are peeping
'Mid gardens rich and green,
That to the margent sweeping
Of that calm lake are seen.

And then I dream of heaven,
Beyond the skies away,
Where there's nor morn nor even,
Nor night, but ever day;
Nor sun nor moon to render
Faint light, for there shall shine
The glory of God's splendour—
The Lamb give light divine!

'Tis gone! My dream is over;
My wandering way I take,
Through many a scene a rover,
By hill and vale and lake.
Still memory will restore me
That pleasant eve in June,
When waking dreams came o'er me
Upon the Lake of Thun.

JOHN FRANCIS WALLER.

THE END OF AN OLD ROMANCE.

MISS SOPHY BRAMBLE sat by the fire in the chill dusk of an early spring evening, with a bunch of primroses in her hand—primroses which had bloomed years and years ago, when Miss Sophy was young, and now were dried up, and withered, and shrivelled. They had lain for some time, untouched, in a sacred box in one corner of Miss Sophy's drawer, together with other worthless tender symbols of bygone days, carefully stored away, "for old sake's sake," where no profane eyes could penetrate. It was not often that the contents of this box were disturbed. Miss Sophy buried her dead with reverent care, but she did not forget that she was still of the living; and her life was too active, too full of little pleasures, little duties, and little cares, for her to waste much time in firelight dreaming over a dead past. But to-day something had happened which had suddenly merged all dead memories in a living present; and now, as she sat in the early dark, with the firelight softening the lines of her spare figure, and catching now and again the silver gleams in her hair, Miss Sophy was living over again the sweet primrose-time of her youth. She held the poor little withered bunch of flowers in her left hand, and stroked it gently with the fingers of her right; while innumerable tender memories and tremulous hopes were fluttering in her heart. The primroses were endowed with magic power, for at their touch the intervening years rolled away, and she was little Sophy Bramble again, and Joe Westlake was the noblest and handsomest man in the world.

The Brambles were the chief people in the village in those days. They occupied the largest pew in the little church, and the high, straight pew-backs were not more stiff and uncompromising than was Mr. Bramble, when he sat there on Sunday morning with Sophy by his side. But the church was a long way off, and with advancing years he was becoming a victim to gout, so that more often the big dark pew contained none but Sophy—a little spot of bright colour in the sombre surroundings. She carried a big prayer-book, and cast down her eyes as she walked up the aisle: and no one could be more devoutly attentive to the service than she was—yet, somehow, before she had been ten minutes in her pew, she always knew whether Joe Westlake was in his place in church. And then, when service was over, if he should come up and offer to relieve her of that heavy prayer-book, and escort her across the green meadows, still with the sweet Sabbath silence, and golden in the noonday sun—well, it was very polite of him; and where was the harm? Mr. Bramble answered that question, when some floating gossip on the subject reached his ears. The harm was that Sophy was an heiress (in village estimation), while Joe's sole possessions were a handsome face and empty pockets. Mr. Bramble was not a man to beat about the bush. Next Sunday, young Joe, waiting in the fields for Sophy, was met by Sophy's father, who ironically proffered himself as a substitute. He would not listen to a word of excuse or entreaty from the unfortunate lover. "You to dream of making up to our Sophy, indeed!" said the irate father. "Go and make money for yourself. Go out into the world, instead of sticking here with no more spirit than a sheep! A young man like you, with all his wits about him, and his life before him, ought to be able to make money if anyone can." That was the kindest word he would say, and meanwhile he absolutely forbade any intercourse between the two. As for poor little Sophy, it was not until her father lectured her that afternoon that she discovered how very dear those Sunday morning walks had become to her, or what a blank, dull week it would be with nothing to look forward to any more. She wept so heartily that her father relented at what he believed to be genuine penitence; but her tears were caused by a mixture of feeling, in which rebellious, impotent misery had certainly as large a share as penitence. Still the habit of obedience was strong within her, and for some time Mr. Bramble's law of separation was kept implicitly.

But one day in the spring-time Sophy received a letter. The letter was from Joe, beseeching her to meet him next morning in the church meadows at seven o'clock, as he was going to London, and would like to say good-bye. "London!" the very word was full of despairing remoteness! Sophy was a very good girl; she did not go to church for nothing, and the sins of disobedience and deceit weighed heavily on her conscience; yet, after a small struggle, love triumphed. She felt too guilty to say her prayers that morning, and the omission troubled her; but when once she was in the open air, and her feet trod the dewy grass, and the breath of the morning swept the hair from her forehead, she forgot all her qualms of conscience, and only remembered that she was young, and was going to see Joe again. And when she did catch sight of him, leaning pensively against the trunk of a tree at a discreet distance from the house, how her heart gave a sudden leap, as it had never done before, at beholding him, and she was minded to turn back and run home again as fast as she could! But he turned and saw her, half-hesitating, in her white gown, with her bright hair glittering in the morning sunshine, and then there was no more question of flight.

"I've come to say good-bye, Joe," said Sophy, with a new sweet shyness.

"I hardly thought you would," answered he, moodily. He had plucked some primroses on his way, and now occupied himself with throwing them away bit by bit.

"Oh, Joe!" said Sophy, with deep reproach, "how could you fancy I would not come?"

XUM

To Sophy, as she said these words, her coming seemed not merely the only right, but the only possible course.

There was a moment's embarrassed silence, and then Joe broke in desperately—

"Sophy, you know what I want to say, what I am dying to say, and yet must not, after the promise I gave your father—but, Sophy darling, you do understand, don't you?"

Joe took her hand, utterly disregarding the spirit while so careful of the letter of the law, and looked into her downcast face. She was trembling so that she could not speak, but she did not attempt to release her hand, and Joe continued with emboldened fervour:

"I am going away now, and it may be years before I see you again, but however long it is, when I have made my fortune I shall come back and say what I dare not now. I would not have you bound, Sophy," said the young man, with affecting unselfishness, "but I shall always consider myself bound to you in heart."

"Oh! Joe, Joe dear," sobbed Sophy, realising for the first time the tragedy of separation, "so shall I be always bound—always your own Sophy. Give me those primroses, Joe, as a pledge, and I will keep them for ever."

And then came the parting, for the sun was rising higher in the heavens, and the dew had dried off the grass.

"I promised that you should not bind yourself," Joe faltered, "and I've been true to my word—but it is good-bye—and, Sophy dear, just one kiss—to remember."

"To remember!" Sophy had remembered, whatever Joe had done. It was the remembrance of that kiss which, five years later, when Farmer Warren pressed his suit, had made it impossible for Sophy to do anything but refuse him, with a tender reluctance and fear of giving pain, that made the honest farmer vow that, whether she loved him or not, Sophy Bramble would always be the one woman in the world for him.

It was the remembrance of that kiss which now, as she sat in the firelight, thirty years afterwards, with Joe's primroses in her hand, thrilled to her heart, and sent a youthful rosy flush to her cheeks.

Thirty years afterwards! and through all those thirty years she had never seen Joe Westlake again. Once, on her birthday, a few months after they parted, he had sent her a lace tippet, which, after much persuasion, she had been allowed to keep. She wrote back a very prim letter, "thanking him for his kind present, which her father had permitted her to keep;" then followed inquiries after his health and general welfare, concluding "With kind regards, Sophy Bramble." At the end of this letter was a hastily scribbled, untidy little postscript: "I keep the primroses always. Joe dear." Since then nothing more had been heard of Joe Westlake; he had no relations in the village, and had disappeared entirely from the little world of which, to Sophy, he had constituted the principal element. For years she believed him too proud to write until he had made money; then she ceased to speculate at all, and, simply believing in him, placed him in the most sacred recesses of her heart, and his primroses in her drawer up-stairs.

But to-day, as she was returning from her morning round of shopping, she had met the Rector's wife, who stopped in the middle of the street, as usual, to chat over parish matters with Miss Sophy. "And who do you think called at our house yesterday?" asked she, with some pleasurable excitement in having a fresh topic of conversation. "You remember young Joe Westlake—a fresh-faced young fellow he used to be? He asked particularly after you, and where you lived now, and I believe he intends calling on you to-day——" She stopped, for Miss Sophy was staring straight before her, with a dazed look on her face.

"Joe Westlake," she said; "Joe come back again!" And she suddenly turned and shook hands with the Rector's wife so abruptly that no time was left to do anything but say good-bye. She passed on through the village street as if in a dream, until in the window of the greengrocer's shop she saw a bunch of primroses, and then she remembered that it was primrose time again. She went in and bought the bunch—pale, stunted little things, but to Miss Sophy the most beautiful flowers she had ever seen. Now, as she sat by the fire, with the dead primroses in her hand, the bunch of living primroses bloomed on the table by her side.

Her listening ear caught the sound of a heavy tread on the gravel without; and as she sprang to her feet and pushed the primroses inside the bosom of her dress, a long "rat-tat" resounded through the little house. Miss Sophy ran into the hall: "Matilda, Matilda," called she, in an excited whisper, "don't open the door for a minute, but light the lamp in the sitting-room, and put on a clean apron." While Matilda was obeying these instructions, she hurried up-stairs, and with trembling fingers drew forth from the box in her drawer a tissue-paper parcel. She was so tremulous that it was some moments before she could undo the manifold wrappings, and the impatient knock at the door was repeated, as she unfolded a small faded lace tippet, yellow with age and antiquated in shape. She handled it gently, as some precious thing, and then, standing before her dim reflection in the glass, she fastened it round her throat. She had never noticed before how grey her hair had become. Then she crept to the top of the stairs, and peeped over the banisters into the dark little hall, and heard a deep voice ask for Miss Bramble, and saw a dark figure move into the subdued light of the sitting-room. She screwed up all her courage, and went down-stairs. The door was shut, and for some time she stood, powerless to turn the handle; then with a supreme effort turned it sharply and entered the room. A grey-whiskered man of portly presence was seated in the biggest chair the room could boast. At her entrance he rose, bowed stiffly, and waited for her to speak. For a moment surprise kept her dumb; then the truth flashed upon her:—

"Joe!" she cried, in a sharp voice, "don't you know me?"

"What, Sophy!" he exclaimed, "it can't be Sophy!"

The cry had been wrung from her lips by the first keen pang of disappointment, but she recovered her self-possession instantly, and spoke with a certain prim formality.

"I ought not to be surprised that you do not recognise me, Mr. Westlake," she said; "so many them; I passed through on my way here. Your father and mother are gone, I see."

The loud, careless way in which he uttered the dear names so sacred to Miss Sophy jarred upon her. She answered, in a voice even more cold and quiet than years have passed since we met one another, and the years leave their mark upon us all."

"Well, that's true," he answered, re-seating himself—Miss Sophy never remembered that he had so loud a voice in the old days—"That's true enough; we're neither of us so young as we were. Dear me! it's really astonishing how the people here have altered—although the place remains pretty much the same—and so many dead too! The churchyard's full of before, "Yes, they are both at rest. My mother died only two years ago, my father some time before."

"Ah, well," said he cheerfully, "perhaps it was as well the old gentleman went first; the gout hadn't improved his temper, even in the days when I knew him."

Miss Sophy drew herself up, with a dull pain at her heart. Could this be Joe—her hero—her ideal?

"He was always a good father to me," she said, with dignity, "and a most devoted husband to my dear mother."

Then she changed the subject, and talked of her parish interests—the lending library, the Sunday-school, the clothing club of which she was secretary.

"It is a very useful institution," she said, talking for talking's sake, "and I only wish the funds were not so low."

Next moment she longed to unsay her words, for the portly gentleman opposite to her drew out a well-filled purse, and with much emphasis laid a sovereign on the table.

"Allow me, my dear Miss Bramble," said he, "to have the pleasure of contributing to so worthy a charity."

Poor Miss Sophy! she could not refuse his donation, so she murmured her thanks, but let the sovereign lie on the table untouched.

While she was wondering what to say next, his eye caught sight of the vase of flowers at his elbow.

"Primroses!" he exclaimed. "It's early yet for them, isn't it? But these are poor little things. Ah! it reminds me of the days of my youth, 'when we were young and foolish,' eh, Miss Sophy? How well I remember giving you a bunch, ever so long ago! Well, well! young people will be young people, I suppose."

She could have forgiven him if he had spared her this last allusion. She pressed his primroses tight against her heart, which seemed suddenly withered and shrivelled also.

It was a relief when he said, "I must be going. I dine with the Rector to-night, and shall be off again to-morrow, so may not see you again. Good-bye, Miss Sophy, good-bye."

He shook hands, secured his hat and stick, and was gone, closing the door noisily after him before Miss Sophy had time to ring for Matilda to show him out.

She stood for a minute or two in the empty room quite still, in the same position as when he left her; then, very slowly, she drew from her bosom the withered primroses, and placed them on the fire, watching them consume away to ashes.

Then she rang the bell. "Matilda," said she, shivering slightly, "bring some more coals; I feel the cold more than I used to do; I am getting old."

HELEN SMETHAM.

"THE SEVEN LEAVES OF THE VINE."

THOUGHTS UPON THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF OUR LORD UPON THE CROSS.

BY THE RIGHT REVEREND WILLIAM ALEXANDER, D.D., D.C.L., LORD BISHOP OF DERRY AND RAPHOE.

II.—THE SECOND WORD FROM THE CROSS.

"Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."—ST. LUKE xxiii. 43.

LET us note the contexture of circumstances by which these words are at once surrounded and elucidated. The "malefactors" of St. Luke (three times so-called by that Evangelist*) are the "thieves" of St. Matthew and St. Mark.† Judging from the fact that Barabbas‡ also is styled by St. John "a thief," it would seem that these men were concerned with a nationalist insurrection. At all times and in all languages the thief, the robber, and the patriot of a certain type are closely connected. The word is popularly stripped of much of its ignominy by the lofty ideas to which it appeals, or by the ennobling touch of adventure and of daring.*

It seems quite clear, from the two earliest Evangelists, that during the first part of their crucifixion both of these culprits joined in reviling the august Sufferer with whom their fate was so strangely associated. "The thieves also, which were crucified with Him, cast the same in His teeth." "They that were crucified with Him reviled Him."† Strong and desperate as

* κακοῦργοι. (St. Luke xxiii. 32, 33, 34.)
† λῃστής. (St. Matt. xxvii. 33, 34; St. Mark xv. 27.)
‡ ἦν δὲ ὁ Βαραββᾶς λῃστής. (St. John xviii. 40.)

* So the λῃστής by sea is spoken of in the Odyssey, not without a touch of admiration, as "roaming the sea, hazarding his life unto the death" (Od. ix. 254); and Thucydides significantly notes, in his citation of the passage, that in Homeric times there was no ignominy attached to the name.

† St. Matt. xxvii. 44; St. Mark xv. 32.

such men commonly are, one was the harder and bolder villain, the "evil genius" of the other. A Christ of earth was the only Messiah for whom he was willing to fight or die. The other was a man of higher and softer mould. He had heard something of the gentle Galilean, with His works of love. He had seen part of the drama of the Passion in its earliest scenes. The dignity and patience, supreme and ineffable: the first words, even at the moment when He was being fastened to the tree ("Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!") went to his heart. At first, custom makes him join in the revilings of his companion. But better influences are at work; repentance ripens quickly in the soil of the Cross. He confesses—"we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds.' He shows the truest concern for his sinful brother —"Dost not thou fear God?" He makes his own act of faith as he prays—"Jesus! remember me when Thou comest into Thy Kingdom."

Let us note, first, that we have in the record of this word one of the characteristics of St. Luke's Gospel.

In other parts, the third Gospel is the Gospel of the beauty of the Redeemer's life. It is the Gospel of the holy angels; the Gospel of ecstatic song and liturgic chant, heavenly and earthly; the Gospel of woman in the presence of Jesus. No woman in that representation is hostile to Jesus. That saddest sight was reserved for later times.

Above all, St. Luke's is the Pauline Gospel, the Gospel of triumphant grace, of abounding forgiveness. The same writer, by old tradition called a Painter, has given the most exquisite picture of woman's passionate penitence. and the most complete picture of man's sterner and more restrained penitence. The first is drawn in soft and coloured lines; the other cut as if by a diamond point on a plate of steel.

If the first word from the Cross be the priestly, this is the kingly word. Consider the assurance, the promise, the revelation in it.

I.

The assurance. "Amen* I say to thee." Here we have the old style of the Lake and of the guest-chamber. There is absolute certainty in it. In intellectual society there are "autocrats" of the table and of the salon. They are soon overthrown; and we find that there is nothing of permanent royalty in them; they are mere temporary presidents of republics of small talk. These speculative dictators are in the habit of announcing, "I think." The harder headed logician draws out his syllogisms, and writes down, "I conclude," or "I infer." The scholar ransacks manuscripts and volumes, and pronounces magisterially, "I read." But it is too plain that students may wander restlessly through libraries, as idle people stroll through a busy city, and be dissipated among their books, even though they be books of theology. There are persons of whom we are peculiarly sure that they have really nothing to say, who begin sentence after sentence with "I say." But Christ's especial utterance is not "I think," "I infer," "I read," not even "I say," but "Amen I say." In His utterances we make an act of faith, because we believe in Him.

This second word, then, has about it the characteristic utterance of the King of Truth.

II.

THE promise in this word is twofold.

First, it is a gracious promise of the abridgment of suffering.

There are instances of unquestionable authority to be found in the pages of writers who lived when the Roman cross was planted on the same soil with the Roman eagles, which show that men might live for many hours, possibly for two days, upon the cross. The position, of course, was agonising; the tension fearful; the cramps constant. Yet, physically strong as armed insurgents generally are, such a man might go on for weary hours, even while the sun set once and again, shaking the cross with his throes. Here there is an absolute promise of death within the day, before sunset.

But again, "He who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think," gives this dying penitent something better than was implied in that which he had requested.

The man had only asked for recollection in a probably distant future—"when Thou comest in Thy Kingdom." He hoped that in that great day of the manifestation of the true Messianic royalty, the King of Israel, in His glory, might deign to revert to His humble companion in the dishonour of the punishment of Calvary. What an answer is accorded to him! Not merely was it a contingency—a possibility of which he need not despair—"Amen, I say unto thee." This hope, faint in his dying heart, but dearer than life, was not relegated to the dim future of distant ages. The very moment was big and thrilling with its presence—"to-day!" The convert of a few minutes should not be lost in the surging myriads of the redeemed. He should be close to the presence of the King—all his guilt

* I venture to cite the following sentences:—"This at once enables us to perceive the meaning of the 'Amen' so often used in the Gospels. The double 'Amen' occurs as the prelude to sentences of Christ twenty-five times in St. John's Gospel alone. The single 'Amen' occurs about thirty times in St. Matthew. It is half assertive, half liturgical. To those simple men as they rocked with Him in the boat, in the long golden hush of the summer evenings by the lake of Galilee, came His 'Amen.' It was like the hymn of their nursery, and the chant of their synagogue. It was also the expression of certainty. It told them of that upon which they could lean unhesitatingly; of the resolution of their simple doubts; of a fixed heaven over the fleeting waters of human opinion. 'These things saith the Amen.' (Apoc. iii. 14.) It is a name of Christ; but it is so only for those who know one characteristic of His teaching—its absolute, unhesitating self-assertion."—"The Great Question, and Other Sermons," p. 50 (Second Edition).

pardoned, all his hardness softened, all his ignorance changed into the fulness of light. He should have in a special degree the highest privilege promised to the most faithful of the servants of the King—"with me." What is that but the fulfilment of the sweetest of all prophecies?—"Where I am, there shall also my servant be." "That where I am, there ye may be also."*

But in this second word from the Cross there is also a revelation—"in Paradise."† When speaking of departed friends, we constantly say "in heaven." To say that this is false would be a heartless exaggeration. It is not false, but inaccurate. The park is not the palace, but it is the precinct of the palace.‡ The word Paradise (Eden) is associated with softness, greenery, rest, coolness, refreshment. "In Paradise are fairer trees than on Golgotha."

Have we not reason to pray, in the presence of this second word from the Cross,§ that He Who spoke it would pardon the Sadducism of our hearts: our little belief in this revelation for ourselves or for others; our little hallowed curiosity about the hereafter? The "majority" is ever increasing on that other shore to which we are daily growing nearer. O the stillness round our noisy years! O the preciousness of the hope which enfolds the dead in Christ, ever since the dying Lord said to the dying penitent, "to-day—in Paradise!" To sum up the whole verse with Bossuet: "'To-day'—what speed! 'In Paradise'—what rest! 'With Me'—what companionship!"

III.

THIS paper may conclude with two reflections:—

1. There is something in these thoughts which requires to be guarded against abuse. Let us beware of turning the very lavishness of our Lord's generosity into a weapon against His holy Law. "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? God forbid."

There is deep truth in the old familiar saying about the repentance of death-beds—"In all Scripture one that none may despair; one only, that no man may prepare." We read some months since of a wild leap from an express train going at full speed, and a desperate escape by the man's being landed on a parapet of a bridge. Who in his senses would follow such an example? "And one of the malefactors which were hanged railed on Him, saying, Art not Thou the Christ? save Thyself and us. But the other answered, and rebuking him, said, Dost thou not even fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this Man hath done nothing amiss. And he said, Jesus, remember me when Thou comest in Thy Kingdom."*

Take all this together, and we find the germs of faith, hope, charity, humility. Give such a germ time to bud, and, under favourable circumstances, it will unfold itself into the rose. Give to such a penitent time to live the life of faith lodged within him, and he will be that wonder of the new creation—a saint. The repentance, so seldom found on a soft bed, is matured with divine rapidity on the hard bed of the cross. Those old writers scarcely exaggerated who affirmed that the case of the penitent thief exceeds in wondrousness that of Magdalene or of Paul.

2. Above all, both the Church and individual Christians should learn to believe in grace—the free gift of God to sinners through Jesus Christ His Son.

What was the source of the thief's pardon? Strange surmises have arisen in times of ignorance. The author of the Arab gospel of the Infancy tells his poor wild story how, when the Holy family was in Egypt in some dangerous place, two brigands sprang upon the little cavalcade; how one of the two, awed by the awful purity of the Mother, and by the light of hidden Godhead smiling "in the bright features of the Blessed Child," protected the wayfarers; how the Babe foretold His Passion, and the repentance upon the cross of the good thief. The Middle Ages fabled that the Blessed Virgin stood in the middle between this robber and Christ, obtained grace from Him, and proposed Christ crucified in fact to the dying man, as the crucifix is held up to people in their last agony. One of later date preached that as the shadow of Peter healed certain of their infirmities, so the shadow of Christ on the cross, when the sun came to a certain point, touched this man, and converted his soul. No! the cause was the efficacy and freedom of grace.

Theologically speaking, grace, no doubt, by the last analysis, is not irresistible. He who stands knocking at the door of the heart does not ungently force His way in, but waits for us to open. An early writer says with justice—"On the cross, the nails had fastened the hands and feet. In that supreme suffering nothing remained free. Yes! something: heart and tongue. By the gracious inspiration of God the dying thief presented to God all in him that was free, so that with the heart he believed unto righteousness, and with the mouth made confession unto salvation." Do we believe in the influence of one human will over another? Can we doubt that a spell of fascination is capable of being exercised by one human being over another, even at a distance? If we believe that there is a Personal God, why should we doubt the fact of grace? for grace is the magnetism of heaven.

† "Paradise" is the translation in the LXX. of the "Gan. Eden"—Garden of Eden.

‡ It has been supposed that an objection to this doctrine of Paradise is presented by St. Paul's language—"caught up even to the third heaven—caught up into Paradise,"—as if Paradise and the third heaven were identical. (2 Cor. xii. 2-4.) But "even to" denotes the future, "into" (εἰς) the present, condition of the saints.

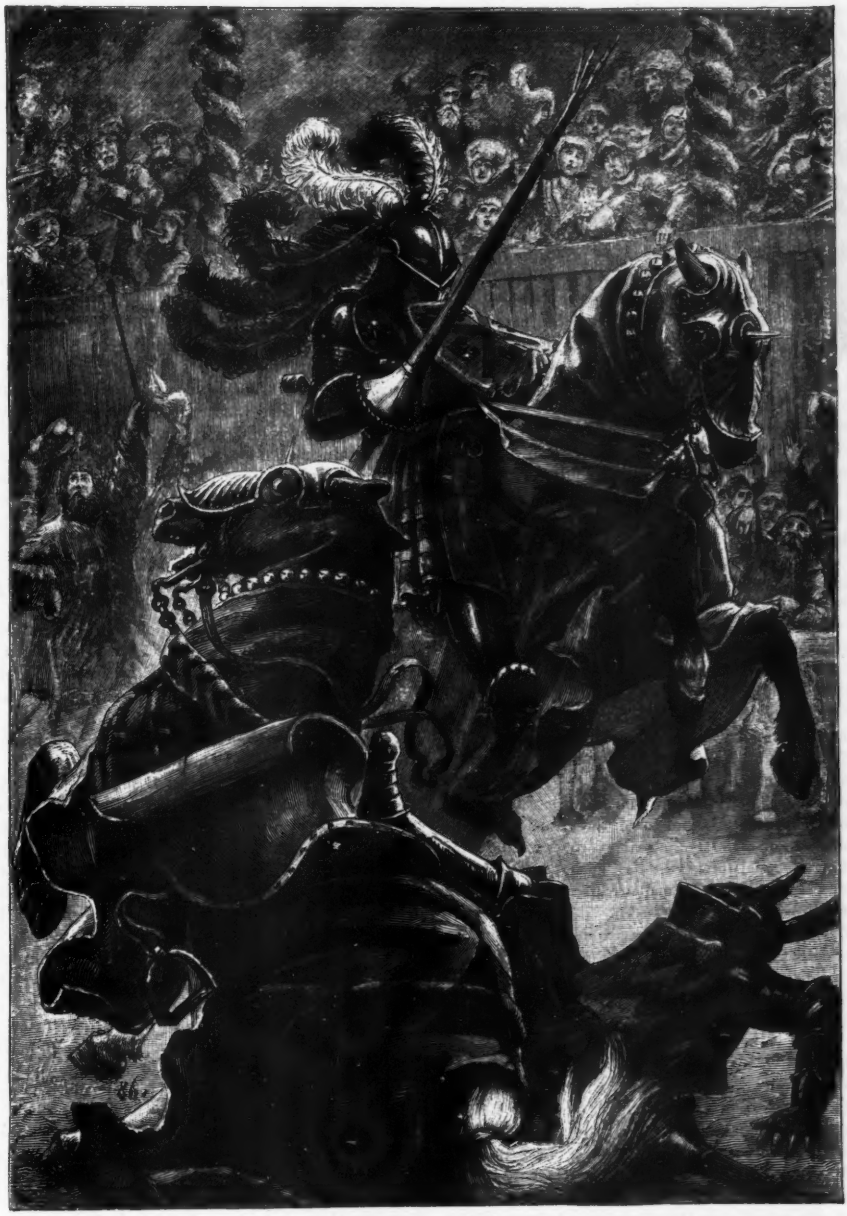
Of later years, we have had many tracts upon death-bed repentance. That upon this subject which at one time was nearly the most popular in England was the (not quite satisfactory) narrative of the notorious Earl of Rochester's last days, by Dr. Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury. Stories of this class in our own time are briefer, and the heroes and heroines of humbler rank. Some of these narratives are deeply pathetic, yet they do not always convey the impression of being simple and unsensational. And unquestionably the writers of the New Testament do seem to have a horror of what are known as "death-bed scenes." Are there any but two to which any prominence is given—the penitent thief's and the martyr Stephen's?

Now, undoubtedly, there is, in the whole incident which we have been considering, something quite alien from—apparently almost inconsistent with—the view of the Christian life taken by all large, organised, constituted churches. Their conception is of a soul brought into the household of God in infancy, growing in grace, following in the footsteps of Christ's most holy life, falling asleep in peace. Not only is this the conception of churches—read the Pauline Epistles: is not this the view which they give of the Christian life? Each separate soul imitates Christ's progress, as each bird of the vast throng that makes westward follows each strange and graceful evolution of the leader bird. Is it in His birth? "until Christ be formed in you"; His circumcision? "putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ"; His baptism? "buried with Him by baptism unto death"; His death? "ye died"; His resurrection? "risen again with Christ"; His very ascension? "raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." Paul's ideal is the image of a soul seen in the dust of death, loved, pardoned, quickened, robed, throned, crowned; not smirched and soiled. Or take the image of Christian life given us in that mirror of a soul, St. John's first Epistle. How does the penitent thief fit into that calm contexture of progressive holiness for any who have once believed? The very word repentance is non-existent in that Epistle.

Yet, taken in its widest capacity, the Church, if it is to be fitted for our weak humanity, must not only be a home for saints—it must have a porch for the penitent, for backsliders, for those who have relapsed. It must be a hospital for restoration. Preach regeneration alone, and you will have an icy Church; preach conversion alone, and you will have a fluid Church; but preach both one and the other, and you will meet the wants of all classes whom the Church includes.

Certainly, ever since Jesus pardoned the dying thief, the Church has believed in pardoning grace—has believed that this incident has its perpetual lesson even for those who have believed and been baptised. The Church sends to the jail, the scaffold, the penitentiary. Let the worst be stricken with the sense of sin, and Christian men and women will tell him of One who abundantly pardons. The tide of grace breaks bright and broad. We can never say—"There is a point where the tide can never wash, and the wave never reach; a heart that can never be softened by love, or baptised afresh with grace."

OUR MODERN HEROES.



NOT as the knights of legendary days
Do modern heroes gain renown:
Battles with dragons and with goblins grim,
That lit with glory all those ages dim,
Bring them no crown.

Not as the heroes of old chivalry
Do our brave knights win fame to-day:
They enter not the lists with pride to fight
For God, their country, honour, and the right,
In rich array.

Our heroes' acts are never blazoned forth
With the loud blast of olden time:
Yet theirs to face death in its every form—
Through fire and water, pestilence and storm,
Through strife and crime.

A noble army stand they forth to-day,
Ready all risks to undertake,
If there's a life to save, a soul in need;
For this their motto in their every deed—
"For Christ's dear sake!"

"TO THE LIONS!"

A TALE OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS. BY THE REV. PROFESSOR CHURCH, M.A.

CHAPTER VII.—THE ARREST.

THE centurion's message was duly delivered to Rhoda, nor, though it failed in its immediate object, was it sent wholly in vain. The girl herself never for one moment entertained the idea of profiting by the warning so as to secure her own safety. She would have been even capable of suppressing it altogether, if she could have been quite as sure of others as she was of herself. There was nothing that she felt to be more desirable than the martyr's crown, and why should she hinder those who were dear to her from attaining the same glory? But these high-wrought feelings had not wholly banished common sense. She was perfectly well aware that such aspirations were beyond the average capacity of her fellow-creatures. She doubted whether her own sister was equal to them. She was quite sure that some of her fellow-believers would fail under the fiery trial of martyrdom, and she shrank from the peril of exposing them to it. Nothing could be more dreadful than that they should fall away and deny their Lord. It would be a deadly sin in them, and, to say the least, a lifelong remorse to her, if she should have led them into such temptation. Her mind was soon made up. Her first step was to find her father, and give him the warning, only keeping back, as she felt bound to do, the name of her informant. Bion, whose practical good sense told him that dangers come quickly enough without one's going to meet them, resolved to keep all his family at home. Under ordinary circumstances, knowing the temper of his elder daughter, he would have charged her on her obedience not to venture out. But Rhoda's action in freely coming to him with the warning that she had received, put him off his guard. He took it for granted that she would attend to it herself, and, not a little to her relief, let her go without exacting any promise from her.

The next morning she started earlier than usual for the place of meeting. Her hope was to see the Elders, communicate what she knew to them, and leave the matter in their hands. They would know what was best for their people. If they judged it better that the disciples should hide from the storm rather than meet it, she would obey their decision, whatever might be her own disappointment. If, as she hoped, their counsel should be "to resist unto blood," then she would be there to share the glorious peril.

One of the little accidents, as we call them, that so often come in to hinder the carrying out of great plans, hindered Rhoda from accomplishing her design. She started at an earlier hour than usual, before there was even a glimmer of twilight, and instead of being more careful than was her wont in picking her way along the rough lane that led from the farmhouse into the public road, was, in her haste, more heedless. Before she had gone fifty yards from the house, she stumbled on a stone, and for some moments felt as if she could not move another step. Then her resolute spirit came to her help. "To think of the martyr's crown, and then be daunted by a sprained ankle!" she said to herself; and she struggled on. But all the courage in the world could not give her back her usual speed of foot; so that the hour of meeting had already passed while she was still some distance from the chapel. She was still crawling along when another of the worshippers, a young slave who had been detained at home by some work which he could not finish in time, overtook her. She at once made up her mind that he must act as her messenger, and that the message must be as brief and emphatic as possible.

The young man halted when he recognised her figure, saluted her, and asked whether he could give her any help.

"Leave me, Dromio," she answered, "leave me to shift for myself; but run with all the speed you can and tell the Elder Anicetus that there is danger."

Dromio waited for no second bidding. He started off at once at the top of his speed, and as he was vigorous and fleet of foot, reached the place of assembly in a very few minutes.

The celebration of the Holy Communion was going on, and the congregation was engaged in silent prayer previous to the distribution of the bread and wine, when the breathless messenger, pushing aside the doorkeeper who would have barred his entrance at what seemed so inopportune a time, burst into the midst.

"Venerable Anicetus," cried the young man, "there is danger!"

Such alarms were not unknown in those perilous times, and though the congregation was startled, there was nothing like panic.

Anicetus, a veteran in the service of his Master, and a confessor who had stood more than once in peril of his life, kept all his presence of mind.

"Be calm, my son," he said; "tell me whence or from whom you bring this message."

"I bring it from Rhoda the deaconess"—for as such the girl was known, though, as has been said before, she had not been formally admitted to the order—"I overtook her on my way hither. She was limping along, in pain as it seemed, though she said nothing, and she bade me hasten on, and deliver this message."

"It is no false alarm," said the Elder, "if it came from our sister Rhoda. Saw you or heard you any signs of an enemy as you came?"

XUM

"I saw and heard nothing," answered Dromio.

"And you came from the town?"

"Yes, from the town."

"Then the soldiers have not yet started," said the old man in an undertone to himself, "and we have a few moments to think."

By common consent the whole assembly waited for his decision. This deference was not so much paid to his office as to the man. Ordinarily such a matter would have been discussed by the community. But Anicetus was one of the men to whom in a time of peril all look for guidance. After a very brief pause for deliberation he spoke.

"All brethren and sisters that are of the servile condition will depart at once, and do their best to escape from the soldiers."

There were doubtless one or two bolder spirits among the male slaves who murmured inwardly at this command. But they obeyed it without hesitation. Indeed, they knew only too well the cogent force of the reasoning which dictated it. A free man or woman was exempted by law from torture, but it might be applied to a slave; and it would be applied almost certainly to some at least of those who might be arrested in the act of attending an unlawful assembly. If, on the other hand, they could escape for the time, their masters, even from the mere selfish motive of saving valuable property from damage, would do their best to protect them. It was well, therefore, to get them out of the way, both for their own sake and for the sake of the community. The Church had found many times what a horribly effective instrument her persecutors had in this power of torturing the slaves. It was not that she dreaded the truth that they might be thus compelled to speak, it was the falsehoods that might be forced out of them that were so much to be feared. Again and again miserable creatures, whose courage had broken down under this pitiless infliction, had purchased relief from their sufferings by inventing hideous charges against their brethren. The mere truth had not satisfied the persecutor, who often really believed that there must be something more behind; and so they had been driven, as it were, to lie.

When the slaves were gone, Anicetus spoke again: "Brethren and sisters, you must be brave; that, I do not doubt, you will be. And you must be prudent; that, to some of you, will be less easy. Therefore I warn you. Court no danger. You shall have strength for your day, but not beyond it. When you are accused, be silent—as far as you may. The law does not compel you to bring peril upon yourselves, and they cannot force you to speak. Acts unlawful to a Christian you will, of course, refuse. There you will not yield so much as a hair's breadth. But see that these acts be such as may lawfully be demanded of you. This is the counsel that I give you, so far as things of this life are concerned. Spiritual help you will not lack, if, indeed, you have not believed in vain. And now, while there is yet time, let us strengthen ourselves with the Communion of the Body and Blood of our Lord. It shall be provision for a way that may lie through rough places."

Just as the Elder had finished speaking, Rhoda entered the chapel. The strength that had supported her through her painful journey failed when she reached its end, and she sank, almost fainting, on the floor. Two of the women helped her into a little ante-chamber, and gave her such comfort and relief as was possible. Meanwhile the interrupted rite went on. The little congregation again offered up their hearts in silent prayer—not less earnest, we may be sure, than that which had been broken into by the arrival of the messenger of danger. This ended, the sacred Bread and Wine were administered: with what depth of feeling in ministers and people it is impossible for us to realise, whether (as will be the case with most who read these lines) we are living quiet and peaceful lives, or even are brought face to face with great perils, such as are the perils of the sea and the battle-field. To "resist unto blood," as these weak men and women were called to do, wanted an enthusiasm of courage far greater than is needed for the lifeboat or the forlorn hope.

The Communion was almost ended when a loud knocking on the door of the meeting-house showed that the soldiers had come. The Centurion Fabius had not ventured to evade the duty of executing in person the order of the Governor; but to make the actual arrest was more than he could bring himself to endure. To enter the chapel on such an errand would have been an intolerable profanation. Happily, military etiquette permitted him to delegate this duty to his deputy. It was this officer, who had been duly cautioned to perform his office as gently as he could, who now presented himself at the chapel door. It was thrown open at once. One point that the Christians were always careful to insist upon was that, though they might find it prudent to meet in secret, they had nothing to conceal. Anicetus was just about to administer the Bread and Wine to Rhoda—who was now partially recovered—when the deputy centurion entered the building. With a gesture of command, which the rough soldier felt himself strangely constrained to obey, he motioned the man back, and then, without a change of look or voice, performed his sacred office.

The rite finished, he turned to the soldier, and cautiously asked him his errand. The man produced the Governor's order to arrest all the persons who should be found assembled in the guild-house of the wool-combers. Anicetus perused the document deliberately, and then returned it to the officer, with the words, "It seems to be in order. We are ready to obey."

The number of prisoners who had been thus taken was a few less than forty, of whom six, including Rhoda, were women. The men were lightly bound—that is, the right arm of one was attached to the left arm of another. The old knight Antistius, and the Elder Anicetus, both of whom were Roman citizens, were not subjected to this indignity; nor was it thought necessary so to secure the women.

The question then arose, What was to be done with Rhoda, who was clearly unable to walk? The deputy consulted his chief.

"There is a woman among the arrested," he said, "whom it will be necessary to carry, if she is to accompany the others. Will you be pleased to give your commands?"

No sooner had Fabius heard these words than an agonising suspicion of the truth crossed his mind. Something, he knew not what, told him that this disabled woman could be no other than Rhoda herself. The wild idea of making this a pretext for releasing her occurred to him, only to be dismissed the next moment. She could not be left; and if she was to be taken, she must go with the rest. With a sinking heart he entered the chapel, and a single glance at her figure, though her face was turned from him, convinced him that his fears had not been vain. It was Rhoda. His warning had been fruitless, although a hasty glance showed him that neither Bion nor Cleoné was among the prisoners. She had been more careful for others than for herself.

It was agony to Fabius to feel that he was the man to put her into the hands of her enemies, and he was glad to leave the chapel before she could recognise him.

Meanwhile the practical difficulty had been solved by an ingenious soldier who had fetched a bier from the mortuary of the burial ground. A little contrivance converted this into a litter. It was convenient enough, and was made comfortable with the cloaks of the party; but Fabius shuddered at the sight of the living borne on the vehicle of the dead.

The departure of the soldiers from the town had not been unnoticed, and a crowd was assembled to witness their return. The principal street was indeed thronged with spectators as the prisoners were marched along it to the Governor's quarters. A few groans and hisses were heard at one point, where Arruns with some of his friends had stationed himself; but on the whole the feeling was friendly rather than hostile. Few knew much about these Christians, but they had already begun to find out that they were the friends of the sick, the poor, the unhappy.

CHAPTER VIII.—BEFORE THE GOVERNOR.

THE arrest at the chapel had been made so early that it still wanted more than an hour of noon when the prisoners were brought into the presence of the Governor. Pliny, aware of the importance of the case which he was about to try, had called in the help of a trained lawyer—an advocate of high reputation—who had some time before retired from his profession, and who now sat as his assessor. At the same time he had invited Tacitus, as a senator and ex-consul, to take a seat on the bench. The prosecution was conducted by the principal lawyer of the town, and Lucilius, Arruns, with several of the Nicean merchants, supported him by their presence. The accused, numbering about thirty in all, of whom two-thirds belonged to the labouring class, were undefended. All the slaves had contrived to escape arrest. The lower part of the hall was densely crowded with a mass of interested spectators. All available space, indeed, had been filled up within a few minutes of the arrival of the prisoners, and the approaches to the hall were thronged by eager candidates for admission.

When the prisoners had answered to their names, and had stated their several occupations and condition of life, the inquiry began. A long harangue by the prosecutor on the subject of the importance of the worship of the gods was cut short by the Governor, who intimated that his eloquence, if it should be wanted at all, would be more relevant after his evidence had been produced. Thus checked, the advocate began his examination, addressing it in the first instance to Anicetus.

"With a gesture of command . . . he motioned the man back."—p. 203.

"You are one of the leaders of the society which calls itself by the name of Christus?"

"'There were two lovely little girl-babies.'"—p. 207.

"Is this the matter, or among the matters, of which you accuse me?"

"Certainly it is."

"Then you hold it to be a crime to belong to this society of Christus?"

"Certainly, seeing that it is not one of the societies that are permitted to exist by the constitution of the Roman State and the will of our sovereign lord, Trajan Augustus."

"If that be so, I appeal to the Governor whether by the law of Rome I can be compelled to make such answer as would criminate myself."

The appeal was so manifestly just that the Governor did not think it necessary to consult his assessor, but decided that the question need not be answered.

Baffled at this point, the prosecutor re-commenced his attack at another.

"You do not deny that you and your associates were assembled this morning in the guild-house of the wool-combers?"

"We do not deny it."

"For what purpose, then, did you meet?"

"Before I answer that question, I would myself wish to know whether you have the right to ask it. Are free men and women, against whom there is no evidence of wrong-doing, to be questioned by anyone as to the purpose of their meeting? That we have the right to use the guild-house of the wool-combers is proved by this document."

So saying, Anicetus produced from his pocket a small parchment, which simply recited that the wool-combers, in consideration of a sum of four hundred drachmæ yearly, permitted the use of their guild-house to Anicetus.

"You see, then," resumed Anicetus, "that we have not taken possession of a place to which we are not entitled, nor is there any evidence against us of unlawful dealings. Were we found with weapons in our hands, or preparing noxious drugs, or practising forbidden acts, or plotting against the safety of the State and the life of the Emperor, then might you justly ask us for our defence. But you do not attempt to prove against us any unlawful deeds or words."

The prosecutor now tried a third method of attack. "Are you and your associates willing to worship the gods of the Roman State, and to pay the customary homage to the image of our lord, Trajan Augustus?"

Without answering this question Anicetus turned to the Governor: "Is it permitted to us, most excellent Plinius, that we see the accusation under which we have been this day brought before you?"

"There are many accusations," replied the Governor; "they are substantially the same, and it will probably suffice for the purpose that one should be read.—Scribe," he went on, turning to an official that sat near, "read the information of Lucilius against the people called Christians."

The document was read. It charged a number of persons, including all of the prisoners then before the court, and many who were not in custody. Treason, impiety towards the gods and towards the Emperor, hatred of mankind, licentiousness, were among the accusations brought against them.

"Here," said Anicetus, when the reading was finished, "are many terrible things brought against us, whereof no proof has been given by our accuser. Is it lawful, most excellent Plinius, that, such proof failing him, he should seek thus to raise prejudice against us? What right has this advocate, being but a private person, to call upon his fellow-citizens to do sacrifice to the gods or to the Emperor? What right has he to fix the time, the place, the manner of worship? Were an Egyptian, a worshipper of Isis, standing here, could he be lawfully compelled to do sacrifice to Jupiter? Or should a German—a worshipper, as I have heard, of Hertha—be condemned because he does not pay reverence to Apollo? For tell me now," he went on, addressing the accuser, "you that charge us with impiety, are you diligent in the performance of your own duties in divine things?"

The accuser was notoriously a man who believed in nothing, and was known not to spend a drachma on any religious duty. A hum of approval ran round the court at this manifest hit. So far, the line of defence taken by Anicetus had been successful. It might easily have failed with another Governor, a man of more imperious and tyrannical temper than Pliny; but the Elder had skilfully taken into account the Governor's mild and tolerant character, and his probable desire to avoid any measures of severity. But it was now to be overthrown in an unexpected way. A tablet was passed from among the crowd of spectators and put into the hands of the prosecuting counsel. On it were written the words, "Challenge the free condition of Rhoda, commonly called the daughter of Bion and Rhoda his wife, and call as your witness the freedman Eudoxus." This document bore the name of Lucilius, and the prosecutor at once perceived its importance. Indeed, it was his last hope, if his case was not to break down completely. He resumed his address.

"As your regard for freedom, most excellent Plinius, protects the silence of Anicetus and his companions, I will address myself to the case of one of the accused who cannot claim this same protection. I maintain that the woman Rhoda—reputed daughter of Bion and Rhoda—is not of free condition, but is a slave."

Had a thunderbolt fallen in the court, judge, assessor, accused, and audience could not have been more astonished. The first feeling was one of absolute incredulity. To no one did the statement seem more absurd than to the girl herself.

"This is a strange contention," remarked the Governor, "and not lightly to be made against a family of good repute. What evidence can you produce?"

"I call the freedman Eudoxus," replied the prosecutor.

The freedman Eudoxus was present, it soon appeared, in court, for he answered when his name was called. Most of those present knew him, but none, it may safely be said, knew any good of him. He did a little pettifogging business as an informer—a person who performs functions that may sometimes be useful, but are certainly always odious. If a baker gave short weight, if a wine-seller hammered the sides or thickened the bottoms of his measures, Eudoxus was commonly the man to bring his misdeeds home to him, getting for his reward half the penalty. Had he been content with this, he might have been endured; but he was not content—his gains had to be increased. If he did not find offences, he manufactured them. All the little traders and shopkeepers of the place—for he did not fly at high game—were in terror of him, and most of them submitted to the blackmail which he levied of them. As he spent his ill-gotten gains in the most discreditable way, it may be guessed that Eudoxus had about as bad a reputation as anyone in Nicæa. Great was the wonder among the audience what this miserable creature could know about the family of the respectable Bion. A few of the older people, however, had the impression that he had once been in the farmer's employment.

Eudoxus, a man of dwarfish stature, with a large misshapen head, whose countenance bore manifest tokens of a life of excess, stood up in the witness-box. The usual oath was administered to him.

"Tell us," said the Governor, "what you know about this case."

"Twenty years ago I was in the service of Bion. He is my patron. He enfranchised me. I was his bailiff."

"Why did you leave him?" asked the Governor.

"We had a difference about my accounts."

"I understand," said Pliny, who, like the rest of the world, was not impressed with the appearance of the witness; "you made things better for yourself and worse for him than he thought right. But go on; what do you know about this matter? You understand what it is; practically this, that the accused Rhoda is not truly the daughter of Bion. Do you know this said Rhoda?"

"Perfectly well, and her sister Cleoné also."

"Proceed, then."

"Bion bought me about a month after he came to the farm which he now cultivates. I was there when he brought thither his newly married wife, Rhoda by name. I lived in the house for the five years following that time. They had no children. Of this I am sure, for I saw the said Rhoda day after day, without the intermission of more than a day at the most, during the said five years. It was a matter of common talk among us of the household that this want of children was a great grief to the master and his wife. Three years after his coming, one morning—it was, I remember, the first day of May—Bion called us all into the dining-chamber. There was a cradle with two children in it. I should judge that they were a few days old. He said, 'See the daughters whom God has given me.' The same day he enfranchised me. To the other slaves he gave presents, and promised them their liberty in due time, according to their age, if they should show themselves worthy of it."

"He called them his daughters, then?" asked the Governor.

"Truly; but no pretence was made that they were so in truth, for his wife did not keep her chamber."

"Who were the women that waited upon her? Are they yet alive?"

"The elder, who was called the mistress's nurse, died, I believe, some ten years since. The younger is married to Lucas the butcher, that has his stall in the north-east corner of the market-place."

The Governor gave directions that the wife of Lucas the butcher should be sent for. Meanwhile he adjourned the proceedings for half an hour.

On the re-assembling of the court the witness was ready to be examined. Happily for herself, as will be seen, she had been emancipated before her marriage. She gave her testimony with evident reluctance, but it was clear and conclusive.

"I was a waiting-maid of Rhoda, wife of Bion. Bion bought me of a dealer in Ephesus a few days before his marriage, that I might wait on his wife. I went to her at once, and never left her till I was married, now ten years ago. She never had a child born to her. It is impossible that she should have done so without my knowing. It was commonly said that this was a great grief to her. I have seen her weeping, and knew that this was the cause. One day, when I had been with her about three years, the old woman whom we used commonly to call her nurse said to me, 'Come now, Myrto'—that was my name—'see the mistress's lovely babies.'—'What?' I said; 'it is impossible.'—'Nay, say nothing,' she said, and put her hand on my mouth. Then she took me into a chamber next to the mistress's, and, sure enough, there were two lovely little girl-babies, twins, as one could see at once, not more than a few days old, as I judged. Nurse said, 'You are a wise girl, and can keep a quiet tongue in your head. From to-day these two are Rhoda and Cleoné, daughters of Bion and Rhoda. And now, mind, not a word to anyone; and, above all, not a word to the little ones themselves when they grow up. For love's sake, I know, you will keep silence, nor will you miss your reward.'"

"And did you know whose the children really were?" asked the Governor.

"I did not know."

"Could they have belonged to anyone in the household?"

"Certainly not. Of this I am sure."

"Someone, I suppose, knew?"

"Yes, nurse knew, but she never told. She has been dead some years. The matter was never mentioned. We were the only women in the house. Eudoxus was the only man. The other slaves were outdoor labourers. None of them, as far as I know, are in this neighbourhood now. The girls, when they grew up, always supposed that they were the daughters of the house. It was never doubted; nothing was ever said to make a doubt."

The witness, whose self-control utterly broke down as soon as she had finished her evidence, now left the box. After a brief consultation with his assessor and with Tacitus, the Governor directed that Bion and Rhoda his wife should be called.

The two were of course present. One of the slaves who had left the assembly, at the bidding of Anicetus had made them acquainted with Rhoda's proceedings. As the girl herself failed to return at the usual time, their fears were aroused, and they were turned into certainty by the news that reached them from the town that a large company of Christians had been arrested at their meeting-house. On hearing these tidings they had hurried down to the town, accompanied by Cleoné, whom nothing indeed could at such a time have kept away from her sister.

The two answered to their names.

"Let Rhoda, the reputed mother of the person whose condition is questioned, be first called," said the Governor.

A way was made for her through the throng with no little difficulty, and she made her way, with tottering steps and face pale as death, into the witness-box.

"You have heard," said the Governor, "the testimony of Eudoxus, and Myrto the wife of Lucas?"

"I have heard," she answered.

"Nevertheless, for the more assurance, let the depositions be read over."

A scribe accordingly read the depositions.

"What have you to say to this evidence?"

The unhappy woman did not hesitate a moment. Nothing could have induced her to go aside by one hair's-breadth from the truth. She lifted her eyes, looked the Governor in the face, and answered in a low firm voice—"It is true. The children are not mine."

"And do you know whose children they are?"

"I know not."

"Nor whence they came?"

"Not even that. My nurse, as I called her, said that I had best not know. I think that they had been deserted; but even of this I am not sure. I can only guess it, because I never heard so much as a word about the parents. Nurse would never speak on the subject. Even when she was dying—for I was with her, and asked her again, as I thought it right to do—she would tell me nothing. 'They are your children by the will of God,' she said; 'no one else has part or lot in them.'"

A whispered consultation now took place between the Governor and his assessor. As the result of it, Bion was called.

"You have heard," said the Governor, "the testimony of your wife. What say you to it?"

It would have been useless to deny it, even if Bion, who was as truthful as his wife, could have wished to do so. "It is true," he said.

"Do you know whence the children came?"

"I know nothing more than my wife. The nurse knew, but she would say no more to me than she would to her."

"Then you cannot say whether they are bond or free by birth?"

The force of the question did not strike the witness, overpowered as he was by the situation, though there were many in the court who saw its significance, while an evil smile crept over the face of the prosecutor.

"Free, my lord!" he answered, after a pause; "of course they are free—they are my adopted children."

The Governor saw the course that things were taking, and was glad to leave the matter to the prosecutor, being ready to interfere if he saw a chance of helping the imperilled women.

"Excuse me, sir," said the prosecutor; "you speak of them as being your adopted children, but can you produce the instrument of adoption?"

The poor man was staggered by the question. "I never adopted them in that way. I never thought it necessary. But I have treated them as my children; they have lived with us as children. I have divided everything that I have between them in my will."

"Pardon me," said the prosecutor, with his voice most studiously gentle, and his smile more falsely sweet, as he saw his toils closing round his prey, "I do not doubt your kindness to them; but if you cannot produce the usual legal instrument—which, indeed, I understand you to say you have never executed—they are not your adopted children. And if you have not adopted them, may I ask whether you have emancipated them?"

The purport of the examination now made itself clear to the unhappy man. He had, of course, done nothing of the kind. Taking it for granted that their condition would never be questioned—ignorant, too, of law, as a man of his training and occupation would almost certainly be—he had never dreamt of either adopting or emancipating the two girls. He had simply treated them as his daughters, and never doubted for a moment that all the world would do so likewise.

"I have established then, most excellent sir," said the prosecutor, "that the woman Rhoda and her sister Cleoné, with whom, indeed, I am not at present concerned, are of the condition of slaves. I demand, therefore, that the woman Rhoda be questioned in the customary way."

The Governor interposed, "Doubtless the accused will answer such questions as will be put to her."

"Pardon me, sir, if I say that the law knows but one way only of questioning a slave."

"But if the slave be willing to speak?"

"Even then, I submit, the law presumes that he will speak the truth only under this compulsion. I demand, therefore, that the woman Rhoda be questioned by torture."

"'We will suffer together.'"

A movement of horror went through the whole assembly.

Another consultation followed between the Governor and his assessor. "This seems to me a needless severity," said Pliny when it was finished. "Why not reserve this compulsion if the witness should be obstinate?"

The prosecuting counsel, hardened as he was, was staggered by this appeal. He turned to Lucilius for further instructions. Lucilius was pitiless. He had been enraged by the cool and skilful defence of Anicetus, and he was determined not to lose his grasp on the victim that had fallen into his power. "Keep to your point," he whispered to the accuser.

"I demand the question by torture against the woman Rhoda."

"It is granted," said the Governor, "but so that nothing that she shall say be used against Bion and Rhoda his wife."

Cleoné, who was standing by the side of the elder Rhoda, had gone on hoping against hope till the fatal words were spoken. Then she rushed forward and caught her sister in her arms. "We will suffer together," she said.

THE PENKNIFE AND THE BRAZIER.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," ETC.

"And it came to pass, that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves, he [the king] cut it with the penknife, and cast it into the fire that was (in the brazier or) on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed in the fire that was on the hearth."—JER. xxxvi. 23.

NEVER was there a man who made such a bad use of his penknife as that unhappy Jehoiakim, king of Judah. Better for him to have taken it and cut off his hand, than to have cut that roll; better for him to have shivered every winter of his life to that life's end, than to have used that brazier to burn the words of the Living God. Poor wretched man! with his brazier and his penknife he entered the lists with God, who is a consuming fire, with the One whose word is quick and powerful, and sharper than a two-edged sword. The cutting up and burning of that roll by Jehoiakim was a bad business; and the worst of it is that though Jehoiakim is dead and gone, his dead body cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, the like is going on now. He has left successors enough. God grant that they may not be amongst us to-day. If they be, God grant that they may be afraid, and rend their garments, or do whatever might be the equivalent of it, before it is too late.

Jehoiakim, as everyone in Scripture is, is a representative man, a specimen of a class of men, who with greater or less audacity do as he did, and with a like result, and a common doom.

I shall occupy your attention but for a short time to-day, doing little more than barely mentioning some of the teachings with which this incident supplies us. Such as I have time to notice will group themselves round two centres—Jehoiakim and God.

Let us first take what is to be noticed in connection with this madman who, with his brazier and his penknife, defied the Living God.

When Jehoiakim had read three or four pages, or columns of the roll, and got from them a sample of the whole, he took his penknife and cut up the MS., and threw it into the fire. He treated it as waste paper, though he knew well enough that it was the message of the Living God.

Jehoiakim read but three or four columns—a little of that kind of thing was quite enough for him. The whole counsel of God was what he did not want to know; he went no farther than mere curiosity would take him. There was deep and serious matter here, which, as a king and a man, he was bound to go into; but, with a levity and an obstinacy of character which seem fitter for a madman than for one in his common senses, he went no further, but acted as though by putting an end to the roll itself he could do the same to the living and awful words which were written therein.

The complexion of the story seems to point rather to a treatment of supercilious contempt, than one of open violence. The penknife is probably quietly and calmly drawn through the roll; and then most likely Jehoiakim sat still and watched the MS. shrivel in the flames, and laughed at the black and formless and letterless ashes of what a moment before had been the word of the Living God. A breath would now suffice to blow away all the heavy maledictions which had been denounced.

Jehoiakim thought that he had effected a complete destruction of all that that roll contained. The gash of the penknife would have still left the roll so that it could be read, but the fire consumed the whole. Mark that. Jehoiakim aimed at a thorough work, and he carried it out.

And mark yet further that the natural action of the fire was not restrained.

We should have said: "God will never tolerate the insult, He will never allow such a thing to happen, He will interfere with Nature, rather than allow such an act of rebellion to be carried out."

For the moment there was an apparent human triumph over God. The king sat before the fire in the pride of his royalty, his courtiers around him, and the charred and dishonoured fragments of a burned roll were the only representatives of the living God.

No voice from heaven had cried to "stop," as it had done to Abraham when he took the knife to slay his son; none called as the trumpet sound which arrested Paul on his persecuting path; the thunders of heaven which we should have expected to have boomed, and crackled, and crashed, and shaken the throne and scattered the brazier's fire, were silent. The fires of heaven, which in their forked descent would have soon avenged the impious deed of the fire on earth, did not cleave the skies and kill the king. All this would have been awful, but to me it is yet more awful that all remained still; the fire burned on; there was no fear. Jehoiakim had provoked the Living God, and there was no sign of the insults being revenged.

And with what simple instruments the whole thing was done! The common things of daily life are quite sufficient as weapons against God, when there is a heart to use them as such. The fire which God had given the man to warm him, the common penknife, one of the little conveniences of daily life, are weapons enough with which to fight against God, even as David's sling and stone were weapons enough wherewith to fight for Him. So ready to hand lie the instruments of the will, for evil or for good, so effective can the humblest instruments become in the hands of those who desire to do right, or whose heart is set on wrong.

Now, I want you to learn, I want myself to learn, some important lesson from all this.

See here how the elements of high defiance of God lie ever ready to our hand.

Let Jehoiakim's penknife and brazier be your preachers and say, "The elements for the destruction of conscience, for turning you away from God's reproof and the Spirit influences, from any of His dealings with you, are round about you in your common daily life. Jehoiakim had no glittering sword with which to strike at the Almighty, but he had a penknife, and that did as well. He had no lightnings to hurl upward at Him; but he had a fire burning in his brazier, and that did the deed.

You don't need me to teach you what all that means. Your common sense will tell you plainly enough. You can fight God, fight your consciences, ruin yourselves with what lies readiest at your hand; the most commonplace things will do this. Let the will but be there, and what is harmless, and even useful in itself, will suffice for you to work therewith the deadliest hate to God, the direst injury to yourselves.

The lawful amusement, the lawful food, the lawful relationship, the lawful love may all be perverted; aye, the very trifles of life a man may use against his own soul. The book that is misused to divert you from serious thought, the coin that the world claims and gets, when it is God's, the child you fondle, the home you love, the very clothes you wear, may become to you the penknife which rends, and the brazier which burns the message which comes from God to you. Perverted uses are often only one step from deadly abuses. The brazen censers of Korah, Dathan and Abiram became sin against their own souls, as Jehoiakim's brazier became a sin against his. Men err in thinking that they have to go far afield for weapons wherewith to fight either for God or against Him. When the roll of the prophet was brought in before the king, the brazier and the penknife were ready for it there.

Three or four columns! that was enough for Jehoiakim. It was bitter reading, and he would not go on. Who knows but that if he had read on, the terrible tale of lamentation, and mourning, and woe, folding and coiling itself around his heart, might have made him shudder, and by the very excess of misery have crushed him into humility; and he that humbleth himself under the mighty hand of God shall be lifted up. The possibility was there, for God himself has said, "It may be that the House of Judah will hear all the evil which I purpose to do unto them, that they may return every man from his evil way, that I may forgive their iniquity and their sin." Who knows but that one of those gracious touches of mercy which glisten like planets in a winter sky, which touch the murkiest cloud and fringe it with golden light, may have wakened up some penitential thought, which He that is "slow to anger and of great mercy" would have been ready to act upon, and forgive?

No, young man—you who will not read your Bible, because it has hard things in it; and you, old man, too—you for whom three or four chapters are enough—go on, go through it all; the Lord has a "may be" in it for you. Read what He will surely do to you if you do not repent; with your miserable brazier and your penknife I adjure you not to enter into conflict with the Living God.

But you may do this. There is here a distinct recognition of man's ability successfully to rebel—i.e., apparently successfully for a time. The knife cut! the brazier burnt! the roll was gone! But Jehoiakim was not gone, and God was not gone, and there was another roll to come, with the same things in it. Oh, foolish man, mark that—with "the same" things in it. "All the words of the book, and there were added besides unto them many like words."

I will say nothing about that last awful sentence, it would want a sermon to itself; the resurrection roll is more awful than the one which has perished in the flames; the first contents are there, "and there were added besides unto them many like words."

And now, what shall I say about God? He seems vanquished; He is gone. There is an interval. All is quiet, and Jehoiakim no doubt thinks that all is well.

Stay. "Then the word of the Lord came to Jehoiakim, and it said, "Take thee again another roll," and in that roll was to be written every word which had been burned, "and there were added besides unto them many like words."

What have we here? The vitality of the purposes of God under, and in spite of, the resistance and apparently destructive power of man.

So the brazier and the penknife were no good. They destroyed the roll, but they could not reach God. Ministers may be unheeded, Bibles may be unread, consciences may be seared, hard, but God's purpose is unchanged, God's will remains, when God's roll is destroyed. Remember that it is with God Himself you will have to deal; until your penknife and your brazier can conquer Him, He will conquer you.

Oh! the terrible calmness of "Take thee another roll." The idea is frightful of God being calm, unhurried, unimpassioned with you. You have tried your best against Him; now He is going to renew the strife, and that with the determination of gaining the day. And what is He going to do? Why, if you fight His word, to vindicate His word, to show that not a jot or tittle of it shall fail; to make it even more stringent than before. The general law will be restored, and the special offender—Jehoiakim then, you now—punished.

That was a miserable failure of Jehoiakim's—his last state was worse than the first; the whole of what was written in the first roll is written now again, and much more beside, and he has written against him a special doom.

My readers, the roll, the law, with all its curses, comes to every one of you. It comes with a purpose. Jeremiah's roll is sent that men may return from their evil ways, that God may forgive their iniquity and their sin. It is your bounden duty to listen to and to believe what God solemnly declares He will do to those who do not heed His threats and forsake their sin.

God comes to you with His Law, that you may hate and flee from the evil against which the Law is directed, for evil cannot live with God. That is its purpose; and it is a good and gracious deed of God to tell you that His hand must be against evil, and that it will be too. Be as merciful to your own souls as God is to them, when He tells you plainly what He means to do with the unrepentant sinner and his sin.

The Law comes to you, unfolding its terrors that you may believe them and escape from them; it wants to be honoured in obedience and not punishment. Christ has fulfilled its demands, and yet borne its curses. You must in your repentance first turn to Him, and then through Him from sin.

If there is any one amongst us to day who is flattering himself that all is well because, though he has rejected God, and God's Law, and God's salvation, all is still—let him remember that another roll may be preparing this time, not for repentance, but for judgment, and that his name, his very name, the name by which we all know him here, the name by which he is known in society, in business, in church, at home, may be on the point of being entered therein.

Break the awful silence this very moment, and say, "Lord, stay Thine hand. I, ere my name goes down, I bow beneath the accusations and the terrors of the roll; I flee to Christ, that in Thy other roll my name may be written, even in the Book of Life."

And if there is any among you who would tell me that I have made too much of the brazier and the penknife, those instruments of the King of Judah's sin, for that any little things might be made the instruments of evil, if only the heart be set on sin, then I say, Out of thine own mouth shall be thy teaching to-day. See, if thine heart be evil, how the elements of defying God, of sin, are ever ready at thine hand—how in even the commonest things of daily life thou mayest work out thy doom. And pray God for the Holy Ghost, that thy heart may be right with Him, that none of the things of daily life may to thee be ministers of sin, as were the brazier and the penknife to that fool who with them did an awful deed, even no less than defying the very Living God Himself.

To you, to you, brethren, comes there this day by my hands the roll of a book, a book written within and without, with lamentation and mourning and woe, but also with grace, and mercy, and peace; these all are true in the very fulness of truth itself—the denunciations, the curses, the woes, the death, the doom are all terribly true; the deliverance, the life, the joy, the peace, are gloriously true also. To those who have taken to themselves first the death and then the life, it is well—they have passed from death unto life; but for others it is yet only a "may be;" it "may be" that they will do the like, but the brazier and the penknife are at hand, and what if there be a heart to crucify the Son of God afresh, and to neglect so great salvation?

Upon the "may be" of to-day, of perhaps this very day, may hang the dread "shall be's" of eternity.

Refuse, like Jehoiakim, to go into the whole Bible roll. Cast it from you when you have read a little, and not found it to your taste; then the "may be" of salvation will become the "shall be" of ruin; and the roll which God sent you as an instrument of life, will become to you a most certain and terrible instrument of death.

EARLY MORNING.

A PARABLE FROM NATURE. BY LADY LAURA HAMPTON.

"DING-DONG," and through the stillness of the morning air the old church clock began slowly to toll forth the hour of five.

"Twitter, twitter," "Chirp, chirp," sleepily answered the birds from the trees and bushes around, as they one by one untucked their little round heads from under their wings and shook out their feathers.

Softly rustled the leaves beneath the breath of the balmy air, as they strung the dew into beads on leaf and stem.

Swiftly and silently the lark mounted high in the rose-tinted ether from her nest amid the daisies, who, already half-awakened, gazed expectantly through their petals.

A breathless spell held all nature entranced as the golden rays brightened in the east, and the stars, who had so patiently and unobserved watched all night, paled and faded before the rising sun. Suddenly a burst of song from highest heaven heralded the new-born day, which was taken up and echoed from earth and sky as hundreds of feathered warblers flitted hither and thither in the sunlight, and trees and flowers offered their silent homage in sparkling dewdrops or opening buds, or filled the air with their fragrance.

"Heralded the new-born day."—p. 211.

A wave as of regret passed over the field of long grass in which the daisies bloomed, as it quivered at the faint touch of the breeze.

"Alas!" it murmured, "that I who have received so much should have nothing to offer in return."

"Well, you certainly have not beauty," sang a hedge-sparrow who was intent on domestic cares; "and for my part, I do not understand this perpetual jargon about thanksgiving. Receive! of course we all receive light and food; how could we live if we did not? and as long as we do our duty I do not think there is time or need for praise."

"It seems so ungrateful," replied the grass, "to take all and give naught back—just to grow, and nothing more."

"You are wronging yourself there," slowly remarked a snail, who with difficulty had crawled up the daisies. "Growth in itself is a giving back, for are you not thus—though perhaps unconsciously—responding to and making the most of gifts received?"

"And to grow at all, one must look upwards, even though it be silently," said the flower on which it rested; "and surely to adore is to praise."

So the grass was comforted, and the rustling of the leaves and the song of the birds, the hum of bees and the scent of the flowers, troubled it no more as it grew and gazed upon the sun, and the birds and the flowers and the bees sought and found shelter amongst it, and were welcome. Spring passed into summer, and days lengthened as the cuckoo's song, the sound of the scythe was heard, and the grass, in the morning green and growing up, at night lay withering beneath the stars.

Once more all Nature sang her hymn of praise to the rising sun, and as its rays rested on the new-mown hay the gift so longed for in life was granted; a subtle fragrance filled the air, and floated heavenwards.

HOMELESS.

"Home, home! sweet, sweet home!
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home!"

CHAPTER I.

SILENCE fell on the generally noisy audience as the pathetic music of the well-known ballad touched all hearts. The promenaders paused in their walk to and fro. The busy devourers of oranges and penny ices forgot for the moment the delicacies before them. The hum of voices ceased.

The singer's voice thrilled through the heated concert-hall as she sang with tightly clasped hands, and shining eyes that saw, beyond the glitter of mirrors and chandeliers and the multitude of faces, a little rose-covered cottage, knee-deep in gilly-flowers and shaded by fragrant lime-trees, which had once been her own "sweet home." The clear tones trembled with suppressed emotion. Sympathetic tears started to the eyes of many a listener. For the moment another atmosphere seemed to pervade the stifling, glaring hall. Then the song ended. There was a brief silence, followed by tumultuous applause, and "Mademoiselle Claudine" came back with a sigh from her dream to reality.

A little later she was wending her way to what she now called "home"—an attic in a back slum of the East End of our modern Babylon. It was a terrible night; the rain fell in torrents, and Ella Maize—yclept "Mademoiselle Claudine" by the aspiring manager of the Swan Road Hall—shivered as the bitter wind caught and buffeted her mercilessly at the street corners. The shadow of the past was upon her—a past which the words of her song had only too powerfully recalled—and not even the delighted manager's promise to raise her salary could dispel it.

Ella Maize was a country woman, whose life until the last two years had been spent in a bowery Hampshire village. Her mother had died soon after Ella's marriage to the village carpenter—a steady, good-natured young man, who had everybody's good word; and her loneliness made the girl cling more closely to her husband, who was indeed all in all to her.

Never was there a happier couple than this young pair. Their cottage was the abode of peace. Nobody ever saw it "in a muddle," or its mistress untidy. Windows, pots and pans, were all as bright as Ella's face. Round the old-fashioned porch roses were trained. The garden was full of flowers, where bees held carnival. All day the door stood open for the free entrance of sun and air, and Ella might be heard at almost any hour singing over her work as gaily as a lark. The cottage was indeed a home; and when a child came to the happy wife, she felt she had not a wish unfulfilled.

Baby Walter was six months old when the first cloud darkened Ella's sky. Her husband's health began to fail. He had a cough; he grew thin; and village gossips, remembering how his father had died of consumption, shook their heads, pouring their forebodings and condolences into Ella's terrified ears.

To die? Her dear Walter to die? A shuddering horror came over her at the thought. Death, both to him and to her, meant only darkness and separation, unlighted by any real faith in the love of Him who takes the sting from death.

Strict keepers of the moral law, they had never learned the first and great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart," and each was the other's idol.

When a friend—the captain of a small sailing-vessel—offered to take Walter for a voyage, which would give him the one possible chance for his life, both of them caught at the chance, though the prospect of parting was a heart-breaking one.

Especially was it terrible to Ella. It was impossible for her to go with her husband, and it was bitterly hard to send him away from her in his weakness to suffer and—oh, thought of anguish!—perhaps to die, without her at his side. But, no, he should not, would not die! He would return to her strong and well, and, like the happy lovers in old fairy tales, they would "live happy ever afterwards"—in the dear little home among the limes.

The dreaded hour of parting came. White and tearless, Ella stood with straining eyes fixed on the fast-lessening vessel that bore her husband away from her until it was lost to sight. Then she turned away—her child, her sole remaining comfort, clasped close to her breast to still its aching. One letter she had from Walter—full of cheering accounts of returning health and vigour—full of words of love and longing for her and her baby. One letter—and never another!

A fortnight later Mrs. Smith, from the next cottage, came in with a newspaper in her hand. The Merryweather had been run down one foggy night by a steamer, all on board perishing with her.

God alone, Who sent the trouble, knew the fierceness of the pang that seemed to tear Ella's heart in twain. He only knew the awful burden of loss and loneliness which that fatal news laid on her—the anguish of hopeless days and sleepless nights. He, who leads the blind by ways that they know not, gave the widow strength to bear her grief, and to live through it, though she never thought of looking to Him for help. For herself she would not have cared if she had starved; she would have been glad to die—to close her eyes to the mocking sunshine, to lose the pain that gnawed ceaselessly at her heart. But for her child's sake she must not die; she must live and work, she must take up the burden of life and bear it to the end.

With the restlessness of grief, Ella could not stay at Fairyburn, in the home that had been so dear and was so desolate. She determined to go to London. The noise and bustle of the great city would distract her mind—would take away that dreary sense of silence which weighed on her very soul. She would find some sort of work, of course!

It happened that Mrs. Smith had a married sister in London, therefore Ella was not utterly friendless when she arrived there. It was to the big lodging-house in Magson's Yard, where Mrs. Lee lived, that she went to make a new home.

As the train swept into the Waterloo station, a lurid sunset was burning over London, the smoke flared dull purple in it, hanging over the houses like a pall. Certainly there was noise and bustle enough. The incessant roar of traffic, the endless train of pedestrians, the confused shouts and cries, quite stunned the country woman. How many faces full of unrest and misery she met! How many wan with disease, and dark with sin!

Ella's heart sickened as she followed the man who carried her one poor box through the streets, while the sunset faded into a dull gloomy twilight.

At last they reached Magson's Yard. Ella pressed her child more closely in her arms, and averted her eyes as she passed groups of bold, slatternly women and drunken men, lolling at windows and in doorways. Up flights of dingy stairs they went, past room after room from whence sounds of quarrelling or loud merry-making issued, to the top—where was the attic which was to be Ella's home from henceforth.

It was a good-sized room, in spite of the sloping roof, and a bright fire burned in the grate, thanks to Mrs. Lee's exertions; but to the young widow it was an abode of desolation. She sat down with baby Walter on her knee, and burst into tears. Vainly she wished that she had never left Fairyburn. She could not live, she told herself, among these dreadful sounds and sights, or breathe in this stifling air. Again and again the desolate cry rose to her lips from her breaking heart—"Oh, Walter! oh, my love! come back to me!"

"My goodness gracious me!" exclaimed Mrs. Lee, hurrying in, with her tall daughter, Grace, to welcome the new arrival; "but this won't do at all! you must cheer up, my dear! Come in and get a bit of tea with us—we 've kep' it a-purpose for you, and there 's a bit of something tasty after your journey."

"Thank you," answered Ella faintly, "I—I don't want anything."

"Nonsense! You feel like that just because you want something so badly! Give me the child—you see, it 's quite ready to come to me, a pretty! and Grace, you bring Mrs. Maize in. Tom and Jim 's out, so there 's only me and Grace."

Mrs. Lee chatted incessantly, being one of those women who cannot live without talking.

"What are you going to do?" she asked at length, when a little colour had crept into Ella's white cheeks under the influence of the hot, strong tea.

"I don't know—plain sewing," replied the latter, dubiously.

"Whew!" whistled Miss Grace, whose costume of crimson and amber, set off by various beads and bracelets had entirely absorbed baby Walter's attention during tea, and also somewhat excited his mother's wonder. "You'd better take to my line of business. Plain sewing 's a fool to it!"

"What is your business?" Ella asked with interest.

Miss Grace tossed her curly head till all her beads jingled again.

"I sing at the Swan Road Hall," she explained proudly. "I sing in character. I'm a comic. Oh! it 's fine!"

Ella's eyes opened in wonder and dismay. Grace laughed a loud, good-natured laugh.

"Shocked your country ideas, eh? Well, you come and see me sometimes, that 's all! I say, can you sing?"

Ella could sing. She had been the leading soprano in the village choir, and owned it modestly.

"I 'll hear you sing," pronounced Miss Grace; "and if you 've a voice, our manager shall hear you. If you enter the purfession your fortune 's made."

Grace and the manager decided that Ella had a voice, and some few months later the widow began her new career as "Mademoiselle Claudine, the celebrated ballad-singer: for the first time in London."

At first the "celebrated ballad-singer" was shy, and the musical critics of the popular Hall voted against her; but on the night on which our story opens she had made a success, and the hall rang with her praises.

Ella was very wet when she reached Magson's Yard, very tired, and strangely dispirited in spite of her success. All night she tossed sleepless on her bed. In the morning she was slightly hoarse, and by the next night her throat was really bad. Evidently she had caught a severe cold. Fortunately, she had three days' rest from singing, and hoped by the end of that time to be quite well again.

"It don't do for us purfessionals to be ill," declared Grace Lee on the third day, shaking her head over Ella's wretched looks—for her hope of being quite well had been a baseless one. "You must suck some lozengers, and keep quiet. It won't never do to disappoint 'em to-night of 'Home, sweet home,' just when you've made a hit."

"I don't know how I shall manage," said Ella despairingly; "but I'll do my best."

The place seemed to swim round her when, at last, the time arrived, and she came on the platform to sing. Her limbs ached; her throat was on fire; and a bewildering humming in her ears added to her distress. The listening faces glimmered indistinctly before her. How impossible it was to sing! What an effort it cost her even to raise her voice—that grew weaker and huskier with every note!

From the back of the platform she heard the manager say, "Sing up!" in an angry undertone. She made a frantic effort to obey. What was the matter with her? she wondered with a feeling of terror.

> "'A charm from the skies > Seems to hallow us there'"—

So far she got, then her voice broke with a curious jarring wail. Not another sound would issue from her white lips. She looked wildly round with a mute pitiful appeal for help. The humming in her ears grew maddeningly loud, the audience disappeared, the lights went out in a rush of darkness, and "Mademoiselle Claudine" fell to the ground insensible.

CHAPTER II.

"WE don't want any new hands, thank you!" said the portly mistress of a small baby-linen shop, in answer to Ella Maize's plea for work.

"I can sew very neatly, and I am willing to take very small payment," said Ella imploringly; "I—I can't get any work anywhere, and I'm nearly starving!"

"We've so many such applicants," replied the other, shrugging her shoulders.

"I've sold all my things to pay the rent, and this morning I've been turned out of my room because I can't pay; I've nowhere to go, and nothing to eat, and I've a little child! For God's sake, help me!"

Miss Steen fumbled in her pocket and produced a penny.

"There, that's all I can do for you. I've enough to do to keep myself!" she said, turning away with a gesture of dismissal.

Hopelessly and heavily Ella passed out into the street. She had utterly lost her voice—her one talent, and the disappointed manager of the Swan Road Hall had refused to pay her anything. Vainly she had tried to get work, day after day dragging her weary limbs from place to place, hearing in her broken slumbers baby Walter's cries for bread, seeing in the cruel daylight his little cheeks losing their colour, his eyes growing hollow—despairingly fighting the grim wolf from the door, which it must enter at last!

The friendship of Mrs. Lee and Grace—never a trustworthy one—cooled as Ella's fortunes declined.

One by one her few possessions were pawned until all were gone. Then the widow and her child were turned into the street—homeless. Oh, terrible word when a woman must say it—homeless!

In all the wide world she had not a friend. Of the crowds that passed her by not one knew or cared anything about her. Sometimes so-called charity put a penny into her outstretched hand, and then went comfortably on its way, forgetting her.

Into the rich West End she strayed wrapped in the old plaid shawl which Grace Lee—with a kindly impulse—had given her at parting. There, there were stately homes enough, whose pampered servants threw away the food for which Ella was starving. Luxurious carriages swept by. Ladies extravagantly dressed, rosy children laughing and gay, glanced askance at the bonnetless "tramp" and fatherless child—for whom was no refuge but the workhouse or the grave. The splendid shops groaned under their plenitude of raiment and food. Ella turned sick at the sight of the latter, but baby Walter first laughed, then cried because "mammy" wouldn't get him one of the pretty sugared cakes he coveted. His cries made the mother's broken heart bleed anew. Surely her cup of woe was nearly full! Slowly the cold April night came on. To home, friends, and dinner, ladies and gentlemen—full of mirthful anticipation or languidly bored by very excess of pleasure—whirled along in their closed warm carriages. Lights glared through the dusk. The noise in the streets grew more deafening. Seeking a quiet corner with a last effort, Ella sank down on a doorstep—yielding to the apathy of weariness and despair—sank down to die.

> "O, it was pitiful!
> Near a whole city-ful,
> Home she had none!"

She would rather die than go into a workhouse, she thought bitterly. A workhouse for Walter's wife and child! No, she would die, since there was no home for her in the world, and no hope! Death could not be darker than life.

Little Walter soon wailed himself to sleep, and his mother's head fell heavily against the door-post. She was not asleep, but completely exhausted, and her life seemed to be floating painlessly from her into outer darkness.

* * * * * *

"I've no husband and no home—no home!"

Her own words roused Ella with a start. She opened her heavy eyes and met a pair of friendly blue ones, that were watching her anxiously.

Where was she? She was lying on a clean white bed in a cheerful firelit room, and on the pillow by her side lay baby Walter's sleeping face.

Ella put her hand to her forehead, trying to recall her scattered senses. By degrees it all came back to her—the dreary wandering in the streets, the cold doorstep.

"No home! no home!" she wailed again.

"The widow and the child were turned into the street, homeless."—p. 215.

"Yes, my dear, you've a home; and if you ain't got a husband, you've a Father!"

"No, no! I've neither home nor father," moaned Ella, exerting all her strength to speak. "Oh, don't send me out into the streets again! I shan't be in the way long, ma'am; I'm dying!"

"There! there!" replied the owner of the blue eyes, soothingly. "Be still, my dear, and go to sleep. A kind gen'leman as lodges with me brought you in, and you 're to stay here. He wouldn't turn a homeless dog out, he wouldn't, let alone a woman!"

"He is kind," murmured Ella, her eyes filling with tears.

"Aye, it's true. You might have died on the doorstep but for him—and your Father."

"I have no father," Ella declared with weak impatience.

"Our Father which art in heaven," said the other woman softly. "Him as cares for His wandering children, and brings the homeless Home."

Ella was silent; but the words had touched a chord in her heart, and set it vibrating. Strange new thoughts and emotions stirred within her.

"Our Father which art in heaven."

Ah! that was the Father, that the Home her new friend meant. She had never gone for love or comfort to that Father—never desired that home. But now, brought very low by weakness and suffering, the long-estranged heart said, "I will arise and go."

A Father and a Home! How sorely she needed both! What sweet, what precious words they were! Ella felt like a child waking from some long feverish sleep, in which it has been wandering lost and hopeless. She clasped her hands and murmured, "Father! our Father!"

It was her first real prayer.

"The gen'leman says as how he'll come in and see you if you're willing," said good Mrs. Morris next day, when her patient had eaten some breakfast and declared herself better, though still too weak to rise; "and don't you go and be afeared of him. He's had a deal of trouble too, and he can feel for you. He's a real Christian, and if anybody can do you good he can."

"I'll see him," replied Ella. "I'd like to thank him."

She looked up, half-timidly, half-eagerly, as her rescuer entered, and saw—her husband!

* * * * * *

It was no dream; though, at first, neither Ella nor Walter could believe in the reality of each other's presence in the flesh. It was a happiness almost past belief; a joy almost too great to be borne. They mingled their tears together, while Mrs. Morris wept for sympathy, and baby Walter, thinking that "mammy" was being somehow injured, cried lustily also.

With her hand in her husband's close clasp, Ella told her pitiful story, and listened to his.

When the Merryweather went down, he had clung to a floating barrel and been tossed about, as it seemed to him, for hours, before he was picked up—almost dead—by a passing outward-bound vessel. For weeks he lay at death's door, being most kindly tended by a clergyman who was on his way to Melbourne. Body and soul this young man cared for him, and, by degrees, as his brain cleared and his mind strengthened, Mr. Williams led him to seek that gracious Lord who is always found by them that earnestly seek Him.

On his return to Fairyburn, Walter found his home deserted. Nobody was able to give him any clue as to the whereabouts of his wife and child, for the Smiths had gone away in debt, and all that was known by others was that Ella was "somewhere in Lunnon." To London he went, full of hope; but after months of vain search and sickening disappointment his hope began to fade.

Through the Vicar of Fairyburn's influence he obtained work, in the intervals of which he still pursued his almost despairing search.

In the darkness he had not recognised his wife in the huddled-up bundle of clothes he carried in from the doorstep to Mrs. Morris's warm kitchen. Being already late for an appointment, he had placed his burden hastily on a sofa, leaving her and her child to his landlady's good offices, with the brief request—"Don't turn her out, poor soul! I'll see her to-morrow."

This was the story which Ella was never weary of hearing.

A month of happiness passed away, during which the happy mother and child rapidly recovered health and strength; and then Walter asked his wife if she would like to return to their pretty cottage home at Fairyburn.

"I hear it's to let again," he said; "and I know you love the country."

For a moment Ella hesitated, as a vision of the sunny, flower-sweet garden, with its blossoming limes rose before her; but only for a moment.

"No, dear Walter; we won't go back," she said, with a brave, bright smile. "Don't you think that God has led you and me through so much trouble just that we may be the better able to help others in their troubles? When I remember how I felt when I was starving—and, oh! far worse, when I saw my baby starving—my heart bleeds for all such! I'd like to live among them, and help as many as we can, Walter. The helpless women! the little orphaned children!"

"Right, Ella! and God bless you for saying so! It's what I wanted to do; only I wasn't sure it was your mind. It will be a work of love to us both, my darling!"

So Walter and Ella Maize live on in London, though they are well-to-do people now. Among the poor in the poorest quarters of the great, wealthy, noisy city they live, finding a joy above all the dreams of selfish happiness in rescuing the fallen and feeding the hungry—in bringing the fatherless to the loving Father, and leading weary, homeless wanderers Home!

WHITE BERRIES.

(See Frontispiece.)

BY THE REV. FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE, M.A.

ACROSS the meadow, wintry white,
They passed, dear girls! so April-bright,
My heart went after;
Ah, poet, turn your rhyme for weeks—
What word will paint those morning cheeks,
Or chime that laughter?

They dragged the burnished branches down;
The red-gold ringlets brushed the brown;
The gazer lingers;
To lend one's aid were sweet enough—
But holly-spikes, howe'er so rough,
Would kiss those fingers!

I saw sweet Gold-hair toward her friend
Hold up a bough, white-globed, and bend,
And half caress her;
The other blushed and turned her head,
And, as her brief romance I read,
I thought, "God bless her!"

Then, throbbing over roof and field,
The Bells of Christmas crashed and pealed
In concord golden,
And on those glad young hearts and mine
Tell, with a balm of peace divine,
The tidings olden.

WIDOWS' WORRIES.

BY THE REV. FREDERICK HASTINGS.

WHEN two persons get married, it is said of them "they have tied a knot with the tongue that cannot be undone with the teeth." Death comes and unties what the teeth cannot touch. The two may have lived happily or unhappily; but the untying has ofttimes terrible consequences to either the one or the other. It is said by some that the wife will get on better without the husband than he would without her; but, as a rule, we find the woman has a greater struggle when the husband is taken away.

Every man should provide for himself, if possible, against a rainy day; but it is imperative that he should do something to provide for his wife against the most fearful rainy day that can come—the day when he will be carried to his long home. He should insure his life, at least. A tradesman told me with pride, "I insured my life at my marriage, and I have gone on increasing the amount as often as I could. I know I shall never otherwise save money; and I am compelled to pay the premium, so I am saving that way." His wife stood by and looked on with equal pride at a husband who was so careful for her. She was not as blind as that one who said, when her husband came home and told her, with gladness, that he had insured his life for five thousand pounds, "Just like the selfishness of men! always insuring and thinking of their own benefit."

When a man dies leaving an estate or a good amount in insurance, his wife will find that there are many drains upon the amount before she can get it invested so that it shall bring her in a permanent income. Perhaps he may leave a will that is so carelessly drawn or so complicated that his poor widow may have endless trouble, and even have the whole estate thrown into Chancery, and a very trifling amount come out. We knew of one who had nearly £20,000 left by her husband, but after some litigation over the will she had about a tenth of that amount left.

It seems terrible enough that a woman should have to bear such sorrow as comes when the prop of the house is taken, but she has so frequently immediately to bestir herself to think of ways and means. After the funeral expenses have been met, there are the daily expenses that have to be curtailed or discharged. How few can indulge the luxury of grief like a certain Marchioness of Tavistock, whom physicians ordered to Lisbon to divert her mind and restore her health. She prepared to go. A consultation of physicians was held just before she started. One of them feeling her pulse asked her to open her hand. She declined. He urged it, and gently pressed it open. Then was disclosed, hidden in the hand, the miniature portrait of the deceased Marquis.

"Madam," said the physician, "prescriptions must be useless if you are determined to keep before your eyes an object which, though deservedly dear, only confirms the violence of your illness."

She replied, "I have kept it in my bosom or hand ever since his death, and thus I shall preserve it until I drop after him into the grave." It might in her case have been a mercy to have been compelled to do something that would take her mind from grief. The absence of necessity for thinking of "ways and means" is not an unmixed good. Few can, however, linger long to mourn. They may not dry their tears altogether, but they must not let the world see too many. They must put forth effort that further bitter tears of poverty may not be wrung from them and their children.

It is not of those of high rank that we speak in considering the question of "how widows live." Nor is it of those who soon after the loss of one husband think only of how to secure another; but we speak of those who have to begin at once the struggle to keep the wolf from the door, those who are left to themselves to face the cold world and battle for life. Pitiful is the sight of the pallid face under widow's weeds, looking for some employment or projecting some scheme that shall enable her to earn a living. What bitter tears must often be shed over disappointments and failures in effort! If men could but know to what wives would be subject they would never procrastinate in respect to providing something that should be a help to them when left alone. The Jewish Talmud warns men against causing women to weep. It says "God counts their tears." Many, alas! cause wives to weep for the way in which they are left to bear heavy burdens which a little forethought would have easily prevented coming upon them.

"Free service for at least a month."—p. 220.

"Few can linger long to mourn."—p. 218.

Look at that widow with crape-laden dress, how she goes from place to place, thinking of how she may start a little school and earn something. She finds a place and begins, but pupils are few and expenses are heavy. She may have a goodly number after a time; then some infectious disease may break out and the school be scattered. We have known some succeed in educational work admirably. The opportunities, however, are now, through the operation of the School Board, greatly lessened, and other outlets for widows' energies have to be discovered. Some will start a little shop for the sale of papers, or sweets, or Berlin wools and fancy goods, or grocery or drapery. Said one to me who had kept a little shop for several years, "The rent and taxes are so heavy and profits now so small, that I shall have to give it up, and I don't know what to take to or where to go." Others, again, take to keeping boarding-houses, or letting lodgings. We have known this succeed well if the sea-side town were properly selected, or the house were near to where medical or other students lived. Others will go to hospitals and learn how to nurse invalids in private homes or public institutions, and they can only do this when someone takes their children. Others will take to the pen, write articles or verses, which they send to editors gorged already with manuscripts. They wait impatiently and send imperatively to know whether the articles or poems are accepted or not. Should they receive any remuneration they may find it is so trifling that it is hardly worth waiting for. Some have indeed earned a good living by the pen in writing for the newspapers. One London newspaper gave a sketch a short time ago of one who in a foreign city makes the best special correspondent of a great contemporary. But there are many widows who cannot keep school or lay out money for fitting up shops, or for furnishing houses to let, or who cannot handle the pen, and their case is sometimes most painful. The widows of artisans and labourers have often a very anxious season. They go out charing, washing, and scrubbing: they have to clean out offices early and late, and poor ofttimes is the pittance they receive.

Here is a widow who has to go and live with her married daughter, and she often finds it very humbling to be told emphatically to do this or that. One widow had to go and live with her son, and she had not too happy a time with the daughter-in-law. We saw one poor gaunt widow who was too glad to creep into the one room in which already slept a man, his wife and two children. When I was once visiting one who was ill in that room, it was with difficulty I could find standing-room in the place, so lumbered up was it with bundles, and old chairs, and a rickety table. To be by oneself, however bare the room, would be preferable: so thought a widow who had drifted into being a caretaker of empty houses. She lived in one until it was let, and then was sent to another. She was so trusted by agents and landlords that she had always several to look after. Whenever one was let she received a sovereign as a bonus, and upon this she would manage to live until another house was let and another sovereign came to her palm.

One widow who had five children to care for, found that she could make a better living after her husband was dead than before. He had given way, at one time, to drink, and then, having lost his situation, he had to remain at home. Slight paralysis brought on by his evil doings made him of little service in the house. As his wife kept a little "sweetstuff" shop she was able to earn a trifle. When she went out to work he often would take the few farthings and halfpence which the children had paid for sweets, and would go to the nearest public-house, where he would speedily dissipate the small earnings and capital of the poor woman. She knew not what to do. To stay at home was to get but little, to go out was to lose at home. At last the man died, and then the woman was able to make a better living by herself than when he was with her. She had faculty.

One widow, whose brothers were well off, hoped for help from them. A two-shilling piece was the extent of the assistance that came after a most earnest appeal, backed up by the writer. Poor woman, how I pitied her! Of course something had to be done to start her. In order to live she made aprons and tried to get into a factory, but she was told that although "she could do machining well, she must yet give, as a sort of premium, free service for at least a month." Thus a widow was taxed in order to secure regular employment. The proposition was made by the manager of the factory of one of the sweating firms. I had even myself tried to interest the principals of that firm in this poor widow, and they gave me directions as to sending her to their manager of the factory department. When the manager proposed the month's gratuitous service, the widow protested that she "could not live for a month and feed her children on nothing." She came back to me in great trouble. Fortunately afterwards she was able to find other employment which, though very poorly paid, was yet better than nothing. She has now been at it some time, and when I recently saw her she said she was grateful "for the way in which her God had provided for her."

Here is the one-room home of another widow. How does she live? She is eighty years old. She has several labouring sons, and each one makes a weekly contribution out of hard earnings towards the support of his mother. What a tiny room she lives in! and yet for this she pays 2s. 6d. per week. Poor thing, she often knows what pinching is. "I only had a cold potato yesterday for my dinner and supper," she said. "Ah, sir, I should not have been in my present position if the two husbands I have had had not given away so much to keep up the public-houses. I remember once I went to bring my second husband out of the 'pub,' and the landlady said to me, 'Don't hurry the man.' I spoke up and told her I did not want him to spend all his money in keeping up her house. I told her them beautiful caps she was a-wearing belonged to me if I had my rights, as my husband's money paid for them, and she knew very well he had no right to spend so much.

"'My word!' she said to my husband, 'your wife do speak out her mind.' Ah, I did speak it out, and meant it; for if it had not been for the money gone to the pub, I should not now have to be dependent on my boys. I know one of them has been out of work for several weeks, and he could not give me that which he usually gives me. Still, God takes care of me, as He does the sparrows and buttercups."

"Why do you say the buttercups?"

"Because I always think that they have no one to water and tend them, yet they grow; so I call them 'God's flowers.'"

"And you are one of God's buttercups, then."

"Yes; He do take care of me and always has done so. I don't know how I have got through, but I have never really been without something to keep life in me, and I am over eighty, and ha' been twelve years a widder."

The same testimony came from the lips of another. She had suddenly lost her husband and bread-winner, a very steady, good man. She seemed at first in her grief so helpless and despairing. What to do for her was a perplexity. She was left with several children, and these young. However, a brother took charge of one, then her husband's employers bought her a mangle, so that she managed to earn a little. The people in whose house she lived let her have an underground kitchen at a much lower rent, and so she struggled along. Then she was called in to attend to an invalid old gentleman every night, and thus she earned a little more. "It is hard work," she said, "but, you know, God gives me strength to do it, and I can only thank Him. It is simply wonderful how He takes care of me. I could not have believed I could have gone through all I have."

Many poor widows have more faith in God and live simpler Christian lives than those who have as far as eye can perceive all that can make life bright and valuable. Looking poverty in the face they often see God's care more specially manifested. They would be perplexed to fully describe how they live, but they would assert unhesitatingly that He fulfils His promise and becomes a "Husband to the widow."

ST. COLUMB'S CATHEDRAL.

ST. COLUMB'S CATHEDRAL, LONDONDERRY.

BY THE HON. ISABEL PLUNKET.

THE name of Ireland is associated too exclusively, especially in the minds of Englishmen, with thoughts of ignorance, superstition, and crime; and it is, alas! true that in a country where the Bible is virtually a closed book to the majority of the people, and public-houses, in alarming proportion to the number of its inhabitants, lie temptingly open at the corner of every village, almost at the corner of every street, the process of development is naturally one of evil, and not of good.

But there is, thank God, another process at work in the hearts of the Irish people, "a power that worketh for righteousness." Protestant Ireland is justly proud of her historic past, brave and unselfish in the discharge of present duty, and reliant, even in these perilous times, as in the greater perils of old, upon the assurance of God's presence and help. "God is in the midst of her, she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and that right early."

St. Columb's Cathedral, Londonderry, offers a grand though silent witness, not only to the faith and courage of Irish Protestants in old historic times, but also to the zeal and self-sacrifice of Irish churchmen of the present day. It rests as a fair crown upon the summit of the picturesque hill upon which Londonderry is built. This hill was overgrown in ancient times with wild oak, and was known as "Derry Calcagh" (the hill of the fierce warrior).

But, under the "sweet influences" of Christianity, which ruled with such powerful sway in Ireland between the fifth and sixth centuries, this name was exchanged, with expressive contrast, for that of "Columbkill" (the church or cell of the Dove). The oaks amongst which the "fierce warriors" had fought and ambushed were cut down, and St. Columb raised in their stead a "House of Prayer," round which, as children round a mother's knee, "peaceable habitations" were quickly grouped, and the city destined for so great a future grew up under the protection of Divine blessing and prayer.

But that mysterious essential of "much tribulation," through which entrance lies to the Kingdom of God, applies not only to the history of individuals, but to that of nations and churches also.

St. Columb died in exile; his eyes and heart turned often yearningly towards Ireland—so yearningly that, as we are told by his biographer, he welcomed with tender love and pity even the spent bird that alighted on the bleak shore of Iona from the Western Island, still called by him his "own dear land."

The town of Derry, although true to the simple faith taught by him, ceased after a while to be associated with his name, and became again the scene of many fierce and desperate conflicts, which it would be impossible to enumerate here. Enough to know that it was in defence of this faith that the men of Derry fought and suffered; and although, in the dark and terrible days before the Reformation, this faith seemed almost to be extinguished under the baneful influences of Romish supremacy, it was only to spring up more bright and vigorous in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, by whose command the maiden city was girdled with a zone of battlemented walls, and freed from all traces of Rome's brief but malignant sway.

The prefix of "London" was then, by royal desire, added to the ancient name of "Derry," so forming the modern name of Londonderry, suggestive of that union of heart with the mother-country dear to all thoughtful and true Irish patriots as the only basis of real and lasting prosperity for their nation.

Since those good days of Queen Elizabeth Londonderry has been impregnable to all foes—a bulwark and a shrine of the Protestant faith. But not without cost has this defence been kept, not without the blood of many martyrs has the victory been won.

The battlemented town, standing in its commanding position at the mouth of the River Foyle, in the midst of a rich and well-cultivated neighbourhood, formed an important and inviting point of attack for many opposing armies, and the Cathedral of St. Columb, erected in 1632, on or near the site of the ancient "House of Prayer," crowned, as we have said, the highest ground within its walls, and offered a tempting target for the aim of the enemy.

But no weapon that was formed against her seemed to prosper, no foe prevailed. Within the troublous years between 1640 and 1689—not quite half a century—Londonderry sustained successfully three desperate sieges, the last and most terrible in 1688—1689, when the army of James II. was stationed for nine long months without the gates, and when famine, disease, and death held ghastly reign within.

Outside the city, the whole strength of King James's forces was gathered, with the French army at his command. Upon the issue of this struggle there hung not only the fate of the town itself, nor even of Ireland, but in all probability, as has been often said, the fate of the Protestant monarchy and Protestant religion throughout Great Britain.

"'T was the Lord who gave the word, when His people drew the sword
For the freedom of the present, for the future that awaits."*

The gallant defenders of the city, who manned its walls day and night; the population, not less heroic, who languished in the slow martyrdom of hunger and disease within; the women and children braving day by day the enemy's fire that they might hand up the scant rations and ammunition to the men upon the wall—these all knew that they were fighting not only for themselves, and suffering not only for the sake of those dear to them, but for the love of their open Bibles, their religion, and their God.

Through all the horrors of that long, fierce struggle—too terrible for record here—it was around the Cathedral of St. Columb that the enthusiasm of the brave defenders seemed to gather, and to centre itself within her walls.

Upon its roof cannon were placed, which kept up a brisk attack upon the besiegers. Beneath its roof the heart of the whole people seemed to throb with one mighty impulse of devotion and prayer.

Not once through all the long months of that terrible siege was the daily service omitted. The Episcopalian and Presbyterian ministers, drawn together as men are wont to be in the face of a great and common danger, led the services there in turn.

From its pulpit the valiant Walker—soldier, governor, priest in one—nerved the people, Nehemiah-like, with "words of hope and courage great," and inspired them again and again by the ardour of his own enthusiasm, by the strength of his conviction of the righteousness of their cause, and by his unswerving faith in God.

At length the courage and endurance of the brave soldiers and citizens had their reward. Walker's faith in his cause and in his God was vindicated. The deliverance so ardently longed for, so earnestly prayed for, came, and—as if in recognition of the people's prayer—it was from the towers of St. Columb's Cathedral that a sentinel first announced to the starving citizens the arrival of the English ships which bore to them not only relief from famine, but with it the assurance of victory and peace.

A few weeks later, and that assurance was confirmed; bonfires flared at the foot of the tower where so lately the beacon had blazed and the red flag waved, as a signal of distress to the loitering ships.

The cathedral bells, with their silver chimes, rang out a joyful peal that day; a voice of great thanksgiving rose from the heart of the people: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thy Name be the praise."

Lord Macaulay thus describes the general rejoicing:—"The recollection of past dangers and privations, and the consciousness of having deserved well of the English nation and of all Protestant churches, swelled the hearts of the townspeople with honest pride. That pride grew stronger when they received from King William a letter acknowledging in the most affectionate language the debt which he owed to the brave citizens of his good city. The whole population crowded to the Diamond to hear the royal epistle read. At the close, all the guns of the ramparts sent forth a voice of joy."

The people of England have to-day an opportunity of acknowledging in some degree the debt so graciously recognised by King William in his letter to the people of Derry. The Dean will be very glad to acknowledge any help which English friends may send towards this good work.

Two hundred years have now passed since that eventful day, and England still rejoices in the open Bible and in the religious liberty for which she is so much indebted to the bravery and endurance of the loyal citizens of Londonderry.

Within the Cathedral of St. Columb now hang the treasured trophies of the siege, amongst them two of the French flags, which fell into the hands of Colonel John Mitchelburne. The steep ascent by which the peaceful worshippers approach the House of God is formed in great part by the graves of the heroes who fell in that siege in defence of the pure faith which is now so freely proclaimed there.

On the 18th of February, 1887, the Cathedral of St. Columb was reopened with a joyous service of praise and dedication, having been closed for some months for the purposes of enlargement and restoration. This enlargement was made to meet the demands of an increasing congregation, and of a growing desire on the part of the middle and poorer classes to share in the beautiful services of the Cathedral.

This fact gives cheerful evidence of the vitality with which the Protestant Church of Ireland is still instinct; the Cathedral now affording accommodation for nearly twice the number of worshippers who gathered in 1689 to listen to the stirring words of Walker.

The cost of this undertaking has been about £8,000. £7,000 of this has been already defrayed chiefly by the contributions which Irish churchmen, even in these times of difficulty and depression, have "offered willingly."

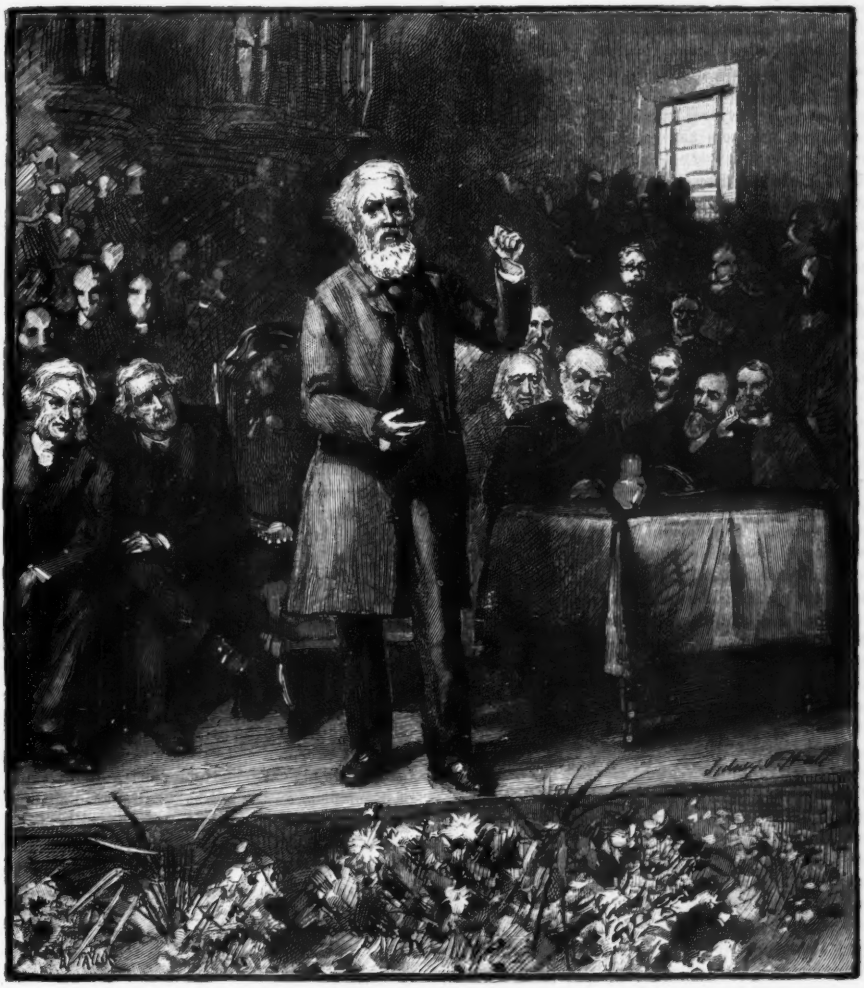
But when the Cathedral of St. Columb was first built, English money was also offered willingly for its erection; later on, English soldiers fought bravely in its defence. Are there not many English Protestants even now who will hear gladly of its restoration, who will rejoice to share in the completion of so good a work, and thus awaken the echoes of the old rhythmic motto engraved on a tablet of the Cathedral belfry?—

"If stones coulde speeke,
Then London's praise should sounde
Who built this church and cittie
From the grounde."

PRESBYTERIANS IN COUNCIL.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., SECRETARY TO THE COUNCIL OF 1888.

FOR several successive days in the middle of last summer the eye of passengers in London thoroughfares could not well avoid a glance at a row of lugubrious sandwich-men, on whose backs and bosoms was displayed, in great staring letters, a placard of the "PAN-PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL." It is said that some of the authorities of the Council were by no means pleased with the placard, having a special dislike to the first syllable of the designation, which is apt, on irreverent lips, to degenerate into "the Pan." The full official designation is, "The Council of the Alliance of Reformed Churches throughout the World holding the Presbyterian System;" or, more briefly, "The General Presbyterian Council." The placards on the sandwich-men announced that it embraced a constituency of twenty millions of people. This was a strange announcement to many a Londoner who had always fancied that Presbyterianism was confined to the people of Scotland and a few Unitarians in England. Twenty millions is a big number, and if, as the official title bears, they have their local habitations throughout the world, there must be something about this Alliance or Council that is worth knowing. A few facts concerning it will, we trust, be acceptable to the readers of THE QUIVER.



If we go back to the time of the Reformation, we find that that great movement after a time unhappily divided into two branches that were anything but eminent for love to one another. Those who adhered to the doctrine and discipline of Calvin came to be known as "the Reformed;" those who accepted the teaching of Luther, as "Lutherans." The "Reformed" were the predominant Protestant Church in many countries of Europe—in France, Calvin's native land, and in Switzerland, the country of his adoption; in Holland, in parts of Germany, in Hungary, and Bohemia, and last, not least, in Scotland. The chief differences between the Reformed and the Lutherans were, that the Reformed adhered more firmly to the Pauline or Augustinian type of theology, as set forth anew in Calvin's Institutes; and in the government of the church they recognised no order superior to Presbyters. In worship, they were commonly marked by less of form and more of simplicity; while along the whole line they held that the sole authority to which their allegiance was due was the Word of God.

It was a great grief to Calvin, this division among Protestants. Archbishop Cranmer and he were intimate and cordial friends; and a saying of Calvin, in a letter to the English reformer, has been quoted again and again—that he would gladly cross ten seas, if thereby he might advance the cause of union.

The history of the Reformed Churches during the last three hundred years has been a singular illustration of the text, "The last shall be first, and the first last." The feeblest, and apparently the most insignificant among them all was the Reformed Church of Scotland. That "land of brown heath and shaggy wood," to which the French had given the name of "L'Écosse la Sauvage," did not probably number more than half a million of people. During the half-dozen previous reigns it had passed through a constant succession of troubles, in consequence of the minority of its kings, its civil wars, the contentions of its rival clans, and its bitter strifes with England. It had little wealth, little commerce, little learning, poor agriculture, a Church corrupt beyond all precedent, and a nobility whose great object was to raise themselves and keep down the king. Through the efforts of John Knox and his coadjutors, the Presbyterian Church obtained a remarkably firm hold of the Scottish people. Knox, while a most vehement hater of Popery and the mass, was far from bigoted on the subject of church government. He himself held office as a preacher for several years in the Church of England; he was one of the chaplains of King Edward VI., and though he refused a bishopric for himself, his sons were brought up in the Anglican communion. All the world knows the struggles and sufferings the Scotch people had to undergo for the sake of their Presbyterian Church. Its very existence in the seventeenth century was due to the endurance of the Covenanters. If prosperity at home and great enlargement abroad can be any compensation, they have been abundantly rewarded.

For it is this least among the daughters of the Reformed Church that has proved the great means of spreading Presbyterianism over the world. Little could anyone have foreseen this result. What a different destiny the Reformed Church of France apparently had at the start from the Reformed Church of Scotland! The Church of Calvin got a very firm hold of France, and bade fair to take the lead among the Reformed Churches of Europe. What a grand country, too, France was, as compared with poor Scotland, and what splendid men, especially among the laity—Coligny, Duplessis-Mornay, and the like—gave themselves heart and soul to the cause! But France was simply overwhelmed by avalanches of persecution. Could any calamities have exceeded the massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572, and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685? It was by her refugees that France contributed to extend the Reformed Church, enriching the blood of other countries, as it were, and quickening their zeal by their very presence. In the centre of Europe, the Reformed Church was strong in Hungary, Bohemia, and other parts of the Austrian Empire; but here, too, the light was literally quenched in blood. If Holland and Germany had quieter times, they did not bestir themselves much to spread their Church. It is the Anglo-

THE PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL IN SESSION AT EXETER HALL.

Saxon branch of the Presbyterian family that has proved the "fruitful bough, whose branches run over the wall." In her own country, the Scottish Church, which at its first General Assembly (1560) had but six or seven ministers, has now, in its various branches, about 3,000. In the seventeenth century, when the province of Ulster was re-peopled by colonists from England and Scotland, who proved a troublesome and turbulent lot, some earnest Scotch ministers went to labour among their countrymen; a great revival followed their labours, and a better stamp was put on Ulster, which it has retained ever since. This was the beginning of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, which now numbers nearly six hundred congregations.

Then Ireland became in turn a great colonising country. When its Presbyterian people spread to the United States of America, they carried their Church with them, and so did the colonists from Scotland. And in the great republic, Presbyterianism has found a very congenial home. It is essentially democratic, and the soil and climate of the United States have greatly fostered its growth. If we include Canada, the number of Presbyterian congregations in North America is probably not less than 15,000. In most of the other colonies of Great Britain it has a firm hold. The mission-fields of China, Japan, India, and Syria, all have their branches. At home, too, there have been recent extensions. At the beginning of the reign of Victoria there were but a handful of orthodox Presbyterian congregations in England; now there are three hundred. The Calvinistic Methodists of Wales have adopted the Presbyterian form; they have 1,400 congregations and 600 ministers. It has always been a point of great importance with Presbyterians to give a thorough education to their ministers. Where national universities or other public colleges exist, the undergraduate course is taken in them; but through theological institutions of its own, each Church makes provision for the theological and pastoral training of its ministers. From what has just been stated it will be seen how the twenty millions of Presbyterians are made up.

Fifty years ago, most of the Churches hardly so much as knew each other's names. It is hardly credible now what strangers they were to each other. One would have thought that surely the Scotch Churches would have kept up a friendly acquaintance with their own daughters and granddaughters; but proverbial though the Scotch are for counting kin even with their far-away cousins, they forgot to do so in the case of Churches. When Irish brethren came over to Scotland about 1842 to express their sympathy with the Church, then in great trouble owing to her collision with the civil courts, Hugh Miller remarked that it was as if they had found the lost ten tribes. As for the United States, it might have been said, in the words of Scripture, that the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans. With some outstanding Continental ministers we had some slight acquaintance, chiefly through the labours of Robert Haldane, who did so much for Geneva and other places; but when men like the late Merle D'Aubigné, Frederick Monod, George Fisch, and Jean Bost began to visit Scotland, they seemed to bring with them fresh air and sunshine, and a certain sprightliness that both warmed and quickened our more sombre nature.

Still there was no actual bond of union between all these various Churches, and the want was all the more strange from the nature of the Presbyterian system. For Presbyterianism delights in order. In each country it gathers individuals into congregations, congregations into presbyteries, presbyteries into synods, and synods into general assemblies. But does not the system demand something more? Ought not the Churches in different countries to sustain some relation to one another? Ought there not to be some common organisation in which all the several branches are represented? If we be not ripe for an authoritative assembly, exercising jurisdiction over the whole, might we not have a non-official confederation where all the Churches might be represented, where they might join in counsel and in prayer, and from which a wholesome influence might go forth that would stimulate every section, and also contribute to advance the cause of co-operation and union?

Thus came into existence, about a dozen years ago, the Presbyterian Alliance. It is an alliance of Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian system, Churches whose creed is in harmony with the consensus of the Reformed confessions. About once in four years it holds a general council. The members of this council are elected by the supreme court of their several Churches. They amount in number to about three hundred, and they represent some fifty or sixty Churches in Europe, Asia, Africa, America, Australia, and the Isles of the sea. Four councils have now been held, at Edinburgh, Philadelphia, Belfast and London; and the meetings have all excited much public interest, and been characterised by a remarkable degree of harmony and brotherly love.

Of the more practical and definite objects of the Alliance two deserve special notice. One is to encourage and cheer those small, struggling Churches, chiefly on the Continent of Europe, which still suffer from the effects of fiery persecution; or which maintain a difficult existence under the deadening influence of Romanism on the one side and Rationalism on the other. It is not the practice of the Alliance to give money aid—indeed, its ordinary revenue is barely enough to keep its machinery going. But in two instances it has deviated from this rule. Within a couple of years of its existence, some friends of the Waldensian Church were very desirous to raise a fund, the interest of which would add a little to the scanty salaries of the pastors of the valleys. If £12,000 could be raised, it would increase their incomes to about eighty pounds a year—a small figure, truly, but representing to them the difference between a hard struggle and comparative comfort. A committee of the Alliance was asked to undertake this work; it set to work with a will, and, by God's blessing the sum raised was over £13,000. Among other considerations that stimulated this undertaking, one was, that in the days when Oliver Cromwell befriended the Vaudois, and Milton thundered out his sublime ode, "Avenge, O Lord, Thy slaughtered saints," the Protector had raised for them a considerable sum of money, which Charles II., on his restoration, actually stole! When the present writer visited the Vaudois Synod in 1876, among other Churches in the Continent of Europe, to ask whether they would join the proposed Alliance of Reformed Churches, a difficulty presented itself, as they were not a re-formed Church, for they had never been de-formed! The difficulty was more amusing than real. The Vaudois have shown themselves staunch Presbyterians; for, when the late General Beckwith, one of their best and most noble friends, proposed to them to become Episcopalians, and elect a bishop, they firmly refused to alter the government which their fathers had handed down to them. And the General, who felt that it would be much easier for him to arrange matters with them through a bishop than through the Table—a committee which the Synod annually appoints for executive purposes—was not well pleased, and left them for a time.

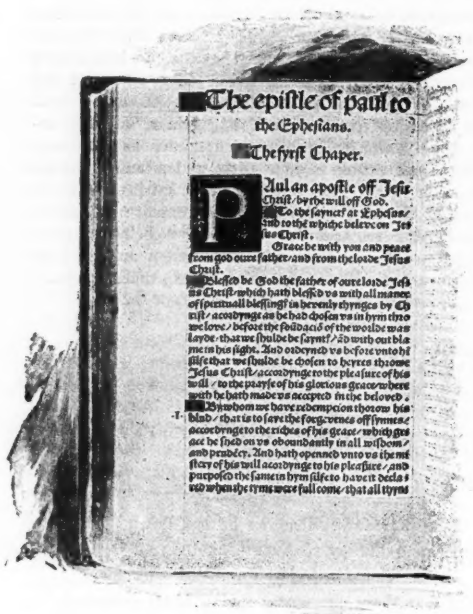
The other Church on whose behalf the Alliance has deviated from its rule of not giving pecuniary aid, is that of Bohemia and Moravia. The history of this Church, too, goes far back into the past. Bohemia was the last of the countries of Europe to submit to the yoke of Rome, and the first to rebel against it. In 1415, John Huss, its first martyr and confessor, perished in the flames at Constance, in Switzerland. In 1416, his friend and follower, Jerome of Prague, followed him to heaven in a fiery chariot. From 1415 to almost the present day, the Protestant Church of Bohemia has never been out of the furnace. Its records alone might furnish materials for a Book of Martyrs, longer and not less thrilling than old John Foxe's. In particular, during the one hundred and sixty years between 1621 and 1781 the Protestant faith had been actually proscribed by many edicts in Bohemia, and fire and sword brought to bear against it in the most ruthless manner; but in spite of all the wiles and cruelty of the Jesuits, it had not been exterminated. When the Emperor Joseph II. issued his edict of toleration in 1781, the Protestants in considerable numbers seemed to arise out of the very ground. The second council of the Presbyterian Alliance, at its meeting at Philadelphia in 1880, drew attention to the fact that next year would be the one hundredth anniversary of this Edict, and proposed to raise a sum of £5,000 as a mark of sympathy and regard for a Church which had had such a history of trial. The sum actually raised already exceeds £4,000, and the greater part has been devoted to the purpose of placing on an efficient footing the Comenius Society, which supplies Christian books, tracts, magazines, and other literature for the Bohemian people. The history of the Bohemian Church is by no means so well known as that of the Waldensian, but wherever it has been made known it has excited a corresponding interest. The Moravian Brethren, so deservedly honoured for their missionary zeal, are an offshoot from the Bohemian, although, from providential causes, they are now more allied to the Lutheran cause than to the Reformed. It is to the establishment of the Free Church mission to the Jews in Prague that the interest of Scotland in the Bohemian Church in recent years may be traced. The late Professor Duncan, often called Rabbi Duncan, who was once a missionary to the Jews in those parts, used in a jocular way to claim the credit of having "discovered" the Bohemians. For many years Bohemian students of divinity have studied at the Free College in Edinburgh, and have created no little interest in themselves personally, and in their Church. Bohemia occupies a splendid position for evangelistic purposes; its people are Sclavonians, and the Sclavonian population, with hardly any evangelical Church among them, amounts to no less than a hundred millions.

The other practical object to which the Presbyterian Alliance has given a great impulse is union in the field of foreign missions. As things were going on before, there was a prospect that every separate Presbyterian Church in Britain and America carrying on mission work would perpetuate itself in heathen countries, by establishing a branch of its denomination there! This was simply awful. The efforts of the Alliance have now secured a basis on which native Churches will be consolidated into one, and the impulse thus given to the spirit of union will probably not cease with Presbyterians, but will encourage union with other denominations who may find it practicable to come to an understanding in the mission field. This impulse to the spirit of union is one of the best fruits of the movement; instead of promoting sectarianism, it will, we believe, rather tend to counteract it, and thus hasten on the time when not Presbyterians only, but all shall be one.

ONE LITTLE BIRD.

ROUNDEL.

ONE little bird upon the pathway brown
Lies dead, and scarcely by the breezes stirred;
Ah! who will miss, o'er wood and field and town,
One little bird?
With simple song, so soft and seldom heard,
To lonely forest shadows he had flown,
And sang his lay to Nature, undeterred
By prouder minstrelsy, unpraised, unknown.
Yet was there one whose loving heart preferred,
To all the bards that higher spheres can own,
One little bird.



ARTHUR L. SALMON.

SOME LITTLE-KNOWN BIBLICAL TREASURES.

BY THE REV. S. A. SWAINE.—FIRST PAPER.

IN the fine old city of Bristol, in the thoroughfare called Stokes' Croft, stands a plain and modest-looking building known as "The Baptist College." Concerning the college itself—which is one of the oldest of Nonconformist theological training institutions—it is no part of my present purpose to write; I am concerned only with some of the contents of its library, few institutions in the three kingdoms being richer in old versions of the Scriptures in English than this, and none other being able to boast of possessing a perfect copy of Tyndale's New Testament, printed at Worms in 1525.

About the little octavo volume just mentioned there has been some controversy. Some have argued for its being a copy of the first, and others for its being a copy of the second, edition. A writer of thirty years ago says: "It was long considered . . . as the first edition; but the discovery a few years ago of a fragment of a quarto edition (now in the Grenville Library, British Museum) by Mr. Rodd has removed it to the rank of the second edition, though the dates of their issue were so near one another that Anderson in his 'Annals of the English Bible' remarks that it is difficult, if not impossible, to say which was actually the first that reached the shores of Britain." It is, however, not so clear as it might be that there was any edition, properly so-called, published by Tyndale prior to the octavo one. Thus another writer says, "The case seems to be as follows:—He had commenced printing the New Testament at Cologne, and had proceeded, probably, to the end of the Gospel of Mark, when he was discovered and put to flight by his persecutors. He proceeded to Worms, where he resumed and completed his unfinished task. There is no evidence whatever that he got beyond the Prologue and first two Gospels in his attempt at Cologne, or that more than thirty-two leaves of it were ever printed." This is quite consistent with the account given by the learned D'Aubigné. It is to be observed, however, that according to this historian the two Gospels of Matthew and Mark, translated and printed at Hamburg, and despatched to England about the end of 1524, were the first-fruits of Tyndale's great task.

It was to Hamburg that Tyndale fled with his precious MS. when driven out of England. Thence he removed to Cologne, where he hoped to be able to complete his task, and engaged and set to work a printer accordingly. Discovered here, he contrived to escape in a boat with his MS. and such sheets as had been printed, and came to Worms, where the work he had set his heart upon was completed in 1525. D'Aubigné says, "As his enemies would have marked the edition, some few sheets of it having fallen into their hands, he took steps to mislead the inquisitors, and began a new edition, striking out the Prologue and the Notes, and substituting the more portable octavo form for the quarto. . . . The two editions were quietly completed about the end of the year 1525." Thus the quarto edition (a fragment of a copy of which Mr. Rodd discovered, and which is now in the British Museum) was that first begun, but probably not the first completed, the work having been interrupted by the discovery of Tyndale at Cologne. The octavo edition was that begun and completed at Worms, printed on smaller sheets without the Prologue and Notes, in order to mislead the inquisitors; and to this edition the volume at Bristol belongs.

The Grenville fragment in the British Museum, which the writer has had an opportunity of carefully inspecting, contains the "Prologue," extending to fourteen pages; a contents table, extending to about a page; and the Gospel of St. Matthew as far as the twenty-second chapter, breaking off at the words, "And spyed there a man which had not on a weddinge garment, and sayde unto him: frede, how camyst thou in hydder? and——"

Inserted in the beginning of the volume which contains the fragment are MS. notes by Rodd, and two MS. letters of Sir Henry Ellis, for some time chief librarian at the Museum—one of which is transcribed here, as giving that distinguished bibliographer's view of this literary curiosity and treasure:—

"BRITISH MUSEUM, November 18th, 1844.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I beg to thank you for the loan of your curious and, I feel confident, unique fragment of Tyndale's first Testament—that edition which, exclusive of his text, he had prepared with glosses. Cochlæus, you remember, after he had plied the compositors in P. Quintell's office at Cologne with drink, learned from them that they had proceeded in the execution of their task no farther than the quaternion K. Your fragment goes to H only. My strong belief is that Cochlæus disclosed the secret he had extorted from the printers so rapidly to Herman Rink, and he to the Senate of Cologne, that there could not have been time for further progress.

"We have a document in the Museum, hitherto unnoticed, which, I think, throws a curious light on your fragment. It is a letter from Richard Rawlins, Bishop of St. Davids, to Archbishop Warham, dated June 14th, 1527, from which we learn that Warham bought up 'the books of the New Testament, translated into English, and printed beyond the sea, as well those with the glosses joined unto them as the other without the glosses, by means of exchange, to the sum of £66 9s. 4d.' If the first Testaments had been completed, this would have been a most inadequate sum for the purchase. I think it is Cochlæus who mentions the number of the impression of the first Testament prepared as reaching to three thousand, which, at 2s. apiece, would make £300. . . . It might not be so easy, when they got to Worms, to find another printer, and I suspect it was there that Archbishop Warham negotiated the purchase of the unfinished work. However, here follows a copy of the letter, and you shall pass your own judgment upon it. I intend to insert this in a third series of 'Historical Letters' which I am slowly preparing, and intend this heading for it—'Richard, Bishop of St. Davids, to Archbishop Warham, offering his Contribution toward the Sum paid by the Archbishop for buying up the Copies of Tyndale's Translation of the Testament' [MS. Cotton., Vitellius B. ix., fol. 117, Orig.] :—

"'In right humble maner I commende me unto your goode Lordeshippe, doyinge the same t'undrestande that I lately receyved your Lettres, dated at your Manor of Lambethe, the xxvi daie of the Monethe of May; by the which I do perceyve that your grace hath lately goten into your handes all the boks of the Newe Testamente, translated into Englisshe, and pryented beyond the See, as well those with the gloses joyned unto them as thoder without the gloses, by means of exchaunge by you made therfore to the somme of lxvi£ ix*s* iiij*d*.

"HENRY ELLIS.

"The Rt. Honble. Thos. Grenville, etc., etc., etc."

The precious volume at Bristol, worth many times its weight in gold, was originally in the Harleian collection. It was obtained for the Earl of Oxford by one of the many agents whom he employed in hunting for old and rare books. The Earl had long wished for such a treasure, and was so pleased when he found himself in actual possession of it that he bestowed upon the fortunate finder an annuity of £20. This annuity was continued for fourteen years, so that his lordship paid for the book the sum of £280, besides what he gave in the first place for it. It is stated that Osborne, the bookseller, purchased the Harleian Library for less than the Earl had spent on the bindings, and that, to insure a speedy sale, he catalogued all the books at an exceedingly low figure. Not recognising the value of this particular book, he priced it at fifteen shillings. It passed into the hands of the antiquary J. Ames, and at his death into the hands of a Mr. White, who gave fourteen guineas for it. To Dr. Gifford, an eminent Baptist minister and bibliographer, who was a friend of his, Mr. White parted with it for twenty guineas. Before he died Dr. Gifford presented it to the college at Bristol, in whose possession it now is.

As the only remaining perfect copy of the first printed New Testament to be circulated in Great Britain, the book is, without doubt, the most interesting book in our language. It may be regarded as the pioneer of the millions of New Testaments that have since been circulated amongst us—of the tens of millions which have been scattered throughout the world. Francis Fry, the well-known Bristol antiquary and book-collector, has admirably reproduced it in facsimile. "Fitting it is," says a writer to whom I am indebted for many of the foregoing facts, "that this book, so priceless, should be preserved in that city in which the martyr often preached, and in the vicinity of which he formed the design of placing the Bible within the reach of all; and fitting, too, that by a secret attraction, around it should be grouped so rich a collection of English Bibles, scarcely second to that in our National Museum."

A WORD ABOUT RED-LETTER DAYS.

AN almanack is a common but never a commonplace convenience. No two people can scan it with identical interest. Not only does it wear a different face to youth and age—having for the former the gay glow of sunrise on its leaves, and for the latter solemn eventide shadows—but it also has its secret smile or frown for the individual. Some days are entered upon its tablets in red ink for each and every reader. Mistress Memory puts us in glad and grateful humour as our glance falls on certain dates. Across the waste of the years we catch even yet the subsiding cadence of the joy-bells. But it is for us alone that the spell exists at the particular line in the calendar. To others the entry is in plain black type, winning hardly a moment's attention.

The whole Christian world—East and West—has its red-letter days, though its dates somewhat differ. They are the birthday of its King, and the anniversary of the glorious morn when the Redeemer rose from the grave a victorious Deliverer.

Nations and races of men have their memorial marks in the pointing of the years, days ever to be remembered with delight, seasons when every pulse beats the faster for an accession of patriotic pride, or through the recollection of Providential mercy displayed to the community. Such to our American readers is Independence Day, July 4th; and such to the coloured brother in their midst is surely the 1st of January, for on that day, 1863 slavery was abolished by the deed of noble President Lincoln, over the area of the United States of America. Similar national red-letter days exist for New Italy in the anniversary of her hard-won recognition as a kingdom, which event took place on the last day of March, 1861; and for New Germany in the anniversary of the proclamation of the empire, at Versailles, January 18th, 1871. Again, France refuses to forget the date of the taking of the Bastille; a part of Ireland, the relief of Londonderry on the 30th of July, 1689; and a large section of the English people, the date of the opportune discovery of the Gunpowder Plot.

But it is not the purpose of the present paper to present a list of these generally familiar celebrations, or to dwell at any length on what may be termed the public side of the subject. The red-letter days we have mainly in mind are not everybody's red-letter days—as are the great dates of which all almanacks take note—but those of the family and the unit.

The boys of the household have theirs—the day at the end of the school year, when, amidst the vociferous plaudits of vanquished but magnanimous competitors, the top prize was carried back under the arm from the Doctor's desk; the day when the great cricket-match was won by the home team, with the sequel of a presentation on the field to the gallant young player whose prowess had chiefly achieved that satisfactory result. The young man has his red-letter day, that on which the news reaches him that he is first in the race for a valuable scholarship; or that, after all, guardians have relented, and he is to follow the profession that is his fancy. She who stands—

> "With reluctant feet,
> Where the brook and river meet," the sweet and winsome maid who is the light of home to loving kinsfolk: she is sure to have her red-letter day—that when the strange new portent flashes on the horizon and with tremulous bewilderment she hears or reads a girl's first offer of marriage. Should she say this wooer nay, it is likely to be but a reprieve for those who look to lose her from under the dear familiar roof-tree. In due season the red line will stand in the maiden's diary, and set by itself as a day apart to the very end—the day on which he came who was rightful lord of affection and of life.

All true husbands and wives, to whom marriage, whatever of care and conflict has come in its wake, has been no failure, but a bond of peace and mutual help, keep as a red-letter day, radiant always with sunny and sacred memories, the anniversary of the indissoluble joining of hands. The flight of time dims not this lustre. There is a world of pathos and of beauty in the answering light that even the stranger shall sometimes see beaming from wrinkled face to wrinkled face. Ah, a red-letter day yet, though half a century may be past! And the pathos is doubled if one is consciously, visibly fading, drawing near to the narrow strait between time and eternity, and if the look on the one side says dumbly what Browning shapes into the poetic speech of "any wife to any husband":—

> "My love, this is the bitterest, that thou—
> Who art all truth, and who dost love me now
> As thine eyes say, as thy voice breaks to say—
> Shouldst love so truly, and couldst love me still
> A whole long life through, had but love its will,
> Would death, that leads me from thee, brook delay."

No artist could do justice to the theme, either with pen or brush.

And men and women walking very diverse paths, dissimilar in rank, in calling, in ambition, in attainments, are alike in this, that they all have their several red-letter days, the recurrence of which revivifies, for at least a few brief hours, ancient happiness and bygone triumphs. Is it not inevitably a red-letter day to the statesman when, for the first time, he is summoned to join in the councils of his Sovereign; to the engineer, when his first important plan is adopted; to the surgeon, when by common consent in a leading hospital an unusually difficult and critical case is first entrusted to his care; to the painter, or sculptor, when his earliest influential patron appears; to the journalist, when he sees for the first time a "leader" produced by the sweat of his own brain challenging attention in the mid-sheet of a great newspaper? Does not Charles Dickens refer to a red-letter day when, in the preface to "The Pickwick Papers," he tells us how, having purchased an early copy of the magazine in which his first effusion appeared, he walked down to Westminster Hall and turned into it for half an hour, because his eyes "were so dimmed with joy and pride, that they could not bear the street, and were not fit to be seen there"?

Things are not always what they seem. We sometimes mistake adversity for prosperity, loss for gain, and vice versâ. There are red-letter days in many lives which we only slowly—and perhaps against our will—come to see in their true character. At first we were inclined to consider them anything rather than seasons to look back upon with joy and thankfulness, and to put a sinister mark in the diary against such disappointing dates. It was when a fond plan was frustrated, when a door which we believed to conduct into a larger room closed in our face, when a heavy decision had to be made.

But the months and the years have rolled on and have taught us the lesson that beyond all question these painful experiences were blessings in disguise. Our plan fulfilled would have been a costly vanity; we were in error as to the worth of the opportunity which eluded our grasp; the decision which we took with saddened heart, under the relentless stress of circumstances, has proved in its issues the grand success of our career. Of how many who have come into more than the heritage of their brightest hopes is the saying true: They were led by a way that they knew not! Many instances might be quoted. Dr. John Kitto, who from lowliest rank rose to deserved eminence as a scholar, a traveller, and an illustrator of Biblical manners and customs, met with an accident in boyhood which totally destroyed his sense of hearing. In his consequent loneliness he took to study as a solace, and inch by inch mastered what to him were new worlds of knowledge. Could he possibly in life's meridian look back on that early physical disaster as a loss without a much more than compensating gain? We think not.

There was a day which for a season looked dark and altogether unsatisfactory in the career of M. de Lesseps. As a French diplomat, he had not pleased his fickle masters, and he was recalled from a mission to a foreign Court. The world and his own fame have been the gainers, for in the leisure which ensued M. de Lesseps conceived the mighty project of the Suez Canal.

Very similar, though in a different sphere of activity, was the experience of Nathaniel Hawthorne. In the delightful gossiping chapter—"The Custom-House"—introductory to the "Scarlet Letter," he has related something of how that marvellous story came to be written. Hawthorne held the appointment of Surveyor in the United States Customs at Salem. But on the election of General Taylor to the Presidency, there was the far-reaching change of officials—"the spoils to the victors"—which is apt even yet with each change of administration to temporarily disorganise public and semi-public life in America. Hawthorne's sympathies were with the party which had suffered defeat, and he lost his post. Thereupon, making "an investment in ink, paper, and steel pens," he "opened his long disused writing-desk," and conquered fame with the book which is now an American classic.

Even the date when riches took to themselves wings and flew away has again and again come to be regarded in after time as a red-letter day. Out of the furnace the gold of manliness, sturdy resolve, indomitable perseverance, has emerged. Trial has again led to triumph. As all students of English literature know, it was loss of fortune which made Thackeray definitely a man of letters, and gave the Anglo-Saxon-speaking world the priceless possessions of "Vanity Fair" and "Esmond." And it is not impossible that a day widely known as the Black Friday of 1866—the time of the Overend and Gurney bank crisis—came in the long run to be looked upon by himself as a red-letter day in a sombre and forbidding mask by the indefatigable astronomer who recently fell a victim to yellow fever in Florida. Richard A. Proctor is said to have been ruined by that huge collapse. He descended from affluence to poverty. And from those dark hours dated his rise to literary and scientific eminence. He was greater than untoward events, and, touched by the sharp spur of necessity, he made full proof of the powers that were in him. As wider and ever wider fame crowned his efforts, it may be reasonably doubted if he did not cease regretting the catastrophe that had brought his shoulder to the yoke of systematic toil and persistent purpose.

Red-letter days have their lessons. One is on the surface at the point now reached. If in numberless lives the dark line in the almanack has been transmuted into a bright one by patient and plodding endeavour, may not we likewise change our supposed failures and defeats into gains and triumphs? Shadows may predominate on the picture of the present; let us labour to flood it ultimately with happy sunshine. The ruins of the past are precious, as more poets than Longfellow have taught, if we make of them a platform to rise to something nobler.

Then, the red-letter day which is always acknowledged as such is a remembrancer of the duty of thankfulness. Do we indeed believe that from our Father in Heaven cometh every good and perfect gift? and shall not our heart sing its song of praise and gratitude on the anniversary of the season when our cup of blessings ran over, or when in our time of utmost need a great deliverance came, or when it came about in the ordering of God's providence that our life-path turned abruptly into a pleasant and safe way? Yes, verily, we will lift to the steadfast stars faces that shine with reverent, thankful joy. We feel at these seasons that life is not a hopeless maze, whatever the pessimist may urge. It is ours to be glad in the possession of personal evidence that controverts the slander.

Lastly, it seems to the writer that the frequent coming of private and individual red-letter days, based very often on claims to consideration which have not been mentioned in this paper—claims arising not seldom through deep moral and spiritual experiences—ought to touch to ever keener and more loving sympathy, ought to increase the spirit of mutual helpfulness. It is a narrow and poor gratitude that sheds no radiance around. Our joys are surely planned to lead to the lightening of our neighbours' sorrows. Here is an easy test of sincerity, and, by the witness of the Master's "Inasmuch as ye did it . . . Inasmuch as ye did it not," the one test that abides to the end, and is final and supreme: a red-letter day will be doubly blessed if in the strength of its happy recollections some aid is offered to the weak, the sinning or the suffering, and it will be still better deserving of its title.

SPECIAL NOTE.—To those of our readers who have helped us so far in this work we tender our grateful thanks on behalf of the Waifs. But much remains to be done; and we invite our friends who have thought for the homeless little ones to make a collection on their behalf at their own happy Christmas or New Year's gathering. And surely the holiday would then be to them a season of far greater rejoicing, in that they had done something to make other lives brighter, happier, and fuller of blessing.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

THE NEW YEAR PATH.

IN a Welsh guide-book there is mention of a motto inscribed on the front of a mansion, the meaning of which is, "Without God, without all; with God, enough." "My grace is sufficient for thee"—the promise is comfort, help, and inspiration through the unknown path we enter with the dawning of 1889. We know nothing of its changes, its losses, its thorns —but "with God, enough;" we need fear no evil, since He Who makes no mistakes appoints each hour, is present everywhere, and knows the path that we take. "God has been our Father a great while," was the simple reply of a Swiss peasant, when a passer-by expressed a fear lest the frost should spoil the flowers of his care. The past witnesses our Father's loving-kindness, and to Him we can trustfully commend ourselves at the changing of the years. Many of us know the solemn feeling of the silent prayer-time at the watch-night service, when the clock strikes the knell of the old year, and the bells peal out, and hundreds of voices take up a hymn of faith and praise; but whether we can manage to join a midnight service or not, we can with equal trust and love put this dawning year into God's keeping, and feel we are perfectly safe, whether 1889 shall close for us on earth or in heaven. It may be this year contains for us the merciful answer to many a waiting prayer; we may be very sure the days will be garlanded with bounty and blessing, and that many a good and perfect gift will be revealed to us amid the deepening light of Christian progress. Yes, let Progress be our watchword day by day; we cannot stand still in the Christian life. When the new year wanes, we shall assuredly be nearer our Master or further from His side than we are now. May He help us to go onward, so that "yesterday's goal shall be the starting-point of to-morrow," and, whatever may be the special lessons the new year shall teach us by brier or by blossom, may we praise and thank and cleave to our Master the whole year through.

> "For us, whatever's undergone,
> Thou knowest, willest what is done.
> Grief may be joy misunderstood,
> Only the Good discerns the good.
> I trust Thee while my days go on."

THE BOYS' HOME AT REGENT'S PARK.

The Bishop of London is president of this industrial school for destitute lads not convicted of crime; the report tells us that punishments are here reduced to a minimum, by offering boys encouragement for good conduct and work, and by the personal influence of the teachers. In 1858 this Home was first started, in the Euston Road, and hundreds have gone forth from the Institute's sheltering care to their life-work at home and abroad, many of them being "centres of far-reaching influence for good," while other shelters have sprung out of the original refuge. At the present building, in Regent's Park Road, the boys learn tailoring, needlework, shoemaking; and the carpenter's workshop is described as a "bower of pleasure," for the lads delight in using chisel and saw, and "the bench" is their cherished aspiration. They also deal in firewood, undertake housework, and are quite expert young bakers; the members of the band are in request among the regimental bands of the army. The chapel is a quiet spot, where special sermons are preached to the young, and the children of rich and poor alike are catechised, and lift their fresh young voices in hymns of praise. "Old boys" far away, hold the Home in grateful, loving memory—so much so that one even writes, "Give my love to the blankets and sheets, the dear old copper-sticks and washing-tubs!" We are reminded by the workers in this Home that Lord Macaulay tells of a beautiful church-window made out of pieces of glass rejected as waste material; how far more glorious is the effort to seek out society's "waifs and strays," and lead them to the beauty of holiness!

A PRACTICAL PLEA.

Passing through a narrow, squalid street in Shanghai (a missionary writes), I saw an old meanly dressed Chinese woman asking alms from house to house: on her back was an inscription in large red Chinese characters. My companion told me she was a Buddhist nun, collecting money for the repair of a temple, the name of which was given in the aforesaid inscription, which further declared that "money thus bestowed would be transformed into the sacred structure." It seemed to me that our heathen neighbours had here laid hold of a striking, suggestive, stimulating view as to gifts of charity, from which we Christians well might profit: far more marvellous and infinitely more enriching is such transformation of our poor "lendings to the Lord" into heavenly treasure, than would be the turning into gold of our earthly all by the far-famed philosopher's stone.

"HERE AM I; SEND ME."

At a public meeting a remarkable instance of Divine guidance into special service was given by a missionary, drawn from his personal experience. At one time he was the only believer in his family, and, being greatly attached to his relations, this fact filled him with much concern, while he passed through the course of preparation for entering the Church. Later on, he was asked to unite with other clergymen at a special prayer meeting on behalf of missionary efforts, and it was notified to him that the subject of prayer was to be the definite one of procuring a suitable worker for Persia; help was much wanted there, and the matter was to be laid before God at this prayer meeting. The clergyman attended the service, and prayed earnestly for the success of missions, and that a volunteer might be found for Persia. As he was leaving the building, a friend touched him on the arm and said earnestly, "Do you think you may be the right man to go out to Persia?" Such an idea startled his hearer, who had not dreamed of leaving the associations familiar to him, and who felt his mission-work lay in bringing his dear ones first of all to the Saviour's feet. Still, that solemn question, coming after the earnest petitions of the prayer meeting, haunted his heart: and he became so disturbed and perplexed, that he could do nothing else save leave the bewilderment at the throne of God, and simply pray that he might be plainly guided to a right decision. And the Lord then, as ever, honoured prayer and faith. It is a wondrous testimony, but with God nothing is impossible: in the course of a few weeks the tidings came from a younger sister, and then from another, and at last from the father and mother, that to them also the Saviour had become precious, and they had resolved to follow Him openly henceforth. So the shadows of doubt were lifted swiftly and brightly; and with a heart full of awe and thanksgiving, he who had pleaded for light and guidance discerned the way into which he was led, and came forward for earnest service in the cause that had been the subject of the special prayer meeting. It is true that not all of us are called to Persia, or to the mission-fields abroad, but there is a suggestive story of some Christian people who tried a week's practice instead of prayer meetings. But the only true method is when prayer and practice go hand in hand, and the prayer meeting stirs in those that pray and listen the inspiration to go forth and accomplish the great blessings for which the great Master has been besought.

TEACHERS' HELPS.

Teachers, whether in the pulpit or in the class, will find much to help them in "Christ and His People" (Hodder and Stoughton), a series of thirteen sermons, which have been preached from time to time by such well-known divines as the Bishop of Liverpool, the Dean of Ripon, Canon Hoare, the Rev. H. C. G. Moule, and the Rev. George Everard, more than one of whom is known to our readers from contributions to our own pages.—Another work, this time entirely from the pen of the last-named writer, the Rev. George Everard, is published by Messrs. Nisbet under the title of "In the Morning," and consists of a Scripture prayer and meditation for each morning in the month. Some of the meditations are very suggestive indeed.—The latest addition to Messrs. Nisbet's "Men of the Bible" series is "Jeremiah, his Life and Times," by Professor T. K. Cheyne, D.D., whose work is a worthy successor and companion to the valuable volumes which have preceded it in this most excellent series.—Another volume of meditations from the same publishers is Dr. J. R. Macduff's "Ripples in the Starlight," a collection of very short, independent thoughts which should be helpful to many a struggling Christian.—A more ordered and connected work of a similar nature, and from the same publishers, is Dr. George Matheson's "Voices of the Spirit," in which each meditation occupies only about two pages, but will be found full of helpful and suggestive thought.—"How to Help" (Nisbet) is a series of republished papers, by Mrs. G. S. Reaney, upon life and work in the East End of London, where she toiled so long and so faithfully with her husband. This work should prove very useful indeed to teachers who are anxious to enlist the sympathies of more favoured scholars in the lives and aspirations of the toiling masses whose lot is cast in less happy surroundings.—"Through the Shadows" (Elliot Stock), by Erskine Moir, is a somewhat strange story, marred by too sad an ending.

XUM

which leaves the reader dissatisfied with the lot of the heroine. The story deals almost too largely with religious "difficulties," which we think are better dealt with directly, than in a form where the slightest misstatement may work incalculable harm.—From the same publisher comes a little volume of essays by E. Hughes, under the title of "Some Aspects of Humanity," in which, to our mind, the first one, on "Patient People," is the most suggestive, though "Children and Flowers" is another very striking paper.—"The Disciples' Prayer," also published by Mr. Elliot Stock, is made up of notes of sermons on the Lord's Prayer, by the Rev. J. M. Gibbon, which we have not space to more than briefly mention and commend to the attention of our readers.—Travellers' tales of the Holy Land and the adjacent countries have often been told, but perhaps teachers may find something new in a recently issued volume of memories of Eastern travel, entitled "Heart and Thought," published by Mr. G. W. Gledsdale, of Bolton, and from the pen of Mr. T. Holmes. The book is a simple record of extended travel, and as such is perhaps more interesting than an elaborate and speculative work.

A CAIRN OF KINDLINESS.

It has been well said, "The cairn is heaped high by each one flinging a pebble," and there are so many ways of bringing pebbles just now to the cairn of kindliness, that the humblest and weakest among us may assist in causing the structure to arise like an altar of thanksgiving to Heaven. Miss Constance Sargent, 20, Castellain Road, Maida Vale, in writing to acknowledge increased interest in her "Spare Minute Club," through our reference to its work in THE QUIVER, asks us to mention the Ladies' Samaritan Society, of which she is also hon. secretary. Subscriptions even of five shillings annually would mean many more deserving cases assisted. This Society is attached to the Royal Hospital for Chest Diseases, City Road, and it sends patients to convalescent homes, pays fares and rent, procures tools, and in every beneficent way relieves the needs of patients. Ladies take it in turn to visit the wards and ascertain the kind of help most urgently required. Miss Sargent writes that at present the income they have to work with is only about £60 a year. There are many simple but loving, helpful agencies at work in connection with the United Kingdom Beneficent Association. Some ladies undertake to correspond with annuitants and candidates and look after their general well-being, sending little comforts and dainties sometimes—in no spirit of patronage, but in Christian sympathy and kindness. "They appear to know my very wants," writes one of those thus aided; "surely, it must be a loving Father that puts it into their hearts." Clothes, food, books, flowers, material—all these find a place amid these quiet, gracious ministries. Mrs. Berry, the Rosery, Dean Park, Bournemouth, is hon. secretary of the "Busy Bees Society," which provides underclothing and knitted articles for candidates and annuitants; and Miss C. Dodgson, 2, Upper George Street, Bryanston Square, W., looks after the "Nourishing Dainties Society" for the benefit of the sick, poor, and aged. Contributions of non-perishable articles, such as good black tea, cocoa, and extract of beef, are much appreciated, and special arrangements could be made as concerns perishable foods, which could go direct to suitable recipients.

IN THE HEAVENLY RECORD.

The story is told of Irving, when co-pastor of Dr. Chalmers, that his friends once found him walking on with a heavy burden on his back, and a poor, worn-out Irishman limping beside him. People laughed, but Irving's simple, noble reply to their questioning was only, "His countrymen were kind to me." Are there any of the kindred of the Lord Himself, whose burdens we can lift because of His mercy and compassion unto us? If, for His sake, we are helping His brethren and His sisters, let us be very sure no kindly word is spoken, no deed of compassion is wrought, but Christ Himself keeps the record, for He seeth in secret. One of the martyrs told how the words he uttered were taken down by a secret pen, writing behind a curtain, and the knowledge of this made him earnest and careful when he opened his lips; is there not a heavenly record, unseen by us, that takes account even of what we deem trivial words and trifling deeds, and shall not things done in secret be revealed on the housetops at last? We heard an eloquent preacher tell of the wonders of the phonograph—how it reproduces single voices or voices strangely mingling, how the operator laughed into it, or wept, and how each sob or burst of laughter was heard distinctly again, and how the sounds of music or human accents can be stored for years and then be clearly reproduced. And he reminded his hearers of that great future when the past will stand forth again more clearly, more wondrously than science dreams: many that are last shall then indeed be first, for there are true, humble, faithful souls in lowly places that are doing Christlike service, prized by the angels, but so circumstanced that men notice them little. With what honour will Heaven requite them, then! It was said by Hooker that there will come a time when three words uttered in charity and meekness shall receive a far more blessed recompense "than three thousand volumes of disdainful wit."

A SEASIDE HOME AT HERNE BAY.

For the past nine years a good work has been carried on quietly and unobtrusively at Herne Bay, in Kent: a "Bird's Nest" and Seaside Home for delicate children needing change and sea air. Founded in a very small way indeed, this Home has recently removed to new quarters—two newly built houses, communicating with each other. There are beds at present for ten children, gathered from all parts, but chiefly from the close and crowded courts and slums of the Metropolis, and from the squalid haunts around Drury Lane Theatre. There is also a small accommodation for "resters"—young women in business needing change of air. During the past summer, forty-two children and fifteen "resters" have been received, nine of the children having been taken absolutely free of charge. Hitherto, from want of funds, the Home has been closed each year from November till May; but, notwithstanding the death of some of its chief supporters, a strenuous effort is now being made to extend its usefulness by continuing it through the winter, and by providing a few beds for mothers with their infants, and other occasional cases sorely in need of rest and nourishment, but ineligible for most other homes. Will any of our readers help in the good work of bringing health and strength back to many a little one to whom the sea and green fields and fresh air are at present but meaningless terms? Annual subscribers of a guinea may send a child for three weeks free of charge. Subscriptions and gifts will be most thankfully received, and all inquiries will be answered by Miss Charlotte S. Abbey, in charge of "The Bird's Nest," Herne Bay.

THREE USEFUL BOOKS.

The studies in the lives and times of Biblical characters which the Rev. F. B. Meyer has from time to time issued during the last few years, have been marked by great care in preparation, and a suggestiveness that has made them very acceptable to preachers and teachers. This is no less true of his latest work—"Abraham, or the Obedience of Faith"(Morgan and Scott), than of its predecessors. Perhaps the finest chapter in the work is that treating of the supremely pathetic story of Abraham's great trial, of which Mr. Meyer truly says: "So long as men live in the world, they will turn to this story with unwearying interest. There is only one scene in history by which it is surpassed—that where the great Father gave His Isaac to a death from which there was no deliverance."—Useful in another direction than Mr. Meyer's work is "The Five Talents of Women," which has just been published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. The author is the Rev. E. J. Hardy, whose papers in THE QUIVER all our readers must remember, and who deals with his subject in his well-known anecdotal style. The book is addressed to girls and women, and is divided into a number of chapters, each one of which could well be read apart from the others, and contains a distinct and valuable lesson. Every part of a woman's life is carefully dealt with through a range of topics which reaches its highest point in the chapter on "A Girl's Religion," which, in its earnest appeal to girls not to waste their opportunities, surpasses in power any other chapter in this most interesting and useful work.—The volumes in Messrs. Longmans' "Epochs of Church History" are always useful, and certainly the Rev. W. Hunt's "History of the English Church in the Middle Ages," which is the latest volume of the series, is no exception. It deals with a period of English Church History which is full of interest, though we need hardly say that it behoves the reader to be very cautious in the study of so disturbed and unsettled a period.

AMBASSADORS FOR GOD.

Andrew Fuller truly said, "Only One could ever declare, when He died, 'It is finished.'" The noblest workers have felt, when all was accomplished, that much beyond their failing powers remained to be done, and that, after all, their best has been but little, their efforts have been frail. Little and frail in their own mortal estimation, perhaps; but God knows which of us do our best in His warfare against evil—angels themselves can do no more. God's workers die, His work goes on—Joshua arises when Moses rests. Be it ours to pray and strive that somewhere in the host of workers we have our place, our part, and that the world somehow is better for our example and our lives, so that "good and faithful servant" shall be the Divine welcome to our souls, when other standard-bearers shall step into our place. Duncan Matheson related a story of a chaplain who consulted a Scotch sergeant as to the best method of work, and the sergeant showed him the preparations for battle, for it was in the time of the Crimea. "We are all in earnest here, sir," he said; "it is a life and death struggle. And an earnest man ever wins the way; to do good, be in earnest." When the Congregational Union met last autumn at Nottingham, Professor Elmslie sounded a clarion-call to every heart that has come in contact with the living God, and beheld some vision of His glory, and realised His redemption. There was no presumption, no self-assertion, he said, in Isaiah, when he sprang forward, invoking God's attention on himself, and before all Heaven, asking to be God's ambassador. No, he had utterly forgotten self, and was conscious only of God, and he yearned "with resistless longing to do something for that God Who had shown such grace to him." Something! Though everyone cannot be an Isaiah, everyone may in very deed do something; and our own special work can be decided only between our own prayerful, praiseful, overflowing hearts and the living, loving God.

THE CHILDREN OF THE STAGE

MACREADY HOUSE.

Are befriended at Macready House, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, where temporal and spiritual benefits exist on behalf of employés at various places of amusement. A young professional practically exemplified the esteem in which the refreshment-buffet is held by showing a visitor a well-cooked steak, the price of which he decided would be a shilling: "No, sir," said the girl, "steak and mashed for fourpence-halfpenny," and she added that it had been cooked by "a brick of a matron!" Besides the creature comforts, here is rest for tired performers, and friendly sympathy is spreading around a gentle Christian influence; how many of those who smile upon the stage have needy homes and weary hearts, and at Macready House confidences are outpoured to friends who care alike for soul, and mind, and body. There are evangelistic meetings for boys, and a gymnasium and Mutual Improvement Society. A lad about nine years old proposed a gift to Her Majesty of a cardboard model of a yacht, but the children of Macready House made their offering in a different form—they sent the Queen a footstool on which they had worked in beads the Victoria Regina Lily. Quite a throng of little performers now entertain the public—some are but eight and nine, some only four: they would be much better sheltered under Christian care, but, alas! the demand for children as performers is increasing, and to these little ones the help of Macready House is invaluable. All the children who played "Alice in Wonderland" frequented the Institute, from "Alice" herself to the "Glowworm," a child of four; "and dear, intelligent children they were," say the workers in the Home. The upper part of Macready House will be devoted to an orphanage for destitute theatrical children. A noteworthy feature of this mission is the endeavour to place each girl and child in communication with a lady, who undertakes to write her a letter every month. Many foreigners have shared in the benefits of this much-needed Institute—we read of an Arab, employed in the Hippodrome, who unwound his turban, and with clasped hands cried out to God to bless the Theatrical Mission—and the hospitality shown to foreigners has resulted in the desire that the mission may spread out branches to Paris, Berlin, Switzerland, and Italy.

THEATRICAL CHILDREN AT THE INSTITUTE.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

A scientific writer tells us, concerning the "fork-tailed date-shell," that it bores into the hardest stones and shells, and has one prevailing instinct—namely, to bore its way through everything. Most thoroughly does it succeed in getting "onwards, ever onwards;" but the writer adds that there is no particular credit due to the fork-tailed date-shell, which only carries out a constitutional trait. There is honour due, however, to those heroic souls who, often unnoticed by mankind, are working away with everything against them; they seem to have nothing in their favour except patience and faith, but "patience is grit," and faith moves the Hand that moves heaven and earth. God's children have learnt that one secret of success is self-denial; are there not cultured and educated lives working to-day amid the most lonely surroundings, and have not some even gone forth to share the daily existence of foreign tribes as brethren and kinsmen? In our own sphere, each of us will reach success as a Christian labourer by remembering that even Christ pleased not Himself, by keeping faithfully on at our task for Him, and, above all, by working on our knees. And if at last the success seem still withheld, and we seem to miss credit, and honour, and encouragement, and fruitage, let us be comforted in the knowledge that "failure is often deferred success," that no real failure is possible to him on whose behalf God's hand is lifted up, and that "He who honour best bestows" will show us the successes when our brief day's work is ended.

LIVES WITH LESSONS.

The lives of Robert and Mary Moffat have certainly many lessons to teach us all of unwearied continuance in well-doing and faithfulness in striving to spread the knowledge of the Kingdom, the work in which Dr. Moffat spent so many long and arduous years in Africa. We are glad, therefore, to see a cheap edition, issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin, of a biography of the veteran missionary and his wife, ably written by their son. The work should now be within the reach of all Sunday-school libraries which do not already possess it.—The same may be said of the life of Samuel Morley, by Mr. Edwin Hodder, of which another and cheaper edition has just been issued by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. Our readers will remember our appreciative reference to this work on its first appearance, and a further acquaintance with the book in no way detracts from our estimation of it.—Dr. W. M. Taylor, of New York, contributes to a collection of historical and biographical essays by the late Professor William Graham, D.D., a few very interesting personal reminiscences of their writer, who must have been a man singularly well worth knowing, for he was not only eloquent in the pulpit and a powerful writer, but in private life was the idol of his friends, and particularly of the little ones among them. It is said that on the occasion of a preaching visit, when Dr. Graham was to have spent the night at their house and was obliged to send a substitute at the last minute, one of his little friends spontaneously added to his usual evening prayer these two petitions: "Please God bring Mr. —— safely here, and may he be as funny as the Doctor." This shows us the man, and gives us some idea of how he endeared himself to old and young alike. The essays on Wycliffe, Milton, and Calvin are perhaps the most striking in the series. The work is published by Messrs. Nisbet and Co.—From the same publishers comes "The Home of a Naturalist," in which are woven together some interesting sketches with both pen and pencil of Dr. Lawrence Edmonston and his home and work at Balta Sound, on the most northerly island of the Shetland group, written by two of his children. Some of the chapters on the folk-lore of these northern islands are very interesting.—Another cheaper issue of a popular biography is before us in the life of the Rev. George M. Murphy, by Annie Taylor (Elliot Stock). This new edition ought to be within the reach even of many of those among whom Mr. Murphy laboured so faithfully and so long in the south of London.

FOR BAND AND DRUMMER BOYS.

Some people openly confess they do not like boys, others by their avoidance of the species betray distrust and timidity concerning them; certain venturesome spirits, however, have discovered "what an honest nature lurks beneath that Puck's countenance," and they go so far as to say they would rather deal with the boys than the girls, and find it easier work. Now "comparisons are odious," and our young folks of both sexes need Christian thought and supervision; but we believe that those who entertain dread of boys and object to their vicinity do not really know how boys "pay" for love and care; and to those who have been inclined to ignore their claims we would say, "If the army of Christ is to be reinforced, if our country is to increase in goodness and glory, we cannot afford to overlook the boys of to-day, with their restless energy, their trustfulness, their ambition, and their strength." Would that wherever societies and institutes for young men are flourishing, there might be some sort of provision for the evening leisure of the boys, who, as a rule, have grown accustomed to hear such and such a meeting is "not for boys," but who crowd heartily within the doors that stand open to beckon them from street corners. A lady has sent us particulars of efforts put forth in four garrisons on behalf of the lads in the band, some of whom are orphans and friendless, and all of whom are exposed to temptations, and are deeply susceptible to gentle, helpful influences. The band-masters report improvement in manners, talk, and docility, as a consequence of the social evenings for boys, held from October to April, when instruction is given in knitting, netting, frame-making, drawing, and other interesting occupations. The boys choose the closing hymn, and many a frank, loving letter testifies to their appreciation of the interest taken by the ladies in their welfare. Further information as to this good work can be had by sending a stamped addressed envelope to "C. G. C. M.," The Birkenward, Skelmorlie, N.B.

"THE CABMEN'S BISHOP."

Liverpool is poorer to-day for the loss of Mr. Edward Sumners, "the cabmen's bishop." He was held in the highest esteem and respect by all ranks and conditions of men, and his cheery presence was as welcome in the mansion of the merchant prince as in the cellar of the starving outcast. As a young man, employed at Fawcett's Foundry, he devoted his leisure time, notably his Sundays, to hard drinking and pugilistic encounters. Through the influence of some Christian fellow-workmen, he was induced to go one Sunday morning to Wesley Chapel, Upper Stanhope Street, and what he there heard, arousing his interest, led him to renew the strange experiences. These chapel attendances were in the years 1832—33. By God's grace the strong man was broken down in penitence and prayer, and it was not long before he found deliverance. He would at this time be about twenty-six or twenty-seven years of age, and could neither read nor write. Mr. Lovett taught him the alphabet, and he derived great assistance at this initial stage in his true life-work from his faithful and surviving friend, Mr. Eastwood—whose son is an old contributor to the THE QUIVER. His only class-book was the Bible. Appointed as an agent of the Liverpool Town Mission in 1838, he zealously laboured in the cause of his Master for forty-eight years, during that long period bringing light and joy into multitudes of sorrowful and benighted hearts. Possessed of a splendid physique and abounding energy, he was remarkable for his bright and buoyant disposition, evidenced in his gracious winning looks and warm and loving hand-grip. His face positively shone. These characteristics gained for him the familiar sobriquet of "Happy Ned." His most noble and philanthropic work among the Liverpool cabmen, providing—for he was a prime mover in this direction—"shelters" for their bodies, as well as refreshment for their souls, needs no comment here. It is recorded in heaven. He was called to his reward at the ripe age of seventy-nine, being discovered early one morning, still and cold, kneeling at his bedside in the attitude of prayer. Fifteen hundred cabmen and omnibus drivers tied their whips with crape on the day of his funeral. The vast procession, representing all classes, and over a mile long, which followed his body to the grave through thirty thousand mournful spectators, bore witness to the veneration in which this humble servant of Christ was universally held. "And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

SOME BOOKS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

Stories for boys and girls are always more in demand at this season of the year than at any other. Parents and guardians are on the look-out for seasonable gifts, and superintendents and teachers for prizes with which to reward regular attendance and good conduct during the year which is closed. "By a Way She Knew Not" (Hodder and Stoughton) is a very well-written story suitable for elder girls, by Margaret M. Robertson, author of "Christie Redfern's Troubles" and other popular stories.—Another book from the same publishers is by Dr. Gordon Stables, and is entitled "Wild Life in the Land of the Giants." There is plenty of life in the work, but it is not carried to such excess of vividness as to be unsuitable for its young readers.—"The Mother's Friend" (Hodder and Stoughton), edited by Mrs. G. S. Reaney, is primarily intended as a magazine for mothers' meetings, but the admirable series of papers which it contains, entitled "Mother's Sunday Hour with her Children," makes it particularly suitable for mention in this connection. "Avondale Priory; or, She hath Done what She Could," is a temperance story by Mrs. Lucas Shadwell, published at the National Temperance Publication Depôt. The story is a simple one, but we can heartily commend it to leaders of Bands of Hope.—"A Song o' Sixpence" is a quaint fairy tale by the Rev. J. Jackson Wray, whose stories in the past have delighted so many hundreds and thousands of children and older folk. This quaint story is published by Messrs. Nisbet and Co., who also issue "Ready, Aye, Ready," and "The Trivial Round." The former, by Agnes Giberne, is well suited for girls and boys who are not very far advanced in their reading, but who have still got beyond books for very little ones. The latter is more suited for elder girls, to whom we think it is likely to prove very attractive.—"Our Own Picture Book" (same publishers) is, as its title implies, a collection of pictures more or less attractive, with accompanying letterpress suitable for very little children. Of "The Middy and the Moors" we need say no more to recommend it to boys than that it is written by Mr. R. M. Ballantyne. The scene of the story is laid in Algeria, and the wild life among the Moors is well described.—Of "Her Life's Work," by Lady Dunboyne, which, like Mr. Ballantyne's story, is published by Messrs. Nisbet, and two other stories entitled "Freemen or Slaves," and "Our Neighbour, Widow Yates," we have not space to say more than that they are well worthy of the attention of Sunday-school librarians, and that the last is written by Grace Stebbing.—The "Swallow" series of books for little children (Cassell) comprises quite a number of little works, very prettily bound and abundantly illustrated in a style well fitted to endear them to the young readers in the nursery. Even those little ones who cannot read will enjoy these books, the very titles of which, such as "Daisy's Story Book," "A Nest of Stories," "Little Chimes for All Times," and "Tiny Tales," would make them popular.

SPECIAL PRIZE.

In connection with THE QUIVER Bible Reading Society, two Prizes, the first of Three Guineas and the second of Two Guineas, will be awarded for the two best sets of anecdotal and other illustrations of the following texts (not more than three illustrations of any one text):—

(1) Hebrews xi. 1.
(2) Proverbs xiii. 12.
(3) Romans xiii. 10.
(4) St. John viii. 12.
(5) Genesis i. 26.
(6) James iii. 5.

The anecdotes or illustrations need not be original or unpublished, but the source must in every case be stated. Extra credit will be given for original work or research, and for anecdotes not commonly known.

The conditions upon which these prizes are issued are very few and simple:—(1) Candidates must write legibly on one side of the paper only, and must send in their MSS. addressed to the Editor of THE QUIVER, La Belle Sauvage, Ludgate Hill, E.C., adding the words "Bible Reading Competition" in the top left-hand corner of the envelope. (2) The latest date for receiving MSS. will be Monday, April 8, 1889. (3) Every MS. must be accompanied by the competitor's full name and postal address, not necessarily for publication, and must also have securely attached to it a declaration that the work is entirely the competitor's own, countersigned by a minister of religion. (4) The Editor reserves the right to divide either or both of the prizes should two or more MSS. be of equal merit; or to withhold either or both should no MS. be adjudged worthy of the award. (5) The Editor cannot undertake to return unsuccessful MSS., or to enter into any correspondence respecting the competition, either before or after the publication of the award.

CHRISTIAN WORK AT OXFORD.

BY AN OXFORD MAN.

IN A LODGING-HOUSE.

OXFORD and Cambridge have been called the two eyes of England; and although now, owing to university extension and other causes, they by no means occupy the position they formerly held, yet their welfare is still of deepest interest to all Englishmen; in fact, they are a sort of public property. Whether it be a boat race or a cricket match in which they are engaged, all the world, from the aristocrat down to the cabman who drives him, must wear the colours of the favourite university. It is impossible to look at the stream of young life which may be seen any day in Oxford during term time without a thrill of interest. What is to be the future of these youths? They are so bright, so free from care, so energetic, so enthusiastic, so willing to follow where they are led. Who will lead them? and whither?

No one can study the peculiarities of the two universities without perceiving the marked difference which there is between them. To touch upon one point alone, viz., their respective theological proclivities, it has been said that whilst Simeon has left his mark upon Cambridge, it is to Dr. Pusey that Oxford owes its ecclesiastical spirit. Yet we cannot forget that the Evangelical revival of the last century was mainly led by Oxford men, such as the Wesleys and George Whitfield; and it is not impossible that a time may be approaching when men who are Evangelical in doctrine, though they would not allow themselves to be called members of an Evangelical party, may be found in some posts of importance in Oxford.

In attempting to set forth the leading Evangelical influences which are being brought to bear on young men in this university, one is treading on delicate ground. There are many things which one hardly cares to allude to, and there is danger both of omitting some agencies which ought to be included, and of exaggerating the possible effects of some which are mentioned. Still, we must do the best we can in a small compass.

There are three centres of Evangelical work in Oxford. The oldest of these is St. Aldate's, where Canon Christopher has been working for about thirty years. It is hard to estimate the amount of good work he has done in days gone by, and if now circumstances have caused him to lose something of the hold which he once had over young men, he is universally loved and honoured by men of all schools of thought for his faithfulness, his warm-hearted earnestness, and his affectionate persuasiveness. Whilst he continues to hold Saturday evening meetings, and occasionally gathers fair audiences of young men, and whilst he provides endless pabulum for Evangelical men, in the form of books, tracts, preachings, and addresses, Canon Christopher's most remarkable effort in the year is the monster breakfast-party, to which he invites all sorts and conditions of men, from "Cowley Fathers" to Wesleyan divines, on the occasion of the annual meeting of the Church Missionary Society. Hundreds are invited, and most of those who are invited come. Before breakfast is half over the host may be seen on his legs, trying to make himself heard amidst a clatter of knives and forks; then comes the speaker of the morning, well selected to give an address adapted to an academical audience; some local Church dignitary or professor closes with a word of thanks, and the mass of men are ordered out in batches without any confusion. There can be little doubt that this remarkable undertaking justifies all the expense and thought which are bestowed on it. Certainly it keeps the cause of missions and the triumphs of the Gospel before the minds of many, both young and old, who too readily forget these things, and who are too often inclined to view heathenism in a rosy light, and Christianity in somewhat sombre tints.

At the very antipodes of Oxford from St. Aldate's—in fact, in the very outskirts, and so in a position where its usefulness is considerably marred—stands Wycliffe Hall. This institution is about ten years old, and has received during that time nearly a hundred men, who have been trained there for the ministry after taking their degrees. It has supplied a very great need in Oxford, and will probably prove more and more useful in this respect as time goes on. But over and above this, which is its special work, there are held here during term Bible Readings for adults—ladies and gentlemen—Bible Classes for children in connection with the Children's Scripture Union, meetings in behalf of various missionary and philanthropic objects, and lectures on Christian evidences, Bible study, etc. Thus a good many men are reached in various ways in the Hall and in the Principal's house adjoining, where social gatherings of young men are held from time to time. The Principal, Canon Girdlestone, is also a sort of honorary adviser and chairman of the Inter-collegiate Christian Union—of which more anon—and is one of the chief supporters of the Undergraduates' Missionary Association.

Half-way between St. Aldate's and Wycliffe Hall lies the parish of St. Peter le Bailey, the rector of which—the Rev. F. J. Chavasse—is now widely known as an effective preacher. His work in Oxford is not confined to preaching. Whilst he attracts large gatherings of people from all parts of Oxford, including undergraduates, to his church, and whilst his parochial organisations are models of what can be done on Evangelical lines, the most striking feature of his work is the large Greek Testament class of about a hundred university men, held in an iron room immediately after Sunday evening service. And yet, when this is mentioned, it is not all, for there is hardly a day in which Mr. Chavasse has not to act as guide, philosopher, and friend to some inquiring undergraduate or graduate. His sympathy, his counsel, his services are lovingly and ungrudgingly laid at the disposal of young Oxford — and they are freely and gratefully used. It will be a sad day for the best interests of Oxford when Mr. Chavasse leaves it.

We now pass to other things. There is a daily prayer meeting during term time, in a room conveniently situated in the middle of the town; but it is not well attended. There is also an association to encourage missionary interest amongst undergraduates; it was founded by Bishop French, an old Oxonian, who was for a time Rector of St. Ebbe's—a devoted missionary. It has had varied ups and downs during the last ten years; and at present it is thriving. Although the wave of missionary interest, which has caught so many men at Cambridge, has not been so potent at Oxford, yet there is a decided missionary spirit at work. It must not be forgotten that there are endless calls on men's time, over and above their natural pursuits. There are Temperance and Purity Associations, Christian Socialism, Political Organisations, College Missions in North, East, and South London; also there is the Calcutta Mission and the "Central African" or Universities Mission, besides a series of local missions conducted by specially known bishops or clergy in the colonies. Oxford men are very kind-hearted, and they take interest in all these things more or less.

Amongst active operations conducted by the young men themselves should be mentioned the preaching in the open air at the Martyrs' Memorial on Sunday evenings, also visitations and addresses to the tramps in the large lodging-houses in the poorer parts of the town; then there is a fairly thriving district visiting society, which works in the villages round Oxford with the consent of the parochial clergy, and which also undertakes districts in Oxford itself; and there are some Sunday-school teachers who work in certain schools, though there is nothing here like the celebrated Jesus Lane Sunday-school at Cambridge. Some of the more earnest men take up navvy work or the Sea-side Mission during the vacations, and for this sort of work they seem eminently fitted. We must not forget to mention the Boys' Brigade, devised by an undergraduate from Glasgow, and officered by university men, as a means of teaching and disciplining the rowdy lads of Oxford. It is a marked success.

Lastly, we come to the Inter-collegiate Christian Workers' Union. This union was started about ten years ago, with the object of binding together the earnest men in the different colleges who were engaged in visiting, teaching, etc., or who were members of College Bible readings. When Mr. Moody visited Oxford, he produced a far-reaching impression amongst the young men, the effect of which has not yet died away. One consequence of this was the formation or re-constitution of College Bible Readings. Almost every college has its reading, some on Sundays and some on week-days, some numbering adherents by tens, and some having only two or three members. These have proved centres of great influence, and have tended to promote a true Evangelical spirit amongst the men. The union formed amongst them has proved most serviceable. The committee represents almost all the colleges, and through its means information can rapidly be spread amongst undergraduates as for any special work to which their attention ought to be called. Sometimes a large gathering of the members is held in Wycliffe Hall for devotion, and as a preparation for some special effort. This union invites down energetic mission preachers from London and elsewhere; it has succeeded lately in securing the use of the university church on Sunday evenings for special addresses; and it has more than once enabled Oxford men to have the benefit of a series of addresses by Mr. Webb Peploe. It was through this union that Professor Drummond was invited to Oxford two or three years ago. On the whole this Inter-collegiate Union is one of the most effective of organisations with an Evangelical tendency which we possess at Oxford; the men work it chiefly themselves, and throw their energy, their money, and their prayers into it. There is a similar organisation at Cambridge, and the two bodies arrange for inter-university meetings once a year.

Our readers will now understand a little of what is going on in Oxford in an Evangelical direction. Much more might be done, but there are special difficulties here which need not be entered upon. After all, the important thing is that each man who comes up as a freshman should bring with him settled convictions of truth and fixed principles of life. If a man comes up with a vague idea of Christianity, knowing little of the power of prayer or of the meaning of the Gospel of salvation, he will very likely drift away into a hollow religionism or a cold scepticism, and perhaps will become a slave to sin. Organisations and influences such as have been described above cannot be absolutely depended upon as safeguards. A man must fight his own battle with the world, the flesh, and the devil, in the strength of Christ and by His Spirit.

THE LAST GOOD-NIGHT

GLAD in their night-gowns, clean and white,
The children come to say good-night;
"Father, good-night!" says Marjory,
Climbing for kisses on my knee.

Then Ernest, Kittie, Harry next—
And baby—till I feel perplexed,
Wishing the last good-night was said,
And each and all were packed to bed.

These small folks take me unawares:
I hear them call, when safe up-stairs,
As I sit down to read or write,
"Father, we want to say good-night!"

The book or pen is laid aside:
I find them lying open-eyed—
Five rosy rebels, girls and boys,
Who greet me with tumultuous noise.

Can I be stern with such as these?
Can charming ways and looks displease?
They hold, and scarce will let me go,
And all because they love me so.

Then, in a vision, suddenly
The future seems unveiled to me!
It is my turn, though all in vain,
To long to say good-night again.

I see the years stretch on and on,
The children all grown up and gone;
No chamber echoes to their tread,
The last good-night has long been said!

And by his fireside, desolate,
An old man sits, resigned to wait,
Recalling joys that used to be,
And faces that he may not see.

Therefore, what bliss is mine that now
I still can smooth each fair young brow!
And feel the arms that clasp me tight,
The lips that kiss the last good-night!

'TO THE LIONS!"

A TALE OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS. BY THE REV. PROFESSOR CHURCH, M.A.

CHAPTER IX.—RHODA'S EVIDENCE.

THE Elder felt that his position, so to speak, had been turned. His silence, however skilfully justified, was useless—nay, it was worse than useless, for it had brought this daughter of the Church, one for whom they would all gladly have suffered, into terrible peril. They had escaped for the time; but at what a cost, if Rhoda was to be tortured!

He made a last effort to save her. "My lord," he said, "I withdraw my refusal to speak. Any questions that you or the prosecutor may put to me I will answer; and what I say for myself, I say also for all the accused."

"What say you to this?" asked the Governor.

There was another brief consultation between the advocate and Lucilius. Then the former rose.

"My lord, our interest, our only interest, is the truth. Our aim, and, I presume, the aim of all persons not being criminal or hostile to the State, is that the truth should be fully told, and amply confirmed. Therefore we must have the best evidence that can be procured, nor can we allow our private feelings to hinder its forthcoming. Is it not a maxim of the law that when slaves are at hand you do not use the testimony of freemen, it being agreed that the truth is more surely drawn forth by the more powerful compulsion?"

The Governor referred the point to his assessor, and that official decided, though with evident reluctance, that the contention was just.

Nothing now stood between the prisoner and her fate. The instrument of torture was sent for. Whilst it was being brought, there was a terrible pause of expectation in the court. Tacitus rose as if to leave the room, but a whispered entreaty from the Governor made him resume his seat. In the audience the agitation was extreme. Several persons fainted; many, both men and women, burst into uncontrollable weeping. The least troubled of all was the girl herself. There was something more than calm on her countenance; there was exaltation—almost, it might be said, rapture. Even as it had been with the judges of Stephen—for so we learn from the confession of one of their number—those who looked upon her saw her face "as it had been the face of an angel."

The instrument of torture was something like a rack. The savage humour which gives a half-comic name to these hideous implements of cruelty had invented for it the nickname of the "Little Horse." The resemblance lay in the four beams, projecting from a timber frame, to which the limbs of the sufferer were attached.

Before this was done the Governor ordered the court to be cleared of all persons not immediately interested in the trial. A few heartless creatures were probably disappointed that their curiosity was not to be gratified; but most of the spectators, however intense their interest, felt the order to be a relief. Bion and his wife claimed to be allowed to remain. It would break their hearts to see such a sight, but their presence might comfort the sufferer; and as she was their slave, if not their daughter, their claim was, of course, allowed. The elder Rhoda's whole thought was centred on the desire to minister to this, the child of her heart if not according to the flesh. Bion watched what was done with a set, tearless face, crushing down the wild impulse to fly to the sufferer's rescue. Most of the spectators averted their eyes; even Lucilius was seen to bury his face in a fold of his toga.

The preparations were now complete, and the executioner awaited the signal of the judge to commence his hideous task. This was given by a gesture, and the man immediately followed it up by the first turn of the dreadful instrument. No one who was present that day ever forgot the horrible creaking sound of the timbers, mingled with a groan of the sufferer, forced from her by the pain, but stifled almost as soon as uttered. There was not a heart, not even of the ruthless Lucilius, in which the blood did not curdle; not a forehead on which the cold drops of sweat did not stand.

The Governor thundered, in a voice such as had never been heard to issue from his lips before, "Hold!"

The executioner, brutalised as he was by familiarity with the horrid details of his office, was not sorry to stay his hand.

The Governor went on: "The law has so far been satisfied. The torture has been applied, and in my judgment, which in this matter is final, has been applied sufficiently. If the accused is now willing to make confession, I will hear her."

Rhoda was unfastened from the rack. The executioner assisted her to rise; but she could not stand, and the Governor directed that a seat should be provided for her. "Now," he said to the prosecutor, "put your questions."

"Are you one of the people that are called Christians?"

"I am."

"Are you accustomed to assemble together?"

"We are so accustomed."

"On what days, and at what time?"

"Once in seven days at the least, and at other times also. The hour of our assembling is before daybreak."

"And what do you at these gatherings?"

"We offer up prayers, and sing praises to God."

"To what god?"

"To God Almighty, who made the heavens and the earth, and is the Father of all men."

"Who, then, is this Christus by whose name you are called?"

"He is God."

"Then you worship two gods—the Father, of whom you speak, and Christus?"

"Nay, for Christus is the Son of the Father, and they two are one God. But ask me not to explain these matters, for I am unlearned in them."

"Is there anything else that you do when you have finished these prayers and hymns?"

"These being finished we depart to our own homes. But in the evening of the same day we meet together and have our Feast of Love."

"With what preparations do you make this feast? With what dainties in meat and drink is it furnished?"

"The preparation is of the very simplest; there is nothing, indeed, beyond bread and wine."

"Why do you take such trouble to do that which is easier done in your own homes?"

"Because it has been so commanded us by our Master, that we may remember Him, and may also show forth the love by which we are bound one to another."

"Do you, then, all sit down together at this feast?"

"Yes, we all sit down; nor is there any distinction made of rich and poor, bond and free."

"And do you bind yourselves by any oath?"

"Yes, if you will have it so, for this very feast is as an oath to us."

"And to what does this oath constrain you?"

"That we should neither kill, nor steal, nor commit uncleanness, nor break a promise, nor refuse when called upon to account for moneys committed to our charge." *

"Does this oath concern at all the Emperor and the State?"

"Only so far that we are bound to be loyal and obedient."

"Obedient in all things?"

"In all things that are lawful to us as followers of the Lord Christ."

"I pray you, my lord, to take a note of this reservation," said the prosecutor, addressing this observation to the Governor. He then proceeded with his examination of the prisoner. "Can you tell the names of others who were accustomed to be present at these assemblies?"

The girl hesitated for a moment when this question was put to her. Then she spoke with a firm voice—"Concerning myself I will speak the truth, nor seek to conceal anything; but of others I am not free to speak."

The Elder did not lose a moment in intervening at this point. "Permit me, my lord," he said, addressing the Governor, "to admit for myself and for all that are here present with me that we are of the people called Christians."

The prosecutor proceeded with his examination of Rhoda. "Can you tell us the names of others not here present?"

"Nay," interrupted the Governor; "on behalf of the absent, whom the magistrate is always especially bound to protect, I disallow that question."

The prosecutor then turned to the Elder: "Are you a ruler among this people?"

"Yes, if you will have it so. I am, as it were, the first among the brethren; but if they obey me it is of their own free will."

"Yet they are accustomed to follow your advice?"

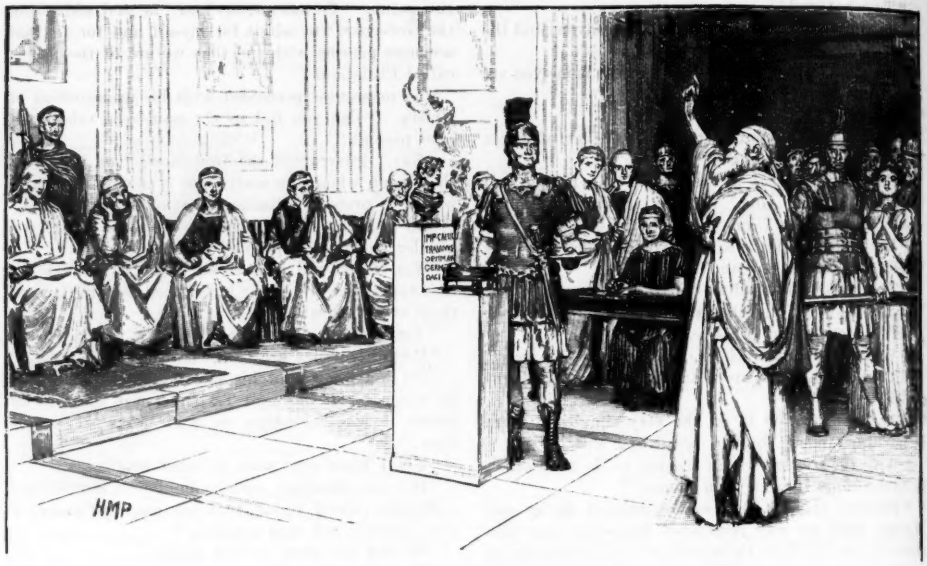
"Certainly; they are so accustomed."

"Do you know that his Excellency the Governor, by command of our lord Trajan, issued an edict by which it was forbidden to hold unlawful assemblies?"

"Yes, I knew that such an edict was issued."

"Did you, therefore, cease to hold your assemblies?—though, indeed, seeing that you are here to-day, I need scarcely ask this question."

"We did not cease to hold them."



"Was the matter debated among you?"

This was a difficult question to answer. The matter had been debated, and that with considerable energy, in the Christian community. Some, of a more timorous spirit, had advised that the assemblies should cease; but Anicetus had been firm for their continuance. It would be a risk to hold them, for it might bring the Church into conflict with the law; but the spiritual danger, the danger of growing coldness, of want of faith, of laxity of practice, that would follow on their discontinuance, was, in his view, much more serious. Prudent Christian as he was, and anxious to avoid a conflict of which he could not see the end, his voice had been given without hesitation for disregarding the edict, or, at least, treating it as if it did not apply. A division had followed. Some members of the community had preferred to follow the safer course. The majority had held with Anicetus, and the assemblies had gone on without interruption. Nothing, of course, remained for him now but to speak the truth.

"It was debated. We differed in opinion. I held that the edict did not apply to us, and advised my brethren accordingly. Some thought differently, and came no more to our meetings."

This frank reply gave a very serious appearance to the whole affair. It could hardly be otherwise regarded than as an avowal of guilt, or at least of what was guilt in the eye of the Roman law. The Governor, who had begun the inquiry with a feeling of tolerance, and had become more and more favourably disposed to the accused as it proceeded, was adversely impressed by it. He seemed to see himself face to face with that invincible obstinacy of which he had been warned. Still, he would gladly have sheltered the accused if he could. His own private opinion was that the Emperor's opposition to what were called secret societies was over-strained and

* This was a very common form of fraud in ancient times. The scarcity of opportunities of investment, and the insecurity of property, made people glad to deposit sums of money in what seemed safe hands. It was deposited, not lent. It seems often to have happened that the person so trusted denied on oath the receipt of the money.

"'I refuse to burn incense.'"—p. 249.

excessive. No trace of loose behaviour or mischievous aims could be found in these people. He was unwilling to condemn, and yet, in view of their own admission, he could not acquit them. The only thing that remained was to postpone the trial. If a time for consideration were given, perhaps some compromise might become possible. This accordingly was the course on which he determined.

"I postpone this inquiry," he announced, "till the ides of May [the 15th]. The prisoners will be released on giving bail. The woman Rhoda will be delivered to her master Bion, who will give sufficient surety for producing her when she shall be required."

The court was then adjourned.

CHAPTER X.—THE EXAMINATION.

THE Governor's advisers did their best to deepen the adverse impression made upon his mind by the frank admission of the Elder. The philosophical Tacitus was especially urgent in his advice that this "execrable superstition," as he called it, should be rooted out. With others of the more thoughtful Roman statesmen, he saw quite plainly that this new faith was really the enemy of the old system of the Empire, and would destroy it if it were not itself destroyed. It was generally the best Emperors who were the persecutors of the Church. A weak tyrant might happen to indulge in some outbreak of caprice or cruelty; but the steady, systematic hostility—the hostility that was really dangerous—came from vigorous rulers: from such men as Aurelius, and Decius, and Diocletian. Tacitus accordingly was, even vehemently, on the side of severity; and Pliny, who always leaned on the stronger character of his friend, resolved to follow his advice.

Something like a reign of terror followed in Nicæa and the neighbourhood. A regular inquisition was made of all who were known or suspected to be Christians. The informers (who, as we know, had already been at work) became more busy than ever. Long lists of accused persons were drawn up, and, as usual at such times, private spite and malice found their opportunity. A jealous lover put down the name of a rival on the list, and a debtor thought it a good way of ridding himself of a troublesome creditor. As lists were received even without being signed, or with signatures about which no inquiry was made, scarcely anyone could consider himself safe.

It was a formidable array of prisoners that was gathered on the day of the adjourned trial in the public hall of Nicæa, no room in the Governor's palace being sufficiently large to receive them. On this occasion all spectators were excluded, and the approaches to the hall were strongly guarded with troops. Within, the arrangements for the trial were much the same as before, except that an officer of the local military force sat below the bench occupied by the Governor and his assessors, in charge of a bust of the Emperor; and that a small movable altar had been arranged in front, with a brazier full of lighted coals upon it.

Anicetus and his companions, who had been arraigned on the occasion already described, were first called to answer to their names. Their cases would, it was thought, take but little time, for they had already confessed to the fact of being Christians. The only question was, Would they adhere to that confession or retract it?

We sometimes think that all the Christians of those early times, when the profession of the faith was never a mere matter of inheritance or fashion, were true to their Master in the face of all dangers, and under the pressure of the worst tortures. But this is a delusion. Human nature was weak then, as now. Men fell away under temptation, either because they had not a firm enough grasp of the truth which they professed, or because there was some weakness—it may be, some cherished sin—in them that sapped their strength. Sometimes, one can hardly doubt, God, for His own good purposes, suffered even His faithful servants to fall away from Him for a time. St. Paul hints as much when, describing his career as a persecutor in his defence before Festus and Agrippa, he says "he compelled" the objects of his hatred "to blaspheme."* And we know that some of the bitterest and fiercest controversies of the early Church concerned the treatment of the lapsi, as they were called—those who had fallen away from their profession. One would gladly draw a veil over the weakness of these unhappy creatures, but to do so would make the picture of the time less faithful.

The first prisoner called upon for his answer by the Governor was the Elder. He, at all events, did not show the faintest sign of yielding.

The Governor addressed him: "You declared when you were last brought before me that you were a Christian. Do you still abide by that declaration?"

"I do," said the old man in an unfaltering voice.

"Are you willing to burn incense to the likeness of our sovereign lord Trajan?"

"I am not willing."

* It is only right to say that St. Paul's words do not actually prove that they did blaspheme. Professor Lumby's note is that they "seem to indicate that the attempt was repeated often, and needed to be so, for it was not in some cases successful." But Dean Alford says that the word "does not imply that any did blaspheme Christ."

"Not when I impose upon you the duty of thus proving that you are a loyal citizen?"

"Loyal I am, nor can any man prove that I have erred in this respect; but this I refuse."

"You refuse, then, to obey the commands of the Emperor himself? Listen."

The Governor produced a parchment, from which, after kissing it, he read these words: "I enjoin on my lieutenants and governors of provinces throughout the Empire that at their discretion they demand of all who may be accused of the Christian superstition that they burn incense to my likeness, by which act they will show their respect—not indeed to me, who am not better than other men—but to the majesty of the Empire."

He then went on: "In virtue of this authority, I command that you burn incense to the divine Trajan."

"If I must choose between two masters, I cannot doubt to prefer the Master who is in heaven. I refuse to burn incense."

"You are condemned of treason out of your own mouth," said the Governor.

"Nevertheless," returned the old man, resolute, like St. Paul, in asserting all lawful rights, "nevertheless, I appeal unto Cæsar."

"The appeal is allowed," said Pliny, "though I doubt whether it will much avail you."

The next prisoner called upon to answer was the old knight Antistius. The course of questions and answers was nearly the same as that which has been already described. The courage of Antistius faltered as little as that of his teacher and spiritual guide had done. From these two the infection of courage spread to the rest. Not one of the first batch of prisoners proved weak or faithless. They were, indeed, the most zealous, the most devoted, of the community—its chiefs and leaders, and they showed themselves worthy of their place.

But when the miscellaneous multitude that had been collected on the strength of the informations sent in to the Governor came to answer for themselves,

"'You should have sent for me,' he said, 'three days ago'"—p. 252.

all did not meet the test as well. Some had practically ceased to belong to the Church for many years; some had been excluded from it for conduct inconsistent with their profession; others had never belonged to it except in name—some passing fancy had attracted them, but they had shrunk back from the self-denial, the discipline, the strictly temperate rule of life which had been demanded of them. These had no difficulty in performing the acts enjoined upon them by the Governor. They threw the incense on the coals that were burning in the brazier with a careless gesture, repeating indifferently as they did so the formula, "Honour and worship to the divine Trajan and to all the gods who protect the city and Empire of Rome." They were almost as indifferent when they went on to satisfy the second test imposed upon them, and to curse the name of Christ. But these careless or reckless apostates—if they are to be so called—were but few in number. Many were reluctant to perform the idolatrous acts enjoined upon them; many shrank still more from the blasphemy which they were constrained to utter. The young Phrygian slave who has been described as accusing Verus to the Church was one of those whose courage failed them in this hour of trial. His was a weak nature, which curiously exemplified the famous saying in the "Odyssey"—that he who takes from a man his freedom, takes from him also half his manhood. Perhaps a finer temper would have disdained to play the part of the informer, even though this was done neither for revenge nor gain, but simply to serve (as was thought) the cause of the Church. Whatever the cause, he had a grievous fall, which Verus, of course, watched with a malignant pleasure. At first it seemed as if his courage would hold out. When he was called upon to answer, he stood erect and answered with a firm voice, though his face was deadly pale and his limbs could be seen to tremble.

"Are you of the people who call themselves Christians?" asked the Governor.

"I am," said the young man.

"You make that answer deliberately, and after reflection? Take time to consider."

The poor creature seemed to feel that reflection would hardly serve to confirm his resolution, and he answered at once, "I do."

"The accused has confessed his crime. Let him be removed and dealt with after the manner of slaves."

When he heard these words a terrible vision of the punishment which they implied flashed across the young man's vision. He had seen a fellow-slave crucified a few days before. It was the wretched Lycus, the cupbearer whose place he had taken on the memorable occasion of the banquet at which Verus was present. Sosicles, his master, had found that he had been guilty of a long career of thefts, and, enraged because the property stolen was lost beyond recovery, had pitilessly ordered him to the cross. From early dawn till late in the evening—when a feeling of weariness, rather than of compassion, had made Sosicles put an end to his sufferings—he had hung in torture. I would not describe those long hours of agony, even if I could. The young Phrygian had witnessed them. His master had compelled him to be present during the greater part of the day. "Go and see what your accursed folly may bring you to. It was, you tell me, your Master's fate—this Christus whom you are mad enough to worship; and it will be yours unless you take good heed. Judge for yourself how you would like it."

Sosicles spoke out of a certain regard—selfish, indeed, but still genuine—for the young man. He was diligent, sober, honest, and it would, he thought, be a grievous pity to lose him for some hare-brained fancy; and lose him he would to a certainty if this threatened movement against the Christians should come to anything.

It seemed now as if his worldly wisdom was not to fail of its effect. The terror of that thought, the horrors of the scene—every one of which memory seemed to bring up before him in a moment, and that with a hideous fidelity—overpowered him. "Hold, my lord," he cried, "I have reconsidered; I will obey your Excellency's command and offer the incense."

He took the pinch of incense from the plate and threw it on the fire, muttering as he did so the prescribed formula of words.

"You are wise in time," said the Governor; "you may stand down. Take heed that you do not repeat this folly, or it will not go so easily with you."

"May I speak, my lord?" said Verus, who saw with rage and disgust that his promised revenge was slipping out of his grasp.

"Speak on," said Pliny, who loathed the man, but could not refuse his request.

"Your lordship is aware that many who do not refuse to burn incense are unwilling to curse the name of their Master, as they call Him. I submit that the more effectual test should be applied to the accused."

"Let it be so," said the Governor.

One of the clerks of the court read out a formula which the wretched young man was to repeat after him. He began—

"I, having been accused of impiety and of neglect of the ancient gods, and of following after strange superstitions, hereby curse as a malefactor and deceiver——"

He had gone so far, and had now come to the holy name. Then he halted. In an agony of fear and doubt he looked round the court. All eyes were upon him. Stern reproach was in the looks of those who had witnessed their confession and had not failed. No face wore a sterner regard than that of Rhoda. It was pale and wasted; for the shock of the torture, though this had not been carried to any grievous extent, had sorely tried her sensitive frame. But this gave a more terrible fierceness to the fire of righteous indignation which seemed almost literally to blaze from her eyes. As the young Phrygian shrank from this scorching gaze, he met the gentle, pitying, appealing look of Cleoné. The girl was not one of those who are insensible to fear. Rhoda was an enthusiast who, as we sometimes read of martyrs of the more heroic mould, would have found a positive rapture of pleasure in the pain endured for conscience' sake. Cleoné was a delicate, sensitive woman, who had a natural shrinking from pain, but yet could nerve herself to bear it. She could sympathise with the poor young Phrygian's dread. Though she had never seen a sufferer on the cross, her vivid imagination helped her to realise its agony, and she pitied more than she abhorred the weakness which made him shrink from it. That look of pity saved him.

"Ah!" he thought to himself, "that was the way in which the Master looked at Peter when he had denied Him. I have denied Him, too; but Peter found a place of repentance, and so may I."

He turned boldly to the Governor. "No! I will not curse Him who has blessed me so often. I have sinned grievously in burning incense to that idol" —and he pointed as he spoke to the image of the Emperor—"but I will not add to my sin the burden of this intolerable iniquity."

"Ah!" whispered Tacitus to the Governor, "I have always heard that the genuine Christian stops short at this."

"Let the law have its course with the accused," said the Governor.

"Ah! my friend," said Verus to himself in a savage whisper, "you will not go interfering again with a gentleman's amusements."

"A curse on the obstinate villain!" muttered Sosicles, his master; "there go twenty-five minæ as good as lost, except I can get some compensation out of the Government. What business is it of theirs what the man believes? He belongs to me."

The young Phrygian's repentance seemed to give new boldness to all that remained to be examined. There were no more cases of apostasy.

The result of the day's proceedings was the condemnation of a crowd so numerous that the Governor was fairly staggered by the difficulty of having to deal with it. A few who could plead Roman citizenship were reserved for the judgment of the Emperor; but there remained many—both free persons and slaves—with whom it was his own duty to deal. To execute them all would be to order something like a massacre. Such severity might defeat its own object, for it might cause a reaction in favour of the Christians. Pliny's caution, not to speak of his humanity, made him shrink from incurring such a risk. He resolved to consult the Emperor by letter on the course which he ought to pursue. Till the answer should arrive, the condemned were to be shut in prison. The common gaol of Nicæa was not large enough to receive so many inmates, and many of the prisoners had to be sent to private houses, whose owners were to be held responsible for their safe custody. Rhoda and Cleoné were among those who were thus disposed of. The Governor was too humane and right-feeling to allow two young women so carefully nurtured to be exposed to the horrors of a gaol. They were committed to the care of Lucilius, whom the reader will remember to have been one of the conspirators who set on foot the movement against the Christians. The man, though hard and greedy for money, had a fair character for respectability; and his wife, as the Governor happened to know, was an amiable woman—much too good for her miserly husband.

CHAPTER XI.—THE HOUSE OF LUCILIUS.

IT was a house of trouble into which the two sisters were thus brought. The only child of Lucilius was prostrated with a fever which had for some time been epidemic in Nicæa. He was a promising lad of sixteen, whose fine, generous temper curiously contrasted with the mean and ignoble character of his father. For the last year or so, indeed—since he had begun to be aware of what the outside world thought about the man whom as a son he was bound to respect—this contrast had troubled him much; and he had felt acutely the unhappiness of his home. His mother—sweet-tempered and gentle as she was, and carrying wifely obedience to the very verge of what duty enjoined—had a conscience that would not allow her to see wrong done without a protest. She would put up with any privation for herself; but to see her child stinted in what was necessary for his health, or the household slaves starved or half-poisoned with unwholesome food, was a thing that she could not endure in silence. Painful scenes became, in consequence, more and more frequent in the family. Lucilius's miserly habits grew upon him, as such habits will grow; and the gentle protests of his wife were met with furious anger, sometimes even with actual violence. These experiences were nothing less than agony to the son's sensitive temper. He loved his mother with his whole heart; he would fain have loved his father. In the old days, before the ruling passion had so mastered the man's being, his child was the one thing for which he cared; and even now the feeling was not wholly lost. If the miser had a soft spot in his heart—one not quite crusted over with the hardness of avarice—it was in his regard for his only child. Now and then he would show some tenderness for the boy; once or twice, by some tremendous effort of the will, he would even loosen his purse-strings to buy something that would please him. It was curiously characteristic of the man's ruling vice that he found it easier to purchase for him some useless ornament than to relax the niggardly rules of his household expenditure. He would give the lad a costly jewel, and yet allow him to pine for the want of good and sufficient food. Possibly this kind of gift gratified his vanity; it may be—for there are no depths of meanness to which avarice will not descend—he could not help remembering that the good food was a perishable commodity, while the jewel represented a permanent value, and, in fact, was only property in another shape.

It can easily be imagined that these causes told, directly and indirectly, upon a constitution that had never been very strong, and that the fever found in the younger Lucilius a victim dangerously ready to succumb to its attack. The early symptoms of the disease had not passed unnoticed by the mother, and she had implored her husband to call in at once the assistance of a physician. Of course he refused. He had trained himself not to believe in the existence of anything that necessitated the expenditure of money, and he wilfully shut his eyes to indications which were manifest enough to everyone else. In two or three days' time this self-deception ceased to be possible. The father had refused to notice—though not, we may believe, without some stifled misgivings—the flushed cheeks, the frequent cough, and the failing appetite; but when the lad could not rise from his bed, and when the ravings of delirium were heard outside the door of the boy's chamber, he could not ignore any longer the presence of disease. Then the physician was sent for in hot haste.

Dioscorides was a Greek who claimed to belong to what may be called the physician caste of the ancient world, the Asclepiads, who traced their descent to Æsculapius, the god of healing, himself. For nearly fifty years he had had the principal practice of Nicæa; his experience was vast, his skill and readiness of resource never failed him. It was these—rather than any traditionary secrets of methods and remedies, such as popular report credited him with—that made him extraordinarily successful. He was an old man, whose face seemed to show at once much firmness and much benevolence. To his patients he was kindness and gentleness itself. He neglected nothing that could please, or even humour them. A modern practitioner of the healing art would perhaps smile at the extraordinary care with which he would prepare himself for a visit to a patient. His long white hair was always carefully combed and delicately perfumed; his robes were beautifully clean. "We must please," he would say, "a sick man's senses as much as we can. Nothing ought to be neglected that can minister to that end."

But while he was gentle, he was firm when firmness was needed. Pretences of every kind met with no sort of mercy from him. If a fine lady, whose only real malady was indolence, sent for him, she was sure to hear the truth without any attempt at disguise. He was no fashionable physician, making a profit out of the whims and fancies of idleness and luxury. "You work too little; you eat and drink too much," was the homely formula with which he described the ailments of these imaginary invalids. If they dismissed him, as they were apt to do in the first annoyance of hearing an unwelcome truth, he accepted the dismissal with a smile. His practice was too large and lucrative to make him care for the loss of this or that patient; and he knew perfectly well that, when any serious cause occurred, he would be sent for again.

Lucilius, whose character and habits were perfectly well known to him, was, of course, not going to escape without hearing some truth from his lips.

"'You,' she cried, 'you offer sacrifice!'"—p. 253.

"You should have sent for me," he said, "three days ago."

"I did not think that there was any need," said the father in a faltering voice. His conscience had begun to prick him; and he knew, too, that all disguises would be useless with the clear-sighted, plain-speaking Dioscorides.

"Nonsense, man!" answered the physician sharply. "You can see, you can hear! You must have heard the lad cough; you must have seen him wasting before your eyes! Don't tell me you didn't think there was any need. The truth is that you shut your eyes and ears because you were afraid of the fees. Now I am very much afraid that it is too late!"

"Oh! sir, don't say so," cried the wretched man, whose heart, hardened as it was with the most deadening of all vices, was touched by the danger of his son —"don't say so. I will spare nothing; save him, and you shall name your own fee."

"Not all the gold in the world," returned the physician, "can purchase the three days that have been lost; but I will do all I can for the lad and his mother. Only the gods in heaven know," he added in a half-audible aside, "how such a woman came to marry such a mean hound—only there is no knowing the follies of women—and how such a father came to have such a son." He went on, turning to Lucilius, "The only chance for the boy now is the best of nursing. His mother is not strong enough; besides, she is too anxious. As a rule I don't believe in mothers' nursing; they are apt to lose their heads. And hired nursing is seldom much good either," went on the old man, talking to himself; "just what's in the letter of the bond, and no more;* must have their so many hours' rest, and so forth; all for themselves and nothing for the patient. Of course there are exceptions, but I can't think of anyone who is available just at this moment. Now, if you could get one of those two young women, Rhoda or Cleoné, or both of them—for it will be more than one can well manage—it would be perfect; they would do the thing for love, and yet not be too anxious. But then they have been mixed up in this foolish business of the Christians, and there is no getting at them, I suppose."

"By good fortune, sir," Lucilius interrupted at this moment, "the two young women are to be put in my keeping, pending the arrival of the Emperor's letter."

"Thank the gods for your good fortune," cried the old physician in his delight; "if anything can save the lad, it will be their nursing. I have had some opportunities for observing it, and it is simply perfect. When do they come?"

"I had notice that they would be delivered into my hands at noon," answered Lucilius.

"That will give me time," said the physician, "to visit two or three other patients. I will return and give them my instructions; and, mind, in case I should not see you again, they must have everything they ask for."

This, then, was the state of things which the two prisoners found on their arrival at the house of Lucilius. They threw themselves into the duty which they found so strangely ready to their hand with wonderful energy, though Rhoda was more fit to be nursed than to nurse. With a touching humility and sacrifice of personal feeling, the mother gave up her charge into their hands. To be allowed to help, to do something for the darling of her heart, was all that she asked. Even this consolation she was ready to give up if she thought that the service it was such a delight to render was better given by another.

But when all their efforts seemed unavailing, when the lad grew weaker every day, and the delirium left fewer and fewer lucid intervals, the behaviour of the mother underwent a curious change—all the more curious when it was contrasted with the altered demeanour of her husband. Something had found its way at last to the cold heart of the miser; disappointed ambition had something to do with it. He had wanted to give his family such rank as could be acquired by wealth, and wealth had about as much power in Bithynia in the days of Trajan as it has in London in the days of Victoria. But what if the son for whom he was saving—and he constantly salved his conscience for mean or unprincipled acts by repeating to himself that all his savings were for his son—what if this son should die? Curiously mixed up with this meaner motive was a genuine love for his child. For the time, at least, the man's hard nature was broken through. His purse was opened now without reluctance to purchase anything that the sick lad could need. He would wait with humble patience outside the door of the sick-chamber for the latest news. The sisters naturally thought that this manifest softening of the heart would have brought him nearer to his wife; but they were astonished to see that the woman, for all the gentleness of her nature, shrank more and more from him, and seemed to feel no comfort in his sympathy, and not to be touched by his manifest grief. Rhoda was the unwilling witness of a painful scene in which this growing alienation seemed to culminate. Made desperate by the increasing peril which threatened his son's life—and, indeed, Dioscorides himself, the most hopeful as he was the most skilful of his profession, had begun to give up hope—the wretched man turned, by way of a last resource, to the help of heavenly powers. He tried to persuade himself that it might not be altogether unavailing; he could anyhow believe that it would do no harm to appeal to it. This idea he communicated to his wife in the presence of the elder of the two sisters. The physician was paying one of his visits, and Cleoné was in the room to hear his instructions as to what was to be done till he should come again. Lucilius and his wife, with Rhoda, were in an adjoining chamber.

"Shall we offer a sacrifice for our poor boy?" he asked.

Then the gentle woman's wrath fairly blazed out. Rhoda watched the explosion with such astonishment as one might feel were a lamb to show the ferocity of a tiger.

"You," she cried, "you offer sacrifice! Will the righteous gods listen to you? Will you even dare to touch their altars with your murderous hands? This is their judgment upon you. I knew that it would come sooner or later. I had hoped that it would not be till I had got my release from the horrible bond that ties me to you. But the gods do not suffer me to escape, for I, too, am guilty. And now the stroke has fallen on you and on me!"

A terrible fascination seemed to keep the girl's eyes fixed on the face of Lucilius as the woman, who seemed positively transfigured by her rage, poured out this stream of reproaches on him. At first it expressed keen astonishment, then a dreadful look of fear seemed to creep over it. Once and again he opened his lips, as if he would have spoken, but no sound came forth from them.

"Be silent—be silent," at last he managed to utter, and so turned and staggered out of the room.

(To be continued.)

* To avoid misconception, I must remind my readers that the old physician is speaking of paid nurses as they were in Bithynia some seventeen centuries ago, but not as we may hope they are in England after all that has been done by Miss Nightingale and others to raise the profession of nursing.

THIRSTING FOR GOD.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

"My soul is athirst for God."—PSALM xlii. 2.

THERE are many curious questions floating about the world, which no doubt from time to time have highly interested you. And there will be other such which will interest you also; but there is one very curious question, which I dare say you never troubled yourselves about at all, although it is of the highest interest to you, and that practical interest too. That question is, "What is my real self?"

Now that is a question which you will never be able fully to answer. Some trashy philosopher may content himself by telling you that you are a scrap of protoplasm—perhaps a millionth part as much as would rest on the point of a needle. But we may leave him and his protoplasm for the present, and say at once that what is the secret of your real self is known to God alone—and moreover that with Him that secret will rest for ever.

And yet it is of the highest possible practical use that you should think into this subject of your real self, and get to know as much of it as you can—at any rate, that you should believe and realise that you have a real "self." It is not the mouth with which you eat, or the hands with which you touch, or the ears with which you hear—perhaps you come a little nearer to it when you say, "Is it the brain with which I think?" or yet nearer, if you ask, is it that with which I love and hate—for the want of a better word, what we call "the heart"—and yet we are not at it even now. What we want to get at is what the Romans called the "ego"—the "I"—who am I?—what is my very "self"?

Now, I cannot tell you what is your very "self." I do not know what is my very self. But I want you to believe and to feel, as I feel, that you have a very "self," which stands alone—distinct from all other "selves." It is your very entity—your being—what may make use of your eyes and hands and ears, but what is distinct from them, and would exist even if you had not these at all. I talk of you as "he" or "she," i.e., as I know you in the outer world, but you must realise yourself—each one of you for himself or herself—as an "I" in a way that no one else can know you—none but God.

Do not suppose that I am going to try and dabble in philosophy or speculation, and that therefore this sermon has nothing to say to you. It is with the earnest hope of doing you and myself too some practical good—good in high and subtle spiritual regions, no doubt, but in practical, homely, work-a-day regions too, that I bring this subject before you at all.

1. What is it that we want to get at?
2. Why do we want to get at it?
3. What will come of our getting at it?
4. What are we to do when we get at it?

(1.) What we want to get at, or to get at as nearly as we can, is the knowledge of what our real self is; or, to pitch it lower, the feeling that we have a real self. I want to sit alone with no one near me—to shut my eyes—to retreat inward from all earthly relationship and interest—from sight, and touch, and sound—inward from everything that has to do with sense at all, and realise that I have a "being," a God-given being, which may indeed do this and that, become this or that; but which, for my present purpose, I look at only as a "being"—I, irrespective of everything and everyone else that God has made, am a Being. The more lone and solitary you can feel, the better.

Perhaps you smile, and say, "You know it well enough," yet try and do intently what I am telling you, and you shall find how little you know about it; you will find yourself, if you are doing it honestly, for the first time in a region, an atmosphere quite different from any you have breathed when you connected yourself with any person or anything of earth; you have come as near, perhaps, to the conception of "spirit," of the origin of life, as you can; you have made the nearest approach that was possible to pure spirit intercourse with God, i.e., intercourse without the help of the Holy Ghost.

But if you will try honestly, intently, and seek the help of the Holy Spirit, you will find that gradually you will be able to attain more and more to the knowledge of the awful mystery, that, even stripped of all relationship to human life, you exist—a being, and a being in relationship with God.

I only want you to realise, "I have a very self"; I don't want you to try and understand, only to realise; and that realisation, simple as it seems, if you can feel it in its awfulness, will change the whole tenor of your life if you be not God's; and if you be God's, will bring you closer to Him than ever you were before. Unless, indeed—which is too horrible to suppose—you attained to this intense realisation of your being, and then deliberately apostatised with it from God, and handed it over into communion with and obedience to the devil.

Now, then—

(2.) Why is it that I want to get at this intense consciousness that I have a "being" far back, behind all earthly relationships and things, a very "self," a something which asserts itself dimly, and sometimes perhaps even more than dimly, whether I pursue an inquiry about it or no; a "something" which, though I know it not, if I think over the matter, is that which was unsatisfied, and had cravings and longings, even after all earthly desires had been fulfilled.

I want you to feel that you have an inmost self, that you may give it to God—distinctly, specifically give it to God. How can you give it to Him, unless you have realised its existence, and know that you have it to give?

I feel that I have that behind all earthly relationships and interests which exists, which is "myself," and I want that to be God's. I feel that I have that which must hunger and thirst and crave; for, after I have had all of earth, I do hunger and thirst and crave. And I want to know what is that hungering and thirsting and craving, and why and how all this can be met? Ah! it is my innermost, far-back, real self, and I want it to be God's. I want Thee, O God, to have whatever is my real self, and I want to believe in a real self in order that Thou mayest have it.

We feel sadly how we are continually slipping into the perfunctory, the unreal, the mere routine, the name—how we are having to do with "the things of God," and not with "God himself." We are continually dropping down into being creatures of religious habits; our selves are not in our acts. I want to live in the realisation of having a real living "self," living far back behind these things of God, using these things as expressive acts, as outcomes of its life, but living its very "self" before God and with God.

Such of us as allow ourselves to think, realise the craving of a life within us: it is ourself—our "self" pure and simple, as considered without reference to sin, or anything else, craving a union with life; our spirit, our very "self," making itself heard and craving union with the Divine Spirit.

And we feel that nothing, nothing here, will satisfy the real "I," but God himself; all outer things, all outer persons are in this view mere excrescences; the man who realises that he has this "being," this self, is insatiable; he wants God, he is hungry and thirsty for God, he cannot do without God. He must bring this "self" up close to God. He says sometimes, almost in an agony of mind, "O God, I cannot get at it. What is it? What am I? What is it that makes 'myself'? Whatever it is, oh take it, take it! Dost Thou call it 'my soul,' then 'my soul' is athirst for God, for the living God. Dost Thou call it 'my heart,' then I want to love Thee according to Thy first great commandment, with 'all my heart, and with all my strength.'"

(3.) Next. What will come of my getting at this conception and consciousness of a very "self," so far as this can be done? I answer, the whole power of practical spiritual life will flow out of it. This attainment which you are perhaps inclined to think so transcendental, so visionary, will make you a good father and friend, and touch you for good in every relationship of life; your inner self will come out for being close with God, and will work through your affections and thoughts, and your mouth and eyes and ears and your mental and moral and physical being. Your inner God-pervaded "self" will shine through the lantern of your mind and body as a light does through a glass. For you shall have power externally for power internal. Close self-life with God will never tolerate close self-life with sin. A man will hate and flee the baseness, the lie, the lust that he has realised clinging to his very self; and he cannot bear the idea of bringing it into his close self union with his God.

Another benefit that you will get is the power to rightly place all human love, all human things. Much of the bitterness of life's disappointments and bereavements proceeds from the ill placing of right things. Money is ill placed in our estimation—the enthusiasm of earthly love—the objects of life. We have that which cannot be fed on this food; it is this real "self" which sooner or later will assert itself, and which God alone (by His own everlasting construction of all things) can feed, quenching its thirst, and giving it rest.

Yes! this will come of this true realisation of our real "self:" we shall live an inner life with God, we shall be able to gather ourselves in from the world, we shall be able to let ourselves out to God, we shall get up into an atmosphere above our difficulties which may indeed remain still the same; but, pain-stricken, bankrupt, disappointed, bereaved, with a threadbare coat and an unbuttered crust myself, I, my real self, may be with God. I have found out that I have a "self" which these things cannot touch, and it is with God.

How sure will you be of your reality, if you can work up into the idea of your naked self pure and simple, and know that it lives with God! Your very agonies of effort to get at this, and to keep it, and not to allow these things which would accrete to it, and stick to it, to do so, will be your witness that you know Him that is a Spirit, and are worshipping Him and are His in spirit and in truth.

And there will be nothing between you and God in death. That is the time when, if men are conscious, they waken up to the realisation of the possession of a "self" with which "things" and "people" have nothing to do, and yet they find those things and people between themselves and God, i.e., between their very, very self and God.

Now, now is the time to gather your whole being in to Him; to sow the seed which will be a harvest of calm communion in the last sickness, in the dying hour.

Moreover, see the comfort from the witness that you are and must be true; it comes from the consciousness that you can go no farther back than you are doing; you are holding nothing back from God; the very root of your "being"—your very "self"—you are giving to Him

You can say, when all of the body and outer life falls off, "God will have—for He has had—my real 'self.'"

You can always dwell with the consciousness of your own imperishableness, and there will be stability and comfort for you amid all the changes and chances and discomforts and perishings of this mortal life.

It will be "yourself" and God's self, irrespective of all circumstances and things.

We sometimes long for elevation, something to lift us up. Here it is, in the absolute certainty that our very self is God's; and who, if we might so speak, is so "deserving" of our innermost being as He who gave the very innermost of Himself, the Son who lay in the bosom of the Father, and who only could declare Him—gave Him up freely for us all?

And I will tell you two other benefits which you will have. You will have an ever-present and ready retreating-place of life and thought. Where can your very inner self retreat to here? How can you find rest when you do not know what it is that is seeking rest, and where only the one suited to it can be found? Myself—my God—myself made one with Christ; and therefore only acceptable to God, and able to abide with God—there with God my real self can live and think.

And all around will assume their true position. What are "things" to my real self, whether in name or in fact? What have they to do with what is practically this unclothed spirit and its spirit life? These have to do with me in my lower relationships on earth; but what I am wanting to do is to show you that there is a life higher than earth's; that you have an innermost which earth cannot touch, and with which I want you to live to God.

(4.) Now, lastly, what are we to do?

These are the things which you ought to do.

You are not to be content with any merely outward religion whatever. It may be faultless in its regularity and beauty, but you yourself may not tarry in it.

You must have seasons of thought, cultivating the sense of your intense individuality, and its relationship to God. Do not be afraid; this is one of the many things which you may do through Christ which strengtheneth you—you may "appear before God."

Bring your individuality, your very "self," close up to God's. He is your Father. Christ says He is the Way; as no one cometh unto the Father but by Him, so by Him may they freely come. To think of doing this would be a fearful thought if there were no Christ; but now it is not only possible, but necessary—close up to the Father should be the very self of the child.

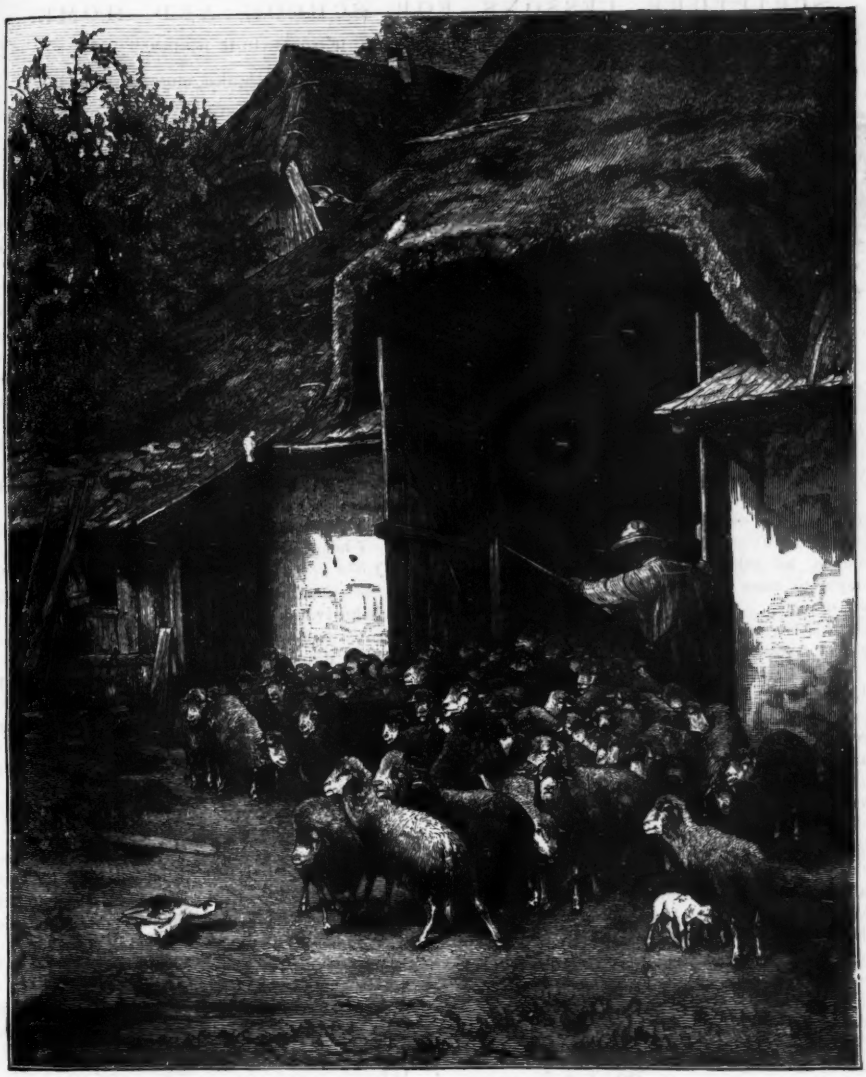
Seek the pervading of the inner self by the Holy Ghost: if He come to you, you will be able to do all. Don't say for a moment, "Such knowledge is too high for me; I cannot attain unto it." You can, if you will; and if you have never known your real "selves" up to to-day, and attain to this knowledge now, you will be different men from what you have ever been before.

There will be nothing between you and God to hinder His action on you; it will be the action of Being upon "pure being," without the intervention, and perhaps obstruction, of faculties at all, which may be in themselves but miserably dull; it will be the nearest approach to union with God which can be made on earth.

I have put you to-day in the way of realising your selfdom; and in doing so, of attaining the nearest possible communion with God; ay, and of attaining the greatest possible holiness in yourselves and usefulness to your fellow-men: for he who comes in the very "self" close to God will catch the very image of God, and try to be like God; and as God is good and doeth good, so will he be good and do good too.

The "self" that comes out from the presence of God will be like God's own self—a self for others: and to this "self" selfishness will gradually become unknown.

AWAY TO THE HILLS.



A SONG OF THE SHEPHERD AND THE SHEEP.

IN the west the stars are dying, and the dusky night is flying
Fast before the coruscating arrows of the archer, Dawn:
On the sward the dew lies pearly, and his flock doth Colin early,
Flinging wide the ponderous barn-doors, summon to the upland lawn.

2.

Huddling on the threshold thickly, frisking, leaping, bleating quickly,
Rams and ewes and tender lambkins, forth into the light they fare:
From the roof the pigeon greets them, but the surly gander meets them,
Grudging them the thymy pastures, wishful with a hiss to scare.

"Flinging wide the ponderous barn-doors."—p. 256.

3.

Skyward far the lav'rock soaring sweetest orisons is pouring
For the blissful benediction of the calm and cloudless day:
Haste, then, shepherd, stay no longer, rest has made your weanlings stronger,
Morning breaks, the sun arises! To the hills away! away!

4.

So, methinks, when Time is ended, fade its dreary shadows, blended
In the new and living splendours of our Father's Home in light;
Christ our Shepherd, kind, protecting, shall bring forth His flock, directing
To the rich and pleasant pastures of the everlasting Height.

JOHN H. DAVIES, M.A.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.—FEBRUARY 10 TO MARCH 10, 1889.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 10.—SATAN CONQUERED.

To read—St. Mark v. 1—20. Golden Text—Verse 19.

THE POWER OF SATAN. (1—10.) Pass over now to east side of Lake of Galilee. Christ just shown His power over nature. Had been great storm in night—stilled by Christ's power. (iv. 41.) He and disciples come into country of Gadarenes—place abounding in rocks—met by a man with unclean spirit. Notice—

(a) His body—diseased, naked (St. Luke viii. 27)—fierce.

(b) His mind—afflicted with evil spirits.

(c) His soul—knew Christ; called Him by name. Worshipped Christ—believing in His power (James ii. 19)—prayed to Christ not to torment him—conscious of his own sin.

(d) His condition—homeless, dwelling in tombs—friendless, all others afraid of him—helpless, all attempts to tame him had failed—miserable, true object of pity.

All this the result of Satan's influence—in some way had "possessed" the man—need not ask how, the fact bad enough.

II. THE POWER OF CHRIST. (11—20.) Had Himself met the devil in the wilderness, been tempted, had overcome. Therefore able to feel for others under Satan's power. (Heb. ii. 18.) What did He do?

(a) Spake with authority—"Come out of the man."

(b) Acted with power—the devils came out.

(c) Diverted the devils into the herd of swine.

Notice the effects of this on two sets of people.

(a) The Gadarenes. Afraid of Christ, conscious of sin and His power of punishing, asked Him to depart.

(b) The man healed. At once cured in body, is clothed, respectable; cured in mind, is calm, quiet, natural. Cured in soul, is eager to follow Christ but is not allowed to do so. What is he to do?

Go home to his friends—show his changed life.

Tell of Christ—bring others to Him.

III. LESSONS. This miracle a parable of man's state and his cure.

(a) Possessed by the devil. Under the bondage of sin—e.g., temper, lust, drink, sloth, bad habits. Gets into sad condition.

Body—sickly, weak, diseased.

Mind—debased, cares not for higher things. (Phil. iii. 19.)

Soul—depraved—at enmity with God. (Rom. viii. 7.)

Is miserable, helpless. cannot cure himself. (Hos. xiii. 9.)

(b) Cured by Christ. Must come to Christ as this man did. (St. Matt. xi. 28.)

Must pray to Christ—cast himself on His mercy.

When pardoned, healed, must work for Christ—tell others of Him.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 17.—THE TIMID WOMAN'S TOUCH.

To read—St. Mark v. 25—34. Golden Text—Verse 36.

I. THE WOMAN'S NEED. (25—28.) Once more Christ crosses the lake of Galilee—Gadarenes had asked Him to depart—He had done so, and returns to Capernaum, where was always welcome. There He found work waiting for Him—Jairus, ruler of the synagogue, in trouble because his little girl ill. Jesus starts for his house. Great crowd follow—people throng round Christ—sometimes so near as to touch Him. He does not mind that, but presently He feels a touch He does notice. Whose was it? A woman—her name unknown, but we can see—

(a) She was sick—been so for twelve long years—chronic sufferer.

(b) She was rich—been able to try one doctor after another.

(c) She was getting worse—her case becoming hopeless. What could she do?

(d) She heard of Christ—perhaps from the nobleman at Capernaum whose son had been healed. (St. John iv. 53.)

(e) She came to Christ. Her state made her so eager she did not mind the crowd.

(f) She tried Christ—touched the "fringe" of His garment (Num. xv. 37), and was made whole.

II. THE POWER OF CHRIST. (29—34.) Notice how she was healed.

(a) Immediately. The moment she touched she was made whole.

(b) Completely. No traces of her sickness left.

Now notice what Christ felt, did, and said.

(a) He knew her. Knew of her sickness, modesty, retirement. Yet asked who touched Him. Why?

(b) He tested her. She must not be a secret disciple—she must come and confess Him openly before men. So she did. What followed?

(c) He blessed her. Her body is healed.

Her soul receives blessing of peace.

III. LESSONS. 1. Faith. See on one side the woman's sickness—on the other Christ's almighty power. What were the connecting links?

(a) The woman's faith; brought her to Christ.

(b) The woman's touch, the result of faith.

Therefore she was blessed and made whole.

Such faith must be ours too. Is there anyone not diseased with sin? For ten, twelve, fourteen, twenty years "whole head sick." (Isa. i. 5.) May have heard of Christ; but no use unless go to Him—tell Him the tale—touch Him by faith, lay hold of something outside ourselves, accept His promises of pardon. "Your sins will I remember no more."

2. Confession. She wanted to keep hid, but not allowed. So also Nicodemus came by night. (St. John iii. 2.) But Christ expects all to confess Him before men—to take up cross boldly and follow Him.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 24.—THE GREAT TEACHER AND HIS TWELVE DISCIPLES.

To read—St. Mark vi. 1—13. Golden Text—ver. 12.

I. THE GREAT TEACHER. (1—6.) Jesus revisits His old home. There had spent first thirty years of His life. (St. Luke ii. 51.) But there had been rejected on His first visit after His baptism. (St. Luke iv. 29.) Now goes again; probably stays at old home with His mother and brethren. On week-days would revisit old friends—on Sabbath Day goes to the village synagogue. What did He do there?

(a) Worshipped God with prayers and psalms.

(b) Read the lessons when asked by the ruler.

(c) Taught and explained the Scriptures. (See Acts xiii. 15.)

What effect did this have on the congregation?—

Joy to His mother, who had kept remembrance of the angel's message.

Astonishment to those who only knew Him as a carpenter.

Offence to those who despised His lowly origin.

And so they rejected His message!

How did Christ take their rejection? With calm dignity; quotes familiar proverb—turns away to other villages—heals few sick, but does no mighty work because of their unbelief. Christ the Lord with them, but they regarded Him not.

LESSONS. We too hear Christ's words each Sabbath Day. How do we receive them? as the words of man, or the voice of God? "Take heed how ye hear."

II. THE TWELVE DISCIPLES. (7—13.) Called by Christ Himself to begin their work—chosen out from all the disciples (learners) (Acts i. 21)—to be Apostles (missionaries), sent out for special work among villages of Galilee. Sent out in pairs, for mutual comfort, counsel, and help. Notice their work—

(a) To preach Gospel or good news of Christ's Kingdom. He, the King, had come: men must repent of sin if would have Christ's pardon.

(b) To work miracles as proof of their mission; even the evil spirits would be subject to them.

(c) To be simple. To take no food—Eastern hospitality never failing. To take smallest amount of clothing wanted for their absolute needs. To stay in one place in each village—not gossiping from house to house or seeking more comfortable quarters.

(d) To take a high tone. Were God's messengers; if people rejected them would be rejecting God.

Sodom and Gomorrha had no warning to repent.

These cities now have warning.

Therefore, if not repentant, their punishment worse.

Started in this order. (See St. Matt. x. 1—4.)

Peter (impetuous) and Andrew (meditative).

James and John (brothers in nature and grace).

Philip and Bartholomew (of the same village).

Thomas (doubter) and Matthew (strong in faith).

James and Thaddæus (kinsmen of Christ).

Simon and Judas (the traitor).

What a blessed work to preach Christ's Gospel!

But one, though a preacher, became a castaway.

LESSON. "Be not high-minded, but fear."

MARCH 3.—JESUS THE MESSIAH.

To read St. Mark viii. 27—ix. 1. Golden Text—ver. 34.

I. ST. PETER'S CONFESSION. (27—33.) Christ now with disciples left the villages on Sea of Galilee—turned north through coast and villages of Cæsarea Philippi. (See map of Palestine.) Beautiful country, watered by springs of River Jordan, Mount Hermon in the distance. As they went He seized the opportunity for quiet intercourse with disciples. They had been with Him two years—had left Him for a time to do missionary work by themselves—had had opportunities of hearing what people thought of Him and His work. So He asks what is general opinion of Him. What is the answer?

Some (e.g., Herod) thought He was John the Baptist risen from the dead. (St. Matt. xiv. 2.)

Some thought Him Elijah come back from heaven. (2 Kings ii. 11.)

Some thought Him "one of the prophets."

None realised that He was the promised Messiah. Why not?

(a) They expected a great prince—not a simple peasant.

(b) They expected one who should deliver them from the Romans.

So Christ tested the faith of His disciples. Whom do they think Him?

St. Peter acts as spokesman. He is the Christ—the Anointed One of God.

(a) When was Christ anointed? At His baptism. (St. Matt. iii. 17.)

(b) With what was He anointed? The Holy Ghost and power. (Acts x. 38.)

(c) Why? As Prophet, Priest, and King.

But this is not to be made public at present. He must first suffer.

Men will reject—persecute—kill Him.

But after three days He will rise again.

How did St. Peter take this news?

(a) He refused to believe it.

(b) He tried to persuade Christ it would not be. (St. Matt. xvi. 22.)

Christ sternly rebuked him. Uses same words to him as to Satan at the temptation. (St. Matt. iv. 10.)

How was St. Peter wrong?

(a) Misunderstanding nature of Christ's mission.

(b) Tempting Christ to turn aside from His duty.

So Christ spoke to the disciples and all the people very plainly—as follows—

II. CHRIST'S REQUIREMENTS. (viii. 34—ix. i.) Of what does the Christian life consist?

(a) Self-denial — giving up things lawful and pleasant for Christ's sake; e.g., Disciples left their homes and all. (St. Matt. iv. 20.)

(b) Cross-bearing—doing unpleasant things cheerfully and patiently; e.g., St. Paul beaten, stoned, etc. (2 Cor. xi. 25.)

Three inducements offered by Christ.

1. Loss of earthly life for His sake ensures eternal life; e.g., St. Stephen the first Martyr. (Acts vii. 55.)

2. This world nothing in comparison with value of the soul; e.g., Judas got his money, went to perdition.

3. Open confession of Christ now ensures His acknowledgment hereafter. Some of them would soon see a foretaste of Christ's glory.

LESSON. Christ's requirements still the same. No cross—no crown. Can we bear them?

MARCH 10.—THE CHILD-LIKE SPIRIT.

To read—St. Mark ix. 33—45. Golden Text—St. Mark x. 15.

I. HUMILITY. (33—37.) Disciples been hearing about Christ's Kingdom; three of them seen partial glory in Transfiguration. (ix. 2.) So begin discussing who shall be greatest in this new Kingdom.

What makes people great in this world?

(a) Birth—heir to kingdom or great estate.

(b) Wealth—giving command over others.

(c) Intellect—able to gain people's admiration, etc.

But in Christ's Kingdom just the opposite. True greatness not in commanding, but serving—being willing to take lowest place. Example—a little child. (Perhaps one of St. Peter's, being at his house.) What are the qualities of a child?

(a) Obedience. Child obeys naturally — easily trained to do as he is told.

(b) Meekness. Child esteems elders better than himself.

(c) Sympathy. Child easily moved by others' pleasure or pain.

Therefore children are to be—

Copied in their humility.

Received as having nature of Christ.

II. FORBEARANCE. (38—41.) See what belonging to Christ can do.

(a) Enable this man to work miracles.

(b) Teach kindly acts of mercy. (ver. 41.)

(c) Obtain Christ's approval and reward.

Many ways of doing Christ's service. Same spirit of love to Him animates all. Therefore must bear with all who are Christ's, though they follow not with us.

III. OFFENCES. (42—45.) To offend is to cause anyone to stumble, i.e., sin. How is this done?

(a) Bad example; e.g., Israelites copying idolatrous heathen. (Judges ii. 12.)

(b) Desire to please; e.g., Solomon building temples for his wives' gods. (1 Kings xi. 4.)

(c) Influence. Jezebel corrupting Ahab and his people. (1 Kings xvi. 31.)

If want to avoid making others, to sin must cut it off in ourselves.

Hand—ministers to sin when used in anger; e.g., Cain killing Abel. (Gen. iv. 8.)

Foot—when leads into unholy places.

Better to cut off occasion of sin than to sin.

Bad enough to sin ourselves. Worse to lead others to sin.

Worst of all to lead children to sin.

Punishment must follow sin unless repented of, and punishment is eternal.

LESSON. Avoid the beginnings of sin.

GRANNY'S JUBILEE.

"'Poor Granny! What is a Bible jubilee?'"—p. 262.

CHAPTER I.

THERE was a skeleton in the cupboard at Briarly Farm, and a turned picture, very like to what we hear and read of in the houses of the rich and proud. Abel Manly was proud enough for any aristocrat, though only going about in the homely grey suit of a yeoman; for pride, be it known, is not always confined to those in high places. No! pride is everywhere, seen or not seen, and when unseen mayhap it is the worst pride of all, the hardest to uproot; and such an uprooting when it does take place! But to our story.

It has to do with the Jubilee lately celebrated, and with Christmas time as well. Oh! a mix-medley story it is—I hardly know where to begin. Here is a good place.

On a fair April morning, when the Lent-lilies were dancing in the flower-bed outside Briarly Farm, and sweet, glinting sunbeams streaming in over the floor of the hall-like front passage from the open door, like a voiceless something pleading for better things than skeletons in cupboards, pride, and the like, good Mrs. Manly and her spouse, Abel, stood in this same sunny hall. At least, she stood in sunshine, her husband in shade, and these are the words they were saying—

"I had hoped that, with this Jubilee coming on, you might have done so."

"Jubilee—what have jubilees to do with it?"

Such a stalwart giant was Abel Manly, with the dignity of his sixty years.

"You know, 'Every man unto his possession, every man unto his family,' is how the Bible puts it."* A sweet, tender, blue-eyed woman was she who pleaded, long past the prime of her days; the light in these same blue eyes quenched, and patience written on every line of her yet comely face, for those who had eyes to see—ay, patience, submission, and long-suffering, long-waiting love.

* See Levit. xxv. 10.

This was the story of her beautiful, quivering face, as she stood by her lord and master, Sarah-like, looking up to him as such, but mayhap with more than Sarah-like meekness. Ay, and if a wanderer had gone out from the farm, as in those old patriarchal days, it was not by her sending.

"That may be, but the Bible times are not our times, and, if they were, it would make no difference."

Abel Manly was a hard, proud, unbending man; even his love was cased about with this "touch-me-not" crust of his, which hid away his better nature, as it were, few seeing or knowing him as he was. But Anne, the wife of his bosom, knew him to be a man of strong affection—or Annie, as he called her in his tenderest moods: but that was not to-day.

"No, Anne, I forbid you, as an obedient wife, to broach the subject again." These were his words, and away he tramped out into the sunshine among the Lent-lilies, and round to the yard, not heeding how the faded blue eyes of the little woman filled with tears, how hand clasped over hand, and disappointment well-nigh erased the patience and submission of her tell-tale face.

"What is it, Granny?"

A little mite of a fluffy, fair-haired girl of seven, just Granny herself in miniature, with all the joy and the mirth of childhood about her, came dancing out from somewhere among the shadows lurking in the hall: such personages often being where they are not supposed to be on certain occasions, hearing what they are not intended to hear, and, at the best, de trop, as the French would say. Thus was it this morning.

"What is it, Granny?" inquired the midge, in that silvery voice which the echoes of the old house loved so well.

"Nothing, Nance. Then you've been playing little pitcher again?" Granny's tone belied her reproving words, and Nance noted it. Yes, she was Nance, the daughter of another Nance, who married, went out from her home, and, dying, sent her friendless child to nestle in the old nest which had sheltered her, to revel in the love in which she had revelled—another Nance to fill the void in the old farm-house. It was sweet to Mrs. Manly's ears to hear the echoes catch the old name, and toss it hither and thither along the gusty passages, to repeat the dancing footsteps till they sounded like the tread of two pairs of childish feet; but she craved to hear that other name twining with Nance's. Nance and Jack—so it had been in the old days; now the little child was all that remained, save a turned picture, the memory of a wrong, a sin committed, a wanderer gone out, disowned, as it were, by his father, and a mother's heart craving in undefined agony over an undefined fear. Terribly real would the fear become to her at dead of night, lying wakeful on her bed, thinking of her wanderer, thirsting, not like that other disowned one, of Bible story, for a drink of water, but for love—someone to care for him, for his well-being, for his soul. Ay, the picture grew so vivid at times, that, in spirit, she was fain to cry like that other lone mother, "Let me not see the death of the child!"

"I wasn't playing pitcher, Granny; but I heard," replied wee Nance. "And, Granny, what is a jubilee?" she asked, as Mrs. Manly stood, looking out through the front door at the Lent-lilies and the April gladness.

Beyond in the meadows were the lambs playing among the buttercups and daisies, and the distant hills crowned with glory.

"A jubilee, dear? That's what's coming to the Queen."

"And do you want to be like the Queen?" inquired the child, linking her hand in Granny's.

"No, dear, not that—the Queen is a happier woman than I shall ever be." Granny's gaze still strayed among the Lent-lilies, and away over the meadows to the distant hills.

"Well, yes, she has lots and lots of fine things, hasn't she, and a crown?"

"She has lots and lots of good children, as can come to see her, and make her happy." There was a touch of resentment in Granny's gentle tones.

"Yes, and her husband is dead, isn't he?"

Children do draw a bow at a venture sometimes; so did Nance now. The words of Elkanah rang through Mrs. Manly's Bible-stored mind—

"Am not I to thee better than ten sons?"

"Oh, God, forgive me, and help me to bear my yoke, though 't isn't youth with me, and my heart is sore with longing," she murmured, her nervous hands twining one over the other.

"What, Granny?—what did you say?"

"Nothing, Nance, nothing," was the reply; and Nance wondered did Granny know she was telling a story? For she did say something.

"Granny, are jubilees only for queens, or do people have them?" asked the young prattler, a moment afterwards.

"Yes, child; people have them sometimes; the people will take part in this one coming, as well as the Queen."

"And did you want to take part in this one? and did Grandfather say no?"

"I wanted to have a Bible jubilee, and—and, child, it was denied me." Granny's tears fell fast now like rain, quietly and steadily as in autumn-time.

"Poor Granny! What is a Bible jubilee?" She reached up, and twined her arms as well as she could round the little woman's waist; the tears came dripping down upon her shining hair, and her sweet daisy face upturned in her half-pity.

"I can't tell you, dear, but you can see it all in your Bible."

Yes, Nance had a Bible, a nice new one, that Granny gave her on her seventh birthday; Grandfather had written her name in it, Nance Danton, and Granny's name and his own. And she could read it, too—she often read it on Sundays, only dancing across to Granny now and then when a hard word puzzled her. She would read it now, search for the jubilee, for she did not think Granny would give her any lessons this morning; she never did when she cried and had a headache,

"I'd not cry, Granny, or you 'll have your headache. And perhaps the Queen's Jubilee 'll be a Bible Jubilee, and perhaps Grandfather 'll let you take part in that," said the wise little woman, reaching up till Granny stooped down and kissed her; then she rushed away for her Bible, and as it was a busy day in the kitchen, she stole with it into the parlour. Here she sat with Granny and Grandfather on Sunday afternoons, in summer-time, looking out through folding glass doors upon the sweet-williams, white lilies, snap-dragons, and the like, with the bee-hives at the end of the walk, under the old elm tree, and hard by the summer-house. Here, sitting down by the sunny glass doors, one just a little ajar, because she liked to hear the birds sing and the bees hum among the dancing Lent-lilies—never such a woman as Granny for Lent-lilies, and other common flowers—here she sat on her own low stool, searching her Bible—very like looking for a needle in a bottle of hay—for the description of a Bible jubilee and the way of keeping it. Chapter after chapter—such a bewildering maze for a child. But she had a good stock of patience, as well as plenty of time, sitting there alone through the long sunshiny morning; and, anon, as by haphazard, she alighted on the very chapter she sought.

Verse by verse she read it through—oh! very bewildering was it all. Which was Granny's part? Not about the bondservants, nor yet about not sowing and tilling the land. No; folk did not have bondservants nowadays, and folk did not let the fields go a long, long year without ploughing and sowing them. At least, Grandfather did not, for he had once told her, he and she walking over the fields together, that he had ploughed, and sown, and reaped over that land for fifty years. Why, that was just the time the Bible said—fifty years. Was that what Granny wanted, and Grandfather would not allow it—to let the weeds grow, and nothing else—only the poppies, the daisies, and the weeds? How funny! Nance gave a little puzzled laugh, and, laughing, she lifted her head, and saw a shadow by the door. It was her grandfather looking in at her.

CHAPTER II.

"Well, little maid, laughing over the Bible? I didn't know 't were a book to laugh over;" so he accosted her, pushing open the door a little wider.

"No, Grandfather, not over the Bible, but over Granny's jubilee."

"Ha! what do you know about Granny's jubilee?"

"She said she wanted a Bible jubilee, and I've found it. Shall I read it out, or do you know about it, Grandfather?" spoke unconscious Nance.

"No, I don't know about it exactly, but I don't think 't is anything to laugh at—at least, Granny didn't laugh about it a while ago, little Nance."

"No, she cried; but that was beca ıse — because——" Nance knew she was treading on dangerous ground, and wisely stopped.

"Well?" Abel Manly's brow darkened, if the child had seen it, but, deep in her book, she asked—

"Are you busy, Grandfather, or shall I read it?"

"Ay, read away."

Nance was dear to Abel as the apple of his eye; she was the sweet living echo of the past and gone.

"'A jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you; ye shall not sow, neither reap that which groweth of itself in it, nor gather the grapes in it, of thy vine undressed,'" read the sweet, silvery tongue.

"That isn't Granny's jubilee, child," spoke Grandfather, with a comical smile.

"Is it this, about bondservants?"

"No, not about bondservants."

"Nor yet this, 'And ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family;' because we are all at home, in our family, and nobody away."

"If any are away, they will stay away; they don't deserve a jubilee"—Grandfather's voice was husky.

"Who do you mean, Grandfather?"

But Abel never answered her, only said, "Hark! that's Granny calling you to dinner."

And so she was: "Nance, Nance," rang in to her like a strain of welcome music; so, linking her hand in her grandfather's, she tripped away with him, round by the summer-house and the bees, and round by the back into the kitchen.

Was Grandfather angry with anyone? she wondered, as she ate her dinner and noted the cloud on his brow. No, not with her: he heaped her plate with just what she liked; nor yet with Granny, for he called her Annie more than once, and that was a sign of just the contrary; and there was no one else, except Jane, their one servant. No, nor was it Jane, for she heard him call her Jenny, as he went out through the back kitchen. No, but still the cloud was there.

"Is Grandfather angry with anyone, Jane?" she questioned of the good-natured servant, while Granny went to don her hood and shawl before going out to feed the two motherless lambs in the shed, whither her little granddaughter always accompanied her.

"Ay, Miss Nance, he's always angry with——" The woman paused, and wiped up a plate or two in silence.

"Yes—who, Jane, who is he angry with?" was the eager question.

"Not with you."

"Yes—but who? Don't tease, Jane." The child's hand was laid on her arm.

"Well, you know the turned picture up atop the front stairs, in the dark corner?"

"Yes, my Uncle Jack's; but he isn't agry with him, he's only vexed. The father in the Bible wasn't angry with his son who went away, same"—Grandfather himself came dangerously near the back door, so his little granddaughter lowered her voice to a whisper—"same as Grandfather—he mustn't hear, 'cause it hurts him."

"Well, I calls it angry, and I pities poor mistress, I do. Now, that's a work for you, Miss Nance, to pray for——"

"Now, Nance, come." Here was gentle-eyed Mrs. Manly, in hood and shawl, and Nance skipped away at her side till the shed was reached.

"We haven't named them, Granny," said she, as she stroked the gentle creatures, while Mrs. Manly held the feeder to their mouths.

"No, dear—what shall we call them?" replied Granny.

"Nance and Jack—that's for mamma and Uncle Jack. Granny, why is Grandfather angry with Uncle Jack?"

"Hush, dear"—Grandfather was passing; he seemed everywhere to-day, his granddaughter thought. "He isn't cross; he's vexed," said Granny under her breath.

"Is your jubilee that you want about him?"

"Yes, child, 't is;" Granny trembled as she said it.

"Why don't you pray for it?" lisped Nance, thinking of what Jane had said.

"I have—these ten years."

"Ten years?—that's three years before I was born—what a long time! Granny, shall I pray too?" asked the prattler, after a silence.

"Yes, dear, if you like;" but Granny's thoughts seemed wool-gathering.

"Praying always gets things, Granny." A happy thought seemed to strike the little maiden. "You and me pray together, because don't you know what the Bible says?—'If two of you shall agree on earth, as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My Father which is in heaven"—that was my text for Sunday. And, Granny," Nance drew Mrs. Manly's head down, "I think I'll ask Grandfather to pray; you know the end of the text, 'Where two or three are gathered together in My Name, there am I in the midst of them.' I think three would be better than two," she whispered into her ear.

"Oh! Nance, he'd be cross," said affrighted Granny. "But come, dear, the lambs have had their fill."

"Good-bye, Jack and Nance." The child put her daisy face to both dumb creatures, and kissed them; then she and Granny returned to the house and their afternoon needlework, sitting in the clean, comfortable kitchen, where the log fire crackled and burnt, and the kettle soon sang for tea.

A very preoccupied little maiden was Nance that afternoon; her needle did not keep time with her thoughts, so fast did they race through her busy brain; and, ere they had nearly done coming and going, it was tea-time, and Grandfather coming in for his share of the pleasant meal. When it was over, and the sunshine waxing rosy and red, Nance climbed up the front stairs, to sit on the topmost step to think. What if praying should bring Granny's jubilee—hers, and Granny's, and Grandfather's praying? She half shrank from asking Grandfather, because Granny thought he would be cross; but, no, he would not be cross with her. She could ask Jane to be the third, only it would be nicer for Grandfather to be the one; because Granny's jubilee would be Grandfather's jubilee, thought the wise little reasoner. So far had she gone in her cogitations, when Grandfather himself came tramping through the hall below. Nothing like striking while the iron is hot.

"Grandfather! Grandfather!" piped she, in her shrill treble, from above,

"She nestled on her pillow and soon fell asleep."—p. 266.

"Ah! little woman, are you up there?" said he, smiling up at her.

"Yes, Grandfather. You come up, too; I want to ask you something."

"How would it be if you came down to me?"

"No, Grandfather, 't is something very particular; I want to tell you up here;" and obedient Grandfather mounted up.

"Now sit by me, Grandfather; I want to lay my head in your lap."

"What a queer little puss it is!" quoth he, but he sat down—he loved her so; and down went the fluffy little head into his lap.

"Grandfather, I want you to pray for something—you, and I, and Granny."

"And what's that?" inquired Grandfather, as if he more than half guessed.

"For Granny's jubilee;" the ready little tongue seldom faltered.

"Child, did Granny tell you to ask for this?" There was a sternness creeping into Abel Manly's voice.

"No! oh, no! Granny said you'd be cross, and I said you wouldn't, and you're not cross, are you?" her daisy face was raised to scan that of the other.

"No, not just that; but I can't do it, Nance."

"Oh! Grandfather, you can—everybody can pray—you mean you won't."

"Well, perhaps won't is the right word."

"But you will, Grandfather, you will; 'cause I want it, and Granny wants it, and—and I think someone else wants it."

"Someone else—what—who?"

"Don't you know?—he who said, 'I will arise, and go to my father.' He must have wanted a jubilee. 'Every man unto his possession, every man unto his family.'" How the echoes caught the silvery words, and tossed them about over the wide landing, where was that turned picture, with the fair boyish face hidden.

"How dare you, Nance! how dare you!" Grandfather put her from him, and rose: such a giant he looked, up there among the gathering shadows.

"Oh! Grandfather, you're cross—cross with me!"—with a pathetic little plaint over that last word. "I will ask Jane." Nance leant her pretty face on the stair, and sobbed.

"Ask who you like, Nance; I can't do it."

"Oh! Grandfather, you won't," came like a wail between her sobs.

To this Abel returned no answer, but walked away down the stairs, and out among the Lent-lilies dancing in the light of the dying day, a lark still high in the heavens singing of a bright to-morrow.

Nance did not cry long, but stole down from the high perch to the back kitchen, where Jane was just righting up for the day, as she told her, watching her a moment ere she broached her request.

"Jane, will you pray for something along with me and Granny?"

"'Deed, I will, Miss Nance; what is it I must pray for?"

"I want you to pray for Granny's jubilee."

"Granny's jubilee! bless the child, 't isn't Granny's jubilee as is coming, but the Queen's."

"Yes, but Granny wants a jubilee all to herself—'Every man to his possession, every man to his family,' same as he who rose and came to his father," explained the little one.

"Yes, I know, Miss Nance; she 's wanted that for many a day."

"Yes, for ten years," said Nance. "And now I 'm going to pray too, for two are better than one, and three are better still, Jesus says. If you 'd time I 'd read to you in my Bible all about it, and about Granny's jubilee too."

"I 've time, Miss Nance, for I 've done.

So away skipped Nance for her Bible as briskly as if she had not sobbed on the stairs so short a time before. Kneeling on the firelit hearth she read all the jubilee chapter first, then the texts about praying together.

"Yes, dear, I 'll pray," promised Jane, when the little one shut up her book.

"I asked Grandfather," returned Nance sadly, "and he said he wouldn't."

"Bless the child! 't was a wonder he wasn't in a mighty temper," cried Jane.

"He was," affirmed Nance; "and, Jane, will you let me see my uncle's picture to-morrow?"

"No, dear, no; I 'd orders never to turn it round."

"What did he do?"

"He made an old woman of Granny, Miss Nance."

"But what?"

"I don't rightly know, but you can pray for Granny's jubilee without knowing what made her want a jubilee, Miss Nance."

"Nance, Nance!" called Abel Manly in the passage.

"Yes, Grandfather." The wee thing went speeding out to him like a newly fledged bird. Ah! there was no anger in the call.

"Here 's the dearest little white rabbit, with pink eyes, ever a little maid saw, for someone;" he held it on his hand—such a pretty white ball in the waning light.

"For me, Grandfather, for me?"

"Yes, for you."

"Thank you, Grandfather;" such a sounding kiss she gave him, as he bent over her.

"All right, little one; let by-gones be by-gones."

"Yes, Grandfather, yes"—the mite understood his meaning. "I 've asked Jane instead, and she said yes; but I'm sorry," she told him.

He made no reply to this, but led her in to show her pet to Granny.

"Oh, God, send Granny her jubilee, every man to his possession, every man to his family, for Jesus Christ's sake," was the petition Nance wove into her evening prayer that night, Granny's tears falling like rain at its close.

"He 'll hear, Granny, He 'll hear and do it, because of that about two or three gathered together, you know; He 'll do it, never fear." Those were the child's last words as she nestled on her pillow, and soon fell asleep.

(To be concluded.)

THE SEVEN LEAVES OF THE VINE.

THOUGHTS UPON THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF OUR LORD UPON THE CROSS.

BY THE RIGHT REV. WILLIAM ALEXANDER, D.D., D.C.L., LORD BISHOP OF DERRY AND RAPHOE.

THE THIRD WORD FROM THE CROSS.

"When Jesus therefore saw His mother, and the disciple standing by whom He loved, He saith unto His mother, Woman, behold thy son. Then saith He to the disciple, Behold thy mother."—ST. JOHN xix. 26, 27.

THE narrative of St. Luke tells us that during a considerable portion of the Saviour's Passion "all His acquaintance, and the women that followed Him from Galilee, stood afar off, beholding these things."* After now nearly three hours of awful endurance, there was a lull in the strong excitement of those who hated Him. It was felt by some of those who were dearest to Him that a possibility of approach was afforded. John and a little group of believing women—Mary the mother of Jesus, and two other Maries, the wife of Cleophas and Mary of Magdala—then for a while stood in close proximity beside the cross of Jesus.† In Gethsemane, as earth's poor sympathy is withdrawn from the agonising Saviour, an angel comes nigh to strengthen Him. He who took not on Him the nature of angels must have felt now that there was something which was still sweeter to Him in the sympathy of human love.

The two first words from the Cross—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," and "To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise"—are, the first priestly, the second royal. This third

* St. Luke xxiii. 49.

† Παρὰ τῷ σταυρῷ. This preposition is used of place, with the dative of the thing, in this passage of the New Testament only. It is worth noting that the particles μὲν, δέ (Οἱ μὲν οὖν στρατιῶται ταῦτα ἐποίησαν—ver. 24; εἰστήκεισαν δὲ—ver. 25) imply a subtle but most touching contrast between the callous cruelty of the soldiers and the tender, fearless love of John and the three Maries. Let the reader note also the delicate refinement of the Evangelist in the incidental way in which his own presence is indicated after that of the rest of the group. (Verses 25, 26.)

word expresses the true human affection of the True Man, the Son of Man.

I.

YET no refined ingenuity of current criticism rob us of the assurance that we have here a genuine saying of Jesus.

It has been said that while the whole incident is eloquent of the personality of the Evangelist, its record is a condemnation of his veracity. He is consumed with a passion for getting himself personal consideration and making himself of importance. As a matter of fact, John does certainly appear to have taken home and (so to speak) adopted the mother of Jesus. The high consideration which Mary enjoyed in the nascent Church no doubt led the Evangelist to give out that Jesus, whose favourite disciple he was always claiming to be, had, when dying, commended to such a friend that which He held most dear on earth. The presence in John's home of this precious legacy of affection assured him of a sort of presidency over the other Apostles, and stamped his doctrine with a seal of the highest authority.*

Much might be said in reply to this elaborate and disgraceful insinuation of that school of "higher criticism" which systematically takes the lowest view of the power of God and of the virtue of man.

One argument is morally sufficient. If ever any writing from a mortal pen was the mirror of a human soul, that writing is the Epistle of St. John. He who truly and deeply loves must truly and deeply hate. Upon a lie and liars the hatred of the Apostle was fixed with a terrible persistence. Through all the oracular brevity and lapidary incision of his sentences, we feel his heart thrilling with indignation even still, when he has to speak of a lie, and the tellers or doers of it!† Surely, in that awful passage about "the lake that burneth with fire," there is one touch which must have come from the hand of John. In a passage quivering, breathless, hurried with emotion, where the writer enumerates the characteristics of the lost, he runs through his fearful list—"the fearful and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars!"‡

Yet we are asked to believe that this man of pure, generous, lofty nature—this man with his inextinguishable abomination of lies and liars—himself lies, and lies in reference to the most sacred moment of his Master's death, and lies for a personal object of the meanest and most selfish kind.

But, it is said by the same writer—"perhaps the extreme loftiness of the character of Christ does not agree with such personal tenderness as is manifested in this word from the cross to the mother and the disciple, at a crisis when He must have peculiarly felt that He was only living for humanity."

Here, again, the answer is simple, and the appeal to human and moral perceptions.

From the literary affectation of academicians—the prigs of the intellectual world—we may turn to all human beings who have had a mother, and who still have a heart. To such we may say, "You believe that Jesus, your Lord, was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary. Think of Him in His dying hours. Would you feel your ideal of the perfect Manhood realised or marred, if you read that He had put by, or spoken coldly, or spoken nothing to His mother?"

In the most glorious dialogue of Plato, in musical and golden pages which the world has never forgotten, we are told of the meeting in the prison of Socrates with his friends, which was to be succeeded that very day by the long parting. The sacred ship has arrived from Delos, the chains are being struck off, and Socrates is to die that day. Xanthippe is sitting by her husband, and holding his child in her arms. History has treated her ill; and perhaps—if one of two extremes must be chosen—it may, in some aspects, be a happier thing to be the wife of certain fools than of certain philosophers. Xanthippe may have had provocations which a great idealistic biographer found it convenient to forget. But at all events she had a woman's heart, a Greek woman's passionate nature. "Socrates!" she cried, "this is the last time that either you will talk with your friends, or they with you." Then Socrates turned to a friend, and said quietly, "Let someone take her home." She is led home, sobbing wildly as she goes; and Socrates, relieved of her presence, frigidly begins a disquisition upon pleasure and pain, suggested by the blended sensations in his limb when the chain was removed—possibly not without bitter sarcasm about the loving, if imperfect, wife who mourned him so bitterly.*

Which presents the tenderer, the more exquisitely human ideal, Socrates or Christ? Let us thank God that the Saviour's heart of fire is also a heart of flesh.

II.

LOOK at the preciousness of the gifts in the three first of the seven words.

Gifts! For from the cross He rained down legacies. No showers were ever so rich in harvests as the red drops of Calvary. In each of those words are abiding and universal, as well as particular and temporary, donations.

"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" That prayer was not merely for the crucifiers. Those who fastened Him to the tree, and drove in the nails, and, after extending Him on the cross, raised it up and fastened it rudely in the soil, were but representatives of a more widely different guilt. From those white lips the words seemed to rise, float away, and die in the distance. But they have never ceased to waken echoes since that moment. Draw near and gaze. From the midst of His agony, wounded and weary, there is One pleading for each soul amongst us. Does not He who hangs thereon give Himself wholly for us? Was not the pang at His heart, the sorrow in His soul, the darkness round Him, and the tormentors on Him, because He loved us with that eternal love stronger than death, which brought Him down from heaven, nailed Him to the cross, sent Him on through the valley of the shadow of death, and its dark waters over His sheep who were scattered? If we listen, we shall, each one, find that our name is on His lips, as He speaks the first word from the cross.

"To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise." That word is precious too; it brings the promise and breath of Eden into every sick-room.

Has He, then, no special gifts for those who are nearest to Him? Gifts! He Who was so unutterably poor. The very gradation of poverty in the Psalmist's prophetic picture of the nakedness upon the cross (the outer "raiment," the inner "vesture")* is literally carried out in the fact of history. One cannot help feeling that we surprise a tender, latent thought of St. John's. As we think over the denudation (verses 23, 24), and put beside it the great legacy (verse 26), we may believe that there is an intended contrast between the divine poverty of the first and the divine exuberance of the second.

Consider the temporary and particular, the lasting and larger gift.

1. The temporary and particular gift has two characteristics.

It was just the right gift.

This passage would certainly seem to imply that Mary had no other son. He, who was so exquisitely delicate in respecting the rights of love, would have wounded that son's heart by leaving a mother—and such a mother—to another. "Having seen His mother, and the disciple standing by whom He loved, He saith unto His mother, Woman, behold thy son. Then saith He to the disciple, Behold thy mother." He gives John to Mary, and Mary to John.

Here there is a temporal provision, an earthly home, secured to the mother of Jesus. It is an unreal spirituality which affects to think little of making such loving provision as may be in our power for those who are nearest to us in blood and affection. But we cannot doubt that there was more here than food and shelter. There was provision here for moral affinities of heart, thought, character, temperament, faith. Jesus gave "The Virgin Mother to the virgin-soul'd."

* ἱμάτια . . . χιτὼν, St. John xix. 23, and Ps. xxii. 18.

2. As Jesus gave the right gift, so He gave it at the right moment.

"There were standing by the cross of Jesus His mother, and His mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene." "Then saith He to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And *from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home." Jesus gently and with forethought spares His mother the long seismic darkness beginning to gather over the landscape, and the Eli cry. Simeon had said to Mary long ago, "A sword shall pierce through thine own soul."† The sword must pierce. But no selfish yearning for sympathy shall cause it to be turned in the wound which it has made.‡

III.

AS our Lord bestows in the third word from the cross a temporary and particular gift, so does He bequeath a lasting and larger legacy and benediction.

1. An enduring endowment was bestowed upon the Church in reference to the history of the Gospels.

False teaching probably does almost as much harm to the Church by those truths of which it makes good men suspicious, as by those which it actually corrupts or distorts. Superstitious exaggerations bring superstitious fear in the recoil. The real "glories" of Mary are forgotten in the panic produced by the extravagances of Liguori.

The long-continued abiding of Mary with John cannot have been without the most real effect in enabling the Evangelist to teach with all confidence the doctrine of the Incarnation. How naturally that he whose home was Mary's shelter should have written, "The Word became flesh"! How natural that to a Church troubled by sectarians, who proclaimed a commonplace Christ or a shadowy Christ—a Christ of mere humanity or of mist—the fourth Evangelist, who was full of thoughts derived from

* ἀπ' ἐκείνης τῆς ὥρας. There is emphasis in this. Nouns defined by the pronoun ἐκεῖνος, used as an adjective, have always the article, to call attention to the fact that an individual of a class is marked out. (Winer, Gr. Gr. 122.) This hour is singled out from all other hours, and marked as the definite beginning of a new relation between John and Mary.

† St. Luke ii. 35.

‡ "By the cross of Christ stood the holy virgin mother, upon whom old Simeon's prophecy was now verified; for now she felt 'a sword passing through her very soul.' She stood without clamour, or womanish noises, and silent, and with a modest grief deep as the waters of the abyss, but smooth as the face of a pool; full of love and patience, and sorrow and hope. Now she was put to it to make use of all those excellent discourses her holy Son had used to build up her spirit, and fortify it against this day. Now she felt the blessings and strengths of faith, and she passed from the grief of the Passion to the expectation of the Resurrection; and she rested in this death as in a sad remedy, for she knew it reconciled God with all the world."—Taylor's "Exemplar," vol. iii., p. 353.

companionship with the mother of Jesus, should have proclaimed with confidence, "Every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit which confesseth not Jesus is not of God." "Many deceivers are gone forth into the world, even they that confess not that Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh. This is the deceiver and the antichrist."* The human intellect was busy then, as it was for centuries afterwards, with the conception which we are to have of the Person of Jesus. All heresies (and in name they are numerous and perplexing) may be referred in themselves or in their consequences to one or other of these two general heads—they either unhumanise or undeify the God-Man. It is often said that the Bouddha, or the classical demi-god, affords a true counterpart of the mystery of the Incarnation. Those who make the assertion have failed to grasp the true idea of that mystery. Christ is not God masquerading for a time in human form; He is not a man deified. He is God humanified. With what marvellous fitness were Mary and John brought into close and constant connection. In Mary, we have the favoured instrument through whom the Incarnation was wrought out. "When the fulness of the time came, God sent forth His Son, born of a woman, born under the law."† In John, we have the theologian by whom the conception was defined, so far as it is capable of definition in human language.‡ The first is the living witness of the fact; the second the providential expositor of the idea.

This assistance must have been of value also for many facts recorded both in St. John's and the other Gospels. Mothers are the best biographers of their children's earliest years. They have a subtle insight, almost prophetic instincts. Who can doubt that the Annunciation, the birth, the sweet silence of the baby and boy life, form a part of Mary's contribution to the materials of the authentic Gospels? As we think of the deeply meditative nature of Mary, as we hear him with whom Mary dwelt speaking with such authority and precision of the Person of Christ, we feel that the heart of Mary has not been without influence on the hand of John.

It will not take us far from our subject if we add here two considerations.

1. By many modern unbelievers—and especially by Renan—it has been said that the author of the fourth Gospel moved in a totally different sphere of historical narration from the synoptical Evangelists; that he knew nothing of the birth in Bethlehem. For this assertion, it is urged there is something more to be alleged than the Evangelist's silence. We have a positive indication that it never occurred to him to couple Jesus with Bethlehem. For he records the objection of certain antagonists, "What! will the Christ come out of Galilee? Hath not the Scripture said that the Christ cometh of the seed of David, and from Bethlehem, the village where David was?"* Now, it is part of the tender, subtle irony of St. John to record objections of adversaries, which, to thoughtful and instructed Christians, were convincing arguments.† The record of the objection has for its motive the knowledge of its futility. If we believe that the disciple from the cross took the mother of Jesus to his own home, the question is settled.

2. The first vision of the Virgin Mother extant in ecclesiastical history, may be taken by us from the accurate pages of St. Gregory of Nyssa. "Gregory (called Thaumaturgus, from the miracles wrought by him), bishop of Neo-Cæsarea, in Pontus, was one of the most celebrated among the scholars of Origen. He was appointed to the Episcopal See of his native city, which then contained only seventeen Christians; the rest were heathens. After his consecration to the bishopric he retired for a time, in order to give himself to religious meditation and prayer; especially that he might be able to refute the errors and heresies of the time, and to hold firmly and teach clearly the true faith. When he was thus engaged, he had a vision of a venerable man, who said that he had been sent by God, in answer to his prayers, to declare to him the true faith. A woman of wondrous beauty and dignity of mien accompanied him. The venerable man, as represented in the vision, was St. John the Evangelist; the woman was the blessed Virgin Mary. The former then uttered certain words, in which he delivered a profession of faith which Gregory set down in writing. . . . 'There is one Lord; One only of One only; God of God; impress and image (εἰκὼν) of the Godhead; energising Word; Wisdom comprehensive of the system of the universe; and power, the Maker of the whole creation; very Son of very Father; invisible of invisible; incorruptible of incorruptible; immortal of immortal; eternal of eternal.

"'There is a Trinity perfect in glory, and eternity, and kingdom indivisible and unchangeable.'"‡

It will be observed that in this "vision" Mary is joined with John. How different, it must sorrowfully be added, is this simple and truly catholic creed from the strange words supposed to have been uttered on February 11th, 1858, to Bernadotte Soubirous—"I am the Immaculate Conception."

* St. John i. 14; 1 John iv. 2, 3; 2 John v. 7.

† Galatians iv. 4.

‡ "He had a name written that no man knew, but He Himself. . . And His name is called The Word of God." (Apoc. xix. 12, 13.)

* St. John vii. 41, 42.

† We have another instance in this very chapter (ver. 35). The Apostle who, from Ephesus, wrote to the Christians of Asia Minor and of the world, might well feel a thrill of triumph as he thought how truly his Master had "gone unto the dispersed among the Gentiles, and taught the Gentiles."

IV.

LET it, lastly, be said that here is something for all who—like John and Mary—follow Jesus lovingly to His cross.

Home! The word has a magic sound. What is best in home, after all? Not the walls and roof, not the plenty and comfort which may be within, not the ivy and roses clinging to the stones—not these, but the living stones, the fibrous tendrils of clinging memories. And what are the associations of a Christian home?* The sweet tempers; the mutually adjusted natures; the steps that pace to the same round of daily duties; the associated prayers; the hands raised for the same hallowed bread; the eyes wet with the same sorrows or lit with the same joys; the hills ascended in company, and, as life advances, touched with the same westering sun; the spirits that gaze at once into the same grave, and the same golden spot in the distance. This is Christ's home-gift from the cross to all true hearts that

"Soar but never roam,
True to the kindred points of heart and home."

Christ once made a home for Mary and John, while a world hissed and yelled, and the darkness gathered round the cross. And still, over life's roaring sea, across darkening hours, He tells us of a home of hearts in the City of our God. "In My Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto Myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."*

* The original (εἰς τὰ ἴδια, St. John xix. 27), if not quite literally our word "home," is perhaps its nearest possible equivalent.

A NEW BOOK OF MARTYRS.—II.

THE DARK NIGHT OF HUNGARY.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., ETC. ETC.

HUNGARY is a country which has long lain hid from Anglo-Saxon eyes. It is out of our beat, out of the beat even of continental tourists, a country with which we seem to have nothing to do. But within the present generation it has forced itself into notice, and it has won the praise and admiration of all who love to see a gallant people struggling nobly in a patriotic cause. In that year of Revolution, 1848, no spectacle in Europe impressed men so favourably as that of Hungary struggling for its ancient liberties, and the eloquence of Kossuth and the triumphs of his generals were received with shouts of delight, till the interference of the Czar on the side of tyranny raised on every side a howl of execration. But crushed though the Hungarians were by sheer brute force, they had pluck enough to continue their contention in another form. Their opportunity came after the Austrian defeats of Königgratz and Sadowa; and as we have often been hearing of late, in another connection, they got back their constitution and autonomy, so that their name is incorporated in that of the Empire now known as "Austro-Hungary." These facts prepare us to learn that the ruling race of Hungary are men of no ordinary fibre, and that the history of the country—both civil and ecclesiastical—is profoundly interesting. The Magyars may have been a restless people, fond of excitement and given to war, but they have been lovers of liberty, and their contendings for the most part have been for justice and truth.

But our business is with the religious history of the Hungarian people. Our chief authority in what follows is the History of Georg Bauhoffer, the English translation of which has an elaborate introduction by Dr. Merle D'Aubigné. For six or seven hundred years, Hungarians have in some form or other been witnesses for the Gospel. So early as A.D. 1176, many who adhered to the doctrines of the Waldenses sought in Hungary an asylum from the vengeance of Rome. Many were profoundly impressed by their doctrines, and the Pope of the day did his best to rouse the King of Hungary to exterminate them, but without success. About the beginning of the fourteenth century, the number of Waldenses in Bohemia, Austria, and neighbouring counties was reckoned at eighty thousand. In Hungary they were comparatively safe; in Austria proper the case was different. In Vienna, some were publicly led to the stake, and among these we find mention made of Simeon Scaliger, a Hungarian, who is represented as an apostle and angel of the sect, and who nobly witnessed for the truth by a martyr's death.

In the fifteenth century, when the banner of truth was unfurled in the neighbouring kingdom of Bohemia by John Huss, Hungary showed no little sympathy with the movement. In 1444, a terrible calamity hove in sight: the Cardinal Julian concluded a concordat with King Uladislaus that the Hussites should be utterly destroyed. Happily or unhappily, Uladislaus was defeated by the Turks in the memorable battle of Varna, and so enraged were his enemies at him for violating an oath he had sworn to them. that, not content with his death in battle, they carried about his head in triumph on a pike. The Cardinal Julian was killed while attempting to escape; the Hungarian Hussites might well sing the 124th Psalm.

From students who went to study at Wittenberg, the views of Luther were borne to Hungary, and met with a cordial reception. But in 1525 the Hungarian Diet ordered all Lutherans to be burnt. In spite of this, the Reformed religion spread. A few years later, the views of Calvin found wonderful favour among the Magyars, most of whom joined the "Reformed" Church, as we usually, by way of distinction, denote the followers of Calvin.

We pass over many memorable chapters of Hungarian Church history, with many scenes of persecution and noble testimony, to fix attention on the deadly persecution which desolated Hungary after the Thirty Years' War.

In alliance with the Jesuits, Louis XIV., that "most Christian King," who sought to atone for the wickedness of his licentious life by exterminating the enemies of the Church of Rome, stimulated Leopold I., King of Hungary and Emperor of Austria, to fall on all the Protestants of his Empire, and exterminate them by fire and sword. The Protestant ministers and teachers were summoned to appear before the criminal court, and the sentence of death was pronounced on all who should refuse to return to the Roman Catholic Church. The general results of this persecution have been stated thus by Professor Balogh, of Debreczen: "Many pastors, particularly Lutherans, turned Catholics, in consequence of their heavy captivity and other torments; others emigrated to foreign countries; a great part (205) resigned their office in order to save their lives and get free from their chains. However, sixty-six intrepid men resisted the cruel system, and awaited with resignation the hour of death. These venerable martyrs were then sold as galley slaves to Naples; and even eminent professors of divinity and superintendents languished in the galleys for ten months. The diplomatic intervention of Holland, and particularly the efforts of Admiral Adrian Ruyter, succeeded in setting them at liberty. But for several years after they were not allowed to return to their country."

It is of this terrible persecution we are now to give some particulars. It was in 1657, with the reign of Leopold, that what has been called the golden age of the Jesuits began. Leopold had been intended for the Church, but the death of his elder brother brought him to the throne in his seventeenth year. Cold, heartless, indolent, and procrastinating, he was a very fit tool of the Jesuits, and as, like Louis XIV., his only idea of religious duty was to uphold the Church of Rome and ruin the Protestants, the evils which he inflicted were very terrible. Hungary under Leopold was just like Scotland at the same period under Charles II. The keenness of the persecution began a few years earlier and ended a little sooner, but in Hungary the desolation was wider and the results more deadly. Traces of a covenant or bond for mutual protection we find in Hungary, but the policy of covenanting was not carried out over that country as it was in Scotland. We are quite sure that but for some such combination in Scotland it would have gone hard for the cause of the Gospel in the end. And if Hungarian Protestants had all combined in a solemn league and covenant for their protection, they might have fared better; for the policy of the Jesuits was to attack them piecemeal in all parts of the country, and wear them out by bitter and protracted sufferings. The argumentum ad baculum (appeal to the stick) was the only argument in the least degree effectual; they robbed, insulted, cajoled, worried the Protestants incessantly, till life became unendurable, and, save in the case of the most earnest and inflexible, pastors and people in instances innumerable at last submitted to the Church of Rome.

What the Protestants complained of in the beginning of Leopold's reign was that the laws in their favour were not observed, and that, in opposition to these laws, churches were taken from them, and wrongs and indignities without number inflicted. They petitioned the king on his ascending the throne to redress their wrongs; he put the matter off till the next meeting of the Diet, and it happened that the Diet did not meet for three years. Meanwhile the wrongs and sufferings of the Protestants continued unabated.

Here are some samples of the wrongs they had been suffering, as set forth in their petition. In seventeen counties they had been robbed of many of their churches, which had been turned from Protestant to Catholic worship. Prince Paul Esterházy had endeavoured to persuade his tenants to become Catholics, and when they refused, had sent dragoons to compel them. Count Nádasdy, once a Protestant, had driven out the Protestant inhabitants of a village by soldiers, who pursued them, and compelled all that they caught to turn Catholics. In other places he had banished the pastors and smashed the furniture of their houses. In one case he had sent for the keys of the church, got hold of a priest, and compelled the people to receive the Communion in the Romish form. He had placed men in a wood to apprehend the Protestants as they passed along; the Protestants were robbed of their clothes and sent home naked. This Nádasdy, however, was himself found guilty of rebellion, and sent by the king to the scaffold. When mounting it, he is reported to have said, "The Lord is just in all His ways," which the Protestants interpreted as denoting that he felt he was punished justly for his shameful deeds.

Stephen Pilaric was pastor of the church at Beczko. Count Nádasdy sent a military escort to bring all his books to his castle of Cseithe; he ordered a fire to be kindled, and all the property and books of the pastor, with the exception of his official gown, to be thrown into it; the Bible was put on a spit, and turned round before the fire, greatly to the amusement of the count and his friends. A puff of wind blew several of the leaves into the hall where the count was sitting, one of which was driven right on to his breast. The count read it: it was part of the fortieth chapter of Isaiah:—"The grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the Word of God shall stand for ever." He rose immediately and left the hall.

In this way many churches were seized, pastors banished, congregations "converted." The process of conversion was sometimes rather too rapid. In Mishdorf, for example, the soldiers broke into the church during divine service, and barricaded the doors till the mass was celebrated, and the congregation, having witnessed the mass, necessarily became Catholics! Sometimes the people were compelled by physical force to take the wafer. A peasant at Mijwah, being threatened with that process, cried out in the church, "I vow by the living God that if you thrust the wafer into my mouth, I will bite off your fingers!"

The conduct of Leopold in other matters led to a formidable political conspiracy against him, in which, no doubt, many Protestants joined. That it was not an affair of religion is apparent from the fact that Count Nádasdy (of whom we have just been speaking) was one of the principal conspirators, and when this was found out he was put to death. But, as might have been expected, the conspiracy became the occasion of renewed and most bitter persecution of the Protestants. More churches were seized, more pastors banished, and more congregations "converted." Sometimes a conspicuous testimony for the truth would be given, as in the case of an old man, Nicolas Drabik, who was put to death in 1671. He had been one of the "Moravian Brethren," but owing to the Bohemian persecution, had fled to Hungary.

"The Archbishop of Grán used to amuse himself and his guests after his dinner parties by summoning the Reformed pastors into his presence."—p. 273.

"Entirely destitute of learning, and knowing no other than the Bohemian language, he had fancied himself enlightened by the Spirit of God, and written a book full of prophecies of judgment on the House of Austria. The two Ferdinands and Leopold were covenant-breakers; the House of Austria was the House of Ahab—a cruel, perjured House, which ought to be rooted out; to the Catholics he prophesied speedy and utter desolation." For a moment the old man wavered in his allegiance to Protestantism, but immediately became ashamed of his vacillation. He was executed on the 16th of July. "His right hand was first to be cut off, then his head; the tongue was to be taken out and nailed to a post, and his writings burned in the market-place, together with his body. Some say the tongue was torn out while he was yet alive."

But these were only the beginning of sorrows. The work of conversion was not going on fast enough to please the Jesuits, and more rigorous measures must be adopted.

The first step was taken by the Archbishop of Grán, who summoned before him thirty-three Protestant pastors from a particular part of Hungary. The indictment refuted itself by its very absurdity. They were accused of having incited the people to rebellion; of giving Roman Catholic children horrible food; of having betrayed Popish priests to Turks and rebels; of having murdered nine priests; of having despised and trodden on the sacred wafer; of having stolen the consecrated vessels; of having made flags of the priests' vestments; of having blasphemed the Virgin Mary and the saints. The charges, as any reasonable man may well believe, were pure fabrications, but the pastors were found guilty. Count Illyesházy appealed to them in their own interest to make submission, for he knew they would receive a horrible sentence; four of them would be put to the torture, have their hands cut off, and be then beheaded. The rest would have a terrible exile. The clergy did not show the courage that befitted them; one of them recanted; his name was Suhajda, which formed the anagram, "Ah, Judas!" Most of them signed a document admitting themselves rebels, agreeing to leave the country, greatly to the distress of their flocks, who were left to be trodden under foot, and who thought that if their pastors had been more firm some relief would have been accorded to them.

The success of the priests in silencing upwards of thirty pastors emboldened them to try new measures on a larger scale. The next citation summoned not fewer than two hundred and fifty, but probably nearer four hundred pastors and office-bearers, mostly of the Lutheran Church, but partly of the Reformed. The accused vindicated themselves from all charge of crime, but nevertheless sentence was pronounced against them, and the sentence was beheading, confiscation, infamy, and outlawry. The sentence of death, however, was not carried into execution. The pastors were completely in the hands of their foes; to their flocks they were as good as dead, and instead of being slain they were allowed to choose between abdicating their office and leaving their country.

Most of the Lutherans demitted their office, but others, chiefly Calvinists, were firm, and awaited the course of events. Only one Calvinist pastor and one schoolmaster signed the document; the rest refused to depose themselves from the ministry, nor did they wish to emigrate, because, being little acquainted with German, they saw no mode of usefulness for them in foreign lands. This refusal was highly provoking, and means were taken to break their spirit. They were thrust into dark and filthy cells, and exposed to the roughest treatment. Here is a description of their condition, which we find at the end of a copy of Jurieu's "Pastoral Letters": "They put irons on their feet, all filled with nails which passed through their shoes and stockings, and pierced their very flesh. The prison where they were put was dark as hell, a low stinking dungeon, full of excrements, mud, dung, rats, serpents and toads, into which they could not enter but on their hands and feet." From such dungeons they were only taken to hard labour utterly beyond their strength. "And because these martyrs (to whom they did not give of coarse black bread a quarter so much as was necessary to nourish them, and almost no water) could not lift up their hands nor set one foot before another, they were beaten with rods, staves, the butt-end of muskets, and cords moistened and full of knots." One valiant pastor, because he would not sign the paper submitted to him, was so furiously and unmercifully beaten that he died from the effects. The Archbishop of Grán, like the Philistines with Samson, used to amuse himself and his guests after his dinner-parties by summoning the Reformed pastors into his presence, loading them with insults, and sometimes descending to personal violence, because they would not sign their resignation. One of them he struck with a hammer so violently that the arm was rendered almost completely useless. The prisoners had to perform the meanest offices; in the middle of winter, with the thermometer many degrees below the freezing point, they had to remove the ice and snow with their bare hands, and clean the sewers. Though they were half-starved, it was a crime for anyone outside to give them food. Some lay in narrow cells, partially exposed to rain and snow, among thieves and murderers, who mocked them when they prayed.

We have no space to go into all the details of torture by which their persecutors sought to wear out these saints of the Most High. As we have said, there was a considerable number who resisted every attempt and endured to the end. On the 18th of March, 1675, they were ordered to Italy, to be sent to the galleys. It was an awful fate. Galley slaves were chained to the bench where they sat from year's end to year's end, obliged to sleep in that attitude as best they might, getting no relief in pain or sickness, and left to die without care or pity. When they heard of their fate, the poor men embraced each other and wept, while they pledged themselves once more not to yield. With their feet chained together, they travelled from Vienna to Trieste. At nights they lay together in stables; they scarcely obtained sufficient food; many fell sick, four died in the prison at Trieste, and other two on the road. From Trieste they proceeded to Naples. One fell on the road and died on the spot. Near the end of the journey another entered into his rest. Three succeeded in making their escape. The remainder reached Naples on the 1st of May; they were sold for thirty Spanish piastres apiece, and being divided among the boats, were chained to the benches.

In the course of a short time twenty more pastors were marched to the shores of the Adriatic, where they endured such treatment that their teeth fell out, and several of them died. Some of them, overborne by torture and misery, at last gave way. The rest maintained their integrity to the end.

The situation of Protestants in these countries was so terrible that even Charles II. interposed on their behalf. More effectual aid was rendered by the States-General of Holland, under whose instructions Admiral Ruyter, with the Dutch fleet, went to Naples, and obtained the release of the pastors. On the 11th of February, 1676, the prisoners forsook the places of their confinement, singing the 46th, 114th, and 125th Psalms. The Admiral told them that "of all his victories, none had given him so much joy as the delivering these servants of Christ from their intolerable yoke."

Such were the effects of the "wearing-out" policy of the Jesuits in Hungary. They did not often burn their victims, for the example of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, and many more, had shown that the fire of martyrdom was apt to promote the cause of the Gospel. The Hungarian martyrs had a more trying ordeal. The fact that so many yielded only shows how hard it was to bear, and redounds all the more to the credit of those who endured. Irreparable damage was done to the Protestant churches. But there are yet three millions of Protestants in Hungary; every Christian will love them for their fathers' sakes, and will pray that God may yet give them a season of reviving, enabling them to hold forth the Word of Life, and to become once more a great Evangelical force in the dark Empire of Austria.

"AGAIN, AGAIN, AND AGAIN."

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, D.D., AUTHOR OF "ECCE VERITAS," "THE YOUNG MEN OF SCRIPTURE," ETC.

"ITERUM, iterum, iterumque."—"Again, again, and again." Such was the motto wittily adopted by the English dramatist Samuel Foote, after he happily became the possessor of a third fortune, when two previous fortunes had been entirely squandered away. "Again, again, and again" he had been favoured; and placed each time in an increasingly responsible position. With each new endowment he had the experience of the past to guide him, and had less excuse to furnish for any misuse of his possessions.

Samuel Foote's motto may be adopted by every reader of this paper in relation to the mercies he has received. Not once, not twice only, has God blessed us, but "again, again, and again." It would be an interesting calculation if the reader could survey his past life and tabulate the number of mercies, in the form of meals, he has received; the number in the shape of suits of apparel, and the number in the persons of friends to cheer life's pilgrimage. Suppose you are twenty years of age, then God has placed upon your breakfast-table 7,300 refreshing repasts to fit you for the day's duties. And if you have partaken of four meals a day, then in twenty years the bountiful Giver of every good and perfect gift has provided for you no fewer than 29,200 meals. This is irrespective of the delicious fruits which He has oftentimes showered into your lap between the stated meals. Are all these mercies to be received and employed by us without acknowledgment? It is, alas! much to be feared that the frequency with which God bestows His gifts induces within us a spirit of forgetfulness. Emerson, in his first chapter on "Nature," truly writes: "If the stars should appear one night in a thousand years, how would men believe, and adore, and preserve for many generations the remembrance of the city of God which had been shown! But every night come out these envoys of beauty, and light the universe with their admonishing smile." And now because the dark canopy overhead is studded with these glittering orbs, it is only very occasionally that our admiration is called forth. Night after night they are there, but they are ignored by us. So day after day, night after night, week after week, month after month, year after year, God anticipates and makes provision for our necessities—"again, again, and again" the good things come to us, and we are too oblivious of the importance of the gifts, the goodness of the Giver, and the obligations of the recipient. As the ocean receives into its bosom the waters of a thousand rivers without being itself any fresher, so men take the innumerable blessings bestowed by Heaven without looking heavenward with gratitude. This ought not so to be. "Again, again, and again" should we praise the Lord, mindful of our incessant dependence upon Him. The words of thankfulness, which are but the outward expression of the inner feeling, gratitude, should be ever upon our lips, like the dewdrops which hang tremblingly upon the petals of the flower ready to fall before the first breeze that passes. It is said that in some of the old monasteries the chanting of praises never ceased, one choir taking up the duty when the other concluded. But with many of us the praise is transient, like the music we now and then produce, leaving the instrument closed and untouched for long intervals. David made thanksgiving his life-work. "As long as I live I will praise Thee." Let us say, "Again, again, and again" I will praise the Lord, Who "again, again, and again" has bountifully remembered me!

But this motto adopted by Samuel Foote should express the purpose of our life in another way. It should be the utterance of our spirit in relation to our militant duty. It should declare the dauntlessness, the determination, the dogged perseverance of heart, with which we commence and continue our life-task. No man has climbed high and written his name on time, "as on a pedestal," without effort, repeated and prolonged effort. "Again, again, and again" he has applied himself before success crowned his toil. We do not forget how Robert Bruce, lying awake in the barn where he had fled for shelter, saw a spider climbing a beam of the roof; how that spider again and again fell, but again and again attempted to reach the roof; how on the thirteenth time the little creature succeeded; how Bruce said to himself, "This spider teaches me perseverance; twelve times have I been beaten, the thirteenth I may succeed;" and how with renewed courage Bruce rallied his followers, and was crowned king.

When the terrible American war, which gave the death-blow to slavery, was being waged, a gentleman said to President Lincoln, "Do you expect to end this war during your administration?"—"Can't say, can't say," was the reply.—"But what do you mean to do?" was the next query.—"Peg away, peg away—keep pegging away!" replied Lincoln. It was by the pegging away process that freedom was won. The Persian poet says, "To the persevering man the blessed immortals are swift." When Diogenes offered himself as a disciple of the cynic Antisthenes, he was refused. Persisting in his request, the cynic lifted a knotty stick, and threatened to strike him if he did not withdraw. "Strike," said Diogenes; "you will not find a stick hard enough to conquer my perseverance." Carey, surrounded by many volumes from his own pen, modestly said, in his old age, "I can do one thing: I can plod." Happy the man who can so speak. In business, in art, in science, in literature, and in religion, we have lost much from the lack of plodding. Little discouragements have too frequently diverted our attention from what should have been a solemn and lifelong work. We are too frequently represented by the stupid scholar who, in class, was reading with his companions the third chapter of Daniel, and could not pronounce the words, "Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego." A few days afterwards the master selected the same chapter, and it fell to the lot of the backward scholar to read those words again. He progressed admirably till he came to the names, when he stopped, and said, "Teacher, there 's them three names again." So we, instead of conquering the difficulty—instead of "again, again, and again" attacking the obstacle—take flight before it—"the names" are encountered with no disposition to conquer them. Shakespeare truly says—

> "He is not worthy of the honey-comb
> That shuns the hive because the bees have stings."

The tiny coral insect might be our teacher. By its minute but incessantly repeated efforts, the Pacific Ocean is being enriched with islands, which, unlike those produced suddenly by volcanic agency, will be enduring and serviceable. Patient persistence has often atoned for lack of power. Industry has achieved by a succession of efforts what another man's genius may have performed at a stroke. But genius has been defined as being "the infinite capacity for taking pains." "Again, again, and again" has been the secret of the success of all great men. Old General Blucher, though beaten almost every time he entered into battle, would in a very brief space of time re-gather his routed forces, and appear as formidable as ever. Hence the Germans call him "Marshal Forwards." Garibaldi could not secure the freedom of Italy at once. Disappointment and difficulty beset his career. But he worked and waited, and never wavered: re-visiting Italy now and again; but, whilst a fugitive, doing his utmost to bring every possible influence to bear in the one direction on which his heart was set. At last he triumphed. Jenny Lind, when young, lost her voice for four years, but, nothing daunted, kept at her theoretical studies. When she repaired to Paris for study, her elected teacher said, "My child, you have no voice left," and ordered her rest. Still she worked on with incomparable energy, often weeping herself to sleep when she recalled the teacher's words. But her fame soon became world-wide. It was the faithful repetition of effort, the "again, again, and again," that made her the "Swedish Nightingale."

Doubtless you have seen the manuscript copies of some of Charles Dickens' works exhibited at the South Kensington Museum. You cannot inspect them without being impressed with the amount of careful work bestowed upon each novel. "Again, again, and again" the author read, re-read, erased, interlined, corrected, and improved before the copy was given to the printer. It is said of Alma Tadema, the well-known Academician, that he sits down every day at his easel, though occasionally without enthusiasm, and paints and paints on till the inspiration seizes him. It is thus that great things are done, and positions of influence and renown reached. Wordsworth, in his "Excursion," immortalises such a case when describing a miner who toiled for twenty years in search of a given object, and found it. He

> "Alone
> Urged unremittingly the stubborn work,
> Unseconded, uncountenanced; then, as time
> Passed on, while still his lonely efforts found
> No recompense, derided."

But the poet tells of the poor man's ultimate success.

> "Conspicuous to this day
> The path remains that linked his cottage door
> To the mine's mouth: a long and slanting tract
> Upon the rugged mountain's stony side,
> Worn by his daily visits to and from
> The darksome centre of a constant hope.
> * * * * * *
> And it is named, in memory of the event,
> The Path of Perseverance."

The same motto, "Again, again, and again," needs to be adopted in our religious life. A Christian's career is one of constant conflict. Spiritual foes must be faced each day and every day till the end of our pilgrimage. The "sword of the Spirit" and the "shield of faith" must be used repeatedly. Every step in our onward path has to be contended for.

The throne of grace has to be incessantly visited. We must go "again, again, and again" into the audience chamber of the King of kings. The seed of the Kingdom has to be sown with unwearied heart and hand. Not once or twice has the testimony for Christ to be borne; not once or twice has the vineyard to be tended, the tender plants trained, and the weeds uprooted: "again, again, and again" we must go about our Master's service. He cries to us, "Be not weary in well doing, for in due season ye shall reap if ye faint not." "Pray without ceasing, and in everything with prayer and supplication make your request known unto God." "Be thou faithful unto death."

"Come, labour on:
No time for rest, till glows the western sky,
While the long shadows o'er our pathway lie,
And a glad sound comes with the setting sun,
'Servants, well done!'

"Come, labour on:
The toil is pleasant, the reward is sure;
Blessed are those who to the end endure;
How full their joy, how deep their rest shall be,
O Lord, with Thee!"

DOWN THE COWGATE.

"Three very modern worthies."

"AND that handsome spire up the road is——"

"That is the Chalmers Memorial Church," answered Mr. Fraser in a rather important tone.

"Oh, I thought his work lay more in the Cowgate and its suburbs."

"Of course it did; but there was no actual necessity for perpetuating his memory exactly on the same spot."

"I suppose not," I said, turning round from the window to confront my host. It was the first time he had acted in that capacity, and it was also my first day in Edinburgh. "I suppose not; only one always associates his name with that famous locality. It seems somehow quite out of place in such a respectable neighbourhood. You must know all those old places well?"

"Not any more than I am obliged to; but if you would like a turn through them, I could take you down to-morrow afternoon—only it's not by any means a romantic locality now, let me tell you."

Perhaps not to him. Mr. Fraser, I had already found out, was an exceedingly practical and business-like personage; but for people generally, who had not attained to that altitude, there must still be a visible story graven into the very stones of those ancient streets.

The grey November day was already darkening down when we crossed the Grassmarket the next afternoon, and began our pilgrimage through the busy regions that once folded in such a different scene. There was a venerable house before we had taken many steps, where one could almost fancy some enthusiastic Jacobite conference was still going on, but instead of the gay gallants who ought to have thronged the pavement in front, three very modern worthies were standing with their backs against the wall, two of them holding forth with great power upon the shortcomings of one Tam Tampson, who appeared to have recently raised his tariff for sleeping accommodation.

"I'd no have believed it of ony ither body, but there's no a mean trick he wadna condescend to for siller; man, he told me aboot it his ain sel."

"And a miserable hoose at the price—never a blink of a decent fire; he'll no find it pay in the long run, I'm thinking. There's mair hooses than his to be had for the seeking."

The third man took no part in the discussion, he was staring dejectedly down the street, that unmistakable stamp of better days in every feature. His companions looked quite capable of standing up for their rights, real or imaginary, but he belonged to a different class, and the silent sufferers incomprehensible music that only a Scotchman ever thoroughly appreciates.

We did not help him in his efforts at a living; it would have seemed quite a liberty to interrupt him even for his own benefit. In the presence of a genuine artist one has need to be respectful.

"If you want a garment of any sort, shape, or description, ancient or modern," remarked Mr. Fraser a stage further on, stopping before a second-hand shop just lighting up, "you will be able to get it here either by exchange or for cash down. We have had occasion to deal with one or two shady transactions in connection with this same place."

The frontage was not extensive, but the back stretched away into a dim vista of wearing apparel,

"Either exchange or cash down.

are usually those who stand most in need; there was a loose shilling in my pocket, and I slipped it into his hand.

"I am afraid you are not very well; will you take that and get some hot soup or coffee."

He did take it, with an astonished face certainly, but without any attempt at thanks. Mr. Fraser hurried me on rather grimly.

"Come, come, that sort of thing won't answer in this neighbourhood. The fellow is just an idle loafer; he ought to be out looking for work instead of lounging about at this time of day. If you really want to be charitable, here is the sort of man who deserves encouragement—he is doing something for his living. Bagpipes mean pretty hard work, though you might not think it."

They belonged to a stately, dignified old pensioner slowly stalking past, his whole attention concentrated on his screeching pipes, the shouting juveniles about him, the rattle of carts, and shrill cries of fish hawkers, alike unnoticed, in the swelling, suspended from the ceiling as though the owners had with one accord committed suicide by hanging themselves. Smaller trifles in the way of shoes, bonnets, and mufflers were exhibited in bundles outside, guarded by a grim old woman on the step. A wizened, sharp-faced man in a Kilmarnock bonnet had opened negotiations for a pair of boots, and was dealing out disrespectful comments upon them with great freedom.

"And how mich wad ye have the conscience to want for them?"—after diligently pointing out their weak points.

"Twa shillings."

"Twa bawbees, ye mean."

"Twa shillings; pat them doon if ye dinna need them."

"Ma certes! I'm thinking ye'll look lang for a buyer."

Close by were standing two Highlanders, their gay uniforms making quite a dash of colour in the place. They were busy complimenting two bare-headed girls, and offering gratuitous advice upon the boot bargain.

"Our present-day heroes," I remarked sedately to Mr. Fraser.

JESSIE'S FATHER.

"Yes," he returned as sedately; "they have both the Afghan and Egyptian medals—the big fellow has four of them, I see."

With that the conversation lapsed. The man went away in triumph with his boots; the matter had ended in a compromise on both sides; and we slowly threaded our way along the crowded pavement. It was growing rather difficult to keep up any vivid impression of the Stuart glories. There was one deep carved stone doorway, crowned with curious little pepper-caster turrets, that had doubtless been the abode of brave knights once. A sickly, broken-down man was sheltering under it now. He shuffled out a pace or two as he saw us, with a pitiful request for a copper.

"It's unco hard to git wark the noo, sir, or I'd no be asking it."

"What is your work?"

"Onything I can get, maister; carrying things hame frae the sale-rooms maistly," he explained, with a hoarse fit of coughing.

"Does that child belong to you?" demanded Mr. Fraser, suddenly.

It was a tiny, ragged damsel, further back in the doorway, watching us from under a mop of tangled dark hair.

"Aye—Jessie, mak the leddy a bit curtsy."

Jessie made her "bit curtsy," and slipped up closer behind her father, tightly clutching a battered tin can. Mr. Fraser had a tender spot somewhere in his practical composition for the bairnies, and surreptitiously dropped a sixpence and a sweetie into the tin can. He gave the father an order on some lodging-house for the night—"though I doubt you'd do better in the Infirmary," he said, as he handed it to him.

"Maybe; but I canna leave the lassie; they'll no tak her in too."

"Is there no person you could leave her with?"

He shook his head, and dragged himself back to his doorway. Mr. Fraser made one more inquiry as we left him.

"Doesn't this close lead into the High Street?"

"Aye; straight on."

Straight on, indeed! It was a veritable corkscrew, with here and there a flight of steep steps and a slippery gutter across; but it did lead us into the High Street, where a little higher up—outlined against the sky—we saw the ponderous crown of the old Scottish Cathedral, St. Giles.

And there for two hours or more, past all extension for that day, we suspended our Cowgate pilgrimage; we argued and discoursed, with a fair amount of personal one-sidedness, of that worthy but undoubtedly obstinate divine John Knox, of the great Montrose, of the "bluidy Mackenzies," and the Covenanters' struggles against the powers that were. In one of the side chapels a thinly attended service was going on, and a middle-aged man with a strong, deep voice was reading the lesson; we sat down out of sight behind a distant pillar to listen.

"Behold, a sower went forth to sow, and some seed fell by the wayside, and the fowls came and devoured it; some fell upon stony places; some fell among thorns, which sprang up and choked it; and other fell upon good ground, and brought forth fruit, some sixty, some an hundredfold."

There the reader ended, and we went softly on to another aisle; presently the tiny congregation melted away. As the minister passed on his way to the vestry, Mr. Fraser stepped forward and greeted him as an acquaintance of his own, and a rather useful one he proved himself, taking us through parts of the building we might not have seen otherwise, and expounding its grandeur with considerable eloquence and length. When he finally let us out into the deserted Parliament Square, it was too late for any question but that of finding our way home without delay.

Still, the nearest way took in a portion of the Canongate—indeed, the cathedral windows look right down it. A brilliantly lighted public-house adorned the first corner, and a disturbance of some kind was taking place in the doorway.

"Just putting out somebody who has taken as much as is good for him," observed Mr. Fraser philosophically, as we went out into the roadway to avoid it; but either we miscalculated the distance, or affairs inside had reached an unforeseen crisis, for when we were exactly opposite the door, the offender was suddenly propelled into Mr. Fraser's arms, where he remained perfectly indifferent to his exceedingly chilly reception. Limp and helpless though he was, it struck us oddly that his face had a familiar air. Light flashed upon us both at the same moment.

"Why, that is my reduced gentleman!" I cried.

"And your shilling has helped him into this plight," returned Mr. Fraser. "Where are the police? Missing, as usual."

"Here! I'll tak the chairge of him," put in a broad voice behind; "it's no that often he gets the chance of a bit pleasure."

"Does he live with you?" demanded Mr. Fraser, cheerfully relinquishing his burden to him of the anti-Tam-Tampson league.

"Whiles, noo and again; he's no great things, ony way, puir feckless body."

We hurried on, a little downcast at the incident. A heavily laden waggon of bales and packages was lumbering along beside us down the street. Presently it tried to turn sharply off up some side opening, and whether the strain was too great for the horses to manage, or the check too sudden, we could not distinguish, but the ponderous mass quivered and slipped, the cords that held it snapped like threads, and, before anyone had time even to realise the danger, nearly the half of it had toppled over into the road.

Cries and shouts rose up on all sides. In that crowded thoroughfare many had been too close at hand to escape. I stood on a step alone, while Mr. Fraser lent all the help he could. A few minutes—though it looked long enough at the time—and he came back with a shocked, startled face.

"There are only two dangerously hurt," he said; "a man and a little child—and they are the two we spoke to in the gateway this afternoon."

"Oh, dear!" was all I could ejaculate.

"See, they are bringing them up: they will both get into the infirmary together, after all."

We watched the shutters go by in silence—the sickly father, who would never need to shelter from the November wind in any doorway again; the little ragged child, who would be quite sure of a reception in those wide wards now—and then, as silently, we walked back to the respectable neighbourhood where stands the Chalmers Memorial Church. Somehow the Stuart memories seemed a little overshadowed now by this later hero, who had fought for others—not himself.

"My shilling was lost, your ticket for that poor man's lodging was lost, possibly the child's sixpence, too," I summed up rather mournfully, as we waited for the door to open; "for any good of it, it might as well have been left undone."

"And perhaps not," was the response. "I fancy there was a lesson for us all in that parable of the sower this afternoon: he has to go on sowing all the same wherever the seed may fall—that is his part in the matter; and, with all the failures, still some did come up the right way, remember."

Months afterwards came to me a line from the old grey city: "You will be pleased, I think, to hear that little Cowgate Jessie is in one of our orphanages, and growing up a bright, bonnie lassie. Even if she should not turn out among the hundredfold, she will surely rank somewhere among the sixty-fold."

SARAH PITT.

THE END OF MY MISAPPLIED SHILLING.

THE FISHERMAN'S CHARGE.

BY F. BAYFORD HARRISON.

THOSE who work among the poor of the great city of Manchester are aware that its courts and alleys are no less squalid and no less unhealthy than similar courts and alleys in London. Indeed, the atmosphere of Manchester is far less pure than that of the metropolis, while there is less of beauty and grandeur in its buildings. The parks and squares and palaces of London, and the shipping on its mighty river, are noble sights, which are not equalled by anything in the great manufacturing town. One wonders how flowers and children can grow up in this "Cotton Capital," and, so wondering, we who dwell among them try hard to transplant the human blossoms, now and then, into fresh air and lovely scenery. We send our children to the country, kind persons paying for them on the boarding-out system.

Several children from my parish had been to the Welsh village of Llangwen; and when, last summer, I found I could take a short holiday, nothing seemed to me better than to go where the little ones had gone, and look after their welfare at the same time with my own. The railway took me within a couple of miles of Llangwen, and, with my bag in my hand, I walked on, and soon found a clean, quiet lodging in which to locate myself for the inside of a fortnight. That evening I spent lounging beside the moonlit sea, drinking in refreshment and strength from the mountain air and the sea-breeze which meet in friendly rivalry on the coast of North Wales. Next morning I went to visit the little members of my flock who were gambolling in these fresh pastures.

I had seen them all except one, and found them all well. Then I asked for the house of Mr. and Mrs. Richard Thomas, and was directed to a white-washed cottage on the hill-side above the village.

At the cottage I found an elderly woman—Rachel Thomas, as her neighbours called her—a clean, tidy, but rather sad-looking person. I told her who I was, and said that I wished to see Rose Anstead.

Mrs. Thomas's face brightened at the child's name: "Rosie is gone with my husband a little way higher up the hill. He thought maybe they might find some mushrooms to sell to the gentry visitors who come to our village."

"Up there?" I said, pointing with my stick to a faint line which meant a footpath, or perhaps only a sheep-track.

"Yes, sir, up there. You will find Rosie so fat and hearty—more like her name than when she came to us. Oh, it is a blessed deed of you clergymen and ladies to send the white-faced mites down to our fresh air!"

"Rosie has been with you a long time," I remarked: "nearly three months. We must soon think of getting her home."

"Not yet, sir—not yet," and Mrs. Thomas's eyes filled with tears; "we have got to love her so, and I do believe she loves us." With those words the good woman turned away, and I suspected that some sorrow in her heart, as well as the pleasure of a strange child's company, underlay her emotion.

"Well, I must talk to the ladies at Manchester, and see what we can afford for Rose Anstead. You know, she is not the only one; there are hundreds wanting the change as much as Rose, or more."

"Yes, very likely," said Mrs. Thomas, relapsing into her dreary manner.

I then said "Good-morning," and went up the footpath, which led out on the open hill-side. Here and there were low walls of stones loosely laid together to form enclosures for the sheep at night. Presently I saw those whom I sought—an elderly man in the garb of a fisherman, and a young child, were slowly walking about the grass with their eyes bent on the ground. As I watched them from a distance, I saw the child put her hand into the man's hand, and in response he took her up in his arms and carried her towards one of the stone walls. When I came within speaking distance, I saw that he had placed her on some pieces of rock piled at the end of a rather neatly built wall, and that she was leaning against him with loving trust.

"Why, Rosie," I called out, "have you forgotten me?"

She turned her head. "Is it the minister from Manchester?" she said, in a shrill yet refined voice.

"Yes, Rosie; I have come from Manchester to see you and all the other little children who are staying in this beautiful seaside place. I suppose this is Mr. Richard Thomas. How do you do? I hope you find Rosie a good girl."

"She is good," said Richard Thomas; "good enough to make up for the bad ones. Do you think her looking well, sir?"

The scene was a pretty one. The weather-beaten man in his picturesque garb, with a stern, serious face, only softening when he looked at the child, she a daintily dressed creature, whose delicate complexion had hardly yet been browned by the sun or reddened by the wind; the dull grey stones contrasting with the vivid grasses and wild flowers all around; on my right the fields toning brown and grey until they were merged in the blue of the mountains; on my left the wide sea, soft and shiny in the summer calm, with a line of yellow light on the horizon. We townsfolk thank God most heartily for natural beauty.

"She was leaning against him with loving trust."—p. 280.

"Yes," I said, "she is looking well. I wish her mother could see her."

"She is a little tired now," said Thomas, "so we will go home.—Rosie, will you pick up the basket of mushrooms?—there are not many, the weather is too dry for them—and then run down the path."

Rosie did as she was told, and led the way back to the cottage.

"I am afraid she must soon go home," said I, as we walked; "there are other children wanting change, and funds are none too abundant."

"She ought to stay a while longer," said Thomas, whose Welsh expressions I shall not attempt to reproduce; "she was very white and sickly when she came here."

"You would not wonder at that if you saw the place she came from. Her mother is a young widow with three children, Rosie the eldest. They can only afford a little back-room in a dark lane, stifling with heat in summer and with fog in winter; damp, smoky, everything that is horrible. And often, as I know, the children have not half enough to eat, and the mother even less than they."

"All the more reason," said Richard Thomas, "that Rosie should stay with us."

"It might be well," I said, "that one of the others should have a turn. It is chiefly a question of cost."

"Mrs. Anstead must have got some relations," said Thomas gruffly; "let them pay for Rosie."

I shook my head. "They will not do that, I am afraid."

He had now nearly reached the end of the footpath where it came out near the cottage.

"Look here, sir," cried the fisherman suddenly, "we'll take Rosie for less money, if you will let her stay with us."

I paused and looked full at him. His stern features were lighted up with eagerness, and his eyes grew soft as they followed Rosie, who ran on and disappeared into the cottage.

"Are you going down to the village, sir? because I'd like to walk with you. I want to speak to my mates about going out this evening, so your way is my way."

I inquired of him as to the fishing, and arranged to go with him that evening and see what sea-fishing was like. My fly-rod was little use to me while the streams were so low and the water so clear. But Thomas soon left the subject of his boat and came back to the child.

"You see, sir, my wife has grown so fond of Rosie that I am sure it would break her heart again to part with the child. She has had her heart broken once already, has my wife."

It was a curious expression. I asked, "How was that? Perhaps you will not mind telling me, as it is my business in life to comfort the sorrowful and help those in any need."

"Why—it was Martha——" There he stopped, grew very red, and dashed on again: "My wife has got a hole—an empty place in her heart, the place that Martha went out of. Maybe you have got a grown-up daughter, sir?"

I nodded.

"Think of her wanting to leave her home just that she might see the world! Such a world as it is to see, some of it! And to say she would go off with strangers before she had even asked leave of her father and mother! Not but what they were nice people; I say naught against them. But in my young days boys and girls did not step outside the door without saying 'May I?'"

Richard Thomas was reviving his old anger. "In these days," said I, "young people have more liberty than they used to have in our days; and I agree with you that they often take more than is good for them. But why did your daughter wish to leave home?"

"She said," answered Thomas, with a sneer, "that she wished to be off our hands, and to earn her own bread!"

"Surely that was a right feeling."

"We did not want her to go. She should have asked leave. She engaged herself as housemaid to the lady, who was a visitor, like as you may be, and then she came home and said to her mother, 'I've got a place, and I'm going to the other side of Chester, and I shall cost you no more money.' It near broke her mother's heart."

"But—but, Mr. Thomas," I put in, "why did you object to her going to a good situation?"

"I did not object to her going, but I objected to the way of her going. I know I'm determined in my will, and Martha took after me and was headstrong too. I got angry, and my wife got angry, and Martha was most angry of all. She said she would go, and I said she might go provided she would promise not to come back again; and so she did go, and that broke her mother down."

While the fisherman was telling me this, I was wondering at the marvellous perversity of the human heart; self-will and pride had parted parents and daughter, and, apparently, on neither side was there any hope of meeting any more in this world.

"And that is why," added Thomas, "little Rosie Anstead does my wife so much good; she fills up that gap in a sort of way." The sob which caught his breath showed that the gap in his own heart was not filled up.

He then spoke about our fishing expedition in the evening, and said no more of his daughter or of Rosie; and I said no more on either subject, though I was not without hope of bringing about a reconciliation between Richard Thomas and his Martha.

The fishing was very successful; it occupied all the night and some of the small hours of the morning, and was an exciting though rather a silent process. Afterwards I was not inclined for much more than a stroll; but the second day after it I paid a visit to Mrs. Thomas, having previously watched her husband take Rosie to the school, and then sit down to the lengthy business of mending his nets.

I soon brought the conversation with Mrs. Thomas round to the subject of the absent Martha. "Your husband has never forgiven her, I perceive."

"No, sir. She never asked for pardon. My husband is a just man, but he is very hard. Yet I know how in his heart he frets after Martha, and that is why he has taken so to Rosie; a young thing, a girl thing, does so brighten the home."

"Now, tell me, Mrs. Thomas, have you never heard from Martha since she left home?"

"Oh yes, sir, many a time. She often wrote to me, but never to her father. I used to put her letters behind that china dog on the mantle-shelf, and sometimes, when I was out washing at the back, I used to peep in at the side-window over my pot of musk, and there was Richard, on the sly like, reading Martha's letter."

"Then his heart is not so hard as he wants to make out?"

"No. But when she wrote that she was thinking of getting married, he went into a passion fit to kill himself! He would not look at her letter, and, as soon as I told him what she had written, he said that if she married without his leave he would never forgive her if she went on her knees to him."

"I am afraid," was my remark, "that he has been very much in the wrong all through this affair. Did Martha ask his leave?"

"No; she was over twenty-one. She only wrote once more after I wrote what her father said. All she put in her letter was, 'I am married and as happy as the day is long.' Dear, dear! to think that I don't even know my girl's name!"

I tried to comfort Mrs. Thomas as well as I could, and I saw that all bitterness had long ago faded from her feelings. I left her this afternoon, and said that I would come again next day. And when I did, I found Thomas and Rosie also at home.

"Well, my child," I said to the pretty creature, "do you want to see mother?"

"Yes, I want to see mother. Please take me to mother. Why is mother such a long way off?" And the lip portended a sob.

"But, Rosie, do you want to leave Mr. and Mrs. Thomas?"

She glanced from one to the other. "Oh, no; I want them all—I want them all three."

"Well, we shall see.—Now, Mr. Thomas, look here: do you like plain speaking?"

"Plain speaking or none at all." His face was rigid.

"Then, I must tell you that I have been thinking it over, and I am sure that you have been more in the wrong than your daughter, though she has been very wrong too. But she has suffered more than you have, and has bitterly repented."

"How do you know?" cried Mr. Thomas sharply.

"I am sure of it. It must have been so. Richard Thomas, will you forgive your daughter, and take her back into your heart, if she humbly asks your pardon?"

"I'll wait till she does. I'll wait till she comes to me."

From the cottage I could see the bit of wall where the fisherman had seated his little charge with all the tenderness of a father. The man's heart could not be hard all through. And I could picture coming down the path on the hill-side a ragged, starving prodigal, son or daughter. "Listen! 'While his undutiful son was yet a great way off, the father went out to meet him.' If Martha, poor and sorrowful, were there on yonder path, would you go forth to meet her and greet her?"

He went outside and looked round, and came back.

Rosie's small voice broke in—"Is mother coming here? Oh, how beautiful!"

We all were startled. Then I said, "If you will not welcome your own daughter, will you welcome Rosie's mother—a lonely widow, toil-worn, careworn, cast-off, partly through her own fault, by those who should be the first to forgive her the follies of her youth and to accept the penitence of her later years?"

The fisherman muttered, "Rosie's mother may come; she can have Martha's room."

"There are two other children," I said cautiously.

"There is Dicky—he is such a darling!" piped Rosie; "and you don't know what a beauty little Ray is, though she is as white as a daisy, and has thin arms and crooked legs, and eyes as big as yours, Mr. Thomas, and just exactly like them."

I had my own reasons for wishing to get away from the cottage before the child's prattle raised up any difficulties or opposition. So I stood in the doorway with my hat in my hand. "Then I understand you to say, Mr. Thomas, that Mrs. Anstead and Dicky and Ray may come and occupy your spare room, if I can persuade the widow to do so?"

"Yes."

"You will not go back from your word whatever may come of it?"

"No."

I put on my hat, with exultation in my heart, when, to my horror, Mrs. Thomas pushed forward and asked eagerly, "How soon will you send for Martha?"

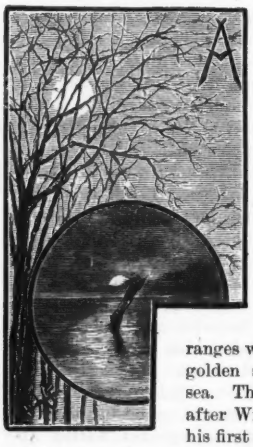
I thought she had spoilt everything, and I made no reply.

"How soon will you send for mother?" said Rosie.

"Richard Thomas, do you go back of your word?"

"No."

"Thank God! She is a great way off, but she is coming. By this time to-morrow, I hope."



I blundered away, hardly seeing how I went, down to the post-office, whence I telegraphed directions to my curate as to the journey of Mrs. Anstead and her children. I knew that neither he nor the widow would be surprised by my telegram, for some time ago I had planned to make the attempt which now had been carried out so successfully. Indeed, my visit to Llangwen had been made with this object in chief, and others only in the second place. I also wrote by the evening post a letter which Mrs. Anstead would receive next morning.

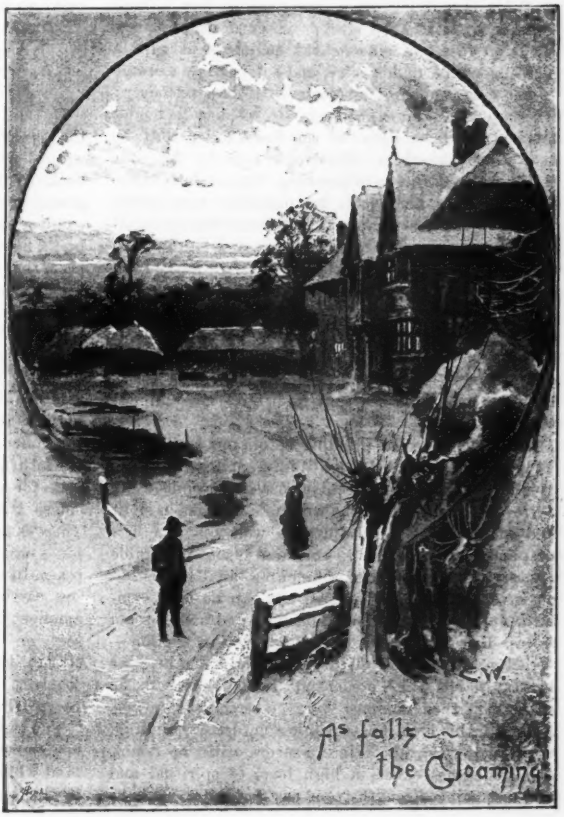
By the 4.23 train she arrived, with the little children and a very little luggage. I had a donkey-cart for children and bags, and I walked with Mrs. Anstead within sight of her girlhood's home.

While she was yet a great way off her father perceived her, and came out, and fell upon her neck and kissed her. And I, who had no right to intermeddle with their joy, set down the babies and the bundles on the sward, and led the donkey back to the village and its stable. And I did not go again to the cottage for several days. When I did so, I said farewell to the happy party of three generations, promising to settle everything in Manchester as regarded Martha Anstead leaving that town for good, and also some other matters which would add to her comfort in her new, or rather her old home.

A WINTER PASTORAL.

A RED sun low in the horizon, a glowing, golden disc, like the shield of one of Milton's archangels. The background—if such term may be fitly applied to sky—of a deep green, rather than blue, with fleecy amber bars set here and there in those fitting intervals which Nature so deftly arranges with mystic fingers, like golden strands in an emerald sea. This is the story of a sky after Winter has just given us his first preludings with strong and honest voice. This for the sky, but what of mother earth? Now and again, of late, there have come, half daringly, from the cold east, clouds of a preternatural bluish-grey—those clouds from forth which Shakespeare says that Mars "doth pluck the masoned turrets"—spangled with hail and fringed with icicles. These, as they trailed along the western hill-tops, were sometimes illumined by the setting sun, but their borrowed glory was short-lived, and the advancing twilight changed the fringe of purple into an uncertain depth of cold, nebulous, undefinable gloom.

When a few of those sunsets have come and gone—strange intervening gleams, bearing with them memories of autumn and prophecies of winter—at last the snow comes, gently and tenderly, and often with as sweet and loving touch as that of a mother spreading the spotless coverlet over her weary and treasured child. With what strange and tender silence that mysterious snow falls! and often, too, when all the world is asleep. And when the curtain of night is lifted, as comes the new-born day, we are reminded of the exquisitely tender words of the Psalmist—"He giveth His snow like wool."



After winter has hovered around our outposts for a space, giving us preludings of his inevitable approach in the ruddy sunset, the fierce north wind, and the stinging, merciless hail, he at last works his wondrous, though oft-repeated, miracle over all the earth. While men sleep he takes from his storehouse his drapery of snow, and when the world awakes all the land is hushed in a new mysterious silence, and clad in a virginal purity that all the other seasons could never hope to bring. There is a strange wonder of stillness on the earth. Even Night, with his calm, circling stars and his mantle of sleep, has no calmness like this.

But, though all sounds of man's labour have ceased, the earth has gained in beauty through this wondrous transformation. Nature has been dowered with a virginal spotlessness and purity which all the shining treasures of summer and autumn could never have bestowed. The earth is now clothed with a garment whose fibres have been carded and spun by the winds and the clouds, and which has been woven by unseen hands as it silently and gently fell. The forlorn and drooping relics of autumn's last hours—the tangled rose-bush, the limp, faded pansy, and the rusted marigold—are now hidden in tender kindliness, with a coverlet pure and shining as an angel's robe. All roughnesses are made smooth, and every dint and unsightly rift is rounded and toned with a skill which Phidias or Praxiteles never could approach. There is nothing harsh on earth's breast. Heaven's snowy robe, untainted as the light of the stars, has fallen on hill and dale, on thorp and town, for leagues around. The stately ancestral hall and the humble thatched cottage, the marble terrace and the sick boy's window-sill, the historic battle-field of old-world days, and the quiet, holy God's acre, are all lying peacefully under the stainless covering which the reverent soul accepts as a fresh revelation, containing in it a message alike suggestive of the beauty of holiness and the enfolding compassion of that "dear God Who made and loveth all."

If the wind has been strong over-night as the snow fell—strange that in a snowstorm even a strong wind makes little sound—it is interesting to study the snow-wreaths under the various aspects of light and shadow which the day may bring. In beauty of outline and grace of curve these wreaths are perfect. They stretch along hillside and valley, and sometimes are even formed across the highway, like waves of spotless marble petrified into the perfection of beauty of colour and form. Their curves in variety and grace are inconceivably perfect. The gradation of tints, from the clearest transparency on the upper portion of the overhanging curve down to the hollow of the half-arched wave, is wonderful alike in modulation and compass. If seen under the glow of a strong winter sunset these tints on and under the overhanging crest—liquid green, dark blue, or rich opal—fall on the sight with a crystalline splendour which will not readily be forgotten.

We have long had the feeling that Winter, in the main, has had but poor justice done him, both by sentimentalists and folks matter-of-fact enough. Certain analogists have finally set him down as the symbol of old age and death, thinking thereby that they have settled the dear old fellow's destiny and position for all time. Not so! The keenest students of Nature find in him a mystery and a majesty which all the rosy colours and the most brilliant sunshine of the other seasons can never reveal. Spring is dainty and sweet, but fickle. Summer is rich and luscious, but has a Delilah-like fascination—the siren's gift of sleep-giving song. Autumn—to the poet, as he thinks of the seasons—is sentimental and whining, in spite of his many-tinted garments and his spasmodic appeals to us as to colour and song. We see, however, that his is a dying cause, and that he has a hard struggle even to keep himself in good countenance. He is, in fact, not sincere, and he leaves us with a pleading whine in his voice, and a departing message which we cannot but associate with despondency.

Not so with Winter, however. He, too, has his tender touches and sensibilities of the finest order, only he does not make them offensive to you by for ever thrusting them into your presence. Painter he is of the highest order; no sunsets, for matchless blue, ruddy tint, and amber bars, can match those of Winter, in all the rolling year. Sculptor he is too, and works with material whiter than marble, and to finer issues than ever were given us in the masterpieces of Greece or Rome. Artist is he in all things, and that in the grandest and most dramatic order. What music is so solemn as his, as there rolls the breath of his hurricane through leagues of swaying pines, giving forth, to those who have the soul to listen, the sublimest psalms?

In this little bit of pleading before our readers, we happen to hold the brief for Winter, and we mean to give him our modest yet chivalrous defence, made up by reverie, analogy, and the wondrous mercies in sight and sound which Nature can so well bestow. His first and lasting dignity in our mind is his unalterable honesty. It is thorough, unflinching, final. He is not an inventor of genial phrases, nor can he turn compliments well; he knows nothing of drawing-room attire. He has, however, one grand, glorious quality—veracity. This is his signet-ring; and when he, year by year, hands us his credentials, sealed therewith, he expects neither nonsense nor un-veracity from us. After all, this is an unspeakable comfort to thinking, truth-loving mortals. He is a severe critic, no doubt, and sometimes exacts a high level of spiritual and self-sacrificing strength from us; but, after we have come out of the transaction—it may be duty, it may be sacrifice—are we not all the richer for it through the remaining varied music of our lives?

Winter has another grand point in his character, he never flatters you by any servile condescension; he may be gruff, but he is never rude, according to the vulgar acceptation of the term. Only the cold cynic who knows nothing of the charms of Nature or the love of human hearts would call him unkind; for has not his rugged generosity brought us for centuries the ever-recurring joys of the Yule-log? and does he not bring to us that exquisite angel-song at every Christmas-tide, that glorious chorus of heavenly minstrelsy which shall be the loftiest Christian idyll for all time: "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, goodwill towards men"?

The man who thinks that the beauty of the earth has passed away when the last russet leaves have fallen from the rugged oak and the "lingering ash" knows little of nature. If he should go abroad in the early day—on the condition that his soul could see and receive the message—he will find the east flecked with rosy cloudlets which summer at no time has ever seen. And it is only a peaceful winter morning—after a cold, petrifying frost has stilled earth and air overnight—that can reveal to perfection that calm cloudland scene, an example of slow but graceful movement so beautifully sketched by the poet:—

> "Underneath the young grey dawn
> A multitude of dense white fleecy clouds
> Were wandering in thick flocks along the mountains,
> Shepherded by the slow, unwilling wind."

By-and-by, just ere the sun rises from over the pine-fringed eastern hills, the low horizon—against which the firs stand black and weird—is all flecked with amber bars. They have not the rugged grandeur of those battalion-like clouds of a sultry summer day, but stretch along in thinnest fleece, each belt a floating cirrus of transparent gold. Here and there they lie in the low east above the awakening hills, like league-long shining strands on the rim of emerald seas. Then mounts the lordly sun in fiery scintillations, making at once a subtle change in cloudland. The spectrum bars fade away into dim yellow-white flecks of mist, while high in the zenith, where, till this magic moment, there seemed to be nothing but the deep azure of infinity, there suddenly start into our sight the most exquisite fleeces of pulsing warmth and glory. Then, and only then, strange to say—for all has hitherto been still as the grave—there comes the awakening breeze of a winter morning. There is now a long-continued and cold sough from the pines on the hill-side yonder, a sound which you hear psalm-like and solemn as you stand on the yet dreaming earth. Overhead the awakened breeze rustles amongst the stripped branches, and there fall at your feet, or flutter hard and crisp over to the frozen stream, in deep maroon or pale yellow, the stray, stubborn leaves of the gnarled oak and the stately beech which have outlived their fellows.

The earth now lies in the morning sunshine fair in her snowy dress. There is not an object in all the land which is not pleasing to the eye and refreshing to the soul. In our newly quickened wonder we do not seem to miss the thousand colours of our garden mosaics or the ebb and swell on the wind-swept fields of golden grain. This is not desolation, far less is it death, but only a wondrous robe of purity thrown over the sleeping earth, a beauteous revelation, making all things graceful, pure, and sweet.

Nor do the dwellings of men suffer from this new-born transformation. The solid, reputable farm-house, surrounded by the trim, cosy cots of its servants, is more homely and warmer-looking than ever it was at summertide; and, as the gloaming falls, one can see gleaming through all the windows the ruddy glow of cheerful fires. All natural sounds are sharper, as the air is crisp and clear. The lowing of the kine, as they slowly wend their way from the byre to the spring to drink, is fuller and richer; the cackling of the hens is more aggressive to the ear, while the cock's clarion has a brazen sound; the maiden's laugh is cheerier and more trustful, while the ploughman hums, with richer warmth, some dear old fireside song of love. All the sounds of life around the homestead seem to be inspired by human love and tenderness, either in possession or in sympathetic relationship. The vitreous treble of the robin has a ring of trusting joy in it as he pipes from his perch on the plough-handle to the pigeons cooing drowsily by the open barn door. All human sounds are healthier and more gladsome, and human hearts are nearer in touch; and in the eventide one can hear the merry jest and gleesome laugh from these open cottage doors; and maidens' faces beam in the ruddy glow of the firelight, and soft eyes respond to loving looks —for are they not drinking the pure joys of love in the fleeting hour and in the presence of the shepherd lads who have come to woo them, from over the dividing hills?

Some of our poets, as we all know, have left us charming pictures of winter. We all remember, and not without affection, the quiet, tender words of the bard of Olney:—

> "Oh, Winter, ruler of the inverted year,
> Thy scattered hair with sleet-like ashes filled,
> Thy breath congealed upon thy lips, thy cheeks
> Fringed with a beard made white with other snows
> Than those of age, thy forehead wrapt in clouds,
> A leafless branch thy sceptre, and thy throne
> A sliding car, indebted to no wheels,
> But urged by storms along its slippery way,—
> I love thee, all unlovely as thou seem'st,
> And dreaded as thou art!"

This, it is true, is not magnificent writing—Cowper never aspired to be dramatic—but it is truth, and in such sweet, homely array!

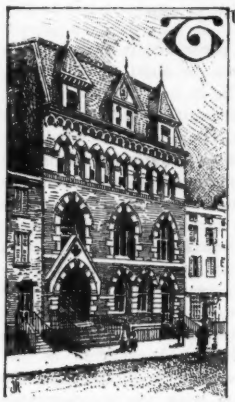
The Scottish poet Grahame paints a winter picture of a rural churchyard, as seen by the passer-by, which, in equal scope, could not be surpassed:—

> "High-ridged, the whirled drift has almost reached
> The powdered keystone of the churchyard porch;
> Mute hangs the hooded bell; the tombs lie buried."

Wordsworth has a most delightful and homely touch in connection with the contrast he draws between the cosiness within and the chill without during a snowstorm at night:—

> "How touching, when, at midnight, sweep
> Snow-muffled winds, and all is dark,
> To hear—and sink again to sleep."

And now, even though perchance it may be mid-winter, let us, like Memnon, be children of Aurora. The winter sunrise has in it music equal to that which the richest meadows of summer have ever waited for in luxurious trance. The winds, at intervals, from out their caves of darkness, may sweep around our dwellings with rough voice, but they are the same winds which have made, and to solemn issues, the pine trees their harps, and which have sent their music deep into the hearts of all men who have chosen to hear. Those winds, snow-laden though they be, come to us fresh from Olympus. In their loud song and their mysterious ebbing and flowing they remind us of the rise and fall which give the majestic swing to the rolling hexameters of the Odyssey and the Iliad, and lead us to feel that the poem of Creation goes on with an uninterrupted grandeur, ever nearing the central, compassing music of the eternities.



And now, ere we are, for the time, sundered from each other, in this our mutual winter musing, might it not be well that each of us should part tenderly with the genial, warm-hearted, though brusque old man? In many things he has given us exquisite delight, and that even in the midst of his gruff, frank honesty. And if he should suggest during his reign, and by his prescriptive right per calendar, the appropriateness of a heaven-arranged time of sleep for all the wearied earth, do not his final sunsets blend with the fresh, glowing prophecy of a new spring, with its faint pulsations of awakening life? If, in his stay with us, hail and snow are, at intervals, born of his breath, or if the diapason of his hurricane appals for hours the poor mortals of a moonless, storm-wrapped land, still, the dramatic splendour with which he clothes his every action and influence, however grand or subtle, makes us richer in wisdom and stronger in true strength. And, on his passing away, a departure not unmingled with pathos, we are led to feel that in contact with him we have received a new, mysterious, yet strong force, the force which the rugged grandeur of opposition and adversity brings. Nor is his going away unaccompanied by tenderness and forward-looking thoughts of hope; for his departing footsteps keep time to the first strains of the far-off music coming from the Eastern hills, and the early flickerings of spring give us the golden prophecy of the time "when the shadows shall flee away."

"THE CONSCIENCE OF THE STATES."

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE REV. JOHN HALL, D.D., NEW YORK.

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

FIFTH AVENUE CHURCH MISSION.

TURNING out of Broadway, in New York, and looking up Fifth Avenue, one sees nothing but mansions and church spires. Fifth Avenue might be called "Church Row." There are the "Brick Church," the "Church of Heavenly Rest," the "Church of the Divine Paternity," and others. There, too, are the Saracenic Synagogue of the Jews, and the large white marble cathedral of the Roman Catholics. There, too, rises the lofty spire and the open iron-work spirelette of the solid brown-stone Gothic church where Dr. John Hall ministers. It is said to have cost a million dollars, and that amount was readily subscribed by the wealthy Presbyterians. It is said that men representing four hundred millions attend that church, so that it would be easy for them to pay for such a holding.

Inside, the place is most commodious. The massive oaken pews are invitingly comfortable. Light falls through windows of faintly stained glass, the patterns of which it must be, alas! confessed, are too much derived from the turning of the kaleidoscope. The glare of the gas is toned by being placed behind ground glass in circular niches below each window, and the bad air is carried off by tubes above. A gradual slope leads from the entrance along the aisles to the rostrum. This is of carved oak, with a reading-desk. Over it is an elaborate Gothic canopy, which forms the seat of the organist and of the precentor, who, by his dark-coated prominence, somewhat detracts from the attention which should be given to the minister.

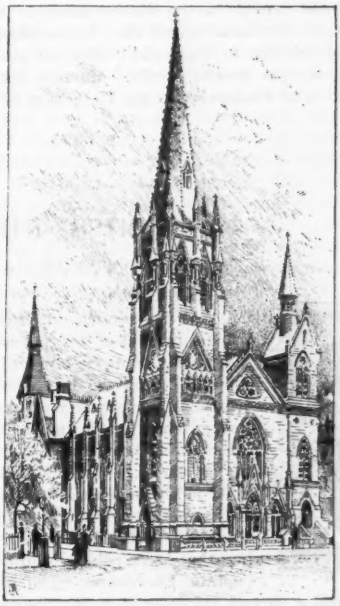
Strains of music so soft as scarcely to be heard are played preliminary to the coming of the venerated pastor.

Here comes Dr. Hall. Arrayed in Genevan gown, and carrying a small Bible in his hand, he ascends the pulpit. His rounded face and benevolent expression draw irresistibly your attention. With hands slowly and gracefully clasped, he seems to bow at once all hearts in prayer. The prayer is calm and devout—real prayer, and not made prayer.

The service on one Sunday afternoon when I was present was the Observance of the Lord's Supper. Before the celebration the minister read a list of thirty names of new members. Among them was a Chinese, Che Wung, who had been baptised during the week in the presence of a number of his fellow-countrymen at the mission building.

DR. HALL'S STUDY.

THE REV. JOHN HALL, D.D.
(From a Photograph by G. G. Rockwood, New York.)



Tenderly and earnestly Dr. Hall spoke of the uses the ordinance was intended to serve, of the opportunity it gave God's people to pledge themselves afresh to His service, and of the strength to faith which might be gained by its observance. He spoke of how, apart from knowledge of its meaning, its observance might be but a piece of formalism, of how love and obedience were implied, and of how it behoved us in every way to yield ourselves to the will of Christ. "Have there not been," he said, "some of us who have passed through the winter of the soul? All seemed blank and dead. Now let us have the springtide of joy and gladness." His words to the onlookers were pathetic and persuasive. There was no straining after effect, but the putting forth of chastened power and natural eloquence.

Overpowering was the effect of the uprising of the twelve hundred communicants singing, "According to Thy gracious Word, In meek humility." Very orderly and reverently were the sacred emblems distributed, and then, after more singing and prayer, we separated. I have attended several other services at that church, but none have been so impressive as that I have just mentioned.

On another occasion I heard Dr. Hall utter words that may well be cherished: "The memory of some men is like a message from Heaven! . . . When the indelible seal of character is set for eternity, it is too late to think of what our lives may speak in the memories of survivors!"

I have, on a former visit to New York, had the pleasure of dining with Dr. Hall, and seeing him in the freeness of home life; but on my recent visit I found him in a new home, far better furnished, and more artistic, quaint, and convenient than the old. A plot of ground was vacant, and likely to be used as a site for a store; but the trustees of the church purchased it. The old manse was sold, and a new one built next to the church. Had this not been done, a painfully plain and tall warehouse-looking building might have been erected, which would have been an eyesore, as well as effectual in dwarfing the tasteful Gothic church. Thirteen thousand pounds were paid for the land, and another twelve thousand expended on the manse. It is indeed a model of taste and convenience, and it ought to be for that amount. The entrance hall is diversified with broad twisted stairway. A little room at the foot of the stairs is the dining-room, and again in the cosy study I had talks with Dr. Hall on various topics. The study is not large, but is fitted with an annexe that can hold a number of volumes. The form of the fireplace would delight, I think, even Ruskin. I told Dr. Hall I wanted to sketch it, and he kindly left me for a time that I might do so uninterruptedly.

He showed me also, in the dining-room, how a recess had been built into which he could perfectly fit a sideboard, which had been a gift from his former congregation at Armagh, in Ireland. He brought out also a picture of wild deer sniffing the air: a picture which had been presented to him by an artist—Bierstadt—who had painted it under the inspiration of hearing a sermon of his: "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks," etc. The artist said, "You painted in words the picture; so to you, Dr. Hall, it belongs."

Through the kindness of Dr. Hall, I was enabled to attend the unveiling of the statue of the Pilgrim in the Central Park. He gave me his own ticket, and so I heard at close quarters Mr. George W. Curtis, the great political lawyer, deliver an oration which made my British blood tingle and thrill with admiring response.

Dr. Hall is of Scoto-Irish descent. His birthplace was County Armagh, Ireland. He was in Belfast College at the age of thirteen. Spite of his extreme youth, he was repeatedly Hebrew prize-man. As soon as he was licensed to preach—at the age of twenty—he was chosen as "students' missionary" in the west of Ireland. There he wrought well, and gained invaluable experience. Then he was chosen to be pastor of the first Presbyterian church in Armagh. A few years after he was called to the Church of Mary's Abbey, now Rutland Square, in Dublin. Here he became very popular, and pursued earnestly his studies. He became also editor of the Evangelical Witness, and he received from the Queen the honorary appointment of Commissioner of Education for Ireland. In 1867 he was a delegate from the General Assembly of the Church in Ireland to the Presbyterian Churches of the United States. He was earnestly welcomed, and his eloquent addresses were greatly approved.

After his return to Ireland, he received by telegram a call to the church where he now ministers. He had great difficulty in breaking away from his people. I was witness in Dublin of the intense affection in which he was held. He entered upon a wider sphere, and has filled it with honour to himself and benefit to the denomination to which he belongs. He has delivered the "Lyman-Beecher" course of lectures to theological students at Yale, and has written several works. He also occupies the position of Chancellor to the University of New York, and Chairman of the Board of Home Missions, and discharges the duties with regularity. He has several missions also under his care. Some of them might "run alone;" but they prefer to be cemented still with the parent-church. He goes in his schoolroom also every Sunday twenty minutes before service, and so encourages teachers and scholars.

Speaking of his work, Dr. Hall said, "I call on my people twice a year at their homes. I do not like preaching to people unknown to me. They, moreover, will not get so much good from my sermons as if they knew me. I am not a great preacher, and I know it; but my people know and love me, therefore they profit by hearing me. If a man comes out here and does something abnormal, or says something outrageous, it gets into the papers and he becomes notorious; but not if he goes on his way calmly preaching the Gospel.

"Various reports are circulated concerning my wealth, but I am not a rich man."

I smiled at this, as reports had been recently put in the papers that even his marriage fees amounted in six months to thirty thousand dollars, and that young ladies often stipulate with those to whom they promise their hands that they shall be married by the millionaire preacher.

Whether rich or poor, one cannot but feel that in any position of life Dr. Hall would have come to the front. He is so true, and humble, and persistent that he must have succeeded. People say of him now that "he is the conscience of the States." What he says is quoted, and taken almost as Gospel.

"Mind the steps," he said, as I left him and leapt down the massive, ornate flight into the great Avenue. It was brilliant with its lines of electric light, but I felt I had left a greater light by far within that quiet manse of the fashionable portion of New York, and one could only pray that he might long be preserved to lift up Christ as the true Light and Hope of the sinful and eager multitudes of this great gateway to the West.

MISS HILARY'S SUITORS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A WILFUL YOUNG WOMAN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER X.

GREAT was the amazement, tremendous the turmoil of tongues among the strictly domestic circle of Abbotswick, when the late mistress's disposal of her property was known among them. And known it was before the dethroned heiress quitted the old house. While Mr. Milroy stood in the porch waiting for his dog-cart, taciturn and thoughtful, Mr. Bevis within had been revealing the extraordinary tidings to Captain Cavenham. The young lawyer had a shrewd suspicion as to why the gallant officer hung about so anxiously, and, being himself neither over-generous nor over-sympathetic, he was uncommonly amused at the horror which overspread his listener's features. Even Wilkins, who was serving them with coffee, preserved his outward composure better, though for one second he felt as if down must go his tray—best china and all. Five minutes afterwards, when he had solemnly bowed poor crestfallen Captain Cavenham off the premises, he declared in the servants' hall that he had felt "struck entirely all of a heap; and as for what that Mr. Bevis had said, he couldn't bring himself to "believe it no ways"; and all his hearers agreed the news was incredible, and must be false.

But then had come a rousing peal of the drawing-room bell, and Mr. St. John's order, given in a voice husky with rage, for brougham and waggonette immediately. Mrs. St. John, flustered out of all reticence—never a strong point with her—had invoked Joyce's aid in a hurried packing-up, and confided to her, with torrents of tears, that poor Miss Hilary was going, never to return. "Miss Humphreys had left her next to nothing at all. Everything was 'that' Mr. Stafford's! And, dear, dear, dear! he must be very deep; and she was very miserable. Where she should put Miss Hilary to sleep in her small house she couldn't think. What a pity it seemed for them to be so cramped for space when there were a lot of rooms perhaps standing empty in this great house! And, oh! there were the children's things to pack. No one had ever called her a spiteful woman, but she did wish now, from the bottom of her heart, one of them had not been named Philippa. And why, why had she unluckily bought them two costumes each? and trimmed with corded silk! Sateen would have been amply sufficient, considering the circumstances."

In the midst of which lamentations up strode Mr. St. John, with terse directions for Miss Hilary St. John's personal requirements to be put together without loss of time. Then the young deposed mistress had been seen crossing the gallery, and disappearing for a brief space into Aunt Phil's chill, empty room. Returning, she had taken her heavily crape-trimmed hat from the hand of the half-scared woman, with a curiously wistful "Thank you," and, without farewell to any, looking neither right nor left, had passed down through the clusters of wondering, whispering servants, and so quitted the house of whose possession, one short hour before, all had felt her assured.

So it was actually true! It was no make-up of that sharp-eyed young lawyer. As the little cavalcade set off Brainford-ward, Wilkins, with a gasp of dismay, marched his subordinates off to their own regions, through the red-baize doors, and sinking into his own arm-chair, ejaculated with a groan——

"Well, of the whole of the craziest cranks our poor old missus ever treated us to, this last is the head one. There's no mistake about that;" which remark was received with a whole chorus of confirmation.

"It's what I shouldn't have suspected—never!" cried Mrs. Wilkins, her tone implying that for that cause alone Miss Humphreys' deed ought to have been beyond the pale of possibility. "For the missus that have remembered the whole of us proper and thoughtful like" (Mr. Milroy had just given the butler that agreeable information before leaving) "to go and serve her very own in such a fashion wholly puts me out. It's not as though Miss Hilary had angered her, nor worrited her, nor wexed her, and it do seem a shame!"

"It do!" echoed half a dozen voices; and Joyce, very red-eyed and plaintive, took up the tale.

"As for vexin' her, Miss Hilary never meant it, poor dear, but she did put missis out now and again. That I've seen full often, specially of late."

"As how, Miss Joyce?" questioned Wilkins, with a judicial air, that suggested getting to the root of the matter now.

"Oh, 'tisn't so easy to phrase how, Mr. Wilkins, but with orderin' this and that, and makin' as if she was real missus already; talkin' of things as if they was her own, and so forth. I know mistress was mighty put out when I just happened to be tellin' her some of poor Miss Hilary's plans for the garden that she'd just spoke about to Bell."

"Then, why," said Bell severely, "why did you talk on 'em at all, Miss J'yce?" Hilary's devotion to his flowers made her a huge favourite with Bell, spite of her occasional freaks in the way of cutting up lawns and paths. "When a womin have left off bein' a-seedlin', so to speak, one don't expect her to go sowin' mischief and rakin' up ill-will in families where she's planted. That's what I call turnin' out a regular noisome weed 'stead of a useful wegetable. What call had you to tell the poor old missus anything? Miss J'yce, I wonder at you!"

"So do I," said the cook, between whom and the lady's maid rankled a jealousy not unconnected with Mr. Bell. "I wouldn't have said a word to hurt the poor young lady, that I wouldn't!"

"Oh! go on; set upon me, all of you, do," cried Joyce, hysterically. "I wasn't fond of Miss Hilary at all; oh dear, no. I'd buttoned her boots and brushed her pretty hair and waited on her for fifteen years, off an' on, without carin' the least mite about her, of course. Why, I'm not going to say Miss Hilary was a angel, for she'd got her faults like the rest of us, and wasn't as thoughtful as if she'd been double her age; but a kinder heart than hers never beat in nobody's bosom, and sooner than have gone and set her aunt against her wilful, I'd have gone and eat deadly nightshade out of the hedge; and that you all know, and so do Mr. Bell."

Here Joyce broke into such very doleful sobs that the penitent gardener set to work to console her. Her audience generally agreed that Miss Humphreys' last astonishing whim could be noways laid to her charge; and all, true to the principle of highly valuing what they had not got, began deploring Miss Hilary, and recounting the excellences of her they had lost.

"She'd have been a real free-handed mistress, she would," cried a kitchen-maid, whose old grandmother had periodically watched by her tumble-down garden gate to make painfully rheumatic bobs at Hilary, thereby extracting sundry half-sovereigns, which had supplied her with more ardent spirits than were desirable. "Ah! and she'd have kept the house alive," said Maria, who had proudly heard of her young lady's successes at Steeple Forncett. "They did tell me yonder the company thought a deal of her."

"Some of them did, no question," said Wilkins reflectively; "though what he—h'm—they will do now is quite another affair. Money makes a sight of difference."

"No two minds about that," agreed the laundry-maid. "My word, Miss Hilary won't get five clean white mornin' cambrics a week now, I warrant! It did make my arms ache to iron 'em, and often I did wish she'd think afore she crumpled up so many. But somehow I never seemed to mind when I see her in a fresh one. She looked as nice and pretty as—as——"

"As one of my June tiger-lilies," put in Bell. "I've said so to myself many times, when I've seen her come down the path in one of them white frocks with all them shiny braids a'top of her head. Ah! deary me; Mr. Stafford won't want no white frocks! Who'd ever 'a counted on seein' him master here?"

"Ah! there 'll be a many blame him for takin' poor Miss Hilary's place like," chimed in Mrs. Wilkins. "Only to think of the changes this one day have brought forth!"

Only to think, indeed!

While the domestics discussed the marvel in every aspect, unanimously agreeing that the one sole speck of comfort was getting rid once and for all of Mr. St. John; while they speculated and debated on their new master, he, all alone in the silence and solitude of his drawing-room, was trying to realise the tremendous metamorphosis, and finding it an almost impossible task.

Not once, nor twice, but over and over again, he read Miss Humphreys' letter to him; those firm, black lines that contained all the reasons she vouchsafed anyone for her doings, and after each perusal the maze it involved him in seemed denser. Could he have heard the old housekeeper's words, fully would he have endorsed them. Many would blame him for standing there in Miss Hilary's place. "Miss Hilary's!" The girl he had watched, almost enviously, springing out of her luxury-girt childhood into that enchanting womanliness that had unawares stolen away his heart. What was he doing by taking her inheritance from her? How could he—loving her as he knew too surely that he did, as he had somehow always hoped in his poverty-bound life he should have escaped ever loving any human creature—how could he step in quietly now and take all that the world had long counted hers? Others besides Mr. St. John would call it robbery. How should he stand justified for this strange appropriation to outsiders, which perhaps signified little: to himself, which mattered more: to Hilary——?

Ah! again he unfolded that strange letter, carried it to the window, re-read it by the waning light, his face as sombre as the now sunless, fading autumn day. Slowly—with all his conscience he tried to do it impartially—he took in for the tenth time the meaning of every single word; balanced the benefits Miss Humphreys had set plainly forth against the ills which might have followed a different disposition of Abbotswick; steeled himself to the future he had accepted; for the road he had set out upon appeared to him the only one possible.

"A very easy conclusion!" say you? "An uncommonly natural ultimatum when that road is paved with gold, and leads to well-defined position!" Nay, but it seemed far from easy or natural to Norris Stafford, as he paced restlessly up and down, till shadows lurked about the corners of the darkening room, and the pale portraits of half a dozen departed Humphreys looked down like ghosts from their frames upon their stranger owner. Whole hosts of pains, difficulties, misconstructions crowded on him, and the end of them all——

"Now Heaven help me!" he exclaimed aloud; and never had he felt more need of what the words implored.

He stopped pacing presently, and stood a minute by Miss Humphreys' writing-table. All on it, from the old Russia-covered blotting-case to the heavy silver inkstand and tall fluted candlesticks, was business-like and old-fashioned: all but one thing—a likeness of Hilary. Through years of altering growth, some such picture had always stood here in Aunt Phil's frequent sight. Here it still stood. The curate lighted the wax candle that he might see it plainly, and gazed for minutes on the happy, fresh young face looking brightly forth from its dark frame. Then he slipped the card from its fastening, and, none being by to see, laid it passionately on his lips, white with an agitation he could barely master. But this weakness had to be conquered. Fighting with all his strength against the heart-sinking that oppressed him, he folded Miss Humphreys' letter around the face of her discarded protégée, thrust both into his breast pocket, strode resolutely across the room, and rang the bell.

The butler, appearing, found the new master quietly seated in the identical Chippendale chair, by a small leather-topped table, whence he had received so many orders from his old mistress.

"It will be sufficient for me to speak to you, Wilkins, if you will oblige me by carrying out my wishes."

"Certainly, sir."

"I should like all the establishment who choose, to remain here definitely a couple of months, unless they find better homes in the meantime."

"Thank you, sir, I 'm sure, for all of us."

"I shall be still at the rectory——"

"For the present, sir?" ventured Wilkins.

"At the rectory," repeated the curate, "and will give you further directions presently. Arrangements about the house I leave entirely to yourself and your wife."

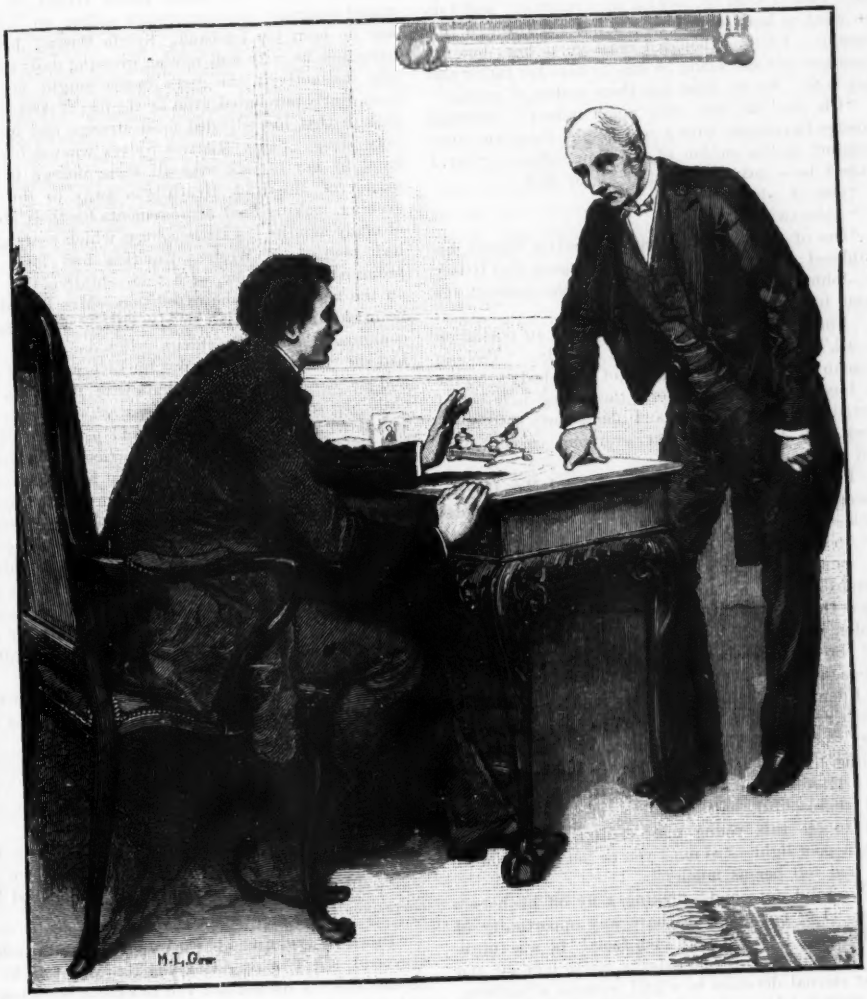
"Thank you, sir," said Wilkins again.

"Meanwhile, let everything be kept precisely as it is now. I know all is safe in your hands. Miss Humphreys has trusted you so long, I can well afford to do the same." Then he walked towards the hall, as if to leave.

Wilkins, gratified by the confidence shown in him, felt bound to speed him with some species of congratulation.

"Of course, sir," he said, following deferentially, "this isn't exactly—not what we expected; but still, sir, I may say for myself—and for the whole of us, I 'm sure—if poor Miss Hilary had got to be set aside, there 's nobody we 'd sooner congratulerate——"

Mr. Stafford put up his hand quickly.



"No—no, thanks," he said; "nothing of that sort—I 'm much obliged to you—now, or at any time whatever. Good-night."

And he stepped forth from his mansion, and adown the shivering, sighing avenue, to his modest half of the small rectory; while Wilkins bolted up the front of the house, and went back, bearing his last piece of satisfactory intelligence to the party, who, after all the excitement of the day, were now settling down to an excellent supper off the remains of the funeral luncheon.

CHAPTER XI.

What a drive home was Captain Cavenham's that afternoon, to be sure! and what a terribly bad time his brown horse had of it between Abbotswick and Steeple Forncett!

brutally, that the affronted animal went along in a style that caused the groom to hold on very tightly behind, and more fervently wish than expect himself at his journey's end without a spill. Once the young officer had to draw rein. He was dashing by the gate

"'Let everything be kept precisely as it is now.'"—p. 292.

Disappointment, disgust, mortification, filled the angry young gentleman's brain. He was one of those who habitually spend their liveliest emotions on the first object that comes handy, and now, in a ferment of exasperation, to the muttered accompaniment of highly unparliamentary language, he laid his whip across Jack's glossy side so smartly, flicked at his forequarters so viciously, and jerked his mouth so of Mosswick Heath when a graceful young woman, with a pair of pretty children clasping her hands, drew the young ones safe from the quick, on-coming wheels to the grassy roadside sprinkled deep with beech leaves. Then she made a gesture of recognition, and George Cavenham had perforce to pull up and speak to her.

"How glad I am to see you! Have you been to Abbotswick?" questioned Mrs. Dasent, coming near. "And will you tell me about Miss St. John? What a sad week this has been for her!"

"Un—commonly," said the young man, with grim emphasis, staring straight away between his horse's ears.

"We have only had a message or two about her," Mrs. Dasent went on, looking up anxiously, "and I do so want to hear more how she has got through this trouble. I felt as though I must go to her; but my husband said she would be sure to have her father and his wife. Mr. St. John was there to-day, of course?"

"Oh, yes! he was, very much indeed!" returned George Cavenham, with a curt laugh—there was some comfort in the notion of a fellow-sufferer—"but I expect he's entirely out of it all by now."

"Out of what?"

"Abbotswick."

"Out of Abbotswick!" repeated Sylvia Dasent, bewildered; "why, George, you don't mean that Hilary St. John would send her father off the moment she came into possession?"

"I mean that Hilary St. John is not in possession at all," retorted the young man roughly. "The old woman has been making game of everybody. So far as I can understand matters, the young lady is endowed with her blessing, and about forty shillings a week. A beastly sell for everyone concerned, I call it."

"Forty shillings a week!" returned Mrs. Dasent, scarcely crediting her own ears. "Then Abbotswick——"

"And everything belonging thereto, is gone over by some legerdemain to that lanky parson. Confoundedly well he must have played his cards to cozen that old dame out of everything. Beg your pardon, though—he's a friend of your husband's, isn't he? So perhaps you think the transaction altogether satisfactory?"

"I don't know what I think it," said Sylvia Dasent, drawing back, thoroughly perplexed and pained at every word of her young relative, who sat sullenly pulling his long moustache over his thick, twitching lips; "I only know I am sorry for Hilary. And so"—half reproachful, half pleading, for she could not bear to see this young man exhibiting himself in such a poor light—"so must you be too. Did you see her, and tell her as much?"

"No, I did not; and," flicking a fly off his horse's mane, "I'm not likely to have any opportunity of condolence." ("Women are such fools!" he was thinking; "I suppose this one expects me to bolt off and swear eternal devotion to a girl without a farthing. I'll show her I'm out of that; thanks very much!")—"Any message for the girls at home to-day, Mrs. Dasent?"

"None but good-bye," answered the lady coldly; "we leave on Saturday."

"Then bon voyage," said Captain Cavenham.—"I should not mind going over the big pond myself, or to the bottom of it either, with such a cursed run of luck as I'm having," he muttered, as he drove off scowling; and Mrs. Hugh Dasent, summoning her bairns from their ra'd after blackberries, gave on Hilary St. John's score one great sigh, less of sorrow than of relief.

The Cavenhams, though distant kinsfolk, were no favourites of hers. The departing officer's handsome face, with its society mask uplifted—sensual, resentful, grasping—filled her with shrinking. Even with fortune's sails well filled, pretty Hilary St. John would assuredly have met rough sailing on life's sea had he been her husband. Sylvia Dasent, her own happiness as wife and mother growing daily greater, felt instinctively the girl's escape might not have been dearly purchased, even by the loss of Abbotswick, though that loss sounded most strange, and must be very bitter. Sadly Mistress Sylvia wanted her husband by her to talk over all these doings, but the master of Mosswick Heath was away in town till evening, making final arrangements for their absence of many months. A little colony, which years ago he had planted in Western America, had long been promised a visit; now, with their children, they were on the very eve of the expedition. Mrs. Dasent had been bidding good-byes in the parish when she encountered Captain Cavenham. Not one single hour had she free before setting out for Liverpool next day; and yet here was this poor impulsive Hilary—a very child she seemed to the young matron—suddenly cast into a whirlpool of calamities, and perhaps (neither Mr. St. John nor his wife had particularly attracted Mrs. Dasent) without a single soul at hand who could quite enter into or soften their keenness for her.

Going to her unsummoned was out of the question; leaving the country without a sign of sympathy equally impossible. All she could do was to write—and that she did before nightfall, sitting by the side of her own little sleeping girl, whose bonnie face of perfect happiness filled her with tenfold pity for any on whom this cold world's buffetings were falling perchance for the first time.

Hugh Dasent, coming down late, heard the whole tale, and was altogether at one with his wife on the subject.

"Poor girl!" said he, scanning Sylvia's tender lines; "if anything can console her yet, this will. Your note shall go over to her before breakfast, and I'll send a line to Stafford at the same time."

Mr. Dasent's epistle was very different from his wife's; but he comprehended the man to whom he was writing, and that man perfectly understood his correspondent.

"DEAR STAFFORD" (it ran),—"This is altogether very odd, but I'm confident you'll work it right if anyone can. I do not ask you to excuse me when I add that at present we feel very vexed for you. Let us hear from you at New Mosswick.—Yours.

"H. D."

And that was the first, and for many a day the only drop of comfort that sweetened Norris Stafford's cup of wealth.

Hilary's missive was far less fortunate.

Passing from one servant to another in the much-unsettled household at Abbotswick, it only reached Joyce late in the day, when her dismal task of collecting and packing-off all Miss Hilary's belongings was just finished. In a climax of mournful worry she simply slipped the note in the last package—a lot of trifles which Hilary by chance left untouched for months; and so it came to pass she lost for long the kind, womanly sympathy that would have been as balm to her through many an aching hour.

Now to return, however, to our neglected Captain Cavenham.

Fuming still with ever-increasing spleen, he rattled on his homeward road; pulled his horse up all of a heap—"fit to break the shaf's," as the groom expressed it—at his own door; strode off, shouting imperatively, "Gertrude, look sharp! I want you," into the smoking-room, where, spending maledictions on the matches because he broke them in his wrathful haste, he ordered his sister to give him a brandy-and-soda, and not stand gaping at him like an idiot; and finally vouchsafed a disjointed explanation of his amiable humour, ending with the query—

"So will you have the goodness to tell me what is to be done now?"

His sister sat aghast at the recital.

"Poor unfortunate Hilary!" she cried; "who on earth would ever have suspected such an end to her grandeur! Po-o-r Hilary!"

"'Poor Hilary' be hanged!" exclaimed her brother, savagely impatient of any pity not spent upon himself; "the thing could never have happened if your 'poor Hilary'—as she certainly is and no mistake—hadn't been next door to an imbecile! Imagine any girl letting such a chance slip, and imagine what a mess it's let me in for! It's poor somebody else, I think—not poor Hilary. Look here, Gertrude," suddenly throwing away his cigar and setting his selfish mouth into its very hardest lines, "you egged me on into offering to that girl, didn't you? You got me into this mess—you can't deny it. Now get me out of it!"

Gertrude herself was not remarkable for refinement of feeling, but her brother's unblushing callousness to their girl neighbour's troubles, and his cool shouldering of his own dilemma upon herself, fairly nettled her. Women are infinitely superior to men in keeping up appearances on all occasions. Now she would have preferred decently veiling her own chagrin under commiseration of the principal sufferer.

"Upon my word, George," she retorted with spirit, "you were ready enough to be egged on. I was under the delusion, from all you said and did, that you actually cared for Hilary. You don't suppose I looked upon the whole transaction as purely mercenary, do you? If so, it is well the whole thing has come to an end."

"But, confound it, has it come to an end?" broke in her brother roughly; "she was not to send an answer to that blundering letter of mine till next week. Suppose she says 'Yes.' Suppose that father of hers cuts up rusty if I back out; why, I shall be the laughing-stock of the whole regiment. And suppose old Isaacs comes on the scene and lets the governor know how deep I'm dipped; and suppose—— Oh," helping himself copiously to brandy without the soda this time, "if I go on supposing, I shall go off my head. Find me a way out of this fix, Gert, or I shall put a bullet through my brains."

Gertrude had heard this threat before from her fast-living brother when his quandary was less serious than now. She was not, therefore, particularly alarmed or affected by it. Nevertheless, she knew this collapse of Hilary's prospects spelt ruin for the captain, unless some counterbalancing stroke of luck set him on his feet again. Help him somehow eventually she very well knew she must; but first a certain shallow sentimentality in her own nature which he had been ruthlessly trampling on demanded healing. Till he had paid her the compliment of apologising to her feminine feelings she would aid him not a jot. Pushing the spirits out of his reach, she drew the corners of her lips down, saying, contemptuously—

"You talk like a half-tipsy boy in his teens, George. I'm absolutely tired of doing anything for a person who thinks of nothing in the world but himself. I would never have helped your suit on with Hilary if I had imagined you had no real regard for her. If you have not the grace to pity her, I have."

The astute brother had wit enough to perceive what was wanted of him.

"Pity her! of course I do," he exclaimed, ready enough to swear black was white if that would dig him out of his quagmire; "and I vow I was getting uncommonly fond of her—no sham about it, Gert, uncommonly! I felt"— warming to his theme as he saw his sister assume a more satisfied air—"as if I could run in harness with her to the end of time and never kick over the traces. Of course it's losing the girl that's helping to play me up like this. You shouldn't be hard on what a fellow says when he's so wretchedly down as I am."

Gertrude was mollified. This brother of hers invariably twisted her round his finger when he took the trouble to do so. After all, her own family and its interests ought to be her chief concerns. That belief had been her lesson from childhood, and she had learned it well.

"Hold your tongue for ten minutes if you can, George," she ordered tersely, and he, foreseeing advantage to himself in obedience, did as he was bid.

For full five minutes Miss Cavenham, pleating and unpleating the lace upon her dress, plunged all her energies into the intricacies of the situation. Then—

"So you are distressed about the misfortunes of Hilary St. John?" she asked.

"Emphatically," answered the captain, "I am."

"Then I can say so truthfully, if I write to her for you?"

"You may, honour bright," he answered fervently. If Gertrude was going to haul him through this dilemma, he would hang on to any assertion she chose to make in his name.

"But poverty, married poverty, would really be far worse for Hilary than for you?" pursued Gertrude, interrogatively.

"Fifty times worse," cried the young officer, cleverly catching his cue; "it would be positively horrid for her."

"So it would, George. And you feel bound to think of her, don't you?"

"First and foremost," said he gravely, with just the ghost of a twinkle in his eyes.

"Peeping at her with mournful and rather resentful interest."—p. 299.

His sister nodded, as if fully accepting the truth of this. Then, suddenly making a new departure, she demanded, point blank—

"Do you owe more this time than my father could pay down, provided you were going to settle—which means marry—satisfactorily?"

"N-o-o," said the captain, rather faintly. "I dare-say he might manage it, only you see," harping on the string so notably unsuccessful, "I'm not going to——"

"Be quiet. Your money affairs surely could be cleared up once and for all if I—helped a little;" by which was meant if Miss Cavenham parted for that purpose with a portion of her small independence inherited from her mother. George's own share had gone before he got it.

"Why, yes, if you helped, Gertrude," with just grace enough to look ashamed of himself.

For this brother Gertrude Cavenham was prepared to do a good deal. Possibly, being a Cavenham, she saw her way to repayment some time or other. Playing rather nervously with the spent vestas flung about the table—

"George," she said, "can you get leave and get away from Brainford for a month or two?"

"Well," dubiously, "I might work it if I smoothed old Buffles down the right way of his feathers" (Buffles being colonel of the Forty-first); "but what then?"

"You would be the better for a change of air after all this worry?"

"Yes," with alacrity; "I shouldn't a bit mind a run to Paris."

"You'll have to run in a different direction, brother mine. I heard from Mary Francis this morning; she is in Cornwall with her aunt again, and finds it wretchedly dull."

The colour slowly deepened on the captain's face. Now he saw what his sister was driving at. Miss Francis had been Gertrude's schoolfellow. She was her senior, which brought her to being his own elder by ten years. Plain she was—lamentably; but rich—very. Years before, she had stayed at Steeple Forncett, and the young fellow, just commissioned, had amused himself by a flirtation which was what he elegantly termed "ripping fun," and placed, as he considered, out of the pale of all seriousness by the dictum, "A man may not marry his grandmother." The lady, however, may not have seen the discrepancy of age in the same light. Her intimates, of whom Gertrude Cavenham was chief, suspected her of taking the fascinating captain's attentions very much more seriously than he intended them, and of wearing the willow for him far more faithfully than he deserved. At any rate, she and her money were unappropriated still. In quest of both, George Cavenham grimly felt it was his fate to go, small inclination though he felt for the expedition. It was no more use struggling for bachelor freedom any longer than if he had been some feeble fly in some great spider's web. He had had his fling. Practically he had woven his own web; now he must walk into it and let its meshes hold him fast for the rest of his days.

But the young captain was not enamoured of the prospect.

"Well, what am I to say when I get to Cornwall?" he demanded sulkily.

"Say you've gone down for the fishing."

"What fishing?"

"Well," impatiently, "for the sea breezes, then, or for your health, or for anything you like; but, mind, what you do go for is—Mary. You were always good friends enough; you can't help esteeming her." (The captain made a wry face.) "Upon my word," his sister cried, "I think she's ten times too good for you, George; but that is the only way out of the wood I can devise. Get away directly—to-morrow, if you can; then you may leave me to manage the letter to Hilary."

The captain only too thankfully accepted this counsel. "You'd always a genius for managing, Gert," he said admiringly, going promptly off to seek an interview at Brainford with his commanding officer, while Miss Cavenham put herself to the task of compiling the epistle which was to get her brother free from Hilary.

It was very neatly done—quite creditably, considering what a very delicate topic it dealt with. Between the little something in the way of pity which she actually felt, and the great deal more which she assumed on her own part and her brother's, Gertrude composed a very natural-reading as well as sensible effusion.

"Nothing," she said, "could exceed poor George's sorrow at this sad turn of events." (That was literally true.) "Had he been a rich man he would have hastened in a moment to dear Hilary's side to claim her more proudly and willingly in poverty than in wealth" (that was a flash of sisterly imagination); "but having, alas! nothing but his pay to depend upon, and poor papa's insignificant allowance, never would he be so cruel as to drag down the woman he loved into hopeless poverty. He could rough it" (how glad Gertrude was he had happened to use that phrase) "alone, but to have her by his side without sufficient means to give her those luxuries to which she had been accustomed would be insupportable pain. Therefore, terrible as the pang was, he must renounce all claim upon her; only trusting—as she, his sister, also did most sincerely—that the future might somewhat heal his own wound and bring some recompense to Hilary for all she was now passing through."

They heard that Mr. St. John had transported his daughter to Brainford, and at the general post office of that town Captain Cavenham deposited his missive as he drove to the station the following day. By good luck he had got his leave. Now he would be safely far away from any jokes at his own expense raised by those fellow-officers before whom he had lately boasted of his coming luck.

On the platform was a big collection of luggage, and a group round the door of a first-class carriage. It was the Dasents going on the first stage of their long journey. Just then they were the last people he wished to travel with. Backing to avoid them, he jostled roughly on another individual, but was far too preoccupied to apologise, though, as he pushed his way quickly to the other end of the train, it occurred to him he had seen the man before.

The man thought so too, and Mr. Bevis rubbed his jarred shoulder with anything but a pleasant gaze after the retreating officer.

"Just his impudence!" he muttered; "met the young jackanapes at Abbotswick. Knows who I am as well as I know him. Might have said 'Beg your pardon,' at any rate; but that set are all tarred with the same stick." Then, as the truck with the officer's luggage came to a standstill by him—"Cornwall," meditated the young lawyer, reading the labels with a side-glance; "that's a long way off; and a pile of things, too. Oh, ho!" with a very knowing expression, "now I know what he's after—it's to get out of the way of Miss Hilary, the heiress that's not! And so, my young lady, who could not remember your humble servant's proper name when you were in all your state and glory, I'll wager a trifle you've seen the last of one of your suitors; and, for all your good looks, where you'll get another from now isn't quite so clear to me."

There is no doubt at all that Mr. Bevis, though a very far-seeing young man, would have been truly surprised had anyone told him at that moment where the faithless captain's successor was to come from.

CHAPTER XII.

In the meantime what about Hilary herself?

Well, the strange transformation scene, once over—that exodus of hers from Abbotswick in the still grey October afternoon, Mr. St. John opposite to her in Miss Humphreys' roomy old landau sunk in stony silence, Mrs. St. John beside her dropping tears quite audibly upon her new silk mantle, the figures of the two astonished little flaxen-haired girls perched up among piles of packages in the waggonette in front—lives like a nightmare in her memory. Nay, so preposterously unreal seemed the whole proceeding, that for weeks and months when she woke at night her first sensations would be those of old Abbotswick habits. What was the stable clock going to strike next? What were Aunt Phil and she going to amuse themselves with that morning? Had the maid been in to light her fire yet?—and so forth.

And even in broad daylight, with eyes and senses all wide awake, she could not for long divest herself of the notion that this new state of affairs was not at all canny; that it would roll itself up some day and vanish like a mist, and the old bright outlook lie smiling before her once again.

But she had to grope her way out of such fancies into grim reality along paths uncompromisingly rough; and, moreover, she had to start upon these with scarce a breathing space between one turn of fortune and another.

Her very entrance into her father's home bristled with small, miserable awkwardnesses, beginning even on the threshold.

Jane, curtseying in profound surprise at the door as the pale young lady went up the steps, had her civilities morosely checked by her master: "Go down and fetch your mistress's shawl out of the carriage. Miss St. John can find her way into the house. My daughter is returned to live with me now."

"And wherever she is to sleep I can't think," said poor Mrs. St. John feebly, seating herself in the front room, where the shutters were still half closed, Jane being of opinion that the éclat of a family interment ought to last as long as possible. "I've actually no spare place whatever for her—nowhere to put up a bed in, and no bed to put up! However we're to manage I can't imagine!"

"I can go anywhere, mamma," said Hilary, feeling very heartsick indeed. "I don't mind where, so as not to be in your way."

"But unfortunately I can't make space, nor build fresh rooms," said Mrs. St. John plaintively; "we're over here, and Willie over the passage, and the boys over us, and the little girls behind, and Jane over the kitchen, so there's nowhere left but the little lumber-room in the roof, and that's quite sure to be full of spiders, and this time of day who's to clean it?" And then, with an outburst of long habitual politeness, "Oh, the idea of putting you up there, after all you've been used to!"

There were sounds without of the carriage departing. Hilary turned strangely cold and lonely. Mr. St. John came in at the instant, and caught up his wife's words.

"As Hilary has forfeited all she was used to, she must simply now take what she can get under my roof, and be contented. I have, I may say, bestowed opportunities upon her such as not one parent in ten thousand has the chance of doing. I have literally hedged her about with advantages. I have fostered hopes for her and of her at the expense of my own feelings as a father. I have built—so to speak—my happiness upon hers. And what have I got in return? Why, the ghastliest disappointment that could have been contrived for me by human being, and a heavy addition cast on my already overburdened income."

Then Mr. St. John plunged into a lounging-chair which had lost one of its castors, looking the picture of woe upon his crooked throne.

A new, keen pain tightened on his daughter's spirit. Her throat contracted and her lips trembled.

"Papa," she said, with a sort of startled pleading "I always thought you wanted me at home. Was it not true, then? Don't—oh, don't you care for me?"

Mr. St. John waved his hand impatiently.

"Care for you! Of course I do," he answered; "but I'm not going to conceal from you that, directly or indirectly, you have given my feelings the very severest shock they have ever sustained. Every single thing I had for years been calculating on—for you, remember, for your benefit—is lost. The St. Johns are a candid family. Candidly, therefore, I tell you that though my house is open to you as to my other children, I feel you have not the same absolute right in it as themselves. You must by some indiscretion have flung away your aunt's favour, on which the interests of—I may say—all of us depended. Under those circumstances, though I am prepared for you to take your place in my family, you must not be astonished if I cannot conjure up any very fervid welcome for you."

This was indeed candid—rather brutally so. There came a day when Mr. St. John was sorry he had been so explicit. Hilary's young face seemed to furrow with pain while he spoke coldly on, but she only looked at him very wistfully, and said—

"Thank you, papa. I understand you—now."

Which, indeed, she did, for the first time in her life.

"As for the unprincipled, or to put it more plainly, the crazy, conduct of the person to whom I had confided you for years——" pursued Mr. St. John.

But Hilary, with her white face suddenly aflame, turned upon him.

"Not one word of that sort, papa, if you and I are to live in peace together! I have nineteen years of happiness and plenty to thank Aunt Phil for. For what she has seen fit to do now I will not permit one syllable to be cast at her in my hearing."

Mr. St. John shrugged his shoulders and elevated his eyebrows with a sneer.

"You are out of position, Hilary, in dictating to me in my own house; but as it certainly is desirable for us to live at peace together, I will make allowances for you. We will not discuss Miss Humphreys, for I can have only one sentiment about a person who has so grossly aggrieved me. As for her coadjutor—I consider him a thief."

Hilary's lips contracted with just one extra pang. She tingled with shame at Norris Stafford being saddled with such a title. An insane craving came over her to listen once more to the kind, quiet tones of this "thief." Oh, the restfulness of them after this jangling storm from her father! But her spirit for the day was almost spent; she dared enter on no battle now to defend her supplanter. Such a great wave of weariness came over her, body and mind, that Mrs. St. John, with quite surprising adroitness, interfered.

"Algernon, however wicked people have been, I do think it 's time we had some tea—I daresay it 's ready." (This house-mistress was never very certain about meals.) "Come into the next room, Hilary; though I cannot offer what you have been accustomed to, yet you ought to be having something." Then she led the way, apologising from custom as she went.

"Excuse the paint in the back passage: the boys do kick it so. I 'm afraid that little paraffin lamp runs; there 's a frightful smell. Of course you burned wax at Abbotswick. Oh, you 'll have to put up with a great deal, dear; but—Herbert, don't stare at your sister Hilary so." The boys had come in from office and school, and, in conclave with Jane and the little girls, had got a general outline of the day's tragedy. "Come and shake hands with her, and find her a chair."

The shaking hands was duly performed; but it was as difficult to find a chair for Hilary as it was to find her a bed, or any other necessary. The ugly, square back-room was littered from corner to corner with books, toys, packing-cases, tools, everything that ought not to be there—including a rocking-horse surmounted by the baby of the St. John family, whom his mother first delightedly embraced after her absence from him, and then smartly slapped because he brought his wooden steed straight down upon her toes. Naturally, small Will resented this treatment, whereupon his father ordered him off to the kitchen, and thither Jane carried him by main force, howling.

"Fetch a chair from anywhere you choose," ordered Mr. St. John, looming as black as thunder from his own at the end of the table: "anything will do. Hilary is merely one of ourselves now. Why, what the—what on earth are these things for?" scowling at the smart set-out upon the fresh white cloth.

"Only a—a mistake of Jane's," explained his wife, timidly. She was feeling mildly elated at the appearance of her tea equipage. Very small straws sent this good lady's spirits up or down. "We always had the best things, you know, Algernon, when Hilary came before."

"But," said Mr. St. John fiercely, "that was under different circumstances. Ring the bell, and order the every-day things up at once. What is good enough for us is good enough for Hilary. What we can drink out of, she can drink out of."

Not venturing to combat the point, Mrs. St. John just dropped a few tears on the gorgeous Japanese tea-tray, and summoned Jane to remove it.

Then the offended maid-servant collected the best "crockery" with such speed that a distinct fracture was the result, after which she clattered the common set down before her mistress, which set—like the chairs—proved too few by one. There was no cup for Hilary.

"There were ten," thundered Mr. St. John, "three weeks ago! Where are they gone to? Whoever has broken them shall pay for them. In small things I can defend myself. I will not be robbed in my own house."

After which outburst, investigation laid the burden of two breakages on the cat; one had some of Mr. St. John's last invention—liquid glue made from fish-bones—in it; and the other, Mrs. St. John meekly suggested, might perhaps be found to-morrow.

In this dilemma, round and rather stupid-faced Bertie St. John, the young clerk, shone forth.

"Here, Hilary may have my cup to-night; I don't mind a mug," said he, gallantly.

And, provided at last with some lukewarm beverage and a bedroom chair, his step-sister joined the painful, muddled meal, though of a truth she felt she would never have inclination to eat or drink again.

The evenings this household always spent in the same tea-scented apartment, where the young people amused themselves as they chose, departing from the family circle when sleepiness overtook them. To-night, Mr. St. John concealed himself moodily behind a newspaper, which, as if in ironical malice, contained an obituary notice of Miss Humphreys, ending with a broad hint as to whom her property would devolve upon.

Hilary's father had himself to thank for that paragraph. Now, he was ready to anathematise the editor for using the information he had incautiously spread. Tearing the lines out of the column, he first showed them to his wife, then burned them. Mrs. St. John thereupon had another little crying-fit, which no one paid the slightest regard to, after which she disappeared for an hour. The little girls and their brothers whispered about their luckless sister Hilary, peeping at her with mournful and rather resentful interest; and Hilary, her head throbbing with exceeding fatigue, sat rapt in thought; while a noisy American clock ticked away the slow minutes of the very longest evening of her existence.

It was relief indeed when her stepmother returned, presently, comparatively cheerful.

"I've been sitting on the top landing," she said, "looking at Jane clearing out the lumber-room, and we've found a little iron bed that I'd quite forgotten. The knobs are off the ends, and three of the splines won't go over the catches; but, if you don't fidget about, I don't think it will come down, Hilary. I'm sorry to say there 's no soap-dish with the toilet things; but perhaps you won't mind a plate for the present. And will you like to come to your room?"

Ah, that Hilary would! Anything, anywhere, to be alone. Her father brushed the top of her forehead with his moustache—the nearest approach to an embrace he ever vouchsafed her from that date; Mrs. St. John, not at all unkindly, offered a large damp cheek for a good-night salute; the children ducked their heads, and nodded sheepishly at her; and so she passed up to her hiding-place in the roof, where, too stupefied even to think, she lay watching myriads of stars, through her uncurtained casement, till sleep closed her tired eyes. And so ended her first hours in the house where she was not wanted.

"O Lord, how happy should we be."

Words by KEEBLE.

Music by the REV. F. PEEL, B.Mus., Vicar of Heslington, York.

2.

Could we but kneel and cast our load,
E'en while we pray, upon our God,
Then rise with lightened cheer,
Sure that the Father, who is nigh
To still the famished raven's cry,
Will hear in that we fear!

3.

We cannot trust Him as we should:
So chafes fall'n nature's restless mood
To cast its peace away;
Yet birds and flow'rets round us preach,
And all the present evil teach,
Sufficient for the day.

4.

Lord, make these faithless hearts of ours
Such lessons learn from birds and flowers;
Make them from self to cease:
Leave all things to a Father's will,
And taste, before Him lying still,
E'en in affliction, peace.

REAL AND AMATEUR GENTLEMEN.

BY THE REV. E. J. HARDY, M.A., CHAPLAIN TO THE FORCES.

IF it be true that "manners makyth man," surely nothing less than manners can make a gentleman. Without them it is possible to act the part of a gentleman for ten minutes without being found out, as the Duke of Wellington said George IV. could do, but not for much longer. It is true that "the grand old name of gentleman" is now so "soiled with all ignoble use," that one prefers to call himself simply "man" rather than "gentleman." And yet were a distinction drawn on proper grounds between gentlemen and roughs, we should all desire to belong to the former class. With quite as much reason we might repeat the complaint which Steele made long ago in the Spectator, that there is no adequate idea of what is meant by "gentlemanly, gentleman-like, or much of a gentleman." "You cannot be wronged, but all the world will say of him that did the injury, 'It must be allowed he is very much of a gentleman.' Here is a very pleasant fellow, a correspondent of mine, that puts in for that appellation even to highwaymen." Curious are the ideas of some people as to what constitutes a gentleman. The other day I heard two soldiers debating the question. One said that it is money that makes a gentleman. His companion asked in reply if a donkey had two panniers full of gold on his back and owned the money, would he be a gentleman? In the same way a cabman has suspicions as to your gentle blood if you give him only his legal fare.

Others, again, seem to think that clothes make a gentleman, as if the peacock were not more gay than the eagle himself. "Why," asks Fuller, "should any brag of what is but borrowed? Should the ostrich snatch off the gallant's feather, the beaver his hat, the goat his gloves, the sheep his suit, the silkworm his stockings, and oxen his shoes, he would be left in a cold condition." A friend of mine, not long ago, coming over from Ireland, heard a man asking, in reference to another, who he was. "I don't know," was the reply; "but he's quite a gentleman. He always wears a tall hat." Indeed, there are those who seem to be incapable of valuing their fellow-men by anything except their clothes. There is a story told of a Persian prince which well illustrates such worldliness. Dressed as a poor man, this prince went to a feast. He was pushed here and there, could not get to the table, and had soon to withdraw. On going home, he dressed himself in his best, placing jewelled slippers on his feet, and putting on a cloth-of-gold cloak. Then he returned to the feast, where matters were immediately altered. The guests made room, and the host, rushing up, cried, "Welcome, my lord! What will your lordship please to eat?" The prince's answer was very expressive. Stretching out his foot, so that his slipper sparkled and glittered, he took his golden robe in his hand, and said with bitter irony, "Welcome, my lord coat! welcome, most excellent robe! What will your lordship please to eat?—For," said he, turning to his surprised host; "I ought to ask my coat what it will eat, since the welcome was solely to it."

But the most foolish of all notions on this subject is that which imagines that a gentleman is one who does no work, certainly no manual labour. We find it lingering in the phrase, "a walking gentleman." Now, I think that to consume much, to produce little, to go away from life's feast without paying the reckoning—I think that this is not the part of an honest man. The Jews had a proverb that if a man did not teach his son a trade he taught him to steal, and no one would call a thief a gentleman. Even the South-Sea Islanders knew better than to think that it made a man a gentleman not to work. When Bishop Patteson went among them they were surprised to see that he was ready to put his hand to anything. He would do a piece of carpentering, wash up things after meals, teach the little blacks to wash and dress themselves. Other white men wanted to put all the work on the negroes, so, in order to mark the difference, they called the Bishop a "gentleman-gentleman," and the others "pig-gentlemen."

Having tried to show what a gentleman is not, we will now say briefly what he is. He is a man who is gentle in thought, word, and deed. He is generous and just, honourable and brave; and, having all these qualities, he exercises them in the most gracious outward manner. A true gentleman pays his bills; is a good son, husband, father, and friend. His aims in life are high, and he keeps from all that is mean.

The third Earl of Balcarres always expressed himself as delighted with the Epistle of St. James, as that emphatically of a gentleman—a term implying, in his acceptance of it, all Christian excellence and perfection.

But the character of the Christian gentleman cannot be better described than in the words of St. Paul in his Epistle to the Corinthians: "Charity [or love] suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not its own, is not provoked, taketh not account of evil; rejoiceth not in unrighteousness, but rejoiceth with the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Charity never faileth." Compare with this the fifteenth Psalm, which also describes a real gentleman, and not one who is only playing at the thing: "He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour; . . . he honoureth them that fear the Lord."

What is a good manner? It is the art of putting our associates at their ease. Whoever makes the fewest persons uncomfortable is the best-mannered man in the room. This implies a quick natural sympathy and the absence of vanity and ill-nature. Why are people who are not certain of their position so much harder to get on with than those who are really well-born? Because this very uncertainty causes them to hedge themselves round with stiffness and artificiality. They are afraid of allowing themselves to be natural, and will not draw from the fountain of natural politeness, which is in the heart and is closely allied to love.

Lord Chesterfield defined good breeding as the result of "much good sense, some good nature, and a little self-denial." The Spirit of Christ does really what this sort of courtesy only does outwardly. Love gives the true Christian a delicate tact which never offends, because it is full of sympathy, and is capable of exercising not a little, but a great deal of self-denial.

True courtesy is "the beauty of the heart." How well it is that no one class has a monopoly in this kind of beauty; that while favourable circumstances undoubtedly do render good manners more common among persons moving in higher rather than in lower spheres, there should nevertheless be no positive hindrance to the poorest classes having good manners. Here is an illustration of true politeness exhibited by both classes of society. One day, in hastily turning the corner of a crooked street in the city of London, a young lady ran with great force against a ragged little beggar boy, and almost knocked him down. Stopping as soon as she could, she turned round and said, very kindly, to the boy, "I beg your pardon, my little fellow; I am very sorry that I ran against you." The poor boy was astonished. He looked at her for a moment in surprise, and then, taking off about three-quarters of a cap, he made a low bow and said, while a broad, pleasant smile spread itself all over his face, "You can hev my parding, miss, and welcome; and the next time you run agin me, you may knock me clean down, and I won't say a word." After the lady had passed on he turned to his companion and said, "I say, Jim, it's the first time I ever had anybody ask my parding, and it's kind o' took me off my feet."

One very cold day the American preacher Henry Ward Beecher bought a paper from a very ragged little boy. "Poor little fellow!" said he, "ain't you very cold?" "I was, sir, before you passed," replied the boy, with natural good manners.

Politeness has been defined as benevolence in small things. This is well illustrated by the following incident, which is related in the "Life of General Sir William Napier, K.C.B." Taking a country walk one day, he met a little girl, about five years old, sobbing over a broken bowl, which she had dropped in bringing it back from the field to which she had taken her father's dinner. She said she would be beaten, on her return home, for having broken it. With a sudden gleam of hope she innocently looked up into his face, and said, "But zu can mend it—can't 'ee?" He explained that he could not mend the bowl; but he would give her a sixpence to buy another. However, on opening his purse it was destitute of silver, and he had to make amends by promising to meet his little friend in the same spot at the same hour next day, and to bring the sixpence with him; bidding her tell her mother she had seen a gentleman who would bring her the money for the bowl the next day. The child, entirely trusting him, went on her way comforted. On his return home he found an invitation, asking him to dine in Bath the following evening, to meet someone whom he specially wished to see. He hesitated for some little time, trying to calculate the possibility of going to meet his little friend of the broken bowl, and of still being in time for the dinner party; but finding this could not be, he wrote to decline accepting the invitation, on the plea of a pre-engagement, saying, "I cannot disappoint her. She trusted me so implicitly."

This anecdote of Christian chivalry on the part of a really "gallant" genuine gentleman is all the more impressive from the fact that the action was not only in itself a little one, but was done for the sake of one of those "little ones" who are made the test of purity of principle.

Rather more than fifty years ago, there was a lawsuit in which Trinity College, Dublin, was concerned. On this occasion the Rev. John Barrett, Senior Fellow, familiarly styled "Jacky Barrett," was dragged from his sanctum, from which he very rarely stirred, to give evidence against the assailant of his beloved establishment. The barrister who cross-examined him gives this account of his defeat by the little kiln-dried sage: "I examined the most learned of the whole University, Dr. Barrett, a little greasy, shabby, croaking, round-faced vice-provost. He knew nothing on earth save books and guineas, never went out, and held but little intercourse with mankind. I worked at him unsuccessfully more than an hour; not one decisive sentence could I get him to pronounce. At length he quite grew tired of me, and I thought to conciliate him by telling him that his father had baptised me. 'Indeed!' exclaimed he. 'Oh, I did not know you were a Christian.' At this unexpected repartee the laugh was so strong against me that I found myself muzzled." On seeing the manners, or want of manners, of amateur gentlemen and ladies, one can hardly help saying, when they talk of their religion, "Oh, I did not know you were Christians."

"A rough Christian," said a dog to a hedgehog; but if the dog had known more of the matter he would have known that a true Christian is never rough, for he learns gentleness from Him Who was "the first true Gentle-man that ever breathed." True politeness is more than "surface Christianity." If a man be a Christian gentleman, the fact will be known by his cat, his dog, his horse, his children, and every living being that comes in his way. To each and all he will display the gentler graces. "In honour preferring one another" is the sacred rule; and it is also the law of good breeding. "Honour all men"; "be courteous."

The mode in which people conduct themselves towards inferiors is even a better test of good breeding than their bearing towards superiors and equals. I take the following from an American newspaper:—

A certain lieutenant-colonel of cavalry was noted for his profanity, but one day he met with a deserved rebuke. General Custer was with him when he rode up to a sergeant of the guard in his regiment, and, swearing at him furiously, ordered him to attend to a matter that had been neglected. The man folded his arms and stood at bay, looking the officer squarely in the eye.

"Do you hear me?" said the Colonel, with another oath. "Why don't you do as I tell you?"

"When I receive a proper order I shall obey," said the soldier firmly. "The articles of war forbid you to address me in the language you have used."

General Custer laughed, with a keen appreciation of the state of affairs.

"He 's got you there!" he said to his subordinate.

The Colonel at once changed his bearing, and apologised with a very manly frankness.

"Sergeant," said he, "you are right, and I apologise. I should not have addressed you as I did."

Then he gave his orders; the man touched his cap respectfully, and turned away to fulfil the command. The Colonel, moreover, had risen many degrees in the estimation of the soldiers.

"The love and admiration," says a well-known writer, "which that truly brave and loving man, Sir Sydney Smith, won from everyone, rich and poor, with whom he came in contact, seems to have arisen from the one fact—that without, perhaps, having any such conscious intention, he treated rich and poor, his own servants, and the noblemen his guests alike: and alike courteously, considerately, cheerfully, affectionately, so leaving a blessing and reaping a blessing wherever he went."

A somewhat similar account is given of Sir William Jones. When he returned the salute of a negro he was reminded that he had done what was very unfashionable.

"Perhaps so," said Sir William; "but I would not be outdone in good manners by a negro."

"My child," said a father to his daughter, "treat everybody with politeness; for remember that you show courtesy to others, not because they are ladies, but because you are one."

"Politeness," says Joubert, "is one development of virtue;" and in reply to those who would contend that it is necessary for society only, not for home, he remarks that we should wear our velvet indoors—that is, give those nearest to us the chief benefit of our gentleness. How many put on their velvet to go out into the world, and consider that anything will do to wear at home! Politeness is their court-dress, which they change for a dressing-gown when they return home.

A really good manner is, like our skin, put on from within, and never taken off while we are alive. Nature's gentlemen are always gentlemen and ladies; but there are artificial gentlemen and ladies, who put aside their good manners with their good clothes in the privacy of their homes. They have company manners for abroad; but home is to them not only Liberty Hall, but a hall of licence, where they allow their evil natures full play.

HAL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "AN UNEXPECTED LEGACY," AND OTHER STORIES.

"YOU 'LL be home early to-night daddy?"

"Why, no, not so very early, Hal. I'm going to the club."

"Oh, daddy, I am so lonely without you!"

"Why, there 's Jane and the two dolls," he said, smiling. "What more would you have?"

"My daddy."

"Well, we 'll see, little chap; p'raps I 'll be home by eight o'clock to-night."

"Oh, do, dear daddy, and we 'll have the tea hot, and everything so nice and comfor'ble for you."

And as John Smith stooped down and kissed his little boy, he fully intended to spend the evening at home, and thought what a happy time they would have.

John Smith might have been a happy man, but he wasn't.

He had as good a wife as man could desire, and three children, of whom the youngest was Hal, a boy of four.

For some years after his marriage he had been a fond husband and a devoted father, but of late he had attended a convivial club, where he was made much of, and had come to believe that he was a cut above the ordinary run of workmen, and, as such, that he was badly paid and far too hard-worked. The home which had seemed so bright to him before, he had come to regard as rather mean in comparison with the club-room at the "Red Lion." And, alas! it had deteriorated of late, for a considerable portion of his earnings disappeared in "glasses round" to his "friends" during the hours spent in political discussions, wherein he gave his advice, in an authoritative manner, on the concerns of the nation at large!

His wife watched with a sad heart the terrible change which had come over him, and worked with all her strength to make the best of their diminished income, praying daily, hourly, that the good God might bring back the wanderer, and waiting in faith and patience for the time to come.

Her one great hope lay in Hal. She felt that for the time her own influence was but slight; whilst the two girls were afraid of their father, and terrified at him in his sullen and savage moods, when he returned from the "Red Lion" discontented and unhappy. But Hal! There was a depth of unfathomable love in the father's heart for this little curly-headed fellow. Never in his life had John Smith spoken unkindly to the boy, not even when intoxicated. And as for Hal, daddy was to him the kindest and best of fathers: his own darling daddy, whom he loved with his whole heart. "First, dere comes daddy and mudder," he used to say. "I love them with all my heart; and den dere comes Mary and Jane, and I loves them werry much; and den dere comes Old Ned and Screecher" (the latter were his pet names for the negro doll and the little stuffed owl). "I'se werry fond of them too." This was Hal's little kingdom, and very happy he was in the midst of it.

Eight o'clock came, and Hal was in a great state of excitement and expectation.

Everything was ready; the toast was crisp and inviting, the tea steaming hot, and Hall sat on his high chair with his face fixed on the door, listening intently to hear his father's footstep as he came up the court.

"Poor daddy!" he kept saying, "I'se afraid he's workin' awful hard—don't you think so, Jin?"

"Yes, Hal—he's sure to be here presently," his sister remarked cheerily; "and mother and Mary will be in by eleven."

But as the minutes sped by and daddy came not, the little face grew weary and sad with the intense strain of long-continued, anxious watching.

Suddenly he said—

"Jin, what does people say prayers for?"

"They ask God for what they want."

"And can God give anything?"

"Oh yes, everything, I know. And mother told me one day that whatever we prayed for God would give us if it were good for us."

"I'se so glad! Jin, for we do want daddy, don't we? and it must be good for us to have him. Will you pray, Jin?"

"I'm afraid I couldn't, Hal, except I was kneeling all alone by my bed or had mother with me. But if you could just tell God what we wanted, why, it would be like praying together."

"Oh yes, Jin, I'll try." So he folded his hands, and bowing his little head reverently, said:—

"Oh Lord, we wants daddy, both Jin and me, so werry much. Please send him home safe and quick, for we's so hungry, O Lord, and we can't have tea without him."

"Now he'll be here d'rectly, won't he, Jin?" he said, confidingly.

"Yes, dear," replied the little girl of five, carried away by the intense fervour of his faith.

Still the weary moments passed lingeringly away, but no daddy came.

"Go to the window and see if he's comin'," exclaimed Hal impatiently.

"No, dear, he isn't coming," said Jinny; "and it's a terrible foggy night."

"Do you think, Jin, 't is too thick for God to see us? or p'raps dere wasn't enough of us for Him to hear?"

"No, I'm sure God heard," said his sister reverently, "but——"

"But what?" he asked anxiously, as the little girl hesitated.

"I once heard mother pray for father, and after she'd prayed she went and brought him home."

"Oh!" said Hal, "p'raps that's part of the prayer. Yes, I'se quite sure, Jin, that that's the second part of mudder's prayer; so I'se agoin' to look for daddy and bring him home to tea."

"Well, dear, I'll go too; but where shall we go?"

"He mightn't be able to see his way home," said Hal, reflectively; "and so we'll take the lamp, and I'll just go to the 'Red Lion' first. It's so bright there, p'raps he got as far as dat and couldn't get no furder."

"Yes, that's it, sure enough," said Jinny.

So away these two mites went, Hal carrying a bull's-eye lamp in one hand, whilst the other was fast locked in Jinny's. A curious pair they looked as they walked through the sloshy, deserted streets, but happily the "Red Lion" was not far off, and its blazing lights soon loomed in sight.

"I'll wait outside," said Jinny, afraid that her father's anger would be kindled if he saw her, but believing that Hal could incur no displeasure.

Handing Jinny the lamp, he walked straight into the parlour.

"Daddy," he cried, with a thrill of joy, as he saw his father, "we've come to fetch you home, as we were afraid you couldn't see the way this dark night; and tea is getting cold, and old Ned, and Kitty, and Screecher, and Jinny, and me is awful mis'able without you," and the little child stretched out its arms in loving expectation. For a moment the father's heart went out in love towards the appealing face, and he longed to clasp the child to his breast.

But the cynical voice of Tom King, his boon companion, quenched his better feelings.

"Hullo! that kid seems to think you've had too much, friend Smith, and no doubt his mummy has sent him to fetch you!"

Poor, weak, miserable man! The thrust went home, and he felt ashamed—ashamed of being sent for—he, the leader of that choice band. So he got up and pushed the child aside.

"Come, come! you've no business to be out at this time of night; get away home."

Alas! the child staggered back, and fell heavily to the floor. His father, sobered by the accident his brutality had caused, caught Hal up in his arms, and kissed him again and again.

"I werry sorry, werry sorry," sobbed the child. "Poor daddy! I didn't mean to fall."

He had fallen on his arm, which had evidently been hurt, but he bore the pain without a murmur, afraid lest he should make his father sorrowful.

"Nothing broken," was the verdict of one of the men, who belonged to an ambulance corps, and had picked up some little knowledge of surgery; "but it'll be stiff for a day or two, I daresay."

No longer afraid of his companions, John Smith bore off little Hal, stumblingly and uncertainly, it is true, for he was muddled; but he happily arrived at home without mishap, and the child was soon fast asleep, with a smile on his face. His last words as he went off to sleep, with his two hands resting lovingly in his father's clasp, were, "Dear, good daddy, I'm so werry, werry happy!"

A purer, happier outlook rose for a moment before the mind of John Smith as he thus rested by the bedside of his little son. But the jeers of his companions—how was he to stand them?

As he sat thinking, thinking, sitting by the little table in a half-stupefied condition, he by accident dragged the cover off the table, and with it the paraffin lamp. The oil in it flowed in a blazing stream over the floor.

In a moment the room was in flames, whilst John Smith, awaking from his doze, was too muddled to retain any presence of mind. But the thought of self-preservation coming naturally uppermost, he rushed down the narrow stair into the street, shouting "Fire!"

Jin, who had crept in stealthily after him when he returned with Hal, had long been asleep in the adjoining room.

The keen fresh air, coupled with the shock he had just undergone, restored Smith to his senses, and his first thought was Hal.

To re-enter by the way he had come out was impossible, for the room was now one mass of flame, and the staircase had already caught light.

One wish alone was present to his mind—to save his son, even if he sacrificed his life in the attempt. But how?

"'Daddy,' he cried, 'we've come to fetch you home.'"—p. 301.

Close by, at the builder's yard, he was aware that a ladder had been in use that day. From the little crowd that had begun to collect he called on a companion for assistance, and they returned in a few minutes and placed the ladder against the front window, out of which the flames now began to curl.

"Stand back!" cried several voices. "It is madness to attempt to enter that house!"

But he heeded them not. He burst through the window, and in a second was by the bedside of his two little ones.

Both were awake and clasping each other, but no fear or dismay was depicted in their faces.

"Quick, Hal," cried the father; "I may yet save you."

"No, no; Jin first," cried Hal.

"Never," said Jin, firmly. "Father, take him—quick."

There was no time for discussion. Every moment brought the fire towards them, and the father, seizing his beloved Hal, dashed through the flame.

At the window a fireman was waiting, who, seizing Hal, cried, "Come out quickly, or you will be suffocated."

"Jin," murmured Hal, in agonised tones.

For a moment John Smith hesitated, then Hal's appeal and the thought of Jin's heroism prevailed, and with a prayer to God for strength, he turned, and was lost to sight in the flame.

The people below were watching with feverish anxiety for the return of the father from his perilous, almost hopeless quest.

Handing Hal to those waiting at the foot of the ladder, the fireman hastily re-ascended, just as the father staggered through the flames, which were now shooting in dense masses from the window. He caught the child from him, passed her to the man below, and seized Smith, who was now all unconscious of what was passing, his strength being spent, his clothes in flames, his face blackened and scorched.

A mighty cry of relief rose from a thousand voices as he was borne quickly down. They rolled him in a blanket to extinguish the flames which enwrapped him; and when John Smith opened his eyes they rested on all his dear ones standing round him.

A murmur, "Thank God!" escaped his lips, and his scorched face was lighted by such a smile of peace as had not crossed it for many a day.

* * * * * *

John Smith had learnt his lesson by the terrible ordeal he passed through that night. The "Red Lion" parlour misses him, but the constant and unfailing prayers of those who loved him were answered in a way they looked not for. Hal had ever thought his daddy perfect, and thinks of him not otherwise than he always did, but the two girls have learnt to know the full meaning of that hallowed word, Father, and share with Hal a loving reverence for his gentleness and goodness.

SPIRITUAL DWARFS.

BY THE REV. R. H. LOVELL.

"And Zacchæus sought to see Jesus who He was, and could not for the press, because he was little of stature."—ST. LUKE xix. 3.

ANXIETY to see Jesus Christ, and to know who He really is, is still the world's concern. No other sight so stimulates curiosity or awakens interest. About no one else is the inquiry so persistent, "Who is He?" And it seems probable that this anxiety will yet rather increase than decrease.

Curiosity still wants to see Christ, and to hear about Him. Science, with her clear cold eyes, wants to gaze upon Him, and asks with earnestness, "Who is He?" Evolution can hardly draw her breath for anxiety to know who He is, from what environment He could possibly have come, and why she has not produced a more highly developed Christ these 1,800 years. Neither in art nor literature, much less in life itself, has she produced a nobler ideal than the original. Evolution is curious to know more about this Christ, only she does not climb trees to see Him; she looks through a microscope at protoplasm, and then wonders she cannot see the Christ.

Art wants to see this Christ, and has been trying to paint His portrait by all her greatest masters, from Raphael to Holman Hunt. None of them are yet satisfied with their efforts. His perfect likeness has glorified no canvas yet.

Literature still wants to see Him. Successful as "Lives of Christ" have been as literary efforts, it is still true that no book would be more popular than another new and inspiring "Life of Christ."

Youth still wants to see Christ. Multitudes of eager, keen, fresh young spirits would climb any eminence to get a real sight of Him. Trouble wants to see Him; care looks out for His coming; the Church looks for Him to come once more; the common people want to see Christ to solve their problems and meet their needs. Old age wants to see Him; His face, so bright and restful, is the one vision for which it longs, to give life its glory and crown. So the hunger of the heart of Zacchæus "to see Jesus," and "to know who He was," is as real and fresh and powerful to-day as ever.

When Christ went to Jericho (not a small city) only two men received benefit from Him. A short man inside the city, and a blind man outside the city. One very rich, the other poor. One too blind to see, and the other too short to see, were the only men who did see. The inquiry would be not a little interesting as to why it was these men did see.

But we are now concerned rather to look at Zacchæus as a typical character—the type of many to-day who want to see Christ, but who are spiritually too short to see Him; men who are looking out for sycamore-trees to help them to see; men who have been more helped by trees than by ecclesiastical systems. Zacchæus knew that he was too short, and was willing to be helped to see; his anxious concern to climb the tree is a promising feature in his character.

The Zacchæus of to-day often does not know that he is so short and small. Because he does not see, he often declares that there is no Christ to be seen at all. Until Zacchæus will believe the testimony of thousands as honest as himself that there is a Christ they can see, and that it is something in himself that prevents his vision, little can be done for him but leave him to his vanity.

What produces spiritual smallness? Not necessarily ignorance or dulness; oftener the over-development of some one talent, that gives the individual a reputation for great cleverness. Nothing is more polished or sharp than a needle, but it makes a very little hole to see through. It pricks, but it does not cut like a sword. A man may so cultivate mathematics that he has no ear or patience for poetry. Looking ever down at minute germs is not the way to see the stars. Some very clever people have no faculty of common sense. Fine powers of observation for minute organisms surely are no qualification for either perceiving or receiving spiritual experiences.

Three causes may be given for spiritual smallness. In the world of vegetation, cold is one of the secrets of dwarfed stature. The frost's finger lays his mandate on pine and fir and says, "You may grow no higher." Sunshine means height. Can any man read the autobiography of Stuart Mill and not see that he was trained in an ice-house, called home? The deep secret of many a spiritual scepticism and hindrance is want of sympathy, want of heart-warmth, want of love. Pentecost was not an icy experience, it was an experience of fire. The "true Vine" loves the sunshine for its culture.

A second cause of spiritual smallness is pride—that is, a man ever so looking at himself, or his work, or intellect, never looking higher than self, he never sees One Who is higher, or deeply feels any such need. "Unless I see, and unless I am satisfied," is the first condition; and that temper of mind never looks Godward, it is so busy with the "I."

Speciality of training may be a hindrance to spiritual stature. Ours is the age of specialists. Men give themselves up to one pursuit, and to see one order of facts; and so, looking for nothing else, they see nothing else. A giant in materialism is often a spiritual dwarf. You may train your nature to look for law and be blind to "its Lord;" for atoms, and be ignorant of their Author. He who neither trains the special organ of vision required, nor looks with any persistence, can hardly expect to see that which he is both unfitted and unwilling to perceive.

Zacchæus was not only short; that might not have mattered if there had been no crowd. The crowd, with the innate selfishness of human nature, had no concern to stand aside and let the short see, or care to place the dwarfed in a front position. The difficulty of Zacchæus was therefore not only a personal defect, it was an external difficulty as well. Other people blocked out his view of Christ.

We cannot live alone. Some in life will excel others. If our leaders, whether at school, or in business, or in literary or Church circles, are sceptical, prayerless, Christless, then many a short one will lose his view of Christ. Many a young student has lost his view of Christ, simply because he is not tall enough spiritually to see over Huxley's, or Tyndall's, or Darwin's shoulder. Even a minister of Christ may get in the way of his Master. People, even "anxious inquirers," may be so "taken up" with the servant as to fail to really see the Master. Crowds of forms and ceremonies may and do sometimes block out the view of Christ. There is nothing like a private, personal interview for really seeing Christ. I once saw a crowd gathered to see the foundation-stone of a new "house of prayer" laid. The adult crowd blocked out the children who had come to the ceremony. I saw one man take a little girl on his shoulders, saying that "she should see, whoever else did not." That act caused others to place all the children in front. We want men and women to-day to place the young, the anxious, the sceptical, so high on the shoulders of practical life and testimony that many a short one shall get a commanding view of Christ. Are we all helping men to see Christ, or hindering their view? If men do stop our view, we need not therefore lose the sight, for there are still opportunities for climbing eminences from which we may be helped to a sight of Christ.

Zacchæus was determined to see. All along life's pathway there are trees towering grandly over life's crowd, from which we may see Christ if we will—your mother's life, your father's example; some biography of a good man, a life like Livingstone's, or Bishop Hannington's. Many a book exists in which every hindrance to intellectual vision has been fully met and removed. You may see Christ in the past of the world's history; in answered prayers—far, far too many and striking to be honestly questioned. You may see Him in fulfilled prophecy. In history, experience, revelation, literature, there are many such trees. Above all, that tree of Calvary, which needs no climbing, will give an immediate view, if once we really wish to see Him.

Climbing the tree can give a sight, but that will not satisfy. To see Christ we may ascend, to receive Christ we must descend. Not the mere sight, but the reception, of Christ can alone give pardon, rest, and full satisfaction. Christ does not say His most precious things to people up in trees, or in crowds. He waits until He and they are alone; then Christ gives to the full all the spirit longs for.

JOHN BRIGHT: A FRIEND INDEED.

BY A MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

FOR more than half a century John Bright has been, in the truest sense of the word, "a publicist;" and for forty-five years he has been almost uninterruptedly a member of the House of Commons. His life has thus been before the public, and on much of it a "fierce light" has beaten. In its later years that life has been much less one of controversy, for many of the objects he at first strove for were gained. And (not in a party sense) it may be said that later years showed the conservative side of his character—the attachment to home, to long-fixed forms of belief, to recreations, all conducing to this end, assisted by that natural magnification of victories, and of removal thus of the causes of strife. In seventy-seven years of life the desire for change becomes satiated, and there is less of looking forward, more of introspection and retrospection. The surroundings of John Bright have had their effect, too; for legislation and custom have altered their position and removed penalties his people had to bear. When John Bright entered public life Parliament may be said to have been closed to that middle class of which he was largely the exponent; the adherents to his faith were prohibited from entering many paths now open to them; and there were laws which pressed harshly upon them. But these may be said to be circumstances well known, and our aim is that of glancing at some incidents in that life more pleasant in remembering.

John Bright came of a Quaker stock, and for generations on both sides, in Charles Lamb's words, "parents owned the Quaker rule." When eleven years old he was sent to the noted Quaker seminary at Ackworth. The entry in the "List of Scholars" as to John Bright is simply his number on the school-roll, 4542, his name, "Rochdale" as his residence, and 1823 as the year when he left the school. From thence he went to York School, also a school for members of the Society of Friends, but for those of more advanced years and requirements. At York and at Newton-in-Bolland his education was completed, and thence business and, gradually, public life received him.

It was from the North of England that he was first sent to Parliament. In Newcastle he wooed and won his first wife—Elizabeth, daughter of Jonathan Priestman, a gentleman who used to have in that Tyneside town the pleasant appellation of the "handsome Quaker." After her death Cobden sought him.

and aroused him to Anti-Corn Law agitation. Speaking often in the North, he was chosen incidentally as candidate for Durham. He fought and lost; but in July, 1843, after another contest, he won. A pleasant story is told in that cathedral city:—Dean Waddington walked from the College to the polling place, and as he went along Saddler Street, the taunt was shouted at him—"You vote for a Quaker!" But his reply was, "I vote for a Free Trader!" Thus, then, a cathedral city and Church dignitaries sent and aided to send the great Quaker Free Trader to a Parliament he has adorned, influenced, and at times guided.

THE RIGHT HON. JOHN BRIGHT, M.P.

There is another parliament than that at Westminster that John Bright has had power and influence in. It meets yearly off Bishopsgate Without. It is in a plain building of ample dimensions—galleries rising at each end from the floor, and another higher looking down thereon. In that "naught-plotting cabal," where silence often settles down on a thousand men and women, in a well-known seat on the floor John Bright over many years used to be seen at these "Whitsun Conferences" of the Society of Friends. And less frequently he would rise up, put aside his hat, rest one hand on his umbrella, and lay the other lightly on a pillar near — hands usually encased in neat kid — and pour forth steadily, slowly, with little of passion and little approach to declamation, a flow of thought in a well of English undefiled. One memorable speech of his dwells in the mind of many. There had been expressed a great horror at the prevalence of intemperance, and a great longing for legislation to contract the means of procuring drink —to contract it as and when the people desired. John Bright arose, and the assembly, rather wearied before, settled down with a hush which told that the great orator not only "dwelt among," but had honour amongst his own people. His speech was short, his illustrations few; he scarcely raised his bell-like voice above a conversational pitch, but all heard and heeded him. He did not discredit legislation, but he pointed out that it could not wisely go faster than the wish of those who made it; that it was those makers of law, the people, who needed to be influenced; and that it was to the Churches we should look for the example, the precept, the influence, and the teaching. That speech told. The "minute" of the Quaker Church expressed it, embodied its central idea in its widely diffused "Epistle," and again and again it has been revived in measure, in spirit, and in tone.

There is another of the places which Mr. Bright loved to visit—his old school at Ackworth. His second wife came from the south of Yorkshire, and had often aided in the government of Ackworth School. Near midsummer, a "general meeting" is held at that Quaker village, and in the old days, before age and illness had afflicted the great tribune, he was a frequent visitor at that general meeting. There is a story told of one of these visits, which has its humorous as well as its pathetic side. The scholars read publicly answers to questions put to them weeks before as part of their examination. One such question was put to a scholar, who hesitated, looked from his written answer straight to where on the plain bench Mr. Bright sat with his wife. The question was repeated, and it was—"Who is the greatest statesman in this age?" Then the lad read, "John Bright," and gave his boyish reasons. There was a smile, and then a hush, as the meeting appreciated the position, and the "statesman" bowed his head, possibly to hide the feeling engendered.

In that school, in its midsummer quiet, John Bright loved to be; lingering with old friends, possibly with old schoolmates, and discussing across the table the changes that time had wrought and the improvements it had seen. And some who had heard him moving vast masses of men in the great cities—who had heard his declamations on hustings and in Westminster—loved best the man in his privacy, and in the charm of his attractive personal "after-dinner talk." And thus this latter-day Penn, who has earned the world's applause, is neither forgotten nor unhonoured by those who have been most intimate with him.

A RESCUING HAND.

BY JESSIE MACLEOD, AUTHOR OF "A STRANGE COINCIDENCE," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

ONE dark night in winter Mr. Breakspear, a London merchant, was unable to sleep in consequence of the wind howling round his house and the rain dashing against the windows. The house was an old-fashioned mansion at Hampstead, standing in an exposed situation. Perhaps he was thinking of his cargoes bound for the Cape and elsewhere. When once the mind enters upon a train of anxious thought it is good-bye to slumber.

As he listened to the storm, he fancied that between the blasts there were additional sounds which did not belong to them: beginning gently, then stopping, then recommencing—noises, in fact, of a saw and the cautious tapping of a hammer on a chisel. Mr. Breakspear arose in order to hear more clearly. Yes, the sounds were distinct: someone was attempting to break into the house by removing a pane of glass in the room below.

Sometimes he had considerable sums of money by him; there was always handsome plate; and at present the establishment was a small one, for Mrs. Breakspear and the children were at Brighton, and several of the servants also.

The merchant took a revolver from its case, then gently opening the window, looked down. It was as he thought. Through the rain which dashed in his face he distinguished two figures, one holding a dark lantern, while the other worked.

"You rascals!" shouted he in his loudest voice. "What are you doing there?"

The light was instantly extinguished, there was a scuffle, and rapid footfalls on the gravel walk. Mr. Breakspear fired his pistol—into space as he thought, but there was a cry, followed by groans: he had done in the dark what probably he could not have achieved with a good light and taking aim—shot the housebreaker.

He was horrified at his own impetuosity. Had he committed a murder!

Ringing the bell violently, he hurriedly dressed. The servants, already aroused by the report of firearms, rushed to his room; then carrying lights, they accompanied their master to the garden, where midway down the path they found a man lying on his face, to all appearance dead. The merchant had an excellent heart, and his remorse was great; he ordered the inanimate burglar to be carried into the house and placed on the bed of one of the absent servants.

He was quite a young man, thin almost to emaciation, dressed in a threadbare suit of clothes known as the "shabby genteel," which were wet through. There was nothing rough, coarse, or repulsive, the accepted characteristics of a housebreaker, about him; his hands were long and delicate. A dark line of blood issued from a wound at the side of his throat—a most dangerous one, as the merchant saw at once.

Greatly dismayed, he did his best to stop the bleeding, while as soon as possible he sent his brougham to bring the nearest surgeon. Fortunately the doctor was still up, having just returned from London, and it is probable that his prompt attendance saved the young man's life. He extracted the bullet, which had only just escaped the jugular artery: the patient was ordered to be kept very quiet, and on no account taken to a hospital at present.

Here was an embarrassment for the merchant: to have a burglar, who was attempting to break into the house, on his hands to be nursed and cared for!

But Mr. Breakspear never flinched; he had brought the trouble on himself by his rash act, and being a just man, accepted its consequences, vowing never to use firearms again.

When the young man recovered his consciousness he was surprised at his surroundings, and very grateful for the comforts he enjoyed. He thanked the merchant with tears, although reticent as to his past life; but at last yielded to the gentleman's urgent solicitations to confide in him, and relate what had brought him to this last stage of degradation. His father, he said, was a severe man; mother he had none. In spite of a good education and respectable position in society, he had unfortunately made idle acquaintances, incurred debts he could not defray, and after a stormy scene with his father, ran away from home.

At first he joined a company of strolling actors, but finding no money was to be gained, left them at Liverpool and tried a seafaring life, making a voyage to the West Indies. The hardships he endured thoroughly disgusted him. Too proud to return home destitute, he became entangled with associates who were nothing more nor less than thieves, and at last consented to accompany one of the gang to break into the merchant's house to steal plate, jewellery, or whatever articles of value they might light upon.

It was the old story of a rapid downward course, caused by a want of industry, a love of pleasure, insidious and dangerous companions—the influence of "evil communications."

Mr. Breakspear listened, much interested; it might be possible to reclaim this youth, and fit him for a useful station in the world, if respectable society should happily succeed to the vicious crew with whom he had associated.

"No, sir," he replied to the merchant's offer of mediating with his father. "I have disgraced his name, and will not reveal it until I have redeemed the past."

"Then what am I to call you?"

"John Francis," he said; "they are some of my real names, at any rate."

When his strength had somewhat returned, Mr. Breakspear placed him in a cottage on the opposite side of the Heath, while he considered what would be the best course to take with him. He dressed him in an old suit of his own, and could not resist smiling at the effect; being himself taller and considerably stouter than his protégé, the garments hung upon his thin figure so loosely that he resembled a scarecrow.

The merchant found it a very difficult matter to obtain him employment—he was no handicraftsman. To place him in his own counting-house would be unjust to his respectable clerks, nor would it be right to recommend him to another firm. At length, however, an opening presented itself at the West India Docks as a landing clerk; the remuneration was small, but it would give him a fresh start in life.

With protestations of deep gratitude, and promises of rectitude and self-denial in the future, John Francis departed.

For well over a twelvemonth the merchant received most satisfactory accounts of him, when he was promoted to a similar situation at Liverpool, and Mr. Breakspear lost sight of him; thus nineteen years glided by.

CHAPTER II.

"I REGRET Mr. Ashworth cannot receive me, for I am anxious to make his acquaintance," said the Rev. Mark Heritage, the new vicar of St. Osyth's, who was calling upon a lady of his congregation.

"You are very kind; but my uncle is averse to having visitors—he feels his loss of sight so much," answered the lady he addressed.

"Loss of sight is not loss of speech, nor of hearing; besides, I do not come as an ordinary caller-in: I am the vicar of his parish, and see the old gentleman occasionally led into church. Do go and ask him, Miss Siddall, to receive me."

The lady demurred; she was a woman of an uncertain age, neither young nor old, with fair hair and complexion; her eyes were of a pale grey, with very light eyelashes; they met the clergyman's as she looked up at him, shaking her head. He was somewhat of a physiognomist, and noted a gleam in them he could not quite understand.

"It will be useless to ask him—thank you very much."

Too polite to importune, he took his leave, but as he walked leisurely homeward that fleeting expression in her eyes seemed still before him. What did it mean: insincerity, watchfulness? Yes. Mr. Heritage had only come to the living three months before, and in that time had become acquainted with most of his parishioners; but although he had made several attempts to obtain an interview with Mr. Ashworth, who was a retired solicitor, he never succeeded in doing so.

His heart had warmed to the melancholy-looking, white-haired old gentleman who came to church on fine Sundays, led to his seat between his niece and the verger, and could not understand why he was always denied. Miss Siddall attended the services regularly, singing in a loud metallic voice. His predecessor in the living, being of feeble health, had not visited in the parish, but the new-comer was active, and in the prime of life—different in every respect.

Some few weeks after this, he chanced to see Miss Siddall enter a shop, and it suddenly occurred to him that her absence might give him an opportunity of seeing Mr. Ashworth; at any rate, he would try the experiment. The maid-servant who opened the door hesitated a little, but admitted him, while she went to her master, whose reply was an invitation to enter the old gentleman's sitting-room, which, with an adjacent bed-room, was on the ground floor.

"This is a pleasure I have longed for," said Mr. Ashworth, extending his hand in the direction of the visitor.

"And I also," said the vicar, who saw his vague suspicions substantiated. "I have called several times, but Miss Siddall would not have you disturbed."

"She is too careful of me, treating me like an invalid; but I am not ill, only feeble in consequence of my infirmity." Mr. Heritage placed himself beside him at the fire, and took his hand.

"Has your sight entirely gone, may I ask? Is there not a hope of it being restored?"

"I think there may be, for I can tell whether there is a light or not in the room—I know when the sun is shining. I fancy a great joy might possibly restore it."

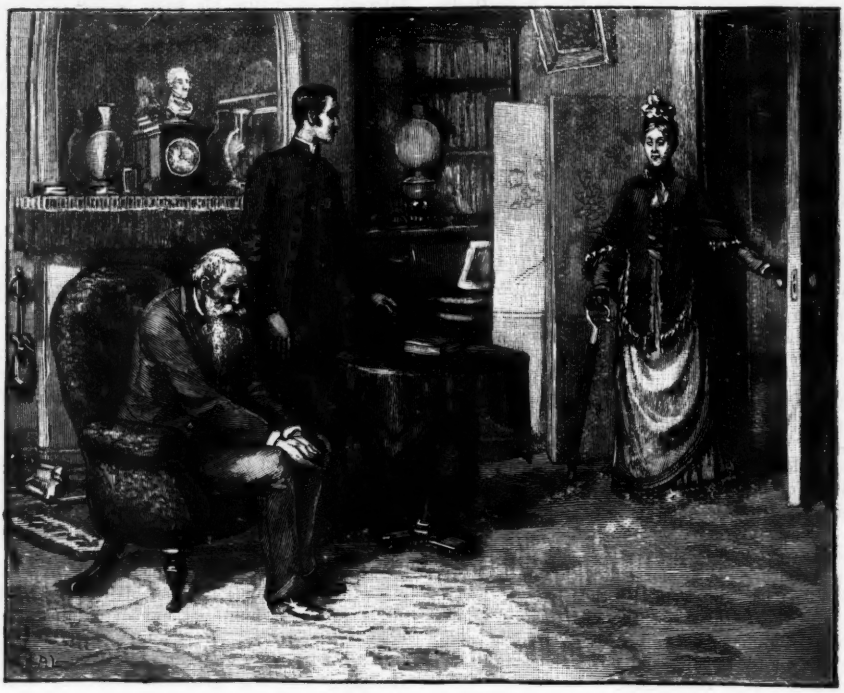
"A great joy?" repeated the vicar, surprised.

"Yes! for great grief has taken it away. Sir, you see a harsh father, who drove his son, his only child, to Heaven only knows what fate. I have shed so many remorseful tears that my eyes have gone blind."

Mr. Heritage became deeply interested.

"If the subject is not too painful, I should much like to hear the circumstances. I might help you to comfort and to resignation," said the clergyman.

"It will be a great relief to speak of it; you will see how hard, how unnatural I have been. My niece, who superintends my house and takes care of me, will not hear me mention his name; she says I ought to forget him—but human nature is not yet dead in me."



"Can a parent forget his children?" said Mr. Heritage, who was gradually becoming more enlightened. "There are few persons in whom natural feelings are quite extinct."

"I married late in life, and was immersed in law business; going to my office early, and returning late, I saw but little of my home. When I became a widower, instead of sending my boy to a boarding-school, as I ought to have done, I kept him at home. At that time I resided in Guilford Street, and my son had, unfortunately, the run of London: that was where the mischief began. He attended a public school hard by, but had much spare time, and no one to direct his youthful pleasures and pursuits. I was severe, too ready to blame and tardy to praise; he feared me, doubtless hiding much from me. Oh, it is a mistake for parents not to make friends of their children and gain their confidence: I see it all now.

"Later on, my wife's niece, Miss Siddall, came to reside with us; she and Frank did not get on well together; he despised her authority. Well, to end a sad story, he made bad acquaintances—actors and such-like—ran a reckless, wild career, and contracted debts. I forgave him, and paid these debts, on his promising amendment; but he was weak, and fond of pleasure—so relapsed. There were scenes between us; I refused to pay his expenses any longer, and told him he must work for his living, saying cruel things in my anger. Passionate and high-spirited, that night he disappeared from his home. It is twenty years ago; I have never heard of him since."

"Did you advertise for him to return?"

"The door opened, and Miss Siddall hastily entered."—p. 313.

"Yes, year after year, with no results."

"It is indeed a sad story, Mr. Ashworth. Let us trust that a merciful Providence may yet lift the cloud and reunite you with your lost son. Strange and wonderful things come to pass. When did you advertise last?"

"A twelvemonth ago; I have relinquished doing so now—it appears so useless. The anxiety of hope deferred, and my remorse, have nearly crushed me."

"Where did you have your letters to be addressed?"

"To myself, of course."

The vicar mused.

"Will you allow me to insert advertisements for you? I have been fortunate before now."

"With pleasure, my dear sir. You quite put fresh heart into me; both my niece and Burnell (a former clerk of mine, who looks after my affairs for me) urge me to give up the quest."

"What is your son's name, Mr. Ashworth?"

"John Francis," replied the old gentleman. "Find me my son, Mr. Heritage, and I will bless you. To hear his forgiving voice is the one hope which binds me to this world. Expense will be no object to me. Look round—do you see a small velvet and another silk bag, hanging by the fireplace? One contains half-sovereigns, the other half-crowns. Sometimes poor people apply to me whom I have known in former days; I am glad to give them little helps."

"Yes," said the vicar, "here are the two bags, close at hand."

"Will you kindly count out ten half-sovereigns and use them in advertisements?" continued Mr. Ashworth.

Taking the velvet bag from its hook, the vicar untied the string, and poured out the coins on the table. What did he see? Farthings! A bag nearly full of them. He opened the silk one. No half-crowns were there, only penny pieces. What did it mean?

"Take more if you will," said the unsuspecting old gentleman.

"You will be surprised to hear that there is a mistake; these bags contain neither gold nor silver, only farthings and pennies."

"What!" exclaimed Mr. Ashworth, rising from his arm-chair, a flush of indignation on his pale face. "What am I to understand by this?"

"That an unscrupulous person is taking advantage of you, I should say."

"Can it be Harriet?—no, she dare not. Burnell brings my money from the Bank. How is it?" said the poor old gentleman, sinking back into his seat. "Am I imposed upon? Be kind enough to say nothing of this; I must take time to think it out and take steps to solve this business. An old lawyer shall not be beaten. Allow me to be your debtor for the present."

The vicar re-hung the little bags; scarcely were they in their places, when the door opened, and Miss Siddall hastily entered, being informed by Sarah that Mr. Heritage was with her master. Discomposure was visible on her countenance, and her eyes glared as if from an inward fire. Mr. Heritage arose and bowed; he was no hypocrite, therefore did not extend his hand.

"I hope my dear uncle has not been exciting himself; his nervous system is far from good; the doctor forbids the least excitement," said she.

"Harriet," exclaimed Mr. Ashworth, "you infer that I am in bad health—that is not the case. I am an old man, and, like all blind people, feeble and uncertain in my movements—but I am not an invalid. By degrees all my friends have been excluded by this statement, and my life is rendered unnecessarily lonely."

"And this is the thanks I get for carrying out the doctor's directions—and as to friends, I'm sure, uncle, Mr. Burnell calls very often."

"Burnell is my salaried assistant. I am speaking of friends who are socially my equals," returned the old gentleman drily. He had gained courage by the vicar's presence.

"I will come again to-morrow, and bring a new book to read for you," said Mr. Heritage.

"It is very good of you to make the offer, but your time is valuable. I read to my uncle every day good books that I'm sure you would approve; for he is old, you know, and ought to care no longer for this world," said Miss Siddall sanctimoniously.

"There is only one link that binds me to it," said Mr. Ashworth. "Lost Frank!"

Miss Siddall started, glancing cautiously at the vicar, who was quite equal to the occasion.

"Mr. Ashworth has told me of his great sorrow. With prayer and trust his son will yet be restored to him."

"What, after twenty years? Never. The reprobate has died long ago, or he would have answered the advertisements," she exclaimed violently and spitefully.

"Allow me to differ from you. Probably he never met with them." As Mr. Heritage spoke he looked at her eyes, and again the ugly gleam passed across them.

"Give me my son—let me hear his voice once more, and I shall die in peace," cried the poor old man, clasping his hands.

"There!" said Miss Siddall—"and the doctor said he was not to be excited." Whereupon the vicar shook hands with him cordially, and took his leave; distantly of the lady—with her he saw it was war to the knife.

"Horrid man!" soliloquised she. "I'll keep him out all I can, and I won't go to his church any more."

The old lawyer had been a man of resolute purpose in his earlier life, but brooding over his family sorrows for so many years had sapped his energy. Now he roused himself, and feeling for the bell, rang it sharply.

"What do you require, uncle?" asked Miss Siddall, surprised.

He did not reply, but when Sarah appeared to answer his summons, said, "Sarah, Mr. Heritage is to be admitted whenever he calls; and never send away visitors without coming to me."

"Well, I'm sure!" exclaimed the lady. "Is there anything more you would like?"

"Yes. I should wish you to count out the bags, and see how we stand for money."

Miss Siddall gave a startled glance at them—they hung apparently undisturbed.

She emptied the contents, and obeyed him.

"Twenty-five half-sovereigns, uncle, and thirty half-crowns," said she.

"Wrap up twenty half-sovereigns, Harriet, and give them to Burnell, when he comes, for his quarter's salary."

"He is always paid at your agent's," she said, dismayed.

"So that he gets his money, he will not care how he receives it. Do as I say; I shall not keep any more money to give away. That which should be left in the bag, six pounds five, is just the sum to pay for the new dress I ordered for you last week."

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

THE CHINA INLAND MISSION.

THE REV. J. HUDSON TAYLOR.
(From a Photograph by G. P. Abraham, Keswick.)

CONCERNING China we are told that it would take something like the letters of eighty Bibles to represent the population of that old and wondrous empire; how vast, how solemn is the need of evangelistic labours in that great harvest-field, and what showers of blessing have come down upon the society that has now sixty-four stations with resident missionaries, and a staff of workers numbering three hundred and twenty-four. These belong to various Protestant bodies, and vary in social position; the great qualification is "soundness in the faith in all fundamental truths," and the success of the mission is undoubted and remarkable. There is a rule to avoid collections and personal solicitation of money, but the income for 1887 was £33,700! When the Rev. J. Hudson Taylor returned to England from China in 1860, he prayed that his return (occasioned by failing health) might be overruled for good; and in a letter to a friend, yearning that devoted young men might be led to serve God in China, he seems to have struck the note that has led to such glorious results. A deep impression was made on many when the University band went out some years ago; last November seven earnest volunteers, from different Young Men's Christian Associations, were commended to the keeping of the Master in a memorable meeting at Exeter Hall, and started from home and country to work in China's interior. Some who preceded them in bearing thither the Gospel standard have died at their posts, but the work will go on. It is told of an impetuous Methodist, listening to a funeral oration wherein the speaker said, "The light of Methodism is extinguished," that he started up with the cry, "Glory be to God! that 's a lie." Faithful ones are called away to rest, but others take hold of the work; the Gospel light will burn all the brighter for their sweet, inspiring memories. "Brethren, pray for us," writes one who is working in China; "the work is the Lord's—prisoners' chains fall off, prison doors fly open, when prayer is made without ceasing of the Church unto God."

"WORK FIRST, AND THEN REST."

This is Ruskin's advice; rest after toil "doth greatly please," but just now many would-be toilers prefer the daily task. "I am quite tired of being the gentleman," wrote an energetic little lad resting perforce at a convalescent home. His heart was back in the daily work again, and very many this winter can take up the little fellow's cry, and echo his yearning to find himself in harness. The problem, so real, so difficult, of lives, young and old, apparently exceeding the daily work that exists—the problem of lives that would work even for a pittance, the sight of enforced idleness and of competition even for temporary jobs—must appeal to the hearts of all who love God, for they love their brethren also, and would fain straighten out the tangle. There can be no truer form of charity than the endeavour to help those who are trying to help themselves; in caring for the outcast and helpless, let us not overlook the claims of those who are outwardly respectable, going hither and thither seeking daily work, asking no alms save the means of earning a living. Those who have education, leisure, and a little silver to spare, may find blessed occupation in endeavouring to bring together the work and the worker, either in England or the growing fields of labour abroad; and those who preside over Bible-classes or Sunday scholars may be of real help in unravelling social difficulties, if they will discover why certain members of their classes are out of work, and thus beset by temptation, and if they will make it a personal concern to seek situations and employment for lives that are asking work.

CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK.

We have heard much of late of the supposed failure of Christian missions, but the "Report of the Missionary Conference" held in London during last year, which has just been issued by Messrs. Nisbet, shows that never before were there so many or so well-trained workers in the mission-field as there are now. Perhaps we are all of us too apt to think more of the furtherance of our own particular division of the Church than the spread of the Master's Kingdom, but we are not without hope that in this respect a great change for the better is coming over us, and of this we see the earnest in the decidedly practical Conference whose report is before us.—The memoir of the late Alexander Balfour of Liverpool, by the Rev. R. H. Lundie, is issued by the same publishers. It tells the life-story, as far as possible in Mr. Balfour's own words, of one who was widely useful in his city during a long lifetime.—To Messrs. Nisbet's series, "Men of the Bible," has now been added a new life of Him who was Son of God and Son of Man, whose life was the Life of lives. The author is the Rev. J. F. Vallings, M.A., to whom, in his own words, Jesus Christ is "The ideal Man, the representative Man, the Divine Man, God over all, blessed for ever." The series would have been incomplete without a work dealing with the life of Christ—the life of the only perfect Man who ever lived. The work is reverent, thoughtful, and suggestive.—"From Adam to Abraham" (same publishers) is the title which the Rev. J. Gurney Hoare gives to a series of forty-eight lessons, intended for class use, upon the first fifteen chapters of Genesis. We do not see anything specially fresh in this volume, which is a companion to one on "Joshua and Judges," which we noticed some little time ago.—We should not like to be bound to express concurrence in everything which Professor Momerie says in his volume, "Inspiration, and other Sermons" (W. Blackwood and Sons). At the same time, there is much in the work that is valuable, and not a little that is helpful. The sermons on "True and False Discontent" and on "Patience" are, to our thinking, among the best in the volume.—"The Present Tenses of the Blessed Life" (Morgan and Scott) is the somewhat awkward title which the Rev. F. B. Meyer gives to a series of more than usually helpful meditations on passages of Scripture which he cites as showing the phases of the Eternal Life which is even now begun in all who have named the name of Christ.—We regret that the unusual demands upon our space will not allow us to do more than mention Mr. Selby's interesting volume, "The Imperfect Angel, and other Sermons" (Hodder and Stoughton).

WORK AMONG NORWICH FACTORY-GIRLS.

A writer on the subject of charities has said there can be no better proof of the Divine origin of Christianity and of the truth of the Gospel than the story of various helpful institutions, and it is certain that those who truly follow the Christian religion do love the poor, seek out lives in need, and hold out hands of friendship and sympathy to one and all. The young, the aged, the careless, and the infirm are alike befriended by Christian lives; the fact of need becomes a claim upon consideration and help, so that thoughtful hearts are ever planning some fresh means of influencing less favoured lives for good. We remember reading of charities abroad that provide for respectable interment of the dead, or for the safe storage of any printed matter that may be found here and there—such pieces of paper being of too much consequence to throw away. But Christian charity cares for the living rather than for those needing interment, and yearns over young souls on which may be written good or evil in their early, impressionable days. An East-End worker determined once to see for herself what attractions in music-halls and cheap theatres charmed the girls in whom she was interested. The style of entertainment filled her with grief and shame, but she noticed brightness and plants and a general air of festivity which would be a most attractive change to hard-working girls. "And I almost wondered," said she, "at the amount of influence our meetings still possess over girls to whom these doors stand open." Is not the moral that Christian institutes and meetings should extend a cheery welcome also, lifting the girls away from their hard surroundings, and refreshing body, mind, and soul? We hear from the Rev. R. Hobson, Clarendon Road, Norwich, of a very successful work among factory-girls. "St. George's Club" exists to benefit them socially, morally, and spiritually, and to make their leisure hours bright and useful. "We seek," says Mr. Hobson, "to recognise two common-place principles, viz., that prevention is better than cure, and that it is wise and well to help those who try to help themselves." Shelter is provided for girls out of work, and the movement is based on broad undenominational lines, and may be justly commended to all who would wish to help on an effort worthy of largely increased support. An interesting feature is the Orchestral String Band, consisting of twenty-four young women, who render gratuitous service to many a benevolent cause.

A CROCUS LESSON.

"When I look into my garden," remarked Bishop Hall, "I see a small spire look out of the earth, which grows into a stalk; at last appears the hope of a flower, which, ripened by suns and showers, arises to perfection." How many a lesson Nature whispers to the heart, of courage, faith, and patience, and the covenant-keeping God Who is the God of life and not of death, and Whose voice awakes the blossoms to preach with voiceless lips of His goodness and His power! Autumn pointed the moral for many a warning concerning death and decay. Let the first brave heralds of spring be like the angels that bore resurrection tidings, and inspired fresh comfort, hope, and cheer. To some young friends who publicly professed the Master a lady gave pots of crocuses, with mottoes full of helpful meaning; on one was a card with the words, "Consider the lilies how they grow"—not by great effort, but by great power. The Heavenly Power is the secret of all true and beautiful growth. Those lowly spirits that utterly rest on God are growing most truly in grace, and those who would fain make spiritual progress must drink in the bedewing influences of the Holy Spirit, and look away from self entirely to Him Who is the Light; thus, "not by great effort, but by great power," will be developed the glorious and immortal possibilities "which in their seeds

"And weak beginnings lie entreasured."

AT THE PRISON GATE.

Mrs. Meredith's Prison-Gate Mission is steadfastly struggling against the forces of evil, preaching deliverance to the captive, and revealing hope to poor victims of intemperance and sin. "It's hard," said one, "when you have nothing but misery and poverty, to think about God." But she was shown that God cares for the poor and troubled ones, and that many a heart has trusted in Him even amid circumstances of poverty. The Christian solicitude that provides breakfast for them, and would fain guide them to an honest livelihood, must surely mirror, even to those who are apparently unmoved, the love and mindfulness of the Redeemer; several cases are full of encouraging promise, and many are thankful for work at the laundry; while others who disappear into the vortex of London life have at least been brought face to face with the invitations of the Gospel, and eternity alone can reveal the result. "I will do better now," said one poor woman, to whose heart the Word of God came home; and another said, "I really am going to think of what you have been saying." It is a sad fact that numbers of women are confined on account of drunkenness; this should give a prayerful and earnest impetus to temperance work. "Will some of our Christian friends," ask the workers at the prison gate, "pray for these women every Saturday night, that the pure Gospel truths they hear may sink deep into their hearts, and bring forth fruit in His own good time?"

"GOD LOVES ME."

Miss Perks, of the Soldiers' Home and Christian Mission, Winchester, relates an interesting incident of her evangelistic village work. She visited a poor old woman, blind and deaf, and a lifelong cripple. This woman was called by the neighbours "Idiot Mary," and indeed her life was one of depression and gloom, though a kindly sister was mercifully left to her, and it was this sister who longed for Miss Perks to "do something" to cheer the darkened mind. The visitor was at first much perplexed, hearing that "Idiot Mary's" one exclamation was "Misery, Misery!" How was she to brighten the poor old soul? She lifted her heart in prayer, and then took one shrivelled hand in hers, making signs thereon, till Mary muttered, "Letters!" for she had learnt to read ere, more than fifty years ago, she became an invalid. Miss Perks, after long effort, spelt out the sentence on her hand, "God loves you." Old Mary, with sorrowful face, patted her shoulder, as if to say, "Yes; you but not me!" So Miss Perks tried again, with the words, "God loves me," and patted blind Mary to make it personal. At last the worn face brightened up, and Mary closed her hand as though to keep the good news therein. A converted soldier took up the case, till Mary learnt texts and hymns traced on her one unmaimed hand; then she received portions of the Bible in raised letters, and at last she began to tell to her neighbours what she learnt and read. Miss Perks writes recently, "We have had a summer filled with blessing, having carried the Gospel all around, and the converted soldiers have taken a most active and earnest part. We have had farewell meetings with troops bound for India, Burmah, and the Cape, and now we are beginning all over again with fresh regiments. Our soldier converts are grand missionaries in all parts of the world."

THE SEASON FOR READING.

Pre-eminently winter is the season for reading, when the days are shortest and the nights longest, and when the inclemency of the weather makes one's own fireside peculiarly acceptable as a refuge. Naturally, at such a time our thoughts wander to other and more genial climes, where skies are clearer and winds warmer. Canon Bell, of Cheltenham, was sent to spend last winter in Egypt, and devoted much of his time while there to noting the close connection between the history of that ill-fated country and the inspired Bible record. What he saw he tells us in a pleasantly written volume, entitled "A Winter on the Nile" (Hodder and Stoughton), which we heartily commend to our readers.—Beside the history of Egypt, whose grandeur was passed before our own day arose, the history of England looks a little commonplace; but to us it is and must be dearest of all this world's histories. So we are glad to welcome the second volume of the Jubilee edition of Cassell's "History of England." This volume covers the all-important period between the Wars of the Roses and the outbreak of the great Revolution, and therefore embraces those most glorious epochs of our history, the establishment of the Protestant religion and the reign of Queen Elizabeth.—Another historical work which is on our table is the latest volume of Messrs. Longmans' "Epochs of Church History," entitled "The Popes and the Hohenstaufen," in which a not unimportant phase of the long-continued battle between the Popes and the European rulers is ably chronicled. Schism and slaughter seem to have been the main outcome of the Papal policy throughout the conflict.

"RESIGNING THE RUDDER."

It was a prayer of George Herbert's that he might wholly be led to resign the rudder of his life to the sacred will of God, to be moved "as Thy Love shall sway." How much fretting, how much worry, it would spare us all if we asked our Heavenly Father that He would cause us to lean utterly, in perfect faith, in cheerful, unquestioning obedience, upon His will and wisdom, whether in life's trivial concerns or in those shades of darkness from which we recoil in fear. We can ask Him nothing beyond His power; some of us know the feeling, "In all but this, I could say Thy will be done;" but if we will only tell the story at His feet, pouring out our hearts before Him, we shall be able to trust our Father, even to rejoice in Him, through every changeful pathway. Not long ago a Christian visitor called upon a poor woman who had just been told by the matron of the hospital of the incurable nature of her complaint; the poor sufferer tearfully declared she accepted God's will patiently so far as her own pain and death were concerned, but she could not bear the thought of her motherless children; nobody could induce her, she said, as concerned the children, to feel patient and resigned. It was a painful scene; the visitor could not remonstrate with her upon her spirit of impatience and murmuring, but felt as though she must weep with her, as she said, "Yours is untold sorrow beyond my understanding even, but God knows all about it—God understands. Will you not tell Him just how you feel—tell Him what you have told me—all your pain, anxiety, and dread of leaving your little ones alone? I am going now to tell the leader of our prayer-meeting about you; to-morrow, from three to half-past, prayers will arise on your behalf; will you not at the same time be on your knees before God and tell Him all?" The sufferer promised: next day, relates the visitor, earnest, pleading supplications laid her case before God, and what was the result? The next interview found that woman as calm as she had been impatient; she had poured out her own heart in prayer, and others had prayed for her, and she told the visitor, "I am just leaving everything with God—not only whether I live or die, but each of my little children. Everything is safe with Him; I feel it—I know it." Verily our God is the same now as in past ages—prayer-hearing, prayer-answering.

"Thou canst no more not hear, than Thou canst die."

IN A FAR COUNTRY.

It may be that we, to whom religious privileges abound, would value them more earnestly could we share the experience of travellers and colonists who in remote districts hear no church-bells ring, have no choice of Christian preachers and teachers, and find little in their Sabbath surroundings to remind them that the day of rest has returned. "People have been fined, imprisoned, martyred," said a lecturer on the Reformation, "for reading the Bible which the children of to-day can so easily possess, so freely read and learn." How great are our responsibilities who live in these days of privileges, and in this land of Christian blessings! may we be saved from lightly esteeming those streams of healthfulness and grace, for which many of our brethren in distant lands are sighing to-day. We have been touched by the story told in a private letter from Oregon, of an old man—one of the earliest settlers—who walked ten miles or more to ask an English family if they had a large-type Bible, as for twelve months past he had been unable to read the small type of the one he possessed. Those to whom he brought his request had only small-type books likewise; so the old man started back without his book, but one cannot forbear much sympathy with himself and his aged wife, long since strangers to their fatherland, yet reading to each other the familiar words they had heard as little children. In districts like these how welcome is the Gospel music when proclaimed among the colonists, and it is said suggestively that there would be rejoicing if some Christian preacher, not quite dependent on congregational support, could journey out to preach among the settlers, many of whom find it uphill work as yet to keep themselves and their families. And those of us who have friends beyond the reach of privileges like our own, may help and bless their neighbours as well as themselves by sending out regularly spiritual food in the shape of Gospel sermons, text-cards, and wholesome literature, which shall gladden unspeakably many a remote fireside.

THE STRANGERS' REST AT CARDIFF.

Many wandering lives come beneath the good influences of this institution, where religious services and Gospel Temperance meetings are held, and much helpful literature is distributed. This much-needed work of Christian sympathy has not proved in vain; the seed sown has brought forth fruit, in some cases not till the shore has been left far behind, and the sailor is toiling again upon the lonely wave. An interesting account is given of a Newfoundlander who once turned in to a meeting with a shipmate, and said lightly, "Do they think they are going to convert us?" About four years later, this sailor visited the steward of his ship in sickness, and, after his death, the steward's Bible was left to him; this Book had been received from the Strangers' Rest, and the address of the Institute was written within. The sailor was impressed by this reminder, and afterwards came to Cardiff, hoping to find help and blessing at the Rest, and by God's mercy his heart was changed, and he was enabled to bear testimony from a distant shore, "God is good—I trust in Him!" We hear of many other encouraging incidents connected with this mission amid lives that are rough and hard and careless to outward seeming, but can be moved by the love of God. One young man—a Russian officer—often spent his evenings thankfully at the Rest. Before long, this young sailor was fated to be cast adrift from a wrecked ship in a little boat with five of the crew: he had brought away his Testament, and, on the Sunday morning, he read to the troubled, exhausted men the story of the storm that was stilled by Christ. Heads were bared, and prayers were offered. A week later a ship was sighted, and when it took no notice of them, some of the men burst into violent language; then the story of that storm was read again, and their frenzy was hushed. On Monday, the Book was read once more, and they knelt to pray, when the cry was heard, "A sail—a sail!" The men broke into thanksgiving, for all were taken on board, and safely conveyed to New York. It is amid lives exposed to sudden perils like this that the Cardiff Strangers' Rest is spreading the tidings of the Redeemer's love, "that, loving the unworthy, loves him into worthiness."

"THE GARMENTS OF PRAISE."

"Who is this?" asked a father, showing his likeness to his child. "That's you, father," was the quick response; "I am sure it is you—the face is smiling so." We know of a Sunday-school teacher whom a little one christened "Smiling-Face;" happy are those whose names suggest gladness and brightness, whose presence acts as sunshine wherever they may move. "He scarcely needs to speak; he beams on all around," was the description once given us of a Christian worker: we do not suggest that it is well to cultivate artificial radiance, which would tend to monotony and ridicule; but even those who are not joyful by nature may become thankful and bright by Grace, and recommend religion by putting away murmuring, complaints, and irritability. The Bible urges us, "Forget not all His benefits;" if we think about our mercies, our preservations, our deliverances, and more about the hope that is set before us, depression will be cured, and the spirit of heaviness will be replaced by the garments of praise. We once heard it remarked that while it is true we have no record that our Lord and Master smiled, it is true also that, His Name being Love, He is King of joy and light—He is the Sunshine of eternity—and above all others He is anointed with the oil of gladness. The very birds, the myriad lives of nature, bid us rejoice; even the faded leaves died smiling up to the sun and the autumn splendour, and before very long the land will again be a vision of golden rapture; but, in all creation, the Christian heart has most cause for the spirit and aspect of thanksgiving. Mr. Spurgeon has said that some Christians are too prone to look on life's dark side, and talk about what they have gone through, rather than what the Lord has done; a healthy Christian says, "I will speak, not about myself, but to the honour of my God. The Lord hath done great things for me, whereof I am glad."

"THEY SHALL PROSPER THAT LOVE THEE."

It is proposed that a "Women's Missionary Association House" shall be established in Jerusalem, whence ladies may go forth to mission-work in Palestine and other Eastern countries, teaching the Moslem, Arab, and Ethiopian women, and the "children of the strangers." Not less than two will labour together, and they will associate themselves as far as possible with those Christian women who are already at work in the "lands of the Bible." Ladies who desire to take up foreign work, and who seem to be fitted for it, will receive instruction in all the necessary qualifications for medical missions. Those who feel interested in the movement may communicate with Miss Lloyd, 143, Clapham Road; or Mrs. Meredith, 344, Wandsworth Road, S.W. An interesting feature of Gospel work among the Jews is the "Wanderers' Home," directed by the Rev. J. M. Eppstein, of King Edward Road, South Hackney. Here inquiring and believing Jews and Jewesses are sheltered, aided, and instructed. Their stay is limited as a rule to three months, but, if necessary, the time is prolonged, and many study Scripture diligently, and ask that they may publicly confess Christ by baptism. A Christian profession often means to the Jew distress and persecution, hence the necessity of a refuge where he will find protection and safety. The case is instanced of a young convert whose relatives tried to get him away from the Home by pretending his father was dead, also that he was in debt and must come out and pay. The police had to be called to stop the rioting and blows, and the convert was given into custody by the Jews, who declared he had stolen money. After several hours' detention, the inspector saw the accusation was false, and dismissed the case. The prisoner returned to the Home, and the prayers that had arisen on his behalf were changed to praise and thanksgiving. He has stood firm through much persecution, and is now in business, helping his poor Jewish brethren.

AT WORK IN BRITTANY.

Mr. J. C. Bolton, F.C.A., 26, Great St. Helen's, E.C., is hon. treasurer to a society which has no paid staff, and possesses free office-quarters through the courtesy of the Trinitarian Bible Society. Brittany seems in a most hopeful condition for Gospel work, although the Church of Rome contests each forward step, and in many cases gathers the Scriptures and publicly burns them. "We look upon the very ashes," say the evangelists, "as seed-corn of promise." Pains and penalties do not deter faithful souls from confessing "Jesus only," and the people themselves assist in scattering the truth, for their neighbours likewise beg to hear the glad tidings. Pastor Lecoat has started evangelistic work among Bretons labouring in Jersey and at the seaport of Havre; the priests opposed such efforts, but the New Testaments safely found their way into the Bretons' pockets, and the Gospel messages to their hearts. A Bible carriage is at work, despite obstruction and prejudice. One colporteur was attacked by women with reaping-hooks; but this work of visitation goes steadily on. A complete Breton Bible is now in prospect; Pastor Lecoat has translated various wholesome publications into Bretonic, among which are the "Pilgrim's Progress," and Miss Skinner's "Friendly Letters," which we noticed some months since in THE QUIVER.

"THE PROPHECIES OF ISAIAH."

After the great work of Delitzsch, any new exposition of the Book of the Prophet Isaiah must naturally suffer by comparison. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, however, the Rev. George Adam Smith has bravely come forward with the first of the two volumes to be devoted to the "Book of Isaiah" in Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's excellent series entitled "The Expositor's Bible." There is a good deal of dash and freedom in Mr. Smith's handling of his subject. Many allusions and expressions are almost startling in their strangeness, considering the sacred connection in which they occur; and some will regard this feature of the work as a blemish. But we are bound to say that, on the whole, the tone is reverential, while there is a great fund of original thought and careful research on which the well-grounded Bible student may draw with keen pleasure and solid profit. We shall look forward with interest to the appearance of the second volume of this ably written book.

MISS DE BROEN'S BELLEVILLE MISSION.

We have received an interesting account of a day's work in connection with this mission, which carries on many-sided religious activities, and ministers to soul and body. Some patients leave home as early as five a.m., that they may get a good place amid the crowd which at nine on Thursday mornings surrounds the Free Dispensary. The medical work goes on till six, or later, and meanwhile the poor and sick are visited, and Bible-classes are held for children. An evangelistic meeting is held in the evening, many converts of the mission being present as a rule, and tracts are distributed at the close. The dispensary is quite free, and the patients that seek its relief keep the doctor and two dispensers hard at work. These patients take part in a Gospel service, hearing perhaps for the first time the simple message, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Sympathetic friends busy themselves among those who wait their turn for the doctor, reading to them and striving to gladden their hearts. It is in the hour of trial and sickness that human hearts are most susceptible to the voice of the Great Physician. May many who seek this mission for bodily relief find healing and health of soul, and may the sphere of this good work be enlarged by willing hearts and hands and the influence of prayer! Miss de Broen's address is 3, Rue Clavel, Belleville, Paris.

"OLD CLOTHES!"

Parents whose boys and girls have outgrown or worn out their garments may take part in an excellent work by sending the cast-off clothes to "Old Clo," 25, Stanhope Street, Hampstead Road, N.W. Thence they will find their way to the Board and voluntary schools of Marylebone, where there are many poor scholars to whom they will mean warmth and comfort and rejoicing. We hear of kindly teachers, sympathising friends, even Her Majesty's Inspectors, sorting, arranging, and folding piles of garments. Repairing old clothes and making new ones have provided several poor women with work, and repairing boots and shoes has given further employment. The things are made to look as tidy as possible, and doubtless the knickerbockers and frocks discarded in many a well-to-do home would conduce to self-respect and bodily health amid less fortunate families.

INDOORS AND OUT OF DOORS.

We should think that of all writers for young people in the present day, no one has put forth more works, especially for girls, than Mrs. Marshall. Two works of hers have just been issued by Messrs. Nisbet, one called "Oliver's Old Picture," and the other "Dulcibel's Day-Dreams." The former is addressed to children still quite young, and tells how a lost picture was recovered. The latter shows how the heroine was led from idle day-dreams to good, honest, practical work, and has interwoven with it a simple love story. Both these books are well suited for Sunday-school libraries.—Another story from the same publishers is the Rev. Jackson Wray's latest work, "Will it Lift?" the story of a London fog, out of which the author manages to bring his characters into very clear light.—"A Prey to the Enemy" (National Temperance Publication Depôt), by Mrs. Zillah Dugdale, is described on the title page as a story from real life. This being so, the story is a doubly sad one, and its warning against the evil of intemperance doubly strong. — What progress the temperance cause is making may be seen from the National Temperance League's Annual for 1889, which we commend to the attention of all who are interested in this good work.—"Wee Willie Winkie" (Cassell) is the story of "a boy who was found," by that old friend of little readers, Miss C. L. Matéaux, who also relates the "Ups and Downs of a Donkey's Life" (same publishers). The author's name is almost recommendation enough for these works, but we may mention, also, that they are abundantly illustrated, and would form admirable birthday or other gifts for young people.—"The Mystery at Shoncliff School" and "Claimed at Last" (same publishers) are stories which originally appeared in the columns of Little Folks, and deserve to be widely popular now that they stand alone.—Mrs. William Gray has worked hard among and for girls, and in her recently published "Last Words to Girls" (Rivingtons) there is some really sound advice in the form of chatty essays on such subjects as life in school, life after school, sympathy, and tastes. The work is alike earnest and thoughtful.—We are glad to see that Mr. H. W. S. Worsley Benison's "Nature's Fairy-Land" (Elliot Stock), which we noticed some little time ago, has now reached a second edition.

DRIFTING SCHOLARS.

"I cannot think what makes them so irregular!" How often these words are spoken by teachers, either openly or mentally; they deny themselves their afternoon's leisure at times only to find their flock dwindled down to three or four, and vacant seats facing them in a manner depressing to behold. We heard of a plan of laying in a store of printed notices, which on Monday would be posted to absentees. This saves time, and time is apparently the deficiency of the age. But a personal note is better when possible—a letter from heart to heart. A teacher found his class missing one Sunday, so he started off on a pilgrimage after the absentees, and inquiries in two cases at least proved that the parents believed their children to be in their places at school. These juveniles had not supposed "teacher" would take the trouble to seek them personally. Nothing is so effectual in the case of drifting scholars as home visitation, for the parents then feel a real interest is taken in their children, and they are concerned in keeping them regularly to their class. Many people conscientiously object to prize-giving; but we cannot see the harm, if the teacher can afford it, of giving helpful books for regularity and good conduct. "What makes my scholars irregular?" is a question that should cause the teacher some self-examination. "Do I give them anything worth coming for? Do I trouble to understand their circumstances, needs, and temptations? Am I a week-day friend to them, or do I see them only on Sundays? Do I conscientiously prepare my lesson for them—do I care for them as GOD'S children for whom the Saviour died—and, above all, do I earnestly pray for them, and remember these drifting absent ones before the Mercy-Seat?"

"Vacant seats facing them."—p 319.

MISS HEDENSTRÖM'S NEW HOME.

"I am now," says Miss Agnes Hedenström, of the East-End Temperance Home for Scandinavian sailors, "with our men in the new building, under our own roof—the old Home belongs to the past." More commodious premises were for some time urgently required; for the Home is very popular, and Miss Hedenström much in request as counsellor, sympathiser, and banker. "For the last fortnight we have had only mouldy biscuits and water," said two sailors, coming in from a hard voyage; "but each day we feel more cheerful, for, gnawing our hard biscuits, we thought, 'We are a bit nearer the day when we shall be well fed in the Scandinavian Home.'" The need of such an institution has been proved by the fact that places and people are in existence whereby Jack would soon be despoiled of his earnings and degraded in character. Miss Hedenström has also a benevolent fund to fit men out as to clothing, and to feed the poor men, women, and children in the neighbourhood of the Home. "To me," she says, "it is a hard thing to speak of God's love to those who have nothing for their bodies." Many will feel it a privilege to swell the right side of the balance-sheet of one who thus practically day by day is revealing the spirit of the Gospel to those in need, and stretching out "a loving hand

"To wrestlers with the troubled sea."

The Rev. H. Philpot, of Abaco, Bahamas, wishes to thank, through the Editor, an unknown donor who has kindly sent him THE QUIVER monthly for some years past.

The Editor has received 5s. from "Ellice," Worcestershire, which he cannot apply for lack of definite instructions (which the Editor would be glad to have from "Ellice"); and 2s. 6d. from S. S., which has been handed to the National Lifeboat Institution.

RAGGED SCHOOLS—OLD AND NEW.

BY G. HOLDEN PIKE.

"ALL IN!" A SKETCH AT NELSON STREET SCHOOL.

WE can easily imagine that to the future historian one of the most striking characteristics of the Victorian era will be that gradual transformation of London which has taken place before the eyes of persons who have now arrived at middle age. One well-known writer on the old times and the new has shown to his own satisfaction that the shadow and the influence of the eighteenth century really extended to the end of the reign of William IV. According to this view, the accession of the present Queen really introduced a new order of things—the era of progress and of philanthropy with which we are so pleasantly familiar. So familiar, indeed, have we happily become with a number of things now reckoned among the common-places of our everyday life, that we may sometimes be disposed to forget that it was not always so; that not only is education on a national scale a new thing, but that widespread missionary zeal, whether at home or abroad, is also peculiar to our modern life—something that our forefathers would have regarded as impracticable, or quite Utopian, before the nation's religious life became quickened by its catching some of the divine enthusiasm of the New Testament. It is quite impossible for us, with our present surroundings, to realise what London was when there was an Alsatia between Fleet Street and the Thames; when St. Giles's retained its rookeries intact; when the East End had its bands of robbers, who were dangerous even in the light of open day.

When the Ragged School crusade commenced, more than forty years ago, our great capital, though only half its present size, remained what it had been for generations; and the amount of squalor, ignorance, and crime to be seen, made up an outlook which dismayed, or even seriously alarmed, the boldest adventurers in the new enterprise. Now, the conditions have altogether altered; and having grown with the times, the teachers have to adapt themselves to the altered requirements of the situation. The creation of the School Boards has rendered old methods of work in some degree obsolete; but, nevertheless, the distinctive religious teaching of the Ragged School Union is still a necessity, and will remain a mighty power so long as fifty thousand boys and girls are found in the schools of London alone on every Sabbath day.

While what may be called the transformation of London is one of the most characteristic things associated with the present reign, there are spots here and there which retain their old-time face, and these aid the social explorer to realise what the more hidden parts of the great city were like half a century ago. Of course, since the creation of local Boards of Health sanitation has made sufficient progress for it to be impossible for things ever really to be again what they once were; but although drainage and the water supply have improved, there are purlieus which in general outward features still greet us with their old-time face. Perhaps one of the most remarkable of these comparatively little-known by-ways is Kent Street, Southwark, which in other days, before the construction of Great Dover Street, was the only entrance into London from the Old Kent Road. This is the identical highway that the Canterbury Pilgrims must have taken when they set out from the old Tabard Inn on their memorable pilgrimage. Five hundred years ago, when the fields of Surrey came up to within a few hundred yards of London Bridge, what afterwards became known as Kent Street would of course be a country lane; but in course of time the thoroughfare became so remarkable for its squalor, that Londoners who were visited by distinguished foreigners were scandalised at the city in which they took so much pride having to be approached by such a miserable street. Then, in about the middle of this century, the Lord Mayor in semi-state laid the first stone of the present Lansdowne Place school, which still remains, and which is apparently as much needed as ever. Persons interested in the subject, and who may wish to study what are, in some measure, photographs of the past—London as it was—should visit this district in the south, and Nichol Street, Bethnal Green, in the east.

Thus the transformation of London, which has been in progress for half a century, means that the conditions of Ragged School work have altered; and that they have altered for the better. The present generation of teachers are reaping the fruits of the seed-sowing of those pioneers who, as Lord Shaftesbury often insisted, found in their work a service of danger. The rags, the extreme filth, which at first characterised the majority of the scholars; their untamed hilarity, which suggested all kinds of horse-play, even in school hours—are things of the past; and boys and girls who are still, in conventional language, classed with the ragged, are decently clad, and are as teachable as those who go to boarding schools. This is so much gain—a matter for congratulation all round, so long as the public do not rush to the conclusion that the work of the Ragged School Union is obsolete. This would be to throw up the work because success has begun to attend it, or to turn back the tide of blessing which is coming in. It would not be difficult to show that the necessity for the work carried on by this band of teachers is greater than ever, and that never before did the expenditure of labour yield so encouraging a return. Even now to support the cause of the Ragged School Union is the most ready all-round method of benefiting the poorest people of all ages.

If the times have changed, how shall the teachers adapt their operations to the altered needs of their still teeming constituency?

In a number of instances they are doing this by rebuilding the schools. In other days, anything was thought to be good enough for a Ragged School; or rather, such was the crying need of their pitiable scholars, that teachers who began the work were content to gather their classes in any buildings that could be procured—a loft or a disused stable, lighted or warmed in a very primitive fashion, being readily and even thankfully appropriated. The teachers bore with the inconvenience, while to the uncivilised scholars there was nothing incongruous in the roughest accommodation. Even under these conditions such a wonderful harvest was gathered that Lord Shaftesbury is not supposed to have exaggerated when he said that the Union had been instrumental in saving three hundred thousand young persons from lapsing into crime.

But though wisdom was shown by beginning with the smallest possible capital, the shifts that did for other days would now simply ensure absolute failure. Thus the movement may be said to have entered on a new era; and in the conveniently arranged school-houses that have arisen in various quarters we have the best possible evidence that the work is not dying of inanity, but has, in reality, renewed its youth. The Ragged School in no sense disputes the ground with the School Board; it is rather its ally. It is, indeed, the complement of our national system of education. The houses in which the classes are now gathered would have struck the old pioneers with astonishment; but although we can imagine their confessing that Christian teachers among the poor were now enabled to walk in silver slippers, the buildings are by no means ahead of modern requirements.

Thoroughly to judge of the advances made, and of what is now being done, interested persons should visit such representative institutions as that in Nelson Street, Camberwell, and that in King Edward Street, Spitalfields. The first, which is one of the oldest institutions of its kind in London, being associated in its early days with Cranfield and the Duke of Sussex—is now superintended by Mr. John Kirk, secretary of the Ragged School Union, of Exeter Hall, Strand; while that in Spitalfields is looked after by Mr. Charles Montague, who was formerly a scholar in the school.

AN OLD-TIME RAGGED SCHOOL.

To our mind, modern philanthropy can show no greater triumph than for a school in this way to rear its own superintendent, a man who has certainly proved himself a benefactor to the whole district.

Having thus provided school-houses more worthy of the times—a portion of the cost of which is supplied by the Shaftesbury Fund, established by the Committee of the Ragged School Union for that purpose—the teachers are endeavouring in every possible way to adapt their mode of operation to the requirements of the times. The Ragged School is compared to a fruitful tree which, as a reward to those who attend to its culture and show interest in its growth, sends out continually new fruit-bearing branches. No class of workers among the poor have been more ingeniously inventive than Ragged School teachers, and from the earliest days of the enterprise to the present time they have uniformly proved themselves to be the benefactors of the poorest of the people of all ages. Should any serious epidemic break out, we find them on the track of the destroyer, attending to the sick and supplying what is wanted. They teach the people the value of sanitation, and supply lime-wash and brushes to such as can be prevailed upon to use them. Poor women, who could not otherwise leave home comfortably to go to work, have their young children taken care of during the day; the "lowest down" of all are encouraged at Sunday morning breakfasts to make one more endeavour to rise; and in many other ways the helpful hand is held out to such as will take advantage of what is offered. For forty years or more, the Ragged School has even proved itself to be one of the best of emigration agencies, and in all of our flourishing colonies its protégés—who, by doing well for themselves, have proved an honour to their country—are to be found. Then it should not be forgotten that the shoeblack brigades represent a Ragged School experiment, the thought of which originally occurred to the mind of Mr. John Macgregor ("Rob Roy") in 1851, when all London was excited over the Great Exhibition. Not that cleaning boots in the streets has ever been looked upon as a permanent occupation; it is merely temporary, a stepping-stone to something better. At the same time, it is not a business to be despised, in face of the fact that the Protestant brigades alone earn nearly £1,000 a month in the streets of London.

One of the things to which the teachers are enabled to give special attention with great advantage is that of pure literature. In the past, when children came to the schools to begin with the alphabet, there was no danger of their being injured by bad reading. But it is far otherwise to-day, when one and all are taught to read in Board-schools, and when, to meet the demand for reading thus created, the market is too plentifully supplied with that which can only enervate the taste and corrupt the morals. Newsvendors will testify that whereas, in other days, children gathered around shop-windows to look at the pictures in the papers, they now, having the ability to read, buy them for themselves. We all know what this means. The presses of St. Giles's, which of old supplied patterers and "flying stationers" with songs, broadsides, and chap-books, are now supplemented by other adventurous printers, who carry on business on a larger scale; and one of the most dangerous plagues of our modern life is represented by penny novels and cheap serials of a debasing kind, which are poured forth by hundreds of thousands every week. To check the progress of this plague, it is necessary not only to provide something better, but to make an effort to ensure that the children shall read something better when it is provided. This is what the Ragged Schools are doing, and the more that is done in this department, the easier will boys and girls find it become to rise to creditable situations in life. Again and again has it been proved, both in and out of the police-courts, that there is no greater snare to the young than bad reading, and nothing which more effectively trains them for a course of crime and ruin. When we know it to be a fact that one school will extend its influence to a thousand families, we can, in some measure, realise how great a work can be achieved in this department. Its importance will be further seen when we consider that unbelief in its varied phases is much more aggressive than it was a generation ago; and by every means, both fair and unfair, it is seeking to bring the common people within its toils. Atheism and Secularism are making efforts to identify themselves with the cause of the common people, and by means of a sham philanthropy to create prejudice in their own favour and against Christianity.

Then, more than was ever the case before, the Ragged School of to-day is endeavouring to retain its hold of the elder scholars; and to do this, rooms for evening classes and recreation have to be provided. It is therefore, in its own way, doing the work of a Young Men's Christian Association among youths of humble social station, who have no facilities for reading and amusement in their own homes. Lads and young men who would otherwise have to loiter away their hours in the street, or seek entertainment in questionable or even vicious places, are held together, and have conferred upon them positive good. A few may even be prevailed upon to continue their too scant education at the evening classes, and thus lay the foundation of future prosperity and usefulness. All this is a development which the pioneer teachers could hardly have foreseen when bent upon their original enterprise of rescuing a few miserable subjects from the pains of squalor, ignorance, and crime.

Another branch of the ragged-school tree which has been long instituted but recently developed is that of summer country holidays for children, who naturally pine for the fresh air of woods and fields which ought to be theirs by birthright. The time-honoured institution of "A Day in the Country" is, of course, still maintained, otherwise crowds of children would hardly see the country at all; but, in addition to this, the establishment of convenient holiday homes in attractive and salubrious districts within fifty miles of London has conferred greater benefit on poor children than can readily be told. At East

Grinstead, Thursley Common, and elsewhere, these pleasant homes—all of which seem to be remarkably well adapted for their purpose—invite the inspection of the friends of children, and the contributions of those who desire to confer on children health and pleasure. Throughout the summer, successive batches of visitors are received, who come for a fortnight at a time, very great care in selection being exercised in every instance. While it is necessary to avoid taking any who are suffering from disease, care is taken to select such as are most likely to benefit by the change. The experiment may be pronounced a success all round, and the more so because, as a rule, the children's relatives bear some small proportion of the expense.

The testimonies which come to hand of the extreme joy with which the country is greeted by the little holiday-keepers, and of the marked improvement in health which many of the most delicate show when their fortnight has expired, are a reward as well as an encouragement to those who take upon themselves the trouble of the enterprise. This movement also shows a disposition to expand; and it is not improbable that it may become more and more self-paying when the industrial classes of the better kind realise more the advantage which comes of their children spending a fortnight among bracing and educating scenes during a time when both the moral and physical nature are most susceptible of genial influences.

Hence the Ragged School Union is adapting itself to altered circumstances; but while this is so, the original idea which the great Earl of Shaftesbury and his heroic band of pioneers had in their minds is not for a moment lost sight of. The Ragged School is still both a preventive and a rescue agency; but unlike some other enterprises which give undue prominence to this department, it mainly exists to diffuse a knowledge of true religion among the people. The Union is therefore the fitting almoner of those who desire that their money shall go to benefit the poor in what one may call a thoroughly all-round fashion. To maintain the enterprise of such a comprehensive institution is not only the truest charity: it shows discerning wisdom as well as a large heart. It is wisdom which refuses to accept the notion that what is conventionally called Ragged School work is obsolete; the Christian work being, in point of fact, more needful than ever, now that secular education on a national scale has been undertaken by the State.

MISS HILARY'S SUITORS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF A "WILFUL YOUNG WOMAN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.

"HE home where she was not wanted!"

Ah! that, in the thick of other very real troubles, was almost greatest of them all; but it was a fact kept constantly before our Hilary.

From her father's unvaryingly moody manner down to small Will's frank avowal, "Now I doesn't love 'ou, Hilary, 'tos 'ou doesn't div' me sweeties;" from Mrs. St. John's querulous grumblings over the more of everything needed now she was with them, to—presently—Jane's flat rebellion at having a full-grown member added to the family to be "waited on and dusted and done for;"—every hour of every day brought some fresh stab or sting on that score.

"Not wanted;" and yet there was no getting away from the position. Hilary's instinct foretold surely enough what would be her next news from Steeple Forncett. Her eyes were opening fast and painfully now to why she had once been much wanted by many people. She divined the purport of Gertrude Cavenham's letter before she read a line of it, and tore the smooth-running, insincere composition into fifty shreds, full of fierce anger with herself for ever having let this gentleman know he had stolen near even the outermost edge of her—no, no, not love; she could deny that to herself—of her fancy.

"I am glad I am poor!" the girl cried proudly to herself. "Now I am bait for no man's flattery;" and under the ruins of her lost wealth she bravely buried the first glimmering romance of her girlhood, so contemptuous of her own poor sense in ever having fostered it that she could actually laugh, some three months later, when she read in the newspaper of Captain Cavenham's marriage with the elderly heiress after whom his sagacious sister had sent him hunting.

But had the captain stood the sharp test of all the late changes, of a surety he could have offered a tempting way of escape out of her present plight. Now there seemed none.

Mr. Milroy sent, within a week of her leaving Abbotswick, one half-year's income to her; "by the late Miss Humphreys' direction," he wrote. Hilary, her nerves sore and chafed by the perpetual stream of small complaints poured on and at her, hailed the cheque as at least a temporary easement of her strained position. Instantly she carried it to Mr. St. John.

"Will you turn this into money for me, please, papa, and let me give mamma some for my living here?

Then perhaps I shall not seem quite—quite such a trouble to her."

For answer, her father solemnly drew from a pocket-book a list, carefully drawn up to meet this expected occasion.

"Hilary," he said, "on the strength of what I counted on your having, with a confidence almost as firm as a belief in my own existence—on the strength of that, and solely with a view of appearing as your closest relatives ought—I and my wife have embarked on different expenses which in the natural course of events I should have looked to you to pay. Events have unhappily taken an *un*natural course; but the expenses remain, and here are the bills." He laid a neat pile before the disappointed girl. "The dress your mamma wore on your unfortunate birthday. Observe: 'Sixteen yards brocade, cashmere, etc. etc.' She didn't need the brocade; she didn't wish for the cashmere: they were purchased simply to do you honour. The bonnet for the same purpose. And my own suit, too. I wanted no extra-superfine tweed at five-pound-ten; not I! Those clothes are practically as much yours as if you'd gone and ordered them. And then, this mourning," exhibiting a terribly lengthy account. "I can honestly confess an inch-and-a-half hatband would have sufficed for my grief, but we were actually driven into—what is it?" scanning the bill closely—"'crêpe cloth, lisse edging, etc. etc.,' and diagonal twill, frock coat, vest, and so forth to match—by our deep desire not to compromise you; by our efforts to appear in a style befitting the parents of Miss Humphreys' heiress. Now, will you tell me, Hilary, who do you think, in all fairness, is the proper and fit person to pay all this?"

Proper or fit, Hilary speedily discovered she was the only person who could, and such an array of items had her father laid to her charge, that not only her half but her whole year's income would be swamped by their settlement. "And thus, as you see," Mr. St. John said, with a long-drawn sigh, when he had presently cashed the cheque and pocketed the notes and gold, and with a generous air pushed a few odd shillings across the table towards his daughter, "you're still left to press heavily upon my slender means."

How that thought, which was never allowed to slumber, cowed Hilary, no one can tell. It perplexed her, it bruised her, it crushed her; but, hedged about hitherto with ease and money and comfort, no knowledge of labour in any shape whatever, no skill or taste for it, had grown up in her. "Work was for poor people," had been her easy, well-bred dictum from childhood up. Now she was one of these poor people; some way or other she was told so twenty times a day, and there was no Aunt Phil to joke off the spell; no one at all to laugh at her laziness, to scold her for her incapacity, then to make it up and pet her all the more for her ignorance. That soft-eyed, gentle woman, Mrs. Dasent, had gone away, she heard; if she had not gone it was little likely she would have wanted to see more of one she had known so slightly. Even—even Mr. Stafford——

One of the few sobs Hilary ever spent on the new order of things was due to him. It was rarely she went into the town, but so doing one December day she saw the curate of Netley at a very little distance from her. By rights, had her thoughts been like her father's, she should have steeled herself to passive enmity, to going by him with cold recognition; contrariwise, however, a foolish craving had come over her to talk with him in the old happy fashion of—of those years ago when she would bind him over to stand by her in any coming argument with Aunt Phil.

But, lo! the curate, when his glance fell on her, turned graver (and he was looking grave enough already—ill, or much, much older than when she had last seen him, she fancied), shrank back, and lifting his hat avoided her point blank by going down a side street, having no wish, it seemed, to speak a single word with her.

That filled up the measure of Hilary's desolation. She grew frightened at the maze she was in, and through the slow, cold winter changed into just a quiet, thought-laden copy of the girl who, full of innocent carelessness, had been the very light of the old house at Abbotswick. Mr. Bevis, coming in occasionally with Herbert St. John, was struck with the alteration in the lad's step-sister, and made a false move with Mr. Milroy on the subject, which nearly cost him dear with Hilary's old friend.

"Awful taken down is that Miss Humphreys' pretty niece, or whatever she called herself," he said one day when in his chief's private room he happened to see the lease of an Abbotswick farm on the table. "Suppose it is not pleasant for any of us to play out the proverb, 'Pride comes before a fall,' or rather, a fall comes after pride."

"I had not observed," said Mr. Milroy icily, "that Miss St. John was unduly, or indeed in any way, proud. Also, I was not aware that Miss St. John had a habit of 'calling herself' Miss Humphreys' niece. Oblige me by speaking more carefully of the young lady in my presence."

But Mr. Milroy took the opportunity of personally paying the second instalment of Hilary's income into her own hands, and closely observing her the few minutes they were together in the room that seemed so unfitted for the girl.

"You don't," he said, hesitating over just the words he wanted—"you don't feel, Miss Hilary—well, worse in health for your removal into the town, I hope? You haven't many roses, but you're keeping pretty well, eh?"

"Quite well," she said, bravely; "nothing ails me at all." (She was not going to be pitied; if anything could upset her, that would!) "Roses don't grow at Brainford so well as at——" then she could not help faltering, but rallied in a moment; "still, indeed, I am as strong as any 'Suffolk punch,' as dear old Aunt Phil used to say."

"'Dear old Aunt Phil, eh?'" said the grey-headed lawyer, looking at her with shrewd kindness; "oh, it's 'dear' still, is it, in spite of everything?"

"'Dear' always," said Hilary.

"That's right; that's right. That's the best way to take it," with a hearty good-bye. "Aunt Phil knew whom to trust her memory with, that 's clear, serve them how she would."

Those genial words were cheering to the girl's heart, seeming forerunners of another pale gleam of light upon her path.

with sufficient for her to be considered once again worth pleasing; and the cause of this new departure was confidentially explained in due time by Mr. St. John to his wife.

"Oblige me, Maria, by getting that servant of yours

"'Here are the bills.'"—p. 328.

About this early springtime Mr. St. John slightly unbent from his rigidly affronted attitude towards our heroine. Much to their surprise, her young step-brothers and sisters were encouraged to show her small politenesses such as till now their father had repressed to the verge of snubbing. Some undercurrent of unknown influence was distinctly investing her—not with her former importance—far from that!—but to keep the drawing-room less like a bear-garden than it always is now. I—er—er—we must pass our evenings in it more in future. Perhaps—I may say, I hope—we may have a gentleman frequently with us. I have sanctioned the visits of one: one whom we must receive well, for he has made what—considering her changed prospects—are really acceptable proposals for the hand of my daughter Hilary."

CHAPTER XIV.

THE interesting announcement Mr. St. John made to his wife was coupled with strict injunctions to mention it to no one, not even to Hilary herself. Premature disclosure of the totally unexpected proposal might upset everything. Though, with the greatest propriety, he, the parent, had been first consulted, his sanction gained before another step was taken, the offer must on no account be dragged into publicity till time and the delicate initial steps of courtship provided ripe and fitting occasion.

This, Mr. St. John, with some revival of the old pompous style in which he had accustomed himself to speak of his daughter, impressed emphatically upon his wife, and she—indulging in a little cry over the secret (she was somewhat romantic, and wept over the woes of a fresh heroine from the circulating library every week) faithfully promised to observe his wishes. So it came to pass that the first stage of Hilary's second wooing began and progressed without her having the slightest suspicion of what was afoot. But others who follow her fortunes need not be equally in the dark.

To return, then, to what he later on declared was the first dawn of his respectful affection.

Mr. Bevis, as we have said, was an occasional caller at Park Villas, and it is certain his first visits there were the outcome of curiosity pure and simple, of a desire to see how that fair young person who had wasted so little attention on him in her palmy days now bore her reverses. To some dispositions it is always delightful to see one's enemies in the dust. Everyone who entertained a lower estimate of Mr. Bevis than he did of himself was felt by that gentleman to be more or less of an enemy. To Hilary St. John in her gay security at Abbotswick it was clear he had been just a nonentity. Naturally, therefore, it was with a spice of satisfaction he now took the opportunity of watching her under what he considered humiliating circumstances, and a good deal of covert amusement he contrived to extract from Mr. St. John's totally changed treatment of his daughter, and Hilary's pale ill-ease amidst her new surroundings.

All unconsciously to herself, however, Hilary's face, bright and winning as once it had been, was acquiring through these cheerless months a something far better and more beautiful.

She was not a patient young person by any means; quite the reverse; but all her pride took arms against the notion of daily altercation with her father, such as his continual dwelling on what she had lost, and why she had lost it, would have driven some to. After the dainty luxuries of Miss Humphreys' establishment, its quiet regularity and perfect order, Mrs. St. John's eccentric housekeeping, with the jostle of thriftlessness and waste, and confused meals, and scolded maidservant, was utterly repellent to all her training in the proprieties of life; but her stepmother, in her own feeble way, showed that she meant kindly to her, and Hilary rigorously put a bridle on her lips rather than, by an incautious syllable, or half a smile, or the faintest sneer, vex the one person who least resented her intrusion into the family. And the result was written on her features.

The power to endure added to them something noble which had been lacking before. Perhaps this new charm, which he could not fail to mark, combined with her small assured income, may have gained Mr. Bevis's admiration. As a matter of fact, just about that time the first filmy lines of a matrimonial plot, with himself and Miss St. John as principal actors, began floating through his brain, though they were only vague at first, and, according to custom, the prudent young man refrained from developing them until he felt his way tolerably safe with the father, and so forth. An additional zest was added to the project through the conduct of other persons slightly concerned. Mr. Bevis was practically on probation in Mr. Milroy's office, it being by no means compulsory on the firm to make a partner of him. His father had been a steady clerk, promoted to the honourable position of "Co." after years of trusty service. At his death Milroy and Gibson, always liberal, had promised the widow her young son's articles by-and-by—which they had given him in their branch office in the next county—and a small share in the firm should he prove worthy and capable of it.

Worthy and capable the young man had not the slightest hesitation in now pronouncing himself, and so secure felt he of his next step that he was now profoundly irritated by not being admitted fully and promptly to the most confidential business of their clients.

Poor old Miss Humphreys had deeply affronted his amour propre by declining his assistance in her last worldly arrangements, and it seemed as if everything connected with Abbotswick was doomed to annoy him similarly. Mr. Milroy had given him a snub direct at his mere mention of Miss St. John. He would have liked—he considered he ought—to know where the young lady's legacy was invested, but, approaching the topic, he was as good as told by the senior partner that it was no concern of his! That interloper, the parson, that Stafford, came backwards and forwards frequently during the winter, but was as close as a vice on the affairs that brought him there, which he discussed solely with Mr. Milroy behind closed doors.

"Bother the fellow's impudence!" said Mr. Bevis to himself, on one occasion, after he had exerted all his affability to entice the clergyman to entrusting him with instructions on whatever he had come about, but had failed to get a glimmer of the business, and Mr. Stafford had departed saying he should "soon meet Mr. Milroy by appointment."

"It's his will he's after, I'm positive. Why can't he use my services as well as that old Milroy's? I'll owe both of them one for their being so uncommonly close."

So, by way of part payment of the debt perhaps, Mr. Bevis took a sincere pleasure in interrupting Mr. Stafford's next interview with his chief, entering the room of the latter with such a light tap of warning that he caught a few words of what was passing between them. They puzzled him a good deal, and set his imagination at work on Mr. Stafford's will in more lively style than ever.

"To Hilary St. John I give——"

That is what he heard. Now, what was Miss Humphreys' heir going to give and bequeath to Miss St. John?

Did he intend to leave her again some of that wealth he had so cleverly done her out of? If so, how much? and when would she be likely to get it? Mr. Stafford was years older than pretty Miss Hilary. Then, he did not look half as "right-up" and robust as he did six months ago. He'd aged fast; got a good weight of anxiety on his mind, perhaps, and serve him right. Mr. Bevis began calculating the chances of life for men of five-and-thirty or thereabouts. "Worry kills sooner than work," he cogitated, and out of this friendly forecast, combined with a distinct appreciation of Hilary's growing beauty, gradually evolved the idea of winning her good graces and the right to share Mr. Stafford's legacy, which he was now so bluntly refused knowledge of. That would take a most agreeable rise out of the parson, who wouldn't be likely to hark back, because his intentions were known to Mr. Milroy. Likewise, this marriage, when it came to marrying, would effectually bring old Milroy down from the high horse he always mounted when Miss Hilary was mentioned. The vision was alluring, decidedly, if only Mr. Stafford's bequest made the game worth the candle. A good deal hung upon that "if," and Mr. Bevis thought about the important monosyllable for many days before he could make up his mind how to proceed.

While still vacillating on this weighty point, the young man was one afternoon at the office in his own small room adjoining Mr. Milroy's. A clerk had just been summoned to the latter; he heard certain orders given in very emphatic tones; he fancied—the partition was too thick for him to be positive—that Abbotswick was mentioned. As soon as the directions were given, Mr. Milroy left, mounted his waiting dog-cart, and went off to his country house, three miles north of Brainford. He had been finishing something private with his own hand, evidently—something probably for Mr. Stafford. Mr. Bevis pondered a few minutes, then he got up and gently opened his own door that led into the passage. From the junior clerks' room just opposite came dismal grumblings.

"And it's the very last match of the year, and here have I got to go pounding all the way to Netley, and can't get back in time for it anyhow. And they'll scratch me! Oh, it's a beastly shame, that it is; why can't the old thing go by post?"

Mr. Bevis coughed very clearly; then he drew back and struck his bell. Mr. Herbert St. John, the youngest of the clerks, appeared, looking very red and discomposed.

"Who attended to Mr. Milroy just now?"

"I did, sir."

"What was he saying to you?"

"That," stammering, "I—I was to take this," indicating a long, stout envelope, "to Mr. Stafford at Netley Rectory, sir."

"At once?"

"Ye—s—s, sir."

"Then," sternly, "why are you not off?"

Herbert shuffled first on one foot, then on another, then blurted out—

"I dared n't tell Mr. Milroy, sir, but it's the very last football match to-day—town against grammar-school; and I was only just stopping to say to the other fellows I wished I hadn't to go to Mr. Stafford's. I should have been off in half a minute—I should indeed, sir."

"I'll take care you are now," said Mr. Bevis, frowning; "put on your hat and come at once."

The young lawyer relished being down on his juniors, who dubbed him "the sharp one." Now he walked Herbert off with an inflexible business air, which softened, however, before they had gone the length of a street.

"It is the very day for football, certainly," he said, looking up at the clear April sky, across which a brisk west wind sent the light clouds scudding "Can't you get back in time for your game?"

"Not likely, sir; Netley and back is six miles."

"Ah, so it is! That's a pity. Well, look here, Herbert, I was fond of football myself at your age. You've worked pretty well lately, so you shan't lose your game. I don't mind a walk such a day as this. Give me the letter, and I'll take it over for you."

"Now, that's awfully good of you, sir," said young St. John, his boyish face beaming with gratitude. "Mr. Milroy said it was too important to post, but of course he wouldn't mind you taking it."

"Of course not. Stay a minute, though," as Herbert was for bolting off instantly; "are those other two, Wade and Groom, going to play?"

"No, sir, no. Don't care a pin about it. Never see them at football."

"Ah, well, then don't mention to them that I've set you free for this. I should have them shirking work next, and expecting me to square it. So mind you hold your tongue about my being so good-natured this once."

"That I will, thank you, sir," and off shot Herbert, as gleeful as any mouse out of a trap; he did so hate that stuffy office and everything connected with it. For freedom and open air, he would sooner follow the tail of a plough than the quill of a pen, and now he felt as if he should be everlastingly grateful to Mr. Bevis for giving him the last hour of the season at his beloved game.

While he went joyfully off to the region of shouts and thumps, the young lawyer walked quickly and thoughtfully along the road that led out east from Brainford, and as he walked it occurred to him that he had hardly been wise thus to take Herbert's message on himself. He scarcely knew why he had done it. Nothing was to be gained by this stroke of amiability. He half turned back, then knitting his brows changed his mind again, and jumped over a stile and took the footpath to Abbotswick beside a hedge of blackthorn, through fields of springing wheat. There, all alone, he examined what he carried. But Milroy and Gibson used excellent stationery. That envelope might have held the secrets of a universe, but he could not get at them. Not a line of the enclosed document was visible through its stout covering, securely fastened by the monogrammed seal "M. & G.," directed in Mr. Milroy's small, clear penmanship. "Confound the thing!" He wished he had not taken the trouble of coming with it; but, after all——

He went into a brown study so deep that he missed the right gate out on to the road at Netley, and presently found himself brought to a full stop by a low laurel hedge, the very one Hilary had taken for frolic the first day we saw her; and Abbotswick, with sunshine glittering on all its windows, from the broad bows below to the quaint dormer casements in the roof, stood before him.

What a very nice place, to be sure! the master of it must feel himself a somebody. But Mr. Stafford was not inhabiting it—that much Mr. Bevis did know; and the rooms had all their blinds close drawn. Still, Bell had not let the gardens down one whit. All Miss Humphreys' favourite geometrical beds were thickly fringed with golden crocuses; order was as absolute as if the hawk-eyed old mistress had still been there.

"A pretty place, uncommonly," repeated Mr. Bevis. "Now I'm here, I'll make a short cut to the Rectory, and take a look round as I go."

So, skirting the hedge till he came to a gate he remembered, Mr. Milroy's self-selected messenger strolled in, and proceeded to gaze about him as he chose. Along a path bordered with brilliant blue scilla, which he stopped once or twice and turned his eyes upon, though his thoughts were far enough from the innocent little flowers, a gardening lad came with a load of tools, and demanded, rather roughly, "Where he was a-goin' to, and who he was a-wantin'." To this Mr. Bevis answered, loftily, that he was from Mr. Milroy's upon business. Hereat, the boy, speaking more respectfully, said, "That Mr. Bell wasn't there to-day, if it was him the gentleman wanted. There was nobody about but himself, and Mr. Stafford had given him leave to go early, and he was just off. Was there any message he could take for anyone?"

"None at all," replied Mr. Bevis; then added, carelessly, "Do you happen to know if Mr. Stafford is up at the Rectory this afternoon?"

"That he bain't, sir. He be gone out by rail. One of our men drove him to Tey station, and is a-goin' to fetch him back to-night."

"Ah, well, never mind," said Mr. Bevis. "I can see——" then he checked himself. "Don't let me stop you. I shall take a turn up the garden and go out the way I came in. Good-day."

The lad departed, whistling. Mr. Bevis saw him vanish though a door in the wall of the kitchen garden, and heard him fasten the bolt behind him. Then he paced along between a row of budding espaliers till he came to Miss Humphreys' summer haunt, the old yew arbour, and there he seated himself, with no companionship save of blackbirds and finches, who were much more interested in nest-building and grub-hunting than in himself.

The wind had grown very active in the last half-hour, and now came swirling and eddying up in showery gusts. Mr. Bevis did not emerge from the arbour till the rain ceased. Then there was a look upon his countenance as if he might have taken a nap and awakened up startled. He glanced first at his watch then at the clouds. Then he turned up his coat collar, muttered, "That will be the best plan," and set off homeward again at his topmost speed.

By a short cut he regained his office just as the clerk in custody was locking up for the night. "Shan't keep you five minutes, Woods," he said, "but I'd forgotten something that must go by this post;" and to make good his neglect he was nigh a quarter of an hour up-stairs.

"Got a headache, sir?" said the clerk, as the young man came down, looking, it is not easy to define how, but scarcely up to the mark of his usual calm conceit.

"Not the least," snapped Mr. Bevis; "never felt better in my life," and he stalked out without a "thank-you" for the friendly inquiry—"which," thought Woods, "serves me right for trying to be civil to such a set-up young puppy."

The letter which had taken Mr. Bevis back appeared to be in no hurry, for he sauntered off quite away from the post-office and towards the Priory field, where the football match was just ended, and Herbert St. John, dashing off triumphantly, nearly ran into his arms.

"Hallo! young one," said Mr. Bevis, still sweet-tempered, "got your game? That's jolly! But, my boy," turning him about confidentially, "after all, I'd no business to let you off that run to Netley. You might get into desperate hot water with Mr. Milroy if he knew you'd shirked it, mightn't you?"

That was only too probable; this unwilling young law neophyte was always getting into hot water at the office. Now he stared up ruefully, and stammered out—

"Whatever am I to do, sir? Do you think Mr. Stafford will happen to say you took the letter instead of me?"

"Well, he might if I had done so. But I felt, as I was going, you might get into a scrape through my being too easy. So I turned back, and I've brought you the thing again. Here, you can have some tea at my rooms and cool down, and then start for Netley as fast as your legs will take you. Come along."

Very grateful to the mentor who had given him his game, and was guiding him in the path of duty at the same time, simple Master Herbert did precisely as he was bid, and when Mr. Bevis cautioned him, solely on his own account, to mention the episode to no one, he promised with the greatest alacrity.

The boy had rather a bad quarter of an hour when Mr. Milroy appeared next morning, lest he should ask the precise minute when his packet had been delivered at Netley; but the lawyer was far from suspecting anything but implicit obedience to his orders. It did just occur to him to ask: "You took what I gave you to Mr. Stafford, St. John?" and the ready "Yes, sir," quite satisfied him.

It also very much satisfied Mr. Bevis, who happened to hear both question and answer. He shut himself up in his own room and rubbed his hands with elation. Then he burnt sundry letters, answering one which had come that morning with care. When he went to luncheon at his lodgings he removed a portrait from his chimney-piece and consigned it to the darkness of his desk, and he found occasion to ask Herbert St. John that afternoon how he was getting on for his preliminary examination in June.

"Oh, awfully!" groaned the lad; "I shall never get through, I know."

Then Mr. Bevis had kindly offered to step round some evening and see how the case really stood. Which having done, and having found the youth's brains in a hopeless muddle, he had advised postponement of the examination for a twelvemonth, and a good coach throughout that time. To this Mr. St. John had returned, "that a coach was impossible for the poor boy now their means had such heavy calls upon them." This before Hilary, whose cheeks burned painfully. And Mr. Bevis had suggested that what little he knew was at their service. Would they permit him to help Herbert?

Thus having yoked himself to the family by bonds of thankfulness, it was not long before, with very proper deference, he disclosed the secret spring of his generosity: his long-planted and rapidly growing admiration for Mr. St. John's eldest daughter!

CHAPTER XV.

THE new leaven which was uplifting the small world about her had been at work some weeks before it seemed to touch Hilary's inner self. The dull, weary spring was well on the way before she recognised in the smallest degree what was astir.

Dull and weary! New words those for her bright nature to be spelling out of the dictionary of life! but she did so terribly miss the flow of Aunt Phil's love, wayward though it may have been, that all her hours now seemed blank and void. Her future looked emptier of sympathy and interest than her purse was of silver and gold. And as yet she could not master events or lay hold of any distinct idea of what she ought actually to be or to do. She could only drift along, guided this way or that by her better instincts.

It was a very new thing for Hilary to feel timid, but it was downright timidity of herself as well as of everyone about her that drove her to her little room with its outlook on tiles and chimney-pots, there to spend hours in lonely, puzzled wondering or listless reverie. And it was a newer thing still for Miss Hilary St. John of Abbotswick to make herself useful domestically; but she was rather roughly driven to that point by a task-mistress in the shape of Jane.

One chill December day she had been long alone in her little fireless den. Her father would cease talking to his wife when she entered one warm room, downstairs: the children would cease playing in another. Very, very chilled in body and spirit, she made her modest request to the servant for the wherewithal to warm at least her fingers. But Jane had the toothache, and was labouring along under a heavy tea-tray and a general sense of being "put upon." This last straw was too much for her, and she gave vent to her feelings with a rush.

"Hot water up-stairs, Miss Hilary? Then take it yourself. There's a-plenty in the copper, which many a maid wouldn't have this time of day, and you're welcome to it if you like to fetch it; but cart it up-stairs I can't and I won't, and that's flat. You come to run about and slave as I do from morning till night, and then have another grown-up person clapped on your hands, without a penny more wages or yet half a crown at Christmas, and see if you don't put your back up at something. I ain't no grumbler, for I've been a willing hoss ever since I could run alone, and minded seven little brothers and sisters, two bein' afflicted with fits; but there's nature's bounds to all things, and my teeth do ache that shockin', and my legs they're that tired, that any extra waiting on you want, miss, you'll have to do for yourself, or stop in the place I can't. There!"

Hilary's first feeling at this outburst was one of disgust and annoyance: for one single impertinent word to herself any servant of Aunt Phil's would have been instantly dismissed. Her next—well, this outspoken young woman had reason on her side. Hilary crimsoned, and her pretty brown head drew back with something of its old proud carriage. Nevertheless, she went and fetched what she desired, and thenceforth, though with remarkable awkwardness at first, set herself to spare Jane's labour up in her own small room.

But oh, how different it all was from Abbotswick, and how, as softer spring came on, she did long to see the old place! Her small sisters had quite lately asked her to take them walking countrywards. Once they had gone close to Netley. The distant beech-boughs, the dear familiar hedgerows, seemed to entice her back. But she fancied far up the white road she caught sight of—someone she did not want to meet, and turned hastily back.

It chanced though, one May day, Herbert was speaking of Mr. Stafford's absence from Netley—he had gone abroad after Easter—and a sudden desire came over her to revisit Abbotswick while he was not there. Her father was gone to town on business. He had been boasting lately of original designs for wells, which were to supply water from unknown depths at a minimum of cost, and talked of interviewing a patent-lawyer and setting the thing afoot. Where the funds were to come from Hilary knew not. Her second six months' income had nigh all been absorbed in pressing back bills, incurred somehow for her advantage; but Mr. St. John had departed full of importance, with money in his purse.

Mrs. St. John fell placidly asleep directly after midday dinner; no one would care where she was gone, no one would even have known; but, as she went shyly through the streets, where Aunt Phil never liked her to be alone, Herbert, tearing up to his office—late, as usual—met and stopped her with a surprised—

"Why, Hilary, wherever are you off to?"

Then she just told him whither she was bound, and pressed on; for, as Herbert had said, it was a long pull, and it would be nearly dark before she got home. But it was not dark as she went; it was light and balmy and beautiful as Abbotswick the lost had always been. The smoky town, peopled with strangers, sank into distance. The sun shone gloriously out as she sped along. Soon she could just see the dark tops of the old cedars, just catch the sound of the Abbotswick bell. Her eyes glistened, then dimmed. She half wished she had not come, and, stopping short, leaned on a gate that she and Daphne had often made a joke of clearing.

Trot, trot, trot. A good stout quadruped came pounding by, and on it the very tenant whose fields and feelings she had made a frolic of over-trampling. Hurriedly she turned aside, but at the bidding of a second impulse pulled her courage together and frankly faced his half-doubting recognition. The farmer checked his cob, and stared at her in double amazement. First, that she should be there at all, and next, that she should be speaking to him. The briefest of "good-days" was all the young heiress had been instructed to bestow on her aunt's tenants. Now she was advancing on him with a smile that found its way to some soft spot of sentimentality in the good man's constitution, and "Dash my buttons!" said he afterwards, "if it didn't make me feel wholly queer."

"Why, Miss Hilary," he cried, dismounting with remarkable alacrity for fourteen stone; "what, you've come to have another look at us this fine day, have you?"

"Just for a few minutes," said Hilary; "I thought I should like the walk, and"—she drew herself up very straight indeed, spending her nervousness by tightly holding Aunt Phil's amethyst ring upon the hand she had ungloved to gather sweet-brier—"and I am so glad I have met you, Mr. Baker; I have thought often since I—went away, that I never ought to have taken your fields for a short cut and galloped over them with Daphne as I used to do. I'm afraid I did not think then the least about vexing you. But I do now. I hope we never did much damage, for"—feeling horribly humiliated—"I can hardly make you any return now, if we did. I can only—beg your pardon."

Hilary twisted her shining ring round and round while speaking. When Aunt Phil gave it to her she told her to be brave. She was trying to be brave now. It rather choked her, but it seemed to be right, so perhaps Aunt Phil—somehow—somewhere—could see she was not going to flinch from her order. She ended with a right-out honest look that was somewhat hazy withal, and it utterly discomposed John Baker.

"Why, sakes alive, Miss Hilary!" said he, turning violently red, and giving her hand such a grip as made it tingle for an hour; "don't you make any bones of a little matter like that. I don't say but what I was put out, but I bear no spite, and I've wiped it clean off my mind since—well, since you didn't get what we thought you would, you know; and I'd give, ay, I'd give that piece of young wheat to have you cantering about here, same as you used. We've no call to find fault with him that's here; 'cepting for the whim that gave it to him, he's the right man in the right place. Still, we miss you, a many of us, and," hastily mounting his nag again, "don't you go begging no more pardons of me for nothing! and," going a few yards, then turning on his saddle to shout as gruffly as if he were offering her an insult, "my missus is a rare hand at her dairy: we'll be proud to send you a taste of it into Brainford if you won't be above accepting it. There ain't much butter like hers finds its way to Brainford, I'll warrant."

Then the farmer trotted off, repudiating thanks, and Hilary, glowing and sorry, glad she had spoken out, pained she had lived so long among these people and never given a thought to the kindliness they harboured for her, went on to seek out other old acquaintances.

Were any of the servants left, she wondered? Not a syllable had she heard of or from them since the October day she quitted Abbotswick; but often and often had she positively yearned after the faces which had been about her from childhood. Would they be all gone, perhaps? She swung open the lodge gate, and glanced anxiously up at the little white dwelling with the clustering banksia roses abloom upon it from base to roof.

"Ah," she thought, "she would love to live even in that little cottage now, to be near Abbotswick;" and she gave a cry of pleasure as the servant of former days emerged from the door, full as amazed at seeing her as Farmer Baker had been.

With a dubious expression of countenance and a great succession of curtseys, Mrs. Pullen invited Hilary in, dusted a chair for her, and then stood at the furthermost corner of the small room answering in respectful monosyllables all the questions Hilary put concerning her husband and bairns, till she suddenly startled her guest by whipping her apron over her head and bursting into a fit of crying.

"Oh, Molly, what have I said?" exclaimed Hilary, going naturally back to the old nursery name; and at that Mrs. Pullen cried harder than ever.

"It's only seeing you settin' there, Miss Hilary, and bein' pleasant as if you wasn't a lady, and yet lookin' every inch as nice as you used to when you was one—leastways, when you was rich; and to hear you askin' after Molly and Patty and the whole of us that you never didn't use to take no notice of when I wanted you to, and was nasty enough to go and say you was growin' high, which you've proved you haven't!—oh, it's that turns me bad, Miss Hilary, and help cryin' I can't!" was poor Mrs. Pullen's response, and Hilary, being on the verge of the same mood, was glad to move on again before her self-command gave way.

"Wilkins and his wife were gone from the house,"

Molly said; "hadn't Miss Hilary heard? And who was there? Why, Joyce, that——"

"Oh! her I must go and see!" cried Hilary, and hastened that way, yearning to set foot in Abbotswick again.

Joyce, looking very dignified in a revived silk of Miss Humphreys', was by a front window, and gave a great jump when she saw who was coming. Uncertain for a minute how the young dictatress of months agone would greet her, she, like Molly, was for donning a respect that seemed stiff and cold. But the young mistress, with both hands stretched out, cried, "Oh, Joyce, dear old thing! how I have wanted you!" And that broke down all ceremony between them, and the next minute Hilary was sobbing right wholesomely on Joyce's shoulder.

The sunshine streamed upon the pair from the garden door as presently all the news of the long winter was poured forth, beginning with something startling.

"For Joyce I may be to you, Miss Hilary, for ever and for ever, but Joyce I ain't to no one else, nor haven't been since this day five weeks. So who am I? Why," with a becoming middle-aged simper, "I'm Mrs. Joshua Bell, Miss Hilary. Me and Bell have made a match of it at last, and"—very irrelevantly, as it sounded to her listener, who had known nothing of the servants' hall romances in bygone days—"that cook have gone to live at Brainford, and taken up with a sergeant! And Mr. Bell, he's as good a husband, miss, as he is a gardener, though that's saying much, and he 'll have to come in and see you, but not till you're looking more yourself, for he 's that feelin' the sight of you like this would right upset him. Why, only when we come back from our little weddin' tower to Brixton, and his poor cat that he 'd had nine year had run away by reason of hatin' a strange person to feed it, and then come back one dark night a-mewin' at the side door like a human bein', so thin you might have run a lucifer match through it, 'Oh, Sarah, Sarah,' he say to it—always callin' it Sarah, after his first poor wife, miss—'you poor skeleton of bones,' he say, 'wherever have you been a-hidin' of yourself?' and the m'isture stood in Mr. Bell's eyes, it did indeed, and not a mite of supper did he eat till that poor cat had got a skin full. So," consequentially argued the gardener's proud spouse, "whatever would he say if he was to come in and see you a-lookin' wexed, Miss Hilary?"

Hilary had cleared away those irrestrainable tears as Joyce chattered on, and could now ask all about Netley and its people. "They were getting used to the new state of affairs," she heard, "and to the house being empty, and there was talk that Mr. Stafford might bring his mother over, and live in it, perhaps, himself; and folks were beginnin' to leave off sayin' nasty things about Mr. Stafford gettin' Miss Humphreys' money. Some had spoke cruel at first, and he 'd found plenty to put up with." Joyce rather dwelt on that, as though it must be a retributive pleasure to Hilary. "But he was very still, and didn't seem to bear no malice about it; and, to be sure, he was spending freely in the village, so that ought to shut people's mouths. The church, hadn't Miss Hilary seen it? Well, it was bein' made as good as new. There were a score men workin' on it from morning till night. And all those houses where they used to have the fever every autumn were pulled down and fresh ones were buildin, with pumps, and ovens, and windows that went to open!"

"And are those Brands and Letty's old grandmother all well?" asked Hilary. "I only knew a few poor people, did I? I did so wish I could have sent them something at Christmas-time, though, but—I couldn't."

"They wasn't worth it," said Joyce tersely. "I darn't have said it to you before, asking your pardon, Miss Hilary, for you didn't like to be interfered with in nothin' in those days, though you do seem wholly different now; but them that got the most of your money was hypocrites. Most of what you give so handsome found its way to the 'Hare and Hounds.' But Mr. Stafford knows the ins and outs better than ever you did, and don't get cheated as you would have done if—— But there, though, for all that, and for all he's a gentleman that knows what money's sent for, there's most of us wish poor old mistress had never changed her mind about her will."

"Joyce," said Hilary, "do you know what made her change it?"

At this, to Hilary's perplexity, Joyce dissolved into tears again.

"There's them that have been cruel enough to say I helped to make her, miss."

"You, Joyce!"

"Yes, miss: and now I'll make a clean breast of it. She'd talk to me sometimes about you, 'specially of late, and—and you did get a little quick in your ways, Miss Hilary, with us servants; and mistress would question me, and I'd tell her—well, not the leasest word more than the truth, but more than I'd have said if I'd have thought trouble would come of it; and once she got right cross, and seemed to think you'd turn everything upside down here when you came to rule. It was just before you went to Steeple Forncett, and then Mr. Milroy was sent for, and the mischief all done in half an hour."

Aunt Phil had been angry with her, then!—perhaps had died angry with her. Hilary's heart ached grievously over that, and her mouth quivered.

"Times and times," Joyce went on, "I've felt tell you this I must; but I never dared come in to see you without askin', not knowing how you 'd take it. And now, Miss Hilary, my poor dear, seeing that perhaps this have come on you through some fault of mine, though Bell tells me continual it haven't, so I needn't worrit, all I can say is, I've a nice little lot of savings put by, and if ever you want it and would take it, it's freely yours. And it would comfort me for you to have it."

But Hilary could only shake her head at this, telling her penitent waiting-woman she was noways to be blamed for what had happened, the fault was—halting over the self-conviction—all her own.

There were sounds of other servants moving near: two more were retained to keep the house in order. Bell would soon be appearing. But Hilary could not face him that day. She would see him some time or other, "but," standing in the quaint old hall, and looking round with longing, loving eyes, "not here, Joyce; I don't think I can ever come here any more." And now she would just look a moment at the church, and then go back to Brainford. Yes, she was walking, and alone, but that did not matter.

"Next minute Hilary was sobbing right wholesomely on Joyce's shoulder."—p. 335.

So with a hungry, lingering glance, such as she felt ought to be her very last—it was bitterer work than she had thought, this coming home and then having to tear herself away—Hilary bade Joyce farewell, and started on the last stage of her afternoon pilgrimage; and that brought her into unexpected contact with the last two people in the world whom by choice she would have met.

Threading her way among scaffolding and stones round to the eastern end, where Aunt Phil had ordered herself to be laid "in the morning sunshine," low voices met her, and in a moment, before she could avoid them, the speakers were upon her. They were Gertrude Cavenham and Norris Stafford.

THE SEVEN LEAVES OF THE VINE.

THOUGHTS UPON THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF OUR LORD UPON THE CROSS.

BY THE RIGHT REV. WILLIAM ALEXANDER, D.D., D.C.L., LORD BISHOP OF DERRY AND RAPHOE.

THE FIRST WORD FROM THE CROSS.

"Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."—ST. LUKE xxiii. 34.

AT what point of the Passion was the first of the last words from the cross spoken? Which is the first of the "seven living leaves put forth by our Vine" upon the tree, as St. Bernard has said?

Four soldiers formed a guard who planted the cross,* and made all the ghastly preparations. They rudely stripped Him, laid Him on the wood, and then drew it up with Him fastened to it. His hands were nailed to the cross-beam, His feet nailed and tied. His body rested with some support on a peg or straddle, which prevented the hands and feet from being so completely rent and torn by the weight of their burden that the condemned might be in danger of falling off to the ground. The title of the accusation was fixed over His head. Worst insult of all to that gentlest and loftiest soul—"they crucified Him and the malefactors, one on the right hand and the other on the left!" He hangs there as the representative of fanaticism associated with crime.

Just at this point, almost with the first falling of the blood-drops upon the dust of Golgotha, Jesus said, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

* Some points of interest in regard to the cross may here be noted:—(1) The cross is spoken of sometimes in the New Testament and in early writers as "the wood," "the tree" (τὸ ξύλον). In the LXX. version of the Old Testament, the words "crucified" and "tree" are found together in one verse "Behold the gallows (ξύλον); hang him thereon (σταυρωθήτω ἐπ' αὐτοῦ)." (Esther vii. 9.) The early Christians saw in this a representation of Satan plotting the death of Christ by crucifixion, yet smitten to death and overcome by the very gibbet which by his agency was set up for Christ. (2) The industry and learning of Byncus has collected all that antiquity tells us about the cross. It would seem that there were three crucifixion figures—one the X, known as the St. Andrew's cross; one the Tau cross, in the form of the Greek capital T, adopted in the Scandinavian Churches; one, and the most usual, like a mast with cross-yards. It consisted of three pieces: the upright stem, the cross stem, and a small projecting rest or straddle. The cross ordinarily was not more than three or four feet high, but in cases of special guilt a considerably higher elevation was supposed to indicate a peculiar crime and an exceptional punishment. This would probably be the case with one who suffered along with others, whose death it was considered desirable to emphasise. That our Lord's cross was higher than usual would seem to be indicated by the incident of the sponge wrapped round the hyssop stalk, and when steeped in vinegar, lifted to His mouth, as well as by the magnificent irony of the prophetic declaration—"I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Myself." (St. John xix. 29; xii. 32.)

I.

Let it be most carefully noted that there is one thing which is not said here, nor anywhere else, by the Saviour.

One prayer has ever been upon the lips of dying saints. With the severe light of eternity full upon their souls, they have always seen the infinite distance between themselves and the perfect purity of the law of God. They cry, "Forgive me; pardon, O my God, pardon!" Sins revive in the dim perspective of memory. In the case of one with the lofty ideal of duty and holiness possessed by Jesus, the least mote or speck of imperfection would have blackened all the raiment of moral righteousness which was as white as snow—would have filled His heart and memory with a sense of intolerable discord. Neither on the cross or elsewhere did Jesus ever utter one half-sigh of penitence; never did He once associate Himself with sinners; never accuse Himself of a duty unfulfilled, of an opportunity wasted, of a thought uninfluenced by righteousness, of an aspiration that fell short of heaven. He might, and He did, pray for the pardon of others; He neither did, nor could, pray for His own forgiveness.

II.

We should never forget that we are here taught, in the first place, the simple and primary duty of forgiveness of injuries.

1. In the Sermon on the Mount our Lord had filled up the comparatively imperfect outlines of the picture of love drawn by the Law. "Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you."* What He enjoined on those who would be His disciples He does Himself.

That sweet lesson of forgiveness we want. It seems to be quite lost sight of that our Lord is almost more exacting, if that were possible, in relation to forgiveness than in relation to purity. Few of us, perhaps, have really very much to forgive. An unkind letter, an implied taunt, a social slight, some worry, real or fancied, about money—that is generally all we have to pardon. We should ponder what possibilities of forgiveness there are in the Christian life from the first word of the dying Lord. All is included in St. Paul's loving exhortation, "Forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake forgave you."†

* St. Matt. v. 43, 44. † Ephes. iv. 32.

2. But behind the first of the sentences from the cross there is also a dogma, and a vital dogma. We may read in it the ground of the pardon which was asked, and the limitation by which it was conditioned.

The ground of it is in the true Sonship of Jesus. The first and last of the seven words are recorded by St. Luke alone. Each contains an appeal to God as His Father. Our reconciliation to God is in the Sonship of Jesus Christ.

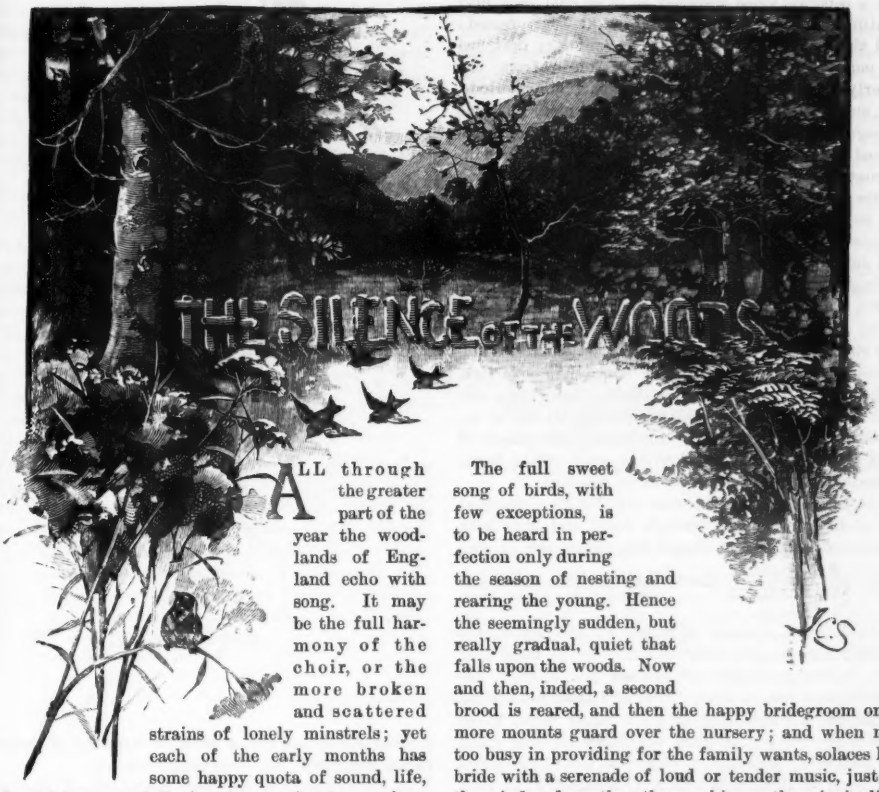
III.

But further. In the first word—a prayer for pardon, uttered at the very beginning of the crucifixion—we cannot fail to perceive an implied reference to the sacrifice which was just begun, to the blood just trickling down and reddening the dust of Golgotha. Truly we are brought very near in spirit "to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel." The naked King, whose raiment is parted, for which the soldiers gamble, casting lots beneath the Cross—who possesses not a thread of the trappings of royalty, or even of the vesture that covers our shivering humanity—"weaves for Himself" out of His Passion "the purple robe" of which Christians in earlier days loved to speak. Thus, in the proclaimed Sonship of Jesus, and in the beginning of the long predestined sacrifice carried on into fact in the domain of history, the ground of pardon is laid. He asks for forgiveness Who has now the right to claim it.

To the forgiveness here asked for, a limit is affixed. Who come within the scope of this word, within the embrace of this appeal? It would seem as if this were purposely left indefinite. We have not any hint given (but one) how far we are to circumscribe the purpose of the intercession.

This prayer, then, must certainly include the executioners. The four Roman soldiers who were told off to superintend this sanguinary work, who were but the instruments through which the iron discipline of the Roman legion worked its tremendous mechanism—how can they come under our condemnation for an obedience which had become one of the nobler instincts of their life?

Nor would even the chiefs and rulers of the Jews lie outside the circle of the benediction. Apostles seem anxious, so to speak, to leave this impression on record, perhaps not without reference to this prayer from the cross. "And now, brethren, I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers," is St. Peter's frank acknowledgment.* "The hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world unto our glory, which none of the princes of the world knew," exclaims St. Paul, with a yet wider charity—"for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory."†



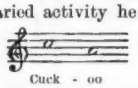
But we may, and we must, make these words still more amply inclusive.

All human sin leads up to the cross. "This word," it has been said, "has two arms; with one it embraces all the past, with the other all the future."

It has been argued that in all sin there is an element of ignorance; that this prayer is, therefore, the charter of universalism—the assurance that all sin will be remitted, and every sinner forgiven. But this conclusion is not warranted. The "for" in this first word has substantially the same signification as "if." "If, and so far as, they know not what they do, forgive them." There may be, as someone has said, a grain of ignorance in every ounce of sin. Yet sin is not merely a severer term for ignorance. No doubt ignorance lessens the guilt of sin. It subtracts from the quantum of presumption, of high-handedness, which sin contains. This is the view of St. Paul: "Before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious, but I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief."‡ But if ignorance and sin were convertible terms, the same thing seen from different sides, the rest of this prayer of Jesus would be absolutely superfluous, a spiritual utterance of the most unmeaning kind. If ignorance quite obliterates the guilt of sin, and if the sinner can always say boldly, "I knew not"—then there would have been no need for this intercession of the Mediator. But, at the same time, if ignorance did not mitigate guilt, He never would have used the plea. "Ignorance," says an old writer, "does not deserve, but often finds pardon."

We have here considered the first of the seven last words of the dying Saviour from the cross. "Mercy," cries Augustine, "Mercy prayed, that misery might pray; the Physician prayed, that the sick might pray; the Judge prayed, that the guilty might pray." In the depths of that word we have seen at once duty and the dogma of the Atonement; the crown of His life on earth, and the image of His work in heaven.

* Acts iii. 17. † 1 Cor. ii. 8.
‡ 1 Timothy i. 13.



ALL through the greater part of the year the woodlands of England echo with song. It may be the full harmony of the choir, or the more broken and scattered strains of lonely minstrels; yet each of the early months has some happy quota of sound, life, and rejoicing, especially for the ear that knows how to listen. Every bird that has a voice seems to be taking part in the concert, and to be doing his utmost and best to make the harmony as joyous and complete as the most ardent musician could desire. But the time of quiet will come, when, turn where we will down the long avenue of beeches, or into any one of the winding green roads that meet us at every hundred yards, or along by the edge of the copse of hazel and dainty birch, not a sound is to be heard. The silence at first seems strange and unnatural enough—that the entire orchestra, which not so long ago filled and flooded the whole woodland domain, should all at once be dumb—but a moment's thought reminds us of the simple fact that most of these wild and artless strains, the wandering cry of the cuckoo, the passionate, sad love-song of the nightingale, the mellow whistle of the thrush, or the liquid melody of the skylark, were after all but the utterance of one happy message to the earth—"the days of joy and gladness, of sunshine and love, are come; let us choose our mates, and build, and sing, rejoice, and be glad." Such is the wondrous instinct which God has planted in these feathered choristers; and so take they their living part in the great anthem ever ascending from hill and valley, woodland and mead, to the blue sky above.

The full sweet song of birds, with few exceptions, is to be heard in perfection only during the season of nesting and rearing the young. Hence the seemingly sudden, but really gradual, quiet that falls upon the woods. Now and then, indeed, a second brood is reared, and then the happy bridegroom once more mounts guard over the nursery; and when not too busy in providing for the family wants, solaces his bride with a serenade of loud or tender music, just as the wind and weather, the sunshine or the rain, incline him. She knows his voice well, and can distinguish it among a host of rivals or imitators. Even the skylark, the woodlark, the titlark, though somewhat alike in many points of tone and trill, are to her ear quite distinct; and should any gay roving bachelor of another genus presume to come a-courting, or paying a morning call, not a word will she say to him. The blackcap and the nightingale may be close at hand on rival boughs, and vying with each other in eager and impassioned praises and entreaties; within a stone's throw may be a troop of finches, equally joyous and in full song; but each musician sings only to his own species, and rarely, if ever, but to the ear he loves to catch, and for which alone he sings. The peculiar call of the female cuckoo, which attracts so many contending suitors, and all the various caressing language of other birds, excites no influence generally, and to all but the individual species is an unknown dialect.

There is, in fact, but one note which seems to be of universal comprehension, and this is the warning cry of danger. The instant it is uttered, the whole flock of birds within hearing, though of many various species, repeat a separate signal of danger, and away they all hurry into the bushes or hedgerow for safety. Nature, in all her ordinances, has a fixed design and foreknowledge, and each species has a separate voice assigned to it, so that each may continue distinct and unmixed, as at first created; and that the notes of birds are as language designed to convey a distinct meaning is clear from the utterly different sounds emitted at particular periods. As summer advances the spring voices become changed; the requirements of the early season have ceased; and the summer excitements, monitions, and informations, not needed in autumn, are no longer heard.

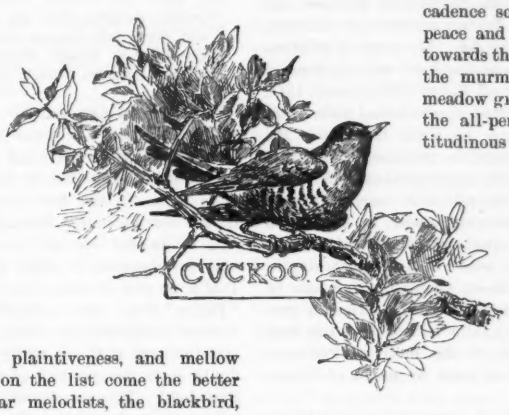
One strange fact, however, remains—and as yet without any certain or adequate explanation—that one sex only is gifted with the power of song: as many naturalists suppose, for the purpose of cheering his mate during the period of incubation; yet leaving us in doubt, in spite of the delightful melody of the songster, as to the exact meaning and object of his song. The singing of all birds seems to be an entirely spontaneous effusion, poured forth with little exertion, and without weariness or lassitude. In certain seasons and weather, the nightingale sings all day at intervals, and during most of the night; the power of song never becoming weaker, the notes never harsh or untunable, even after hours of practice.

The cuckoo alone would seem to suffer from constant use of his voice. All through April and May with unwearied activity he chants his one strain of two notes  (more than once in the woodlands I have counted upwards of 150 repetitions without a moment's cessation), but by the middle of June he has gradually got hoarser and hoarser, unmusical, and out of tune. Now and then his cry descends but a single tone, or more rarely down to an imperfect fourth; or even continues on one faint and quavering monotone; while just before the faultless song of Philomela ceases, it wanders away into a croaking sound, like a hush or warning of danger to his mate and the half-fledged brood.



In round numbers, the chief song-birds of England amount to about twenty-five—among which the nightingale reigns chief and supreme. It is almost impossible to frame any accurate table of the comparative beauty and merit of these varied and happy songsters; but the attempt has been made by an earnest student of nature,* who devoted many years to this one express subject, and some of his notes are of curious interest. Taking "20" to express the point of perfection, at the head of the whole list stands the sweet bird of night: for mellowness of tone, compass, and execution, and an inborn plaintiveness of melody which is almost wholly his own. Pre-eminent, too, among the beauties of the strain is its infinite variety; as many as sixteen different beginnings and closes having been noted in the song of a single bird. Beginning, like many a famous master of eloquence, in a sound of infinite and tender softness, he gradually breaks out into deeper and fuller expression, reserving all his strength as if for some sudden touches of passion and delight, and then dying away into a fine and delicate thread of such exquisite and keen sweetness as to pierce the very heart. In the calm stillness of a summer evening this dainty note may be heard through half a mile of silent, listening woodland.

Next to the nightingale come the three happy

* Daines Barrington.

singers, the skylark, woodlark, and titlark, each having a special exellence of his own; the two latter singing both while on the wing and when at rest; their song being full of sweetness, variety, and swift changes; and the first surpassing even the nightingale in the rapid snatches of sprightly joy with which he rises up towards the blue æther,

"And ever rising, wins his liquid way."

Then follow the whole throng of finches, headed by the linnet, who stands fifth on the entire list, and carries off (in these days of competitive examination) 74 marks out of a possible 100 for compass, execution, sprightliness, plaintiveness, and mellow tone. Far lower down on the list come the better known and more popular melodists, the blackbird, the thrush, and the whitethroat, the reed-warblers, and the robin—who, by the way, during the silent autumnal days deserves a whole column to himself. To these, however, must be added the blackcap, who, for beauty, power, and flute-like brilliancy of song, excels all other of these happy minstrels but the nightingale himself.

For a time all these joyous sounds one by one die out, and we talk of the silence of the woods and fields. But, in truth, the great song of earth to heaven never ceases; wander where we will in these pleasant domains, if the ear be but rightly in tune, one may catch in ever falling or rising cadence soft and happy echoes of peace and joy rising as in a cloud towards the summer sky. The hum, the murmur, the whisper of the meadow grass or the waving corn, the all-pervading sound of multitudinous insect-life, the faint rustle of the wandering breeze among the far-off tree-tops, the still fainter music of the streamlet in the next hollow,

"That to the quiet woods
all night
Singeth a quiet tune:"

all these, together, float dreamily through the balmy air, and yet tell us that the songs of summer never die. Even the silence has a voice. Happy they who can so join in it here in this world of changing sun and shade, that they may know at last of the deeper mystery, and the yet grander song, of another and a greater life.

ABOUT STERNHOLD AND HOPKINS'S PSALMS.

THE history of the metrical versions of the Psalter which have at one time or other been authorised for use in the churches, is one of the most interesting subjects to be found in the by-ways of literature. One version still remains in constant use by Presbyterian worshippers; the other two versions are numbered amongst the things that were. All three have exercised an abiding influence on the sacred poetry of our country; and each has found an echo in the hearts of thousands of worshippers of various creeds and countries. The rugged lines of Sternhold and Hopkins, the more polished verses of Tate and Brady, the literal renderings of Francis Rous—all these have formed at various times the sole medium of praise to assemblies of Christians, most of whom would have looked upon the introduction of a hymn into the worship of the Church as not only inexpedient, but rankly heretical. An outline of the history of each of the three versions we have named is what is proposed in these articles. The records bearing on the subject are not generally accessible, and when collected into a concise and chronological narrative we feel sure they will be appreciated by many readers.

The earliest of all the versions of the Psalms in the tongue of the people appears to have been that of the brothers Wedderburn, known as the "Dundee Psalms," from the residence of the authors. How many were translated we cannot certainly tell; neither is it known at what precise date they were issued to the public. The first mention of them is in connection with the martyrdom of George Wishart in 1546. Knox, in his "History of the Reformation," records the fact that Wishart on the night before he was apprehended at Ormiston, "after supper, held comfortable purpose of the death of Goddis chosen children, and merrily said, 'Methink that I desyre earnestlye to sleep,' and thairwith he said, 'will ye sing a Psalme?' and so he appointed the 51st Psalme, which was put in Scotische meter, and begane thus:—

"'Have mercy on me now, good Lord,
After Thy great mercy.'"

These lines are from the second verse of the Psalm in the Wedderburn collection, and it seems therefore probable that some at least of the renderings may have existed several years previous to the date we have mentioned.

In England the earliest metrical versions were by Miles Coverdale, the co-translator with Tyndale of the first complete English Bible, published in 1535. They were issued under the title of "Goostly Psalmes and Spiritual Songes," the Psalms numbering thirteen, and the "songes" twenty-six. The year of publication is not certain; but as the book was condemned to be burnt by an order of Henry VIII., dated 1546, we may safely presume that it was issued about that time. There is evidence to show that both the Wedderburn and the Coverdale versions, each set to simple music, were eagerly appropriated and freely used by the people in the religious services of the time. They do not, however, appear to have been used as Church-songs properly so called, nor to have received the sanction of those holding authority in such matters; and the most, therefore, that can be said of them is that they did good service in preparing the way for the public adoption of the first complete English version of the metrical Psalms—the version, well known at least by name, of Sternhold and Hopkins.

In giving an account of this version, it will be convenient to speak first of the author whose name is chiefly associated with it. Thomas Sternhold is generally described as a native of Hampshire, but this would appear to be doubtful, judging by the following entry, which has been found in the registers of Awre, in Gloucestershire. The date of the entry is believed to be somewhere between 1570 and 1580:—

"Let it be remembered for the honour of this parish that from it sounded out the Psalms of David in English metre by Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins. The former lived in an estate near Blakeney, called the Hayfield; the latter in an estate in the tything of Awre, called the Woodend. And in the house of the said John Hopkins there is now to be seen the arms of the Tudor family, being painted on the wall of it; and on both sides is written in Saxon characters the former part of the thirteenth chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, which was done at that time."

The author of "Singers and Songs of the Church"—to whom the discovery of this extract is due—tells us that the Hayfield estate is still well known, and that the Woodend property came to its present owner directly from the descendants of Hopkins. Very unfortunately, the house referred to in the extract has long since disappeared, having, it is believed, been washed down by the Severn; it would have formed a most interesting memento of one of the leading authors of the now obsolete Psalter.

Of the early life of Sternhold we know nothing, except that he was educated at Oxford, which he left without taking a degree. He became Groom of the Robes to Henry VIII., and afterwards to Edward VI., to whom the first edition of his Psalms was dedicated, and in whose service he died in 1549. His heart appears to have been touched by the influence of the religious movements of the time, and he is said to have composed his metrical Psalms chiefly with a view to their taking the place of the improper songs used about the Court.

The first edition of the Sternhold Psalter contained nineteen Psalms, and was published under the following title:—

"Certayne PSALMES, chosē out of the PSALTER OF DAVID, and drawē into English metre by Thomas Sternhold, grome of ye Kyngés Maiesties roobes. Excudebat Londini Edvardus Whitchurche."

There is no date on the title-page, but the dedication to Edward VI. shows that the book cannot have been issued before 1547, and other circumstances lead to the conclusion that it can hardly have been later than this. In the first Act for the uniformity of divine service under Edward VI., 1548, it is allowed "to be lawful for all men as well in churches, chapels, oratories, or other places, to use openly any Psalm or prayer taken out of the Bible." The term "Psalm" is not here expressly defined as metrical, yet various authorities, as Strype and Burnet, so understand it; and if this is really the case, as there is little doubt it is, the renderings must have been those of Sternhold. This conclusion is, indeed, borne out by a statement in the dedication to Edward VI. of William Baldwyn's metrical version of the Canticles, published in 1549. "Your Majesty," says the author, "hath already given a notable example in causyng the Psalmes in fine Englyshe meter by your godly-disposed servant Thomas Sternholde, to be song openly before your grace in the hearynge of all your subjects." These facts show, then, that the first edition of the Sternhold Psalter was issued about 1547; and also that it had the honour of being at once authorised for public use—an honour which, as we have seen, had not been accorded to any preceding version.

By the year 1549 the Psalter had been considerably enlarged, and an edition was then published containing thirty-seven Psalms by Sternhold, and seven by a new versifier, John Hopkins. The latter was evidently editor of this edition, though it does not appear how he was led to act in that capacity. As a preface to his own Psalms—which are printed by themselves after those of Sternhoid—Hopkins writes as follows:—

"Thou haste here (gentle reader) unto ye psalmes that were drawen into English metre, by M. Sternhold, vii more adjoined. Not to the intent that they shoulde bee fathered on the dead man, and so through his estimacion to be the more highly esteemed: neyther for that they are, in myne opinion (as touching the metre) in any part to be compared with his most exquisite doings. But especially for that they are fruitful, although they bee not fine; and comfortable unto a Christian mind, although not so pleasaunt in the mouthe or eare. Wherefore, yf thou (good reader) shal accept and take this my doyng in good part, I have my heartes desire herein. Farewell. "J. H."

Very little is known of the life of John Hopkins; but it is certain that he was educated at Oxford, and that he ultimately entered the ministry. It has been conjectured that he may be the same as one John Hopkins who in 1544 graduated as B.A. at Oxford. Wood ("Athenæ Oxon.") makes mention of a John Hopkins who died at Waldringfield, in Suffolk, in October, 1570; and this was doubtless the author of the metrical Psalms. Hopkins's versions, like those of Sternhold, are all in common metre, but with this distinction—that whereas the Sternhold stanza possesses only two rhymes, that of Hopkins has four. No less than sixty of the Psalms in the complete Psalter were from the pen of Hopkins.

Between 1549 and 1553 the "Forty-four" Psalter was several times republished, but without any alteration or addition. In the meantime the singing of metrical Psalms had become exceedingly popular, but the accession of Queen Mary put an end for a time to all public practice of it. During this reign, however, the work of translation was still going on, although not in England. The Protestant refugees at Geneva had framed for themselves an Order of Service in place of the Book of Common Prayer, and in this Order were included the forty-four Psalms already mentioned, together with seven additional renderings from the pen of William Whittingham. It is interesting to note that among the latter is the earliest L.M. version—"O Lord, consider my distress" (Ps. li.). The Psalms of both Sternhold and Hopkins were at this time submitted to considerable alteration—it is generally thought by Whittingham—and the text as so altered was adopted in all the subsequent editions of the Psalter. No doubt these alterations were made with the view of bringing the versions still more closely into conformity with the original Hebrew.

Whittingham was one of the chief translators of the Geneva Bible, and appears to have been a man of some ability. Born in the county of Chester in 1524, he was senior student of Cardinal College, Oxford, and after leaving it travelled in France, Germany, and Switzerland. He had hardly returned to his native country, when he had to fly from the persecution of Mary. At Geneva he married Calvin's sister, and succeeded Knox as pastor of the English congregation there, coming again to England in 1560. In 1563 he was made Dean of Durham, and this post he held till his death in 1579. Whittingham contributed in all twelve Psalms to the Sternhold Psalter, exclusive of those which were finally rejected. Several of these are in the irregular metres characteristic of the French versions of Marot and Beza, and must have afforded a pleasing contrast to the dominant common metres of most of the other writers.

In 1560 fourteen more renderings were added to the Psalter, thus bringing the number up to sixty-five. Of these fourteen, nine are by Whittingham, two by Robert Wisdom, two by John Pullain, and one (the 95th) is anonymous. The new authors need not detain us long, for they did not write again, and only one Psalm from the pen of each was included in the final edition of the Psalter. Wisdom was for some time incumbent of St. Catherine's, Lothbury, and was imprisoned for refusing to sign the Six Articles. He was one of the Frankfort exiles, but shortly after the accession of Elizabeth he was made Archdeacon of Ely, and this post he retained till his death in 1568. Pullain was a Yorkshireman, and in 1547, at the age of thirty, was admitted senior student of Christ Church. He preached the Reformation privately at St. Michael's, Cornhill, 1556, but afterwards became an exile. Returning in the happier period of Elizabeth, he was made Archdeacon of Colchester, and died in 1565. His influence on the Psalter was of course very slight, but the metre of his 148th Psalm has formed a model for frequent imitation.

In 1561 the exiles at Geneva produced an edition of their Psalter enlarged to eighty-seven Psalms. In this edition the 1560 renderings of the 67th, 95th, and 125th Psalms were excluded, and the new versions therefore numbered twenty-five. The fresh contributions were all from the pen of William Kethe, who will ever be remembered as the author of the noble rendering of the 100th Psalm—"All people that on earth do dwell." Kethe is described by Warton (who styles him "no unready rhymer") as a native of Scotland. He joined the exiles at Geneva in 1556, and after his return to England was settled as a minister in Warwickshire. If regard be had to fidelity to the original text, variety, energy, and elegance, many of Kethe's renderings are entitled to a very high place. The 100th Psalm has been well described as "the gem of the entire collection;" and it is certainly a very high tribute to its merits that even at the present day no metrical translation of any Psalm is in more general favour wherever the English language is spoken. Ten only of Kethe's versions were retained in the final edition of the English Psalter, but the whole twenty-five were included in the edition printed for use in the Scottish churches.

The next stage in the history of the Sternhold Psalter is that which marks its completion in 1562. In this perfected edition twenty-three of the previous renderings were rejected, and eighty-six were thus required to make up the total number. Of these eighty-six, three bear the name of Sternhold, and it is supposed that these had been discovered subsequently to his death. Hopkins, after long silence, again reappears, and no fewer than fifty-three of the new versions are from his pen. Two other translators now come into view. The first of these is Thomas Norton, who versified as many as twenty-six Psalms for this final edition. Norton was by profession a barrister, and, according to Wood, "a forward and busy Calvinist." He is said to have enjoyed some poetical reputation, and he was well known as the author of several tracts on the religious controversies of his time. All his Psalms are in the C.M. form, and rhyme like those of Sternhold. To four of the Psalms added in 1562 the initial "M." is attached; this is now generally believed to stand for John Marckant, of whom nothing is known that is worth stating.

The complete Psalter was thus the work of nine writers, whose respective parts it may be as well to summarise. At the same time that we do this we may show the difference which existed between the English edition of the Psalter and the edition published for the Scottish churches. The following table will make the matter plain as to both points:—

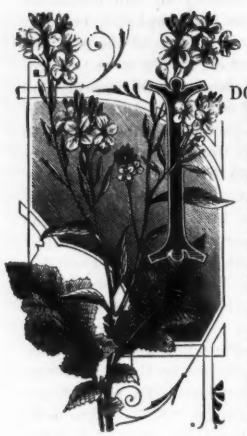
Finally completed and authorised, the metrical Psalter was before long everywhere adopted. The hold gained by it may be estimated from the fact that nearly three hundred and fifty distinct editions were published previous to the year 1700, when the more recent version of Tate and Brady began to divide the public favour with it. It had the honour of a Concordance all to itself; and in the time of Charles II. it was printed in shorthand. Most of the editions included the tunes with which the various Psalms were associated; "with apt notes to sing them withal" was the usual formula of the title-page. These tunes were few in number, and as they were always set to the same Psalm, both the words and the music would soon be known by heart to the congregations. Though generally superseded by the new version, the Sternhold Psalter was used in the English churches within the memory of some still living; among the Nonconformists it continued to be the medium of public praise only till the time of Watts, whose hymns began to drive it from the field.

* Five duplicates.



The literary merits of the Sternhold version are not great; indeed, it is certain that the book would not be tolerated in the present day. Many of the translations are low and ludicrous, and not a few offend against all good taste. The likeness of the version to the original Hebrew—a likeness which was proclaimed on all the title-pages—is, to quote the words of James Montgomery, "but the resemblance of the dead to the living." Probably Warton is right in the opinion, that had the renderings been more poetical, "they would not have been acceptable to the common people." At any rate, we shall not err if we say, with quaint old Thomas Fuller, that the versifiers were men "whose piety was better than their poetry;" and the only pleasant thought for us is that in the 100th and 104th ("My soul, praise the Lord") Psalms of Kethe, and one or two more versions which might be named, we "still retain some links with so venerable a book and history."

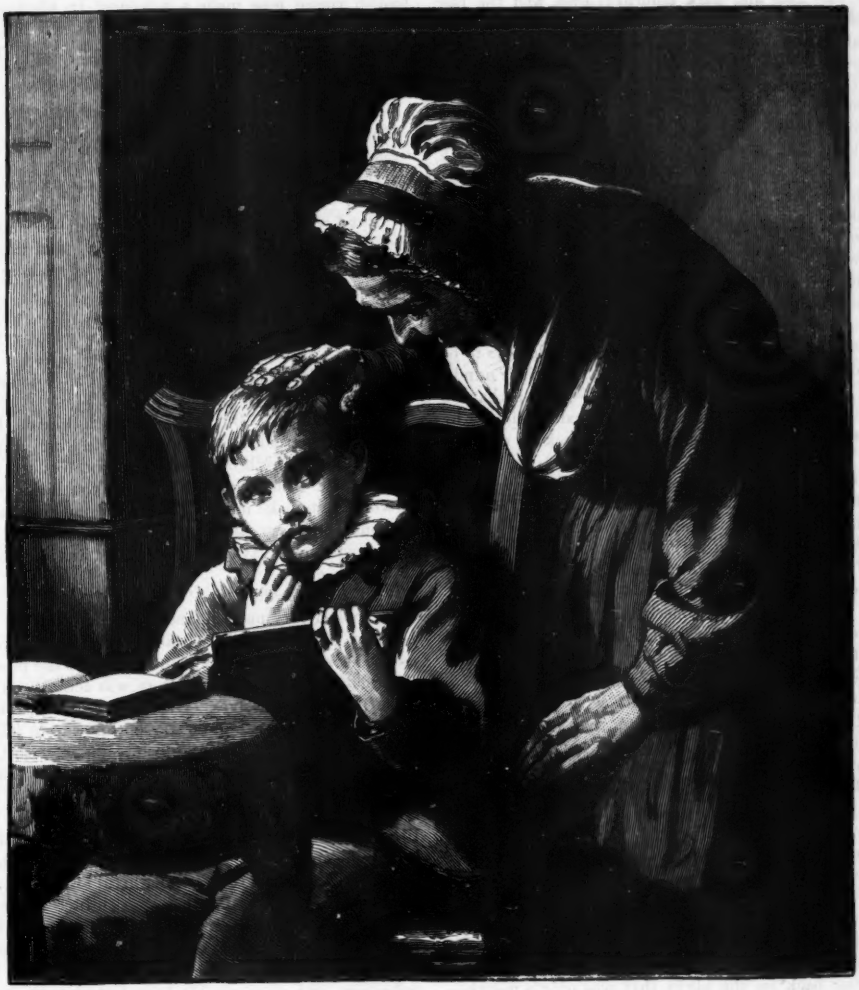
THE CRUMPLED LETTER.

A STORY IN FOUR CHAPTERS.
BY THE AUTHOR OF "MY BROTHER BASIL," ETC.

CHAPTER I.



I DON'T know why he should have been called little Toto, for he was rather a tall boy for his age. Perhaps it was that neither his age nor his stature could possibly have been called great, for Toto was only eight years old when he went on this memorable holiday of his. His real name was not Toto, of course—it was Thomas Havilgar Desmond, and why he was called Toto was one of those perplexing mysteries which a celebrated nobleman was wont to declare "no fellah could understand." The origin of the queer appellation was probably lost in the remote nursery days which seemed as far off to Toto as the times of Aryan or Greek myths seemed to his elders, but in this case no one inquired very curiously about it, or tried to deduce any wonderful theories from its simple syllables. Toto he had always been called, and Toto he was still, and as he always answered to his name, it served its purpose well enough.

People who passed the little fair-haired, bright-faced boy in the street, might easily have thought that his life had been all holiday; but, short as it had been, Toto had not found life all play, as so many of his little companions had done. There had been a good many days, and even weeks and months, of sickness in it, times when Toto fought hard for the breath he could draw so easily now, and those who loved him fought harder still for courage to see him suffer, and for faith to believe in the Love that laid little Toto's cross on his small, tender shoulders. Toto had nearly forgotten all this now, but Toto's father and mother would never quite forget. Always Toto would be a little different from their other children; this child who had been twice given to them, who had come to them once through the gate of life, and once had been snatched from the very jaws of death.

Toto had been delicate ever since, and was just a little spoiled, as delicate children are apt to be. And first amongst his worshippers, and spoiler-in-chief to the wilful but loving and engaging little boy, was his eldest sister, Honor, under whose charge Toto set out on the holiday they would both remember all their lives.

"For I think a change will do Toto good," Mrs. Desmond had said, glancing at Honor's pale cheeks, but not venturing to say, "will do you good," under the gathering wrath of Honor's mutinous eyes.

"'How do you spell penitent?' Toto was asking."—p. 348.

If there was a thing Miss Desmond resented just now, it was the assumption that her health was not vigorous, nor her spirits of the best. Because Philip Western had jilted her, was she going to whine and pine like the heroine of a sentimental story? Certainly not! she assured herself, as she went about the house, singing gaily for the benefit of all who chose to hear. There was something in Honor's singing that brought the tears to her mother's eyes, but happily Honor did not know this, and believed her trouble unsuspected, as firmly as any ostrich who hides its head in the sand believes itself unseen. It was a month-old trouble now, if it was a trouble at all, which Miss Desmond vigorously denied, and Honor was looking rather white and wan, in spite of the good spirits which found vent in these untiring bursts of song. She was thin, too—from singing too much, she said—though the opinions of physiologists, and the aspect of most of the famous Queens of Song, were rather against her theory, and Mrs. Desmond was sincerely rejoiced when Honor vouchsafed her assent to share in the holiday that would be so good for Toto.

The Isle of Wight had been selected for their destination, chiefly because a friend of Mrs. Desmond's was going there, and had suggested that the brother and sister should share her rooms. Mrs. Bretherton would go on first and take apartments, and Honor and Toto were to join her a day or two later.

And so it came to pass that the tall thin girl with the pale face and dark mournful eyes, and the fair pretty boy stood together on the deck of a steamer bound from Portsmouth to Ryde, on a bright June afternoon, and attracted a good deal more attention and admiration than either of them was conscious of. Honor was not so pretty, perhaps, as she had been a month ago, but she was striking and distinguished-looking, and as for Toto, everyone was in love with him. Very sweet and bright and engaging the little fellow looked, in his miniature sailor suit, with a real Jack-tar hat and pea-jacket, his small feet peeping from the long wide trousers that were a little difficult to walk about in, and his eyes shining with excitement and delight. He stood close to his sister, for Honor had charged him to keep by her, and Toto was quite preternaturally good this afternoon.

It is not difficult even for spoilt little boys to be good when everything is going exactly to their minds, and after all Toto was not spoilt—only perhaps a little in danger of being so. He stood obediently by Honor's side, looking as good and meek as possible, and watched the other passengers, and the sailors whose garments were not nearly so correctly nautical as his own, and none of whom could pass him by without quite an affectionate smile. And Toto smiled back at them with the most delicious mixture of fun and shyness and sauciness, and asked Honor a hundred questions about the construction and navigation of steam-vessels, concerning which it is to be feared that Honor herself had only the vaguest and most general information, but which she answered patiently, to the best of her small ability.

She was always very patient with Toto, though Philip Western could have told that it was by no means a quality she displayed to the rest of mankind. Everyone said—that is, everyone in Honor's little world—that Captain Western had jilted her; and many women, and some men who had found her decidedly impatient of their inanities, said that it served her right. But this was not at all how it appeared to Philip Western. He jilt her—he? Why, he would have died for her, until—well! until Honor's eyes turned coldly from his gaze, or met it with a proud defiance he could not understand. He could not understand anything about it, he thought, looking back on the night that was only a month—four little weeks!—ago, but that seemed as many years. He only knew that Honor had charged him with untruth and disloyalty, and that when his pride rose in arms, as any true man's might, she had taken him at his word, and given him back his ring, and sailed away on another man's arm, as gaily as if she had not just broken his heart. This was Philip's view of the question, and he believed it as firmly as Honor believed that she had wasted her love on a man who had only been flirting with her, and who had been only too glad to take back the pledge of a broken troth. It was the old story of the "whispering tongues that poison truth," of the little misunderstanding fanned by a false friend, of a tangle of slander and temper and pride. And the end of it all was that Captain Western sent back Honor's letters and received his own in return, together with sundry bangles, fans, work-cases, and other costly trifles, of which the foolish young man made a holocaust in his barrack grate; and that Honor was sent on this expedition to Sandown, which was to do so much good—to Toto.

CHAPTER II.

"HONOR," whispered Toto, in a very mysterious voice, "may I say something?"

"Haven't you been saying something ever since we started?" Honor asked, with a smile.

"But I want to say something different—something about Captain Western," explained Toto, "and mamma said I mustn't talk about him, for fear of making you ill."

This was pleasant information for a young woman who had sung herself hoarse in an evidently vain attempt to throw dust in her relatives' eyes!

"It wouldn't make you ill, would it?" Toto asked, rather eagerly.

"Certainly not! But you need not talk about him, Toto. I—I am not at all interested in him. I don't want to hear anything about Captain Western ever again," said Honor decidedly. "Do you hear, Toto? It would not make me ill—that is all nonsense!—but I should be angry, and you would not like that; so you must never say anything about him to me, or to anyone else."

"All right," said Toto, "I won't."

He looked very puzzled, and rather crestfallen; but he kept his promise honourably—whereby, if Honor escaped some future awkwardness, she lost the present information that Captain Western was actually on the same boat as themselves. His battery had just been ordered to Sandown, and he was on his way to join it there, but seeing Honor and Toto come on board, he had kept out of their way at the second-class end of the boat. Toto's sharp eyes had spied him out, but Honor had not seen him, nor did she guess what her little brother meant, or why his eyes wandered so often to the opening between the engines and the paddle-boxes. She had grown very thoughtful and silent, and sat with her eyes fixed on the smooth blue water, on which the little steamer was leaving a long white trail, and Toto, seeing that she was in what he called a "brown study," determined to leave her to her reflections, and go to see his friend at the other end of the boat. Toto and Captain Western had been very good friends, and Toto knew no reason why they should not be good friends still. It was true that Honor had told him not to leave her, but, as we know, Toto was accustomed to have his own way, and his fit of quite abnormal goodness and docility was a little wearing off. He slipped quietly away from unobservant Honor, and finding the deck impeded by passengers and luggage, climbed up on the broad ledge that runs along the side of the Solent boats, and tried to make his way to his friend. Perhaps, but for the sailor-trousers he was so proud of, he might have succeeded, but just as Captain Western heard his name pronounced in Toto's childish voice, the boat lurched, and the small sailor-clad figure lurched with it; and before anyone could hold out a detaining hand, the little fellow had fallen into the shining blue water below.

"Toto! It is Toto!" Philip Western cried, in horrified tones, and the next instant he was in the water himself, grasping Toto's little blue sleeve, and striking away from the hideous suck of the paddle-wheels, while the steamer reversed her engines, and all the confusion reigned on board which the cry of "Man overboard!" always produces.

It was then, and then only, that dreaming Honor missed her little charge. Where could he be? And what was all the hubbub at the other end of the boat? She went towards the crowd, a good deal alarmed, and as she approached everyone made way for her.

"It's his mother," someone said. "No—his sister, more like," said someone else; but Honor did not think they were talking about her.

"Have you seen a little boy in a sailor suit?" she asked; but no one answered her. They only made way for her in silence, and as she pressed forward, troubled and amazed, the sailors leaning over the vessel's side drew on board a half-senseless man, with a quite senseless child clasped in his arms.

CHAPTER III.

SANDOWN is one of the prettiest and quietest of watering-places. It stands just in the curve of a bay, blue as that of Naples, and almost as beautiful, and has a background of soft, swelling downs, of villas set in trees, of common where the gorse blows, and the cuckoo calls, and the larks sing overhead. It seems a curious contrast to the peaceful, pleasant scene, to look at the ring of forts that surrounds the smiling bay, to meet in the quiet High Street the dark uniforms of Her Majesty's Royal Artillery, and hear now and again the roar of guns that tells of innocuous practice at floating targets, and does no worse damage than to shake the windows, and perhaps crash a pane in one that a careless housewife has forgotten to open. No prettier sight can be imagined than this Artillery practice on a bright summer day. Honor looked at it enchanted, as she and Toto and Mrs. Bretherton watched it from the window of their lodgings on the Esplanade. Sky and sea were both of the intense, metallic blue peculiar to the Isle of Wight, and where shot or shell struck the water, a little white puff of steam rose from it, as if in emulation of the small white clouds floating in the blue above. Toto clapped his hands as each white jet arose into the air, and held his breath for the dull reverberating roar that came so long afterwards that Toto could hardly believe it had anything to do with the shot just fired.

Toto was none the worse for his dip in the Solent. He had revived directly he was taken out, and, thanks to Captain Western's timely aid, was decidedly more frightened than hurt. Honor knew that she owed her little brother's life to Philip Western, and faltered out incoherent thanks, with white, quivering lips, when Philip emerged from the cabin where he had changed his dripping garments; while Honor and half a dozen eager helpers had rendered the same services to Toto in the velvet-cushioned saloon. They were at Ryde by this time, and everyone was crowding to the gangway; but Honor made a desperate effort, and came up with Toto's deliverer before he left the boat.

"I must thank you," she said, holding out her hand; but perhaps he did not see it. She hoped not, afterwards, blushing furiously at the bare remembrance, for he did not take the poor little trembling hand so impulsively offered to him. He only lifted his hat, and bowed ceremoniously; and then he passed on in the crowd, and Honor saw him no more.

She had not seen him in Sandown, except in the distance. Once or twice she had caught a glimpse of the well-known figure, a street's length away, and Mrs. Bretherton, who was short-sighted, had wondered at the sudden crimson in her young friend's cheeks. "Sandown is doing you good, dear! I always say it is the finest air in the world," she would say, innocently; and Honor did not know which she detested most—Mrs. Bretherton, or herself, or Philip Western. And yet she could not help being grateful to him—for had he not saved Toto's life?

Toto himself was very grateful indeed, and whatever Captain Western felt about Honor, he did not let his feelings towards her interfere with his fondness for his old friend Toto. Toto was made free of the Captain's quarters, and between his visits there, and the time he spent in erecting mimic fortifications on the beach, Honor and Mrs. Bretherton saw very little of him. Mrs. Bretherton was rather an invalid, and Honor decidedly preferred sitting on the balcony with her to going out alone, with the possibility of meeting Captain Western always before her eyes. So Toto went his own way: and the beach was so safe, and the little boy had made so many friends amongst the visitors, to say nothing of the friend with whom Honor always felt that he was as safe as with herself, that neither she nor Mrs. Bretherton felt any concern when he was out of their sight. Toto knew his way all over the place, and never failed to put in an appearance for his meals.

Toto's extreme punctuality made his absence at tea one night seem a little alarming, but Honor would not let herself be frightened. She had seen Toto go by an hour or two ago, with his hand in Captain Western's, and felt quite easy about him. But supper-time came, and still no Toto; and both the ladies became seriously alarmed. Mrs. Bretherton sent to Captain Western's to ask if he was there, and Honor's heart stood still as she saw the Captain coming down the Esplanade alone. He had outrun Mrs. Bretherton's maid in his anxiety, for he had not seen Toto since the afternoon; and it was evident that something must have happened.

"Is there anything I can do?" he asked Mrs. Bretherton. "I should be so glad to be of use if I may. I would do anything for Toto."

He did not look at Honor, nor Honor at him. She stood, white and silent, looking out at the moonlit water, and wondering in a dazed, stupid way, what the knot of fishermen were talking about who were standing just under the balcony, and pointing up at her, and then at the dark, silent sea, with its one track of silvery light.

Captain Western saw and heard them too. He pushed Honor quite roughly from the window, and shut it in a quick, agitated way; and then he ran down-stairs, and she saw him talking eagerly to the men.

He did not come up-stairs again, but sent a message asking Mrs. Bretherton to come down to him, and when she saw his face in the moonlight it was whiter than Honor's.

"I have heard something—I am afraid I have heard all there is to hear," he said, with a short sob, of which he looked horribly ashamed, but that Mrs. Bretherton thought only did him honour. "He went out in a canoe, it seems, after he left me——"

"In a canoe! That child!" she ejaculated; "and I know Honor had forbidden him to go in one!"

"He had never had one before, and it was quite safe in the tide-pool; but the water was high, and they think it must have drifted over the sandbank, and so out to sea."

"They don't really know, then?" she said, fighting against his hopeless tones.

"No one knows anything; but they found the canoe an hour ago, bottom upwards, in Whitecliff Bay. Hush!"—with a quick look at the window above—"don't—don't! I think of her! It is not certain, you see, and they say the—the body—will be sure to come ashore there, if it is so."

Mrs. Bretherton forced back her tears.

"What shall I say to Honor?" she wailed.

"Tell her—no; tell her nothing! Keep this report from her if you can; at least, till I get back from Whitecliff. Say that people are looking for him, and that she shall hear as soon as there is any news."

CHAPTER IV.

THAT short summer night, with its awful burden of suspense, seemed to Honor the longest she had ever known. It seemed long to Captain Western too, waiting for the dawn, that seemed as if it would never come. He was to go to Whitecliff with the earliest streak of day, and, indeed, the sun's great red disc was hardly out of the water when a boat, with Captain Western and three fishermen, put off from Sandown and bore away in the direction of the Culvers. Whitecliff lies just the other side of the steep white cliff, a little sandy bay with a beach thickly strewn with rounded flints, hollowed out of the chalk-cliffs above. It was here that they landed, for here, if anywhere, the fishermen said the sea would give up its dead. And so they paced up and down the rough, pebbly shore, and looked at the calm blue waters, sparkling in the sun, and the little waves breaking so softly they scarcely stirred the sand on the beach, till the tide had come in, and turned again, and the sun was well overhead. It shone all over the little bay now, showing all the marvellous colours that make up the whiteness of the chalk, and glittering on Philip's watch-chain, on the metal buttons one of the men wore, and on something that the shadow of the cliff had hidden till now, but that glittered like a gem when the light fell on it. It was not a gem at all, but it was something which Philip Western would not have exchanged for the Koh-i-noor—it was a little silver whistle he had given to Toto to wear on his lanyard, and which he had seen round Toto's neck the afternoon before. It was Toto's whistle, undoubtedly, and it was lying here under the cliffs, twenty feet at least above high water-mark. If Toto had been wrecked, as they supposed, his whistle could not have got here; and Captain Western looked anxiously about him, almost as if he expected to find Toto under the cliffs, too. The little bay was soon explored, but the whistle in Captain Western's hand was the only trace of Toto, and having satisfied himself of this, the Captain told the men to wait below, while he ascended the cliff to make inquiries at the cottages above. There were only one or two, but as he approached the first, he heard the sound of a voice that was curiously like Toto's, and looking in, he saw Toto himself. It certainly was Toto, though the familiar sailor suit was replaced by some old-fashioned garments that changed his appearance so much that Philip would hardly have known him but for the unmistakable voice, whose pitch was so much higher than Honor's, but whose tone and quality were so like hers.

"How do you spell penitent?" Toto was asking an old woman, who bent over him with a very kind face.

"That I can't tell 'ee, dearie," she said, laying her wrinkled, toil-worn hand on Toto's little head. "Don't'ee trouble about the spelling, sonny. It's feeling it matters a deal more than spelling. The Lord 'll never ask if it's spelt right, dearie, nor your good kind sister neither."

"Oh, you don't know," objected Toto. "Honor teaches me, and she's awful particular about spelling. That's why I write it on a slate first—she always makes me, you know; and if you don't know how penitent's spelt, I'd better look it out."

But as he turned to a large, old-fashioned dictionary on the table beside him, he saw Captain Western, and flew into his arms.

"Have you come for me?" he cried. "And is Honor very cross?"

"Cross? Child, you don't know what you are talking about," the Captain said, as the remembrance of Honor's dumb anguish came over him with a thrill of pity. "You can't understand the trouble you have caused."

"So I tell'd him, sir," the old woman said, with a curtsey. "I know'd the poor young lady would be in a dreffful taking, and no wonder neither. He were writing to her when you come in, sir, and my son he's just going into Sandown with the letter."

"But how did he get here?" Captain Western asked.

"Canoe," said Toto, briefly. And then he looked up with the eyes that were so like Honor's. "I am sorry," he said, "I really, really am."

"I think he really is, sir," Mrs. Jolliffe said. "He know'd well enough he shouldn't 'a done it, and when he found hisself a drifting out to sea, he were proper frightened, poor dear."

"But how did he get here?" repeated the Captain.

"Well, you see, sir, there's a current sets this way, and the canoe it just drifted into the bay, and little master with it. He were washed clean out of it, but my Jim were down there setting lobster-pots, and brought him up to me. He were that worn out, poor dear. he fell fast asleep in Jim's arms, and I just took his wet things off, and put him to bed. It were only this morning he were able to tell us anything about hisself, and Jim is going off directly."

"There is no need. I have a boat down in the bay," Captain Western said. And then he told Toto to get ready to come with him, and rewarded good Mrs. Jolliffe with a liberality that exceeded her utmost expectations.

Half an hour later they were on their way back, and Toto, clad once more in his own habiliments, looked very little the worse for his adventure, though he had the grace to look exceedingly ashamed. Mrs. Jolliffe's homely remarks had found their way to Toto's heart, and—whether he could spell it or not—he was really penitent, both for his disobedience and for the trouble he had caused.

"You see," the Captain said, pressing home the lesson, "it was doing what you knew you oughtn't, that was really the sa't thing, wasn't it? I always think there's something sneaky about disobedience, and there's such a temptation not to own up afterwards."

Toto grew very red.

"I do own up," he said, "nearly always."

"But not quite, eh? I wonder what is on your small conscience now? You'd be much more comfortable if you made a clean breast of it."

Toto wriggled uncomfortably.

"You'd be cross—and Honor too," he said doubtfully. But when repentance is sincere, confession is not far off. "It was only about that note," he said, confidentially, "the note I didn't give you, a long time ago."

"What note?"—rather sharply.

"There! I knew you would be cross;" said Toto, with a sort of forlorn triumph. "And so will Honor too."

"What has Hon—what has your sister to do with it?"

"Honor asked me to give it to you, and I forgot, and I thought she'd be vexed, and I didn't tell. But I am going to tell her when I get home. She won't mind, if I tell her, will she?"

"How can I tell?" said the Captain, in a very odd voice. He would have given a good deal to know what was in that note.

"You don't know what you did with it, I suppose," he remarked. But equally to his contentment and surprise, Toto did know. He put his hand in his pocket, and produced an exceedingly dirty and crumpled envelope, addressed to Captain Western in Honor's well-known hand. Inside was a note, with a date six weeks old. How strange it was to read, "My own darling Phil," and to know that she would never call him that any more.

But as he read on, a hope so strong and sweet as to be almost painful sprang up in his breast. For the note was one that should have been answered at once, and he began to see how his failure to do so had offended Honor's pride, and even made her doubt his love. He remembered all about it now, and how, instead of going to the "Grosvenor" with Honor, as the note asked him to do, he had chosen that very day to go with his cousin Nettie, of whom Honor had always been a little jealous, and had met Honor there, and been cut to the heart by the coldness in her voice and eyes. But now, but now——!

There was a sudden mist in Philip's own eyes as he looked at the smudged and crumpled paper in his hand, and thought of all that perhaps it might do for him yet!

"How you blink!" said Toto, sympathetically. "Is it because the sun is in your eyes?"

* * * * * *

What a happy evening that was! Philip and Honor sat in the balcony together with happy faces and tight-locked hands, and Mrs. Bretherton—kind, considerate creature that she was!—felt suddenly well enough to go for a little walk, and took Toto with her. And the reconciled lovers rejoiced over their reconciliation, and only quarrelled as to which had been the most to blame. The moon came up and turned the little bay into fairyland, and life stretched before them sweet and vast, a fairyland such as most men only visit once, but that these were treading for the second time with undimmed faith and hope.

THE NAME CHRISTIAN.

BY THE REV. TRYON EDWARDS, D.D.

THE disciples were called Christians first in Antioch;" so we are told in Acts xi. 26, and most commentators and readers regard the name as given in contempt or ridicule to the followers of the blessed Saviour.

Before this they had been known by other names—disciples, for their knowledge; believers, for their faith; brethren, for their love to each other and to Christ; witnesses, for their faithful testimony to the truth; saints, for their holiness, as sanctified through the truth and by the Holy Spirit; and the faithful, for their trust in and their unwavering allegiance to the Saviour. And all these names are recognised by Christ Himself, or directly by the word of inspiration. But now, at Antioch, for the first time they are called Christians. What, then, is the origin of the name, and what is its meaning?

As already said, it is the common impression that the name was given in reproach by the opposers and enemies of the new faith, in the endeavour, by ridicule or contempt, to cast discredit on the new doctrine and its recipients. This, however, can hardly have been the case, for though their enemies, as we know, stigmatised them as "Nazarenes" and "Galileans," it is nowhere said that they gave them any other name; and it is scarcely probable that the Church would so readily have assumed, and so willingly have kept, a name which had been given to its members only in contempt and derision. It is far more reasonable to suppose that the name was divinely given, for ever to associate the followers of Christ with His own blessed name. And the Greek word translated "were called" makes it almost absolutely certain that this was the case. Nine times in the New Testament that word is used in its form as a verb, and once as a noun, and in every other one of these cases it signifies a command or direction, coming as a message from God Himself, as when the wise men were warned of God not to return to Herod; and Joseph, being warned of God, turned aside into Galilee; and Cornelius, being warned of God, sent for Peter; and Moses, being admonished by God, was directed how to build the tabernacle; and the Hebrew Christians are warned not to refuse Christ, Who spake on earth, etc. And this uniform use and meaning of the word in these various cases seems plainly to point to the fact that here also it is used in the same sense, thus saying that the name was given of God—divinely given.

In the nature of the case there seems to have been a need of some new name that should sink the distinctions of Jew and Gentile, and embrace in its broad, and significant, and definite meaning all of every nation who should be converts to the faith of Christ. And it is more than probable that this was the very name alluded to and foretold by the prophet Isaiah when he says (chapter lxii. 2) that the people of God, under the New Dispensation, "shall be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name." And given, as it was, but a few years after the death of Christ, and at Antioch, where inspired men were so long ministering to the Church, it seems more than probable that they were divinely directed to give to believers this "new name," which so early became the mark of discipleship, and which everywhere, and to the end of the world, was to designate the disciples of the Saviour, and be a form of acknowledging and confessing Christ before men.

And this divine origin of the name, it is believed, is confirmed and illustrated by an expression in the Old Testament which throws light upon this point. Going back to the last verse of the fourth chapter of Genesis, we find it written:—"Then men began to call upon the name of the Lord." But the literal meaning of the Hebrew seems to be, "Then it was begun to call men (i.e., good men) by the name of God—or God's sons." And this meaning seems recognised in the next chapter but one, where it is said that the "sons of God" (i.e., good men) married "the daughters of men" (i.e., irreligious and worldly women), and so, as mothers do shape the character of their children, a race of giants sprang up: not giants in size, for the word has no reference to size—but giants in wickedness, outbreaking men, violent men, the very word that is used when it is said (chap. vi. 13) that the world was "so filled with their violence" that God was led to destroy it by the flood. So the former passage in the New Testament is parallel to this in the Old. Then, in the Old Testament in the days of Seth, good men were first called "God's sons," and here in the New Testament, in the days of Paul and Barnabas, and at Antioch, good men were first called "Christ's sons," or Christians—for the latter word is but the synonym or equivalent of the two others. In each case the name seems to have been divinely given, to distinguish God's people from the world, and to mark them by name as His own.

And now if it is asked, "What is a Christian? And how may I know if I am one?" the answer is given by two other questions:—First, "Do you believe all that Christ teaches, so far and so fast as you understand it?" and second, "Do you endeavour to do all that Christ commands, as far and as fast as you understand that?" In other words, Do you receive all that Christ says as true, and treat it as true, and act upon it as true, cherishing His spirit in your heart, and endeavouring in all things to do His will in your daily life and conduct? If you do, you are a Christian. For when someone asked the blessed Saviour, "What shall we do that we might work the works of God?" Jesus said, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent." And when they told Him "that His mother and brethren were without, desiring to speak with Him," He said, "Whoso shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother."

If then you believe all that Christ teaches, so far and so fast as you understand it, and if you endeavour to do all that Christ commands, so far and so fast as you know it, you are a Christian. You may be, as yet, but a weak and feeble Christian, just entering on the divine life, but you are in that life. You may be as yet but a mere babe in Christ, but you are in Him. And if you are but faithful to study His Word that you may know His truth and His will, and are earnest in prayer for the aid of the Holy Spirit that you may understand the former and do the latter, then you shall grow and increase in strength, till you come at last to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ Himself.

SCIENCE AND CHRISTIANITY.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE REV. W. H. DALLINGER, LL.D., F.R.S., ETC.

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

DR. DALLINGER'S LABORATORY.

AN almost unique position is occupied by the highly honoured and well-known Wesleyan minister, Dr. W. H. Dallinger. He is a renowned and eminent man of science, at the same time that he is a highly popular and powerful preacher; he is a recognised authority on biological subjects, especially those relating to minute biology and the origin of life; while he has borne a full share in the circuit work of the denomination to which he belongs.

Humanly speaking, a serious illness caused Dr. Dallinger to become also an eminent scientist. Of course he possessed the qualities for such a career—the ardent love of nature and the power of patient and steady research—but these and other faculties might have lain dormant or only been partially used were it not that when a young man he was struck down by severe illness, and for eighteen months was quite unable to pursue his vocation as a minister.

Being then wholly forbidden to occupy the mind by anything that caused it any strain, he was thrown back upon his old love of nature, and in fine weather he was taken, through the days and months of a long and brilliant summer, into the fields and woods. There, amid the murmuring breezes and the cheerful sunshine, he crept slowly back to health; and the old passion of his boyhood re-asserted itself. He became the possessor of a high-class microscope, and made himself thoroughly master of the delightful instrument. As a boy he had been wont to use it with considerable success; and now by steady practice he became thoroughly able to employ it so as to obtain the finest results attainable with an object-glass of $\frac{1}{25}$th of an inch focus—a lens at that time not commonly used; and subsequently he employed with equal facility a lens of $\frac{1}{50}$th of an inch focus, corresponding to that with which Dr. Lionel Beale did his classical work in the demonstration of the nature of protoplasm. Both these "object-glasses" are now wholly surpassed by others of the same power, but transcendently higher qualities, which modern optics and opticians have in successive years produced. All these are to be seen on the tables of the Doctor's work-room.

Such instruments as these require the utmost skill for their really efficient use. To possess a lens of very high power and perfect construction no more carries with it the capacity to use it than the purchase of a Stradiuarius violin carries with it ability to evoke its music. The "front lens" of a $\frac{1}{50}$th inch "dry" lens, the same power "immersion," and another "oil-immersion" of equal magnifying capacity, is in each case so small that when a strong light is sent through the combination of lenses united in making the "object-glass," the front lens in each case is as a mere luminous needle-point. During twenty years of work, Dr. Dallinger has seen, and been the means of promoting, wonderful advances in the perfection and use of the microscope; but it was in the days of which we are writing that earnest study and practice were devoted by Dr. Dallinger to endeavour to obtain a complete mastery of the instrument.

"I attribute all the best results of my work," said he, "to my having, at the outset, made myself thoroughly master of the optical principles of the microscope, and the practical use in the best way of all the apparatus employed with it."

And now, what are some of the great results at which Dr. Dallinger has arrived? Briefly, he has proved, by his long and patient examination of some of the minutest living creatures, that "spontaneous generation," or the origination of life from not-life, is absolutely fallacious; and therefore the presumption, on purely scientific grounds, is that all life must have originated in a cause not operating in nature now. He has shown that the minutest and lowliest living things—the least known to us at present on earth—can only come, like the largest and most complex, from preceding living things. Hence the inference is inevitable that there was a point in the creative progress or genesis of the earth when a power operated as no power now operates, endowing matter dead and inorganic with the unique and wonderful properties and powers of LIFE. We may not even conceive of how this was done, but it must, in its primal nature, have been the act of the Creator. A scientific man himself, and one who has made profound and original scientific researches, he does not find anything in physical science to conflict with the great foundation on which Christianity rests.

Dr. Dallinger was born at Devonport in 1841, and educated privately. He was early imbued with a deep interest in nature, and amongst other things —as a boy—he was enabled to obtain and use a small microscope, which deepened his interest in nature, and led him at first to choose medicine as a profession. But want of health greatly interfered with his prospects of success, and when he was about sixteen or seventeen years of age he became moved with a desire to become a minister. Educated in the Church of England, he at that time became acquainted with several exceedingly earnest young men associated with the Wesleyan Church, and this resulted in his leaving the Church of England—for which he still has a great love—and joining the Wesleyan Society at Stonehouse. He engaged in Sunday-school work, and ultimately joined the Wesleyan ministry.

For some time, now, he devoted his mind to the study of sacred and classical languages, and to theology, and with great reluctance abandoned, for about five years, any special work in nature or in science. Then fell upon him the serious illness during the slow recovery from which he became master of the microscope, and subsequently, when he had partially recovered, but was still out of health, he spent twelve more months in endeavouring to discover the origin and mode of development of some of the organisms which set up putrefactive action in organic bodies. These organisms are the least and the lowliest in nature, and some remarkable results were obtained at the end of the year.

This was done at Bristol. Being now better in health, Mr. Dallinger was removed to Liverpool, where he remained, engaging in the work of the Wesleyan ministry for about twelve years, and where much of his special scientific work was done. At the time of his removal, the question of so-called "spontaneous generation," or the mode of origin of the lowest forms of life, was greatly agitating the biological world; and having no opinion either for or against either of the two opposing doctrines, Dr. Dallinger determined to thoroughly investigate the matter. One of these doctrines inculcated the hypothesis that these lowliest living creatures arose directly—without the intervention of living things—from not-living matter; the other affirmed that only that which was living could give origin to that which lived.

"The extreme minuteness of the organisms," said Dr. Dallinger, "was the greatest impediment to the solution of the question, but the highest powers then accessible were employed. The only mode in which it could be successfully done, however, was that a single organism should be followed by constant observation through all changes of its life, and the mode of origin of successive forms determined. I soon found this could not be done by one observer alone. The application had to be too close and too constant, and it was necessary to find a coadjutor. A thoroughly competent one was found in Dr. J. J. Drysdale, F.R.M.S., of Liverpool, who worked for six or seven years with me in my laboratory. During that time we worked out completely the life-histories of seven distinct putrefactive organisms. The details of our observations, and the results and methods pursued, are given in the Proceedings of the Royal Society and of the Royal Microscopical Society, and the general result of the work was a demonstration that these living things, like all the larger and more complex ones above them, originated in parental products—the equivalents of seeds or eggs altogether too minute for general conception."

This, in brief, has been Dr. Dallinger's special scientific work. But he has done much more; he has increased the number of life-histories of minute putrefactive organisms now known, and proved that they are a group of minute creatures doing a special work for which they are more or less strikingly fitted; also that they are to putrefaction what the yeast plant is to fermentation. Dr. Dallinger has also shown that these organisms are capable of undergoing remarkable changes, which adapt them to live under adverse surroundings; so that the fittest ultimately survive in conditions that would have been absolutely destructive at the commencement of a long series of experiments. Thus, for example, the usual temperature in which they live is 60 degrees of the Fahrenheit thermometer, but after nearly ten years of adding heat very slowly, with extremely delicate and well-devised instruments, these organisms lived at a temperature of 157 degrees Fahrenheit! If the change were sudden, they were destroyed. Indeed, the normal adults are always killed at 140 degrees Fahr.

This Dr. Dallinger regards as direct evidence of the truth of the doctrine laid down by Darwin, that if the surroundings of an organism change adversely, variations take place in successive generations, which enable them to adapt themselves to their surroundings, so that these are adverse no longer; and, said he—

"In my judgment, the existence of this power of concurrent adaptation, possessed by every living organism in nature, is the broadest and sublimest evidence of design that can be brought before the mind of man."

Thus, out of one of the Darwinian doctrines itself, this keen and resolute seeker of truth triumphantly draws an evidence of the existence of a Great Creator.

It is well, therefore, that it should be clearly understood, on the authority of an eminent scientist such as Dr. Dallinger, that there is nothing in the scientific facts Darwin brought to light which conflicts with the vital truths of Christianity; while Dr. Dallinger has himself proved, to use his own words, "that there is an absolute gulf between matter in a living state and matter in a state not living, in even the lowest forms. Therefore the conclusion is, that the whole series of living things originated in a primal and competent creative act, although the method of doing this may reveal itself to our present knowledge by no discontinuity in the order or succession of creative progress."

As a result of this work, Dr. Dallinger was elected a Fellow of the Royal Microscopical Society, and subsequently President—a post which he held for four years. He was also elected Rede Lecturer to Cambridge University, and received a grant of £100 from the Royal Society to aid in the prosecution of these researches. In 1880 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and about the same time became "Governor," or Principal, of Wesley College, Sheffield. For many years he has been on the staff of lecturers in the interests of the Gilchrist Educational Trust Funds; and, at the request of the Committee of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, he visited Montreal to deliver one of the lectures before the Association when in session there, and while in that city received the degree of LL.D. from the Victoria University. He has also delivered the Fernley Lecture, in 1887, the title being "The Creator, and what we may Know of the Method of Creation."

After being the Principal of Wesley College, Sheffield, for about eight years, Dr. Dallinger left at his own instance, being desirous of devoting all his time and energy to working out more fully the problems still remaining in the biological work to which he had devoted so many years; and at the Wesleyan Conference, or annual parliament of the denomination, last year (1888), he, with a few others, was released from circuit work—i.e., from the charge of a stated pastorate—and appointed a special preacher of the Society. Thus he might almost say, "The world is my parish;" for he may be called to preach at any Wesleyan church in the kingdom, though he has a discretionary right of refusal or selection The appointment of these special preachers is, we may say in passing, one of the new features lately introduced into the methods of Methodism.

The removing of Dr. Dallinger from Sheffield was made the occasion of a very remarkable demonstration, which was, in its way, quite cosmopolitan. At a large and enthusiastic town's meeting, the Mayor presiding, a silver salver was presented to Mrs. Dallinger, and a purse of money to her distinguished husband. Clergymen and ministers of various denominations were present, including the vicar of Sheffield (Archdeacon Blakeney).

Dr. Dallinger has now taken up his abode in a commodious house towards the end of a quiet and pleasant road in one of the London suburbs, in the South-East district. There, in as great quietude as is perhaps obtainable near the great city, he can pursue his studies. There two front rooms—one on the ground floor and the other on the first floor above it—have been quite remodelled and refitted (from his own designs) for use as his library and laboratory respectively. The whole of the front in each case has been made into a large bow-shaped window, so that as much light as possible can be obtained in the room. Tight-fitting sliding shutters are placed on the windows in the room above, so that (as sometimes happens) if the complete exclusion of the light of day is necessary for his work, it can be obtained. The great love of Dr. Dallinger for art is seen in the colouring, and carvings, and designs of the wood or other work, and in the beautiful little statuettes and busts and drawings which aid in giving grace and beauty to these delightful rooms.

In the library down-stairs, on a table before the window, is a superb microscope, which is in its way quite a marvel of mechanism. It can be turned with ease in any direction without disturbing the object under examination. This, like all his microscopes, Dr. Dallinger keeps under a glass case, while shaded paraffin lamps, in elegant brass brackets or suspended from the ceiling, diffuse a cool white light. He could not, he said, subject his instruments to gas.

A bust of Mr. Ruskin—of whom Dr. Dallinger is a personal friend and (as an art critic) a warm admirer—stands before the books on the left. He is also the happy and fortunate possessor of a complete set of first editions of Mr. Ruskin's works, and he has also a choice collection of selected editions of the British poets and of Professor Max Müller's editions of "Sacred Books of the East." In the large and handsome sets of book-shelves which line the greater part of two of the sides of the library are placed the volumes which apply to poetry, philosophy, art, and theology, while up-stairs in the laboratory is a most complete collection of English works on microscopy and those dealing with his scientific labours.

Dr. Dallinger has twelve first-class microscopes, all of which are more or less in constant use. Some of them are placed on low tables of their own in a line along the laboratory, each with an easily and ingeniously removable glass shade over it, a chair (made to admit of considerable changes in height, like a music-stool) near it, and a slab of glass forms the top of the table in front of each microscope. Glass was chosen because it can be easily cleaned. To give some idea of the perfection of the arrangements, we may say that parts of the tables on which the microscopes stand can be removed or replaced without disturbing the instrument in the least, so that the operator can sit down to it at any time, and, by removing the parts of the table on either side, can have complete command of his microscope at once. A large semicircular table, which permits the operator to sit at it with the table all round him, and which is carefully fitted with drawers, is used for special kinds of work, and stands in the window. On the right, as one looks to the window, is a well-appointed sink and apparatus for dissections, etc. There is here a most beautiful instrument for obtaining very minute sections of any object to be examined by the microscope. The wall is lined with encaustic tiles of Dr. Dallinger's own design, representing Music and Science and Art, and executed in beautifully toned colours; also bearing, as a motto, Wordsworth's line—

'To the solid ground of Nature trusts the mind that builds for aye."

As may be supposed, Dr. Dallinger makes frequent references to the works of nature in his sermons. In preparing them, he relies but little upon commentaries or upon expositions. In each sermon he aims always at the development of a theme or idea, and endeavours to thoroughly work it out and carry it home to his hearers. In doing this he has found his resources from a knowledge of nature provide a rich and attractive method of illustration.

Dr. Dallinger writes his sermons out first in full; then he prepares special and ample pulpit notes. These he can use with great ease, but in fact he frequently does not use them, his sermons being often delivered almost extempore. But this complete preparation for the pulpit he regards as an element of success. It prevents discursiveness, and gives terseness and closeness to the speech. Generally a sermon occupies him a couple of days to think out and prepare, sometimes longer, according to the nature of the subject. He decidedly advises the study of elocution, but it should be directed to the most absolute naturalness and avoidance of mannerism. For effectiveness there is nothing that will compare with a deep sympathy with the subject and earnestness in proclaiming it.

When in Liverpool, Dr. Dallinger's ministry was attended by an increasing interest, which reached far beyond his own denomination, and again at Sheffield the same thing occurred. Here boys and young men formed a large part of his congregation, and some of his subjects were Christian manliness and the importance of purity of motive. He has felt the importance of dealing with great moral principles, and carrying them home to the common life of men, seeking rather to teach them the spirit in which all work should be done and the responsibilities of life discharged, than to bind them with a network of rules.

In preaching to and dealing with boys, he has especially found frankness and sympathy to be of great service. He would put before them frankly the possible dignity and greatness of the human mind, and the immense responsibility attaching to our moral nature. He would claim in the name of religion the enjoyment of all that it is possible for us, with nobility of spirit, to enjoy. One of his characteristic sayings is, "No man can ever be noble who thinks meanly or contemptuously of himself, and no man can ever be noble who thinks first and only of himself." High aims and a manly self-reliance, with confidence in God—these are the elements, he thinks, which, if taught boys and youths in a plain and earnest manner, with pertinent illustration from nature, are sure to arrest their minds and awaken their consciences; and he makes a point of appealing to the intellect and reasoning powers, as well as to the moral and religious nature.

One very remarkable illustration of the great confidence reposed in Dr. Dallinger is that he yearly receives a very large and increasing number of letters from men of varied social positions, including those at the Universities, who are manifestly anxious to be helped to believe. These letters Dr. Dallinger most industriously and scrupulously answers, and frequently receives replies thanking him, and telling him of the good effected by his letters. Dr. Dallinger has also had exceptional opportunities of coming into contact with intelligent working men, and he believes that men are much more disturbed as to whether the foundations of faith are being shaken than they are by any voluntary desire to yield to unfaith or agnosticism. It is the duty of ministers to concern themselves anxiously with the difficulties of the times, and acquaint themselves with the forms in which those difficulties may come. "There is," said Dr. Dallinger, "an immense amount of growing intelligence among the working men of this country, and to enable them to remain in enlightened association with the Christian Church is one of the highest ends to be sought by any ministry." And he is decidedly of opinion that no young minister is properly furnished nowadays for the ministry unless he have a general comprehension of the principles, and have mastered the spirit, of modern science, so that science can be pressed into the service of religion.

Rightly understood, therefore, physical science is not the opponent, but the loving handmaid, of real religion. Time was when they were supposed by some persons to be antagonistic, but that era is fast passing away. And it is largely owing to the efforts of men like Dr. Dallinger that this happy result has been obtained.

A CALL BY THE UNKNOWN TO THE UNKNOWN.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., MORNING LECTURER AT ALL SAINTS' AND ST. AUGUSTINE'S, SOUTH LAMBETH.

"And He saith, Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men."—St. Matt. iv. 19.

I.

THE call of St. Andrew, received by the shore of the Sea of Galilee, was by the Unknown; yet not altogether by such; more correctly speaking, we must say, by the only partially Known. As regards what he was called to, it was not the wholly unknown; for Andrew had had some previous knowledge of Jesus. He had been a disciple of John the Baptist, and had heard him say, "Behold the Lamb of God!" To him that saying must have been highly enigmatical, but it made him follow Jesus; and, at Christ's invitation, he spent some time with Him, and no doubt heard much from Him, for "he findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messias!" But to Andrew this was a very partial knowledge of the Christ; it could be only that of a Messiah according to the Jewish conception; he, in common with the rest, looked, in his after apostleship, for great earthly things.

Those mysterious words, "Behold the Lamb of God!" might, indeed, have now and again awakened in him a wondering thought; perhaps some of what Christ said to him that night might have done the same; but Andrew had no revelation of Christ as the Messiah that really was to be.

Nor could he have gathered any from the call. No explanation was given; no previous conversation took place. Jesus must have been to Andrew and Peter, when He gave them that call so suddenly and abruptly by the Sea of Galilee, to a great extent "the Unknown"; and all that He advances is a personal claim, and all that He promises is a new position, of which they could from their present position have the merest glimpse of what it might be—and they responded to the call of the "Unknown."

Here, to a certain extent, we must part company with Andrew and Peter; for the call of Christ can never be to us—looked at from its intellectual side—such a call from an "Unknown One" as it was to them. To us, the whole fields of the Gospels, and Revelation, lie open with their manifestations. We have been taught from our very infancy Who Jesus was and is; and yet every first call, and many of our after calls, by Christ come to us—be it more or less so, yet really—from the practically "Unknown."

And yet it is true that to many a sinner amongst us, born and bred in ignorance of everything except the bare name of Jesus; to many—to all heathen—Christ comes in the first call as wholly the Unknown. To the most enlightened amongst us (even to St. Paul, who said, "I know in Whom I have believed"), so partial is our knowledge, that, when Christ speaks to us, it is partially as the Unknown; and as such, wholly, must the sinner, in the first call, listen to and obey Him; as such, partially, must we listen and obey also.

Look at the sinner in his first call. Christ comes to him as a primary revelation. His views might be as dim as St. Paul's, when, as Saul of Tarsus, he said, "Who art Thou, Lord?"—as the penitent thief's—as the London slum-dweller's who "never heard of the gentleman," and asked, "Who might he be?" But we must not shrink from presenting to the sinner "the Unknown;" we must not fear that, as "the Unknown," there will be no prospect of His being received; it is Christ's own way, and it must be ours.

And so is it with the heathen. There are those who would educate the heathen up to Christianity; but mere education will never make a man desire Christ. The Chinese are perhaps the most highly educated people in the world, in their own literature; the Hindoos are subtle to excess in their own philosophy; we also have our philosophical schools, and, I suppose, are destined to be highly educated too—but all this can exist with no felt soul-need of Christ. In no country is infidelity more rife than in Germany—perhaps the really best-educated country in the world; but a mere historic Christ (which is all that education can tell of), looked at from His secular side, will always be one unknown when presented to the soul's eye first of all, and when the call comes to a man to become a disciple of this Christ.

And to ourselves—who, I hope, know something of Christ—will come calls which will be from our own Lord indeed, yet from Him as only partially Known. For "now" indeed, as the Apostle says, "do we only know in part." And herein lies a continual trial of our faith; and so, herein, lies a continual glorifying of Christ. A call responded to by the Sea of Galilee—the call of a world-unacknowledged Christ, of a partially known Messias—is more honouring to God than a call responded to, when made to a fulness of knowledge, and in fulness of light. The response of Andrew is greater than that of Saul. Of this last Apostle, as Paul, we hear much; of Andrew, but little; yet it seems to me that the unquestioning response by the Sea of Galilee is more than the terrified cry on the way to Damascus.

The Christian life is full of after-calls of Christ; and in many of them he is to us but partially—only very partially—known. For all Christian life, like all national life, is progressive in development, and in what calls out development too. The exercises of the man are different from those of the child; as his mind and his muscles expand, they have new calls made upon them, and by these calls they grow.

The Christian is exercised in the direction of which I am speaking now. He has to believe and to act with nothing but the voice of Christ to guide him, and but little information vouchsafed to him.

"What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter," must be his comfort and his stay. Like Philip, all that he hears may be a voice to "go down to the place which is desert;" but in obedience, he—even as Philip did, and as Andrew and Peter did—will find the blessing.

In these calls upon us to do this and that at the voice of Christ, you will often have to act simply in the power of obedience and faith. It was so with Andrew and Peter; it is so with all Missionaries; it is so with all Christians—with you. If you were to ask me what passed between these disciples and Christ which made them so willing to obey His call, which made them take up with so strange a notion as that they should be "fishers of men." I answer you, "I cannot tell." If you are asked, "Why have you given yourself to Christ?" I hope you will, while, as the Apostle says, being "able to give a reason for the hope that is within you," still say, "I cannot tell. True! I have heard of my need, and of His grace; but so I had long before I thought of giving myself to Him." Ah! the secret is the drawings of the Holy Ghost, both on those Apostles and on you.

But there is one thing which you must mark, for it is of great importance. There was here a bringing together of intense personalities; and wherever there is this there must be power. "I will make you." He was to make them something of which they had never heard before; something which was to be better than what they had ever been yet. But there is no intervening process announced. I do not say that such intervening processes were not to exist, and did not afterwards develop; there were to be many teachings of their Lord before they could become able fishers of men: Andrew, e.g., had a teaching, and that with the very fishes with which he was so familiar. "One of his disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto Him, There is a lad here, which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes: but what are they among so many? And Jesus said, Make the men sit down." Then, with those loaves and fishes, He fed the multitude. That was a teaching!—and an unlearned one, as you read in St. Matt. xvi. 9: "Do ye not yet understand, neither remember, the five loaves of the five thousand, and how many baskets ye took up?" But, here, all that there was, was the bringing together of the "I" and the "you."

Yes! all after-processes will come in God's good time and way; what we have to do with is the personality of Christ, and our own—to hear Him saying, "I"—to hear Him saying it to "me"; He promising and commanding, I believing and obeying—that is all. And the missionary who can go forth with, if it need be, nothing but the bringing together of these close personalities, will go forth with power, and will be made a "fisher of men."

There may be much needed to make him a successful one: experiences, discipline, providences, disappointments; but all these may be left to the One Who has promised. What is needed to outfit the fisherman, and to fit him for his work, will come from Him Whose work it is. There will be a developed revelation all round—of Christ, of the work to be done, of the way in which we are to do it, whatever our work may be.

But let us turn for a moment to ourselves. How is Christ, and how must Christ be to us (in varying degrees, perhaps, but still in some degree at least) partially "the Unknown"?

It is not the believer here to-day who will challenge me on this subject, and say that he knows Christ well enough. The more we advance in the divine life, and the more we know of Christ, the more we know that there is ever so much beyond us which we do not know. Well might the Apostle say, "We know in part." Well might the Apostle cry out, "That I may know Him!" Little did we know of the extent of His love when He called us; little do we know of it now, little of His wisdom, little of His authority—all these have to unfold, and they will unfold; but at first it is simply Christ calls, and we obey.

And, indeed, it requires faith; faith all round, faith in the "I," faith in the "you," faith in the "make," faith to believe that there is something very good that we shall be made—something quite beyond ourselves, as was the case with the Apostles, when it was promised that they should be made "fishers of men;" and they believed the word.

The right study of this verse would half furnish a missionary for His work. If he could grasp it—live it out—it would make him a man of wisdom and of power. And it will do much for you. The "Unknown," in the One Who calls you, will not hinder you in your obedience to any call—however, wherever, and to whatsoever it may come.

II.

But next:—We have to think for a moment or two upon this as a call to the Unknown.

It was so in every aspect. "Follow Me!" Whither? It was all unknown. To what? To be fishers of men; this calling was all unknown. How were they to be so made? That, too, was of necessity unknown; and not a word of explanation was then vouchsafed.

But we know, to some extent at least, what is meant by being a "fisher of men." It was a call from the lower to the higher. And such is every call of Christ, and every such call involves "the unknown." Christ can give no call other than this. He cannot call from the higher to the lower. He may indeed appear to humble us by some position which He calls us to take up; but that is only as a means to an end. He is ever moving His people up higher. There is an abundance of revelations where there is the thorn in the flesh. What happened to Andrew and Peter happens to us. It is the law of progression in the spiritual life. Christ "putteth forth His own sheep, and goeth before them; but they often know not whither: all they know is that He is going on before. He speaks to us, and there is a demand made upon our faith, and our faith in Him. But remember that it involves obedience—that is all that is required of us; all else has to be left to Him. I wish we realised this—it would be a great help to us. For we are continually troubling ourselves about what we have no concern with, how things are to be done, how things will turn out. And we may—and we do—fret ourselves immensely on these points, and nothing comes of it after all. Let us just go back to simple obedience; that, at least, is easily understood. Our Lord's words might well again be spoken to us—"What is that to thee; follow thou Me." The way of the work, the measure and nature of the reward—everything—leave it all; as Andrew and Peter did, who simply heard a call, and rose and followed Christ.

But let me comfort you concerning one thing in the midst of these—it may be—somewhat hard demands upon your faith. Remember that there is a great difference between the "unknown" and the "Unknowable." The "Unknowable" is the name which some philosophers of the present day give to God; though, as Agnostics, they cannot say whether there be a God at all.

You need only take down your concordance to see the numbers of texts which speak of man's knowing God, to show you that in part He can be known, even as in part He cannot.

With the Unknowable in God we have nothing now to do. I make no doubt that much of this will be revealed when our present faculties are exalted, and our present affections purified, and, it may be, new capacities added to our nature. But all this I can afford to leave. It is enough for me that with the "Unknown" is the "Known," and that the "Known" is so good that it tells me that nothing but real good can be in the "Unknown."

The hints—the partial revelations of the present—might be the key to the future. These Apostles here had a dim revealing hint of what was to be, even in the enigmatical terms of their call. They were "fishers." They knew what that meant—labour, human uncertainty, lowly occupation, great toil, and gain, the winning of the fish from the waste of water; these gave them a hint when it was said that they should be made "fishers of men." They were put on a track of thought which nothing but after-experience could unfold.

Obedience is always followed by development on Christ's part.

God give us grace not to fear any calls to the "Unknown," whether they be in life or death. There are solemnities of the "Unknown" in each. There is that in each which nothing but a bringing of Christ and ourselves together—close together—with nothing between, will enable us to be comforted in, or to go forward as Abraham did, not knowing whither he went—yet in assurance and in peace.

Only be sure you hear the words, "Follow Me;" only be sure that He is on before; only be sure of some good "I will" of promise; only have—even if it be but dim—yet some expectation of great destiny.

Then the two simple lines of the hymn now so often sung will sum up all your outlook for time and for eternity, and all your reason for obedience and for faith—

> "Peace! perfect peace! the future all unknown—
> Jesus we know, and He is on the throne."

And now take one teaching, and that direct from the Gospel which records the call.

You will observe that the first call of the first Apostles contained within it prophetic elements of expansion. Andrew and Peter were called; but it was not for themselves alone—"Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men."

A like word came to Andrew's companion, Peter, farther on—"When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren." A like word came to them all—"Freely ye have received, freely give." These all are only exemplifications of a great law, that "No man liveth to himself."

Accept, reader, the teachings which come to you through the Apostle St. Andrew. Accept all the teachings which God the Holy Ghost may give you direct on this subject, and those which, I trust, He has sent to you in these words. They will help you in hard passes of spiritual calls and temporal too, and God knows these are hard at times. They will comfort you, they will strengthen you, they will elevate you, they will make you live for others as well as for yourself, and, if only you have ears to hear, and a heart to understand, and a will to obey them, there is not one amongst my readers to whom, in some form or another, Jesus does not say to-day—

"Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men."

"He contented himself with stretching out his hands in a mute gesture of blessing."—p. 362.

'TO THE LIONS!'

A TALE OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS. BY THE REV. PROFESSOR CHURCH, M.A.

CHAPTER XI.—A MARTYR'S TESTIMONY.

"He contented himself with stretching out his hands in a mute gesture of blessing."—p. 362.

THE young Lucilius was still hovering between life and death when the long-expected answer from the Emperor arrived at Nicæa. It was exactly the document that anyone acquainted with the character of Trajan might have expected. Above all things he was a soldier, and had a soldier's regard for discipline and obedience. Where these were concerned he was inflexible.

Certain forms of worship were sanctioned by the State; all others were forbidden. Anyone who adhered to these forbidden rites and refused, when called upon, to abandon them, was breaking down the established order of things, and must be punished. He might believe what he liked in his own heart—with belief the State had nothing to do—but in practice he must conform to certain rules. Refusal was an act of rebellion; the thing might be the merest trifle in itself, but the principle concerned was at the foundation of all order.

The practical application was perfectly simple. Those who had acknowledged themselves to be Christians, and persisted in the acknowledgment, were to be punished. But the offence was of such a kind that every loophole should be left by which the accused might escape, so long as the principle remained unimpaired. These were not a set of criminals whom it would be desirable to bring into the grasp of the law, by stopping every way of escape. On the contrary, ways of escape must be made easy and multiplied for them. The simple denial of anyone that he belonged to the society of Christians was to be accepted. There was to be no question about the time to which the denial referred, so that it at least referred to the present. If a man affirmed, "I have ceased to be a Christian," there was to be no curious inquiry as to when his withdrawal took place.

But the most practically important direction in the Emperor's rescript referred to the anonymous informations. All proceedings founded on them were to be annulled. Roman law took no cognisance of such things; and persons accused under them were to be treated as if their names had never come before the court. The immediate result of this order was a release of a number of prisoners. Of the two Roman citizens who had appealed to Cæsar, one—the Elder, Anicetus—was sent back into the province. The Emperor had heard his cause, and condemned him. The Governor was to deal with him on the spot, where the spectacle of his punishment might act as a salutary deterrent to his followers. The old knight, Antistius, by a merciful ordering of Providence, had passed beyond the reach of his judges. On the morning of the day on which he was to appear before the tribunal of Cæsar he had been found dead in his bed.

The Governor's first duty, on the reassembling of the court, was to deal with the prisoner who had been thus remitted to him. The Elder was placed before the tribunal, and the Governor addressed him:—

"Anicetus, or (as I should rather call you by the Roman name which, however unworthily, you bear) Lucius Cornelius: the Emperor, having heard you on your appeal and confirmed the sentence which was here passed upon you, has remitted you to my jurisdiction, thinking it well that you should suffer the penalty of your misdeeds in the same place wherein you have committed them. I should do no wrong were I, without further parley, to hand you over to the executioner. Nevertheless, I am persuaded that, in the great clemency of our gracious lord and Emperor, Trajan Augustus, he will approve my offering you yet another opportunity of repentance. Are you willing to renounce, now, at the last moment, this odious superstition which you have been convicted of holding, against the laws of the Senate and People of Rome?"

"For your clemency," said the Elder in reply, "I heartily thank both Trajan Augustus and yourself, most excellent Plinius. Yet, were I to accept it on the conditions which you offer, I should be casting away that which, for my whole life, I have held most precious. That which you call an odious superstition I do verily believe to be a truth worthy of all love and honour. The laws of the Senate and People of Rome I have ever most scrupulously obeyed, and to the Emperor I have ever been faithful and loyal. But there are laws to which I am yet more bound, and a Master whom I must prefer even to Augustus himself. But these things you have heard already, nor is there any need that I should repeat them. Let me not waste your time any further, nor do you delay to give me that which I hold to be more precious than all other things—the crown of martyrdom."

The executioner was summoned into court, and took his place in front of the tribunal. The Governor then pronounced his formal sentence:—

"In virtue of the power of life and death specially delegated to me in the case of the citizen Lucius Cornelius (commonly called Anicetus) by our Lord Trajan Augustus, I hereby hand over to you the body of the said Lucius Cornelius. Take him to the third milestone on the road to Nicomedia, and there strike off his head with the axe. In consideration of his blameless life, I grant to him, as a special favour, that he be neither blindfolded nor bound. Of this sentence let there be immediate execution, of which execution I require that testimony be given me before sunset this day."

The court was adjourned till the next day, when the remainder of the prisoners would be dealt with. An interval of two hours was conceded to the condemned man. This the Governor's humanity permitted him to spend with his fellow-prisoners.

Of earthly ties he had none. His wife—for in those days it was held a duty, as the Eastern Church still holds it, for a Christian minister to be a husband—had entered into her rest some two years before. His marriage had been childless, and his brothers and sisters had predeceased him. Hence he could give up the time that had been allowed him to comforting and strengthening his brethren and sisters in the faith.

To Cleon, the young Phrygian slave who had fallen, and so manfully recovered his fall, he was especially tender. The unhappy youth was overwhelmed with shame and remorse.

"I have denied Him! I have denied Him!" he would go on repeating day after day, from morning till evening, and nothing that his fellow-prisoners could urge seemed to give him any comfort.

Anicetus was one of those who were accustomed to express somewhat stern views about the sin of the lapsi (those who fell away), but this was not a case in which he could insist on them. He even felt that to do so might be to place a fatal stumbling-block in the way of an imperilled soul. If this poor wretch was left in this despairing mood, he might even fall into the more deadly sin from which he had once been rescued.

"My son," were his parting words to the unhappy Cleon, "my son, listen to me, not only as to him whom God has entrusted with the charge of your soul, but as one to whom He has given the great privilege of witnessing for His truth in this place. You have sinned, but God has forgiven you, even as He forgave the blessed Peter. God pardon you; I pardon you in the name of the brethren."

He laid his hands upon the young man's head, and pronounced the solemn words of forgiveness. That finished, he gave him the kiss of peace, and so took the fallen back into the brotherhood of Christ.

We shall not have occasion to speak of the young slave again. Let it be sufficient to say that he suffered the next day the cruel death of crucifixion with an exemplary courage and patience. His agony, however, was not protracted as long as it was in the case of some sufferers, for the Governor, who had been struck with the real heroism with which he had struggled against the weakness of a timorous nature, gave instructions to the centurion in charge that death should be hastened with a spear-thrust.

To return to Anicetus. His solemn declaration of forgiveness to the penitent Phrygian was but just spoken when the presence of the executioner was announced.

"I am ready," he said to the apparitor who summoned him. Then turning to his fellow-prisoners, he stretched out his hands, "The blessing of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost be upon you. Pray for me, and for yourselves, that we may be faithful and steadfast to the end. So shall we be together in Paradise."

The procession of death moved through the city. In front was a guard of half a century of soldiers. They were armed with swords only, and wore no armour beyond their helmets. Then came the executioner, carrying his axe with the edge turned towards the condemned man, who had also a soldier fully armed on either side. The remainder of the century marched behind him. A vast concourse of all ages followed. No man was better known to the poor of the city of Nicæa, and no one certainly more beloved than Anicetus. He had fulfilled to the utmost the apostolic precept, "Do good unto all men," putting less stress, perhaps, than some of his brethren thought right, on the words that follow, "especially unto them that are of the household of faith." It was no idle curiosity, therefore, that brought this great crowd to see him die. To judge from their dress, one would have said that they came from the rabble of the city; but they followed with a silence and an order that would not have misbecome the funeral of the first citizen of the place.

At the spot appointed for the execution there was an open space of about an acre in extent. The milestone stood where four roads met, and close to it, as marking where the territory of Nicæa touched that of a neighbouring township, stood one of the statues of the god Terminus, the boundary-marker, a roughly hewn pedestal of granite, surmounted with a human bust of the rudest shaping. In old time it had been an object of reverence, and had been daily adorned with fresh garlands of flowers or evergreens, according as the season served. Two or three of these still hung from it, but they were dry and withered, and the decaying fragments of others, which no one had taken the pains to clear away, lay at the base of the pedestal; while the pedestal itself had long leaned somewhat out of the perpendicular. It was a type of the neglect into which the old worship was everywhere falling. Possibly this was the motive that made the Governor choose the spot as the place of execution.

The block was placed close to the pedestal. The soldiers drew a cordon round it, but as the ground rose somewhat on all sides, this did not shut out the view from the crowd which thronged the whole of the open space. The centurion in command had forbidden the condemned man to address the spectators, and Anicetus, always obedient to lawful commands, so that they did not trench on higher duties, did not attempt to speak. He contented himself with stretching out his hands in a mute gesture of blessing. Many of those who could see him bowed their heads in reverence, and, dangerous as it was to show anything like sympathy with the faith of the sufferer, some even fell upon their knees. All kept a silence which was almost terrible in its depth and intensity. Then, after a pause, which seemed to the strained attention of the crowd to last for hours, the executioner raised his axe and struck. It was a strong and skilful blow, nor was there any need to repeat it. The head of the martyr fell upon the ground, and the blood, spouting out in a torrent, drenched the pedestal of the god.

And then followed one of those strange occurrences which we may or may not call miracles, but which are certainly signs; so full are they of meaning, and not the less truly signs because they come from causes strictly natural. The statue of the boundary-god had been leaning, as has been said, for some time out of the perpendicular, and the piety of the two townships, whose borders it marked, had not been active enough to restore it. Anyone might have known that but a little impulse would be sufficient to overthrow it; and this impulse was given by the slight shock of an earthquake at the very moment when the martyr's blood spurted on the pedestal. The half-suppressed groan which had followed when the headsman's axe was seen or heard to fall was checked; first, by the sensation of terror as the spectators felt the ground reel, as it were, under their feet, and then by awe as the statue of the god was observed first to totter and then to fall.

No one in all that great assembly was so dull as not to read something of the future when this ancient landmark—symbol as it was held to be of all that was most stable—was removed, as it were, from its place by the touch of the martyr's blood. If the champions of the old faith had thought to advance their cause by that day's spectacle, they had signally failed. The "senseless earth," as the philosophers called it, had seemed to speak against them, and its voice had found its way into many hearts. Seldom has the saying been proved more true than it was that day, that "the blood of martyrs is the seed of the Church."

It was an incidental result of this strange event that the friends of Anicetus were allowed, without hindrance, to take possession of his remains. Commonly the authorities took care to dispose of them otherwise. In the consternation that followed the fall of the statue this care was forgotten, and the Elder's body was quietly removed, and accorded Christian burial.

CHAPTER XII.—A DISCOVERY.

"THE mills of God," says an old writer, "grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small;" and Lucilius was beginning to find out this truth for himself. Again and again he bitterly reproached himself for lending his help to the conspiracy which had been hatched in the wine-shop of Theron. So far, none of the gains that he had expected to flow in from the confiscated estates had reached his coffers. Antistius, who was a really wealthy man, had died (as has been said) in Rome, and it was a doubtful point who would benefit by his property. Would it go where the appeal had been decided—that is, in the Capitol—or where he had been condemned in the first instance? The provincial claimant might have the better right in law, but Lucilius knew perfectly well that when such rights came into collision with the demands of the Imperial purse, they were pretty sure to go to the wall. Anicetus had been far too generous in his lifetime to leave anything behind him after his death. Most of the richer among the accused had saved their properties as well as their lives by denying their faith. In short, the speculation, so far, had been a failure.

On the other hand, the prospect at home grew darker and darker. Whatever feeling his long-indulged habit of avarice had left him was centred in his son, and this son's life was trembling in the balance. At first it had seemed a lucky chance that brought the two sisters to his house. They had kept the boy alive. Latterly, Rhoda's increasing weakness had compelled her to give up her share in the nursing, and Cleoné had assumed the whole.

She was simply indispensable to the boy. It was from her hand only that he would take food or drink. When his delirium was at its worst, it was her hand that soothed and quieted him. But if she had to leave him, it would have been better that she had never come.

The old physician was furious at the thought. All his cases interested him deeply, but in this he was especially wrapt up. Never had he fought against disease more pertinaciously and more skilfully, and never had he been more ably helped by the physician's best ally, a good nurse. It was simply maddening to him to have this assistance removed, for the loss meant defeat. He cursed with impartial rage everyone concerned in the matter: the busybodies who had stirred up the movement against the Christians; the foolish obstinacy—for so he described it—which made these people cling to their absurd superstition.

But nothing could be done. The Emperor's commands had to be executed, and all persons who had confessed their adherence to the Christian faith would have to be dealt with according to law. Among these were the two sisters. A formal demand was made by the officials upon Lucilius for their surrender, and he had no alternative but to submit. They were included in the company of prisoners arraigned before the Governor's tribunal on the day that followed the execution of Anicetus. Lucilius was among the crowd of spectators which thronged the court-house, and awaited the result with feelings of despair.

Nothing could save the sisters. He knew them too well to have the least hope that they would renounce their faith to save their lives. A vague suggestion to that effect on which he had once ventured during the time of their sojourn in his house, had been received by Cleoné with a scorn that brought conviction to his mind. Their condemnation, then, was certain.

Hard-hearted as he was, he could not contemplate this result with indifference. They had lived in his house for some weeks. Their grace and goodness, seen in the close intercourse of family life, had touched him as he had never dreamt of being touched, and he shuddered at the thought of their being handed over to the shame and torture of the slave's death.

And then there was the thought of his son. Even if he were to battle through the disease without the help of his nurse, what would be the result when he heard, as hear he must, of the horrible fate which had overtaken her? The wretched man groaned aloud when he thought of what the future had in store for him.

"He stood nervously shifting his cap from one hand to the other."—p. 366.

He was roused from the stupor of despair into which he had fallen by the voice of the court-crier calling aloud the names of Rhoda and Cleoné. Rhoda was described as an ancilla, i.e., a female slave, and as a deaconess attached to a certain unlawful society which called itself by the name of Christus. Cleoné was also described as being of servile condition.

When the clerk of the court had finished reading what we may call the indictment, the Governor addressed the prisoners. "The clemency of our most gracious lord and master, Trajan Augustus, has ordered that even for the most obstinate offenders there should be provided a place of repentance, if only, even at the last moment, they will submit themselves to lawful authority, and renounce their obstinate adherence to a mischievous superstition. Therefore I call upon you, Rhoda, for the last time. Are you willing to burn incense to the statue of the divine Trajan, and to curse this Christus, whom you superstitiously and rebelliously have honoured as a God?"

Rhoda had remained seated during the proceedings. Her weakness did not permit her to stand with the rest of the prisoners. She now rose, and confronted the Governor. Fear she had never known; and, for the moment, her bodily strength seemed to have been restored to her.

"I thank the Emperor," she said, in a voice which never faltered for a moment, "for the clemency which he offers, though I cannot but refuse the conditions. For him, as our ruler appointed by God, I pray all blessings; and especially light, that he may discern the truth. Such honour as a man may receive, I willingly pay; more I refuse; for it is written, 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve.' That I should blaspheme my Lord and Saviour is a thing too monstrous to be thought, much more spoken."

"What say you, Cleoné?" went on the Governor, addressing himself to the other sister.

"I am of one mind with my sister. I will not worship a man; neither will I blaspheme my God."

"Rhoda and Cleoné," said the Governor, "are condemned to suffer the punishment of death in such manner as is customary with those of servile condition."

At this moment a commotion was heard at the back of the court. The young Greek, Clitus, whose acquaintance we have already made in his character as Cleoné's suitor, made his way with difficulty through the crowd that besieged the door into the body of the chamber. He had just arrived in Nicæa, and his dress bore the marks of travel.

"My lord," he said, addressing the Governor, "is it permitted me to speak on a matter of urgency, which concerns the administration of justice in this matter, and especially the case of the two prisoners Rhoda and Cleoné?"

Rhoda, who had sunk again into her seat, seemed not to notice this interruption of the proceedings. But Cleoné turned an eager look upon the speaker. She had never seen or even heard of the young Greek since the day on which they had spoken together among the vines. She had striven to school herself into the persuasion that it was well that it should be so. He had spoken of love in days past, it was true, but all was now changed. He was a citizen of Rome, and had it not been proved that she was a slave? In any case, there was henceforth a hopeless separation between them. And then, what had she, a condemned woman, to do with thoughts of love? No, it was well that he had not attempted to hold any communication with her. It was only what prudence, and even duty, dictated—that he should keep aloof. So she had thought, or tried to think. Nevertheless, her heart gave a glad bound when she knew that, after all, he had not forgotten her; and the exalted look on her face, which showed how she had braced herself up to confess and suffer, changed to a softer and more tender expression as she listened to what he said.

"Speak on," said the Governor, "if you have anything of importance to engage the ear of the court."

The young Greek proceeded. "Your excellency is aware that the two women Rhoda and Cleoné, hitherto reputed daughters of one Bion and Rhoda his wife, were adjudged to be of servile condition on testimony by which it was proved that they were not in truth daughters of the said Bion, but were castaway children, adopted by him and his wife.

"I have now to bring under your excellency's notice the terms of an Imperial rescript quoted by yourself in this court last December, as settling a certain question concerning the condition of exposed children submitted by you to the Emperor. These terms were in substance as follows—your Excellency will correct me if I am wrong, but I took them down in writing at the time, as seeming to me to be of great importance:—'If it should be proved that children so exposed were born of free parents, their free condition shall not be held to have been impaired by such exposure.' This, my lord, is exactly what I am now prepared to prove of the two women Rhoda and Cleoné. And first I will, with your permission, produce the witness on whose testimony I chiefly rely, though indeed it can easily be confirmed by other evidence."

"Inform the court of the name and condition of this witness. But it will promote the ends of justice if you will first inform us of your own proceedings in this case, and of how you were led to believe that our adjudication needed to be corrected."

"My lord," began the young advocate, "it must have occurred to you and to others who were present on the first day of trial, as certainly it occurred to me, that nature had committed, if I may so speak, a strange freak when she ordered that maidens of an appearance so noble, so worthy of freedom, should be born of slaves."

"The thought was not unreasonable," said the Governor; "but such eccentricities are not unknown, and the evidence seemed to support the presumption."

"Further, my lord, I was aware that this nobility was not of appearance only, but of mind also and disposition, for I had been admitted into the home of Bion, the reputed father of the two, and know that none could be more worthy of respect and love."

Cleoné cast down her eyes, blushing to hear these praises from her lover's lips.

"But I will leave suppositions, my lord, and proceed to facts. I gathered from the evidence that there was a secret connected with the birth of these two children—that the only person who had been known to be cognisant of this secret was a certain nurse, and that this person was now deceased. It was also proved that, when about to die, she had refused to communicate the knowledge that she evidently possessed. The only hope that seemed to me to remain was, if I could discover that there had been some other person who had shared, or might be supposed likely to have shared, in this knowledge. I made many inquiries for such a person, and for a long time could hear of none. Her husband had been long dead. She had left no children behind her. But at last I heard from a woman of the same age, who is yet alive, that she had a brother who followed the occupation of a shepherd. All that I could learn about him was that he had suddenly disappeared from this neighbourhood; that some supposed that he had been drowned, but others doubted, seeing that his body had never been found. Here, then, my inquiries seemed to have an end.

But now, my lord, listen to what followed. Your excellency sent me on business, wholly unconnected with this matter, to a certain village on the borders of Phrygia. It was finished sooner than I had expected, and as I could not return till my horse had had a day's rest, I had some time to spare. I spent it in wandering about the downs which are above the village, and in the course of my walks I fell in with an old shepherd. The man interested me with his talk, which touched upon more things than such a man commonly knows. He happened to let fall something, from which I gathered that he knew this town. When I asked him a question about it, he seemed unwilling to speak. I pressed him. Something seemed to warn me that by chance, if there is such a thing as chance, I had found the man whom I wanted."

"He fell swooning upon the floor."—p. 368.

"You are a student," interrupted the Governor, "and you know doubtless how one of your historians speaks of an 'inspired chance.' It was that, if I remember right, which made the baby Cypselus smile in the face of the men who came to murder him. Chance, I take it, is an ordering of things which we do not understand, and we may well call it inspired. But go on."

"Well, my lord, as I said, I pressed him, and he told me that he knew this town well. And then he gave me the story of how he came to leave it. But as this story bears directly upon the matter in hand, I would suggest, with your permission, that you should hear it from the man's own lips."

The witness, who had been waiting outside in the charge of one of the officers of the court, was called in. His face, curiously seamed with lines and wrinkles beyond all counting, indicated an extreme old age; but it was an age that was still vigorous and green. His blue eyes were bright and piercing. His hair was abundant, and showed amidst the prevailing grey much of the auburn which had been its colour in the days of his prime. His tall figure was but little bowed by years; and his broad shoulders, and sinewy arms (the right of them left bare by his one-sleeved tunic) showed that he might still be a match for many a younger man.

It was evident that the scene into which he had been brought was wholly strange to him, and that he was not at all at his ease. He had stood nervously shifting his red Phrygian cap from one hand to another, while his eyes roved restlessly over the crowded court.

"Tell us your name," said the Governor.

"My lord," said the man, in Greek, "let me first implore your protection." The refinement of his voice and accent contrasted curiously with his uncultured look. In garb he was a rustic of the rustics; but it might be seen that he had once been a dweller in cities.

"You can speak without fear," said the Governor.

"I shall have to say that which may be brought up against myself. It concerns years long past; but if the man against whom I offended still lives, he is not one of those who forgive."

"No one shall harm you if you will speak the truth. I promise it by the majesty of Augustus."

"More than twenty years ago I was steward in the household of a certain merchant in Nicæa."

"What was his name?" asked the Governor.

"With your permission, I will reserve this to the end of the story which I have to relate. I was a slave, but I had been well taught, and he trusted me with much of his business. I kept his accounts, and I knew much of his affairs. He was, at the time of which I speak, a man of about forty years of age. Five years before, he had married the only daughter of the merchant Lycophron of Nicomedia. Lycophron was reputed to be rich, and my master, who was very greedy after money, expected to inherit much wealth from him.

"Lycophron had given but a very small portion to his daughter on her marriage. This was a grievance with my master; but he hoped to have it made up to him. I have heard the two talking about it—they always spoke openly before me. 'Never mind,' the old man would say; 'there will be the more when you come to unseal the tablets,* and by that time you will know how to use it and keep it better.' This was a joke of the old man's, for no man could make more of money, or cared less for spending it, than my master.

"Well, at the time of which I am speaking, news came that old Lycophron was dead, and my master started at once for Nicomedia. He was not very willing, for my mistress was then not very well. Three days after, he came back. He was in a furious rage, and broke out as soon as he saw me. 'Listen, Geta,' he said: 'that old villain has deceived me. He has not left so much as a single drachma behind him. His house was mortgaged; the very bed on which he died was pledged. When I came to open his will—for he had the impudence to leave a will, though there was nothing to dispose of—I found written in it—"The only possession of value that belongs to me I have already given away, to wit, my daughter Eubule. My son-in-law, who has now known for five years what a treasure he has found in her, will not be disappointed to know that I can give him nothing more." These were his very words. Yes; he palmed off his beggar's brat on me very cleverly. A treasure, indeed!'

"Just at this moment the nurse who had been attending on my mistress came into the room carrying two babies, one on each arm. Her face was wreathed in smiles, and she was so full of her own importance—as such women, I have observed, are wont to be—that she did not see what a state my master was in. 'Thank the gods, sir,' she said, 'who have given you two most beautiful daughters.'—'Curse them!' he began. By chance one of the children began to cry at the very moment, and the woman did not hear what he said. By the time she had quieted the baby he had recovered himself. He kissed the children, and went up to see his wife as soon as he was allowed to do so.

"Some days afterwards my mistress became very ill. Fever showed itself, and she became delirious. The children had to be taken from her, and brought up by a nurse. I think my master was getting reconciled to his disappointment, when, as bad luck would have it, he heard of another loss. This time it was his wife's brother had failed. He farmed some of the taxes of the province, and my master had become security for him. I heard him say to himself when he had read the letter that told him about it, 'This family will be my ruin.'

'That night, after I had been asleep about an hour, he woke me up. He looked very wild. I think his losses had half-crazed him. He was carrying a cradle, and the two babies were in it, lying head to feet, and sound asleep. 'Geta,'

* Wills were commonly written on tablets of wood.

he said, 'these children will be my ruin. If they were boys, now—but how can a beggar like me keep two girls? You must put them out on the hill.' —'Oh, master!' I said, 'not these beautiful babies!' —'It is better than strangling them,' he said.

"Well, I had scarcely a moment to think what was to be done. He looked as if he might do the poor things a mischief, so I made up my mind. 'Very well, master,' I said, 'it shall be done.'—'Their mother,' he said, 'knows nothing; perhaps never will know. Take them, and do it at once.' I got up and went out with the children. It was a stormy night, and raining in torrents. I was at my wits' end. Then a thought occurred to me. I had a sister, a nurse, living in the town; perhaps she might help me. I took the babies to her house, and told her the whole story.

"'You have come in time,' she said; 'I know of a home for the dear little beauties. It is with one of the best couples in the world, but the gods have not given them any children.'—'So be it,' I said; 'but you must swear that you will never tell where they came from.' So she took an oath, and I left them there. But I did not dare to go back to my master. I ran away, leaving my hat and shoes on the riverside, to make people think that I had been drowned. I made my way to a village in Phrygia, and took up a shepherd's business, in which I had had some experience when I was young. There I was when this young lawyer found me."

"And now tell us your master's name," said the Governor.

The whole audience listened in breathless silence for his answer.

"My master's name was Lucilius."

CHAPTER XIV.—A LETTER FROM TRAJAN.

"Is this man Lucilius in court?" asked the Governor of one of the officials.

"I saw him this morning, my lord," said the person addressed.

"Crier, call Lucilius."

The crier called the name, but there was no answer. The wretched man had listened to the evidence of the slave with growing apprehension which was soon changed into dismay. At first, indeed, he had wholly failed to recognise the man. The lapse of twenty years and more had of course made a great change in Geta's appearance. The old shepherd, tanned to an almost African hue by exposure to wind and sun, with his grizzled beard and moustache, and long, unkempt locks falling over his shoulders, and his roughly made garments of skin, was as different a figure as possible from the neat, well-dressed, closely shaven indoor servant whom Lucilius had known in time past. Still, some vague indication of the voice, as soon as the man began to speak, had troubled him; and of course little room had been left to him for doubt as soon as the man began to tell his story.

Lucilius was not so heartless but that he had often thought with regret of the two beautiful girl babies whom he had put out to die. The crime was indeed far too common in the ancient world to rouse the horror which it now excites. Indeed, it was a recognised practice. The fate of a newborn child was not considered to be fixed till the father by taking it up in his arms had signified his wish that it should be reared.

Still, the remembrance of that night's deed had troubled him. Prosperous days had soon come, and the losses which had infuriated him had been repaired. Then the grief of his wife, whom he loved with all the affection of which his nature was capable, had much troubled him. As a mere matter of domestic peace, her mourning for her lost darlings—though, as we shall see, she did not know of their actual fate—had destroyed all the comfort of his home. And for some years his home was childless. When, after an interval, a son was born, and, the mother forgot something of her grief in the care which she lavished upon him, the father was stricken by a new fear—what if this child should be taken from him by way of retribution for the hard-heartedness with which he had treated his first-born? Every ailment of infancy and childhood had made him terribly anxious; and he watched over the boy who was to carry out his ambitions with an apprehension such as the most timid of witnesses would have felt.

As the lad grew up these fears had fallen into the background. But we have seen how they had of late been revived, and, it seemed, justified. The shepherd's story made them more intense than ever, while it added a new horror. It was a hideous thought that he should have helped to doom his own daughters to torture and death; and he saw what would be the end when his son should know of it. The wretched man waited in court till he had heard enough to banish all doubt from his mind, and then hurried home, half expecting as he came near the house to hear the lamentations for the newly dead.

As a matter of fact, no change had taken place in the condition of the invalid. He had woke two or three times since the departure of Cleoné, but never so thoroughly as to become aware of her absence. He had taken mechanically from his mother's hand the nourishment offered him, and had almost instantly fallen asleep. The physician had just paid his morning visit, and was more hopeful. For the present at least the lad was doing well. But when the explanation had to be made, that was another matter altogether.

Lucilius entered the sick boy's chamber with a silent step. His wife took no notice of his coming; but when he stood fronting her on the opposite side of the bed, and she could not help seeing his face, her woman's heart was touched by its inexpressible misery. She went round to his side, and laid her hand with a caressing gesture on his arm.

"What ails you, my husband?" she said. "Our darling, I hope, is doing well. The good Dioscorides speaks well of him."

He made no answer, but, falling on his knees beside the bed, buried his face in the coverlet. She could see his body shaken with silent and tearless sobs. At last he managed to articulate, "Call Manto"—Manto was an old and trustworthy servant who had been long a member of the household—"and let her watch for a while. I have something to tell you."

When Manto had obeyed the summons, Lucilius, who seemed to have become almost helpless, was led by his wife into an adjoining chamber.

Then, in a voice broken by sobs and tears, he told the miserable story.

He had scarcely finished when an official arrived from the Governor's court, bringing a summons for his attendance.

The wretched man rose from his seat as if to obey. But the limit of his strength and endurance had been reached, and he fell swooning upon the floor. Before long he was restored to partial consciousness; but it was evident that his attendance at the court was out of the question. In fact, he was suffering from a slight shock of paralysis.

"Let me go instead of him," said the wife. "I can at least tell what I know, and you can examine him when he is fit to answer."

Accordingly, after giving directions to Manto as to what was to be done for the patient during her absence, she accompanied the official to the court.

It was not much that she had to say; but, so far as it went, it confirmed the shepherd's story.

"I became the mother of two female children," she said, "on the fourteenth of May, twenty-one years ago. They were born alive, and were healthy and strong. I nursed them for fourteen days, as far as I can remember. Then I fell ill of a fever, and they had to be taken from me. I remember seeing them several times in the day for two or three days afterwards; then I knew nothing more. When I recovered my senses they were gone. It was then nearly the end of June. My husband told me that they were dead."

"Had you any doubt whether he was telling you the truth?" asked the Governor.

"I had none. Why should I? And when we were reckoning up our expenses at the end of the year, I found a paper which seemed to show the sum paid for the funeral."

"Do you remember the slave Geta?"

"Yes; I remember him. My husband said that he had been drowned. Some articles of his clothing were found by the river."

"Have you had any suspicion at all up to this time?"

"Lately I have had. Since my son has been ill, my husband has been much troubled in mind. He has talked in his sleep; and he said the same things over and over again, till I could not choose but heed them. 'Why did I kill them? Why did I kill them?' 'Geta, Geta, bring them back!' and 'Childless! Childless!' These were the things that he repeated. I put them together till I began to suspect that there had been some foul play. And then I remembered some words the old woman, Geta's sister, had said."

"And have you anything else to say?"

"Nothing, my lord, except that within the last hour my husband has confessed to me the whole."

"Why is he not here?"

"He is paralysed."

Here the poor woman, who had given her evidence with extraordinary firmness and self-possession, utterly broke down.

The Governor took but little time to consider his decision. It was to this effect:—

"The legal proof in this case is not complete, for it needs the formally attested confession of the man Lucilius. Substantially, however, the truth has been established, and I have no hesitation in pronouncing the sisters Rhoda and Cleoné to be of free condition."

Clitus now rose to address the court.

"I have an application to make that the proceedings in this case be annulled."

"On what ground?" said the Governor.

"On the ground that they were essentially illegal; that the evidence of the free-woman Rhoda was extorted from her by questioning that could not lawfully be applied."

"And you contend, therefore, that she should be set free?"

"That is my contention."

"And how about the woman Cleoné?"

The question was embarrassing. Cleoné had suffered no actual wrong, and Clitus felt that here his case was weak. He tried to make the best of it.

"She has been treated as if she were of servile condition. The indictment against her is made out in these terms—'Also the slave-girl Cleoné,' are the words. I contend that it is informal, and ought therefore to be quashed."

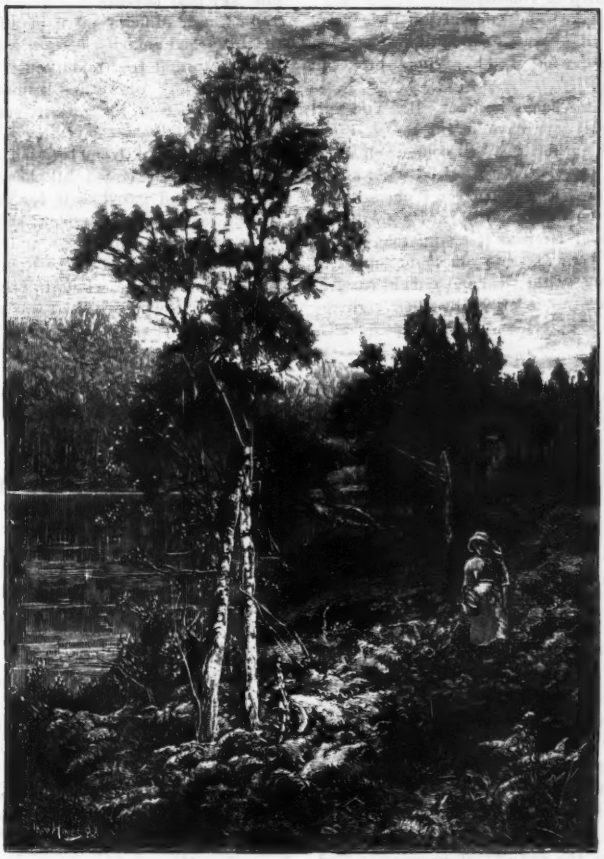
The young advocate had the sympathies of the court—so far, at least, as the Governor was concerned—in his favour. He adjourned the court in order to consult his assessors. He found them adverse to the claim. A long argument ensued. In the end the opinion of the Governor prevailed, and he returned to the tribunal and began to deliver judgment.

"Having carefully considered the circumstances of this case, and remembering especially that the law, if ever it has been unwittingly betrayed into error, is anxious to make such amends as may be possible, I direct that the free women, Rhoda and Cleoné, wrongfully condemned as being of the servile condition——"

At this point the delivery of judgment was interrupted by the arrival of a messenger bearing an imperial rescript.

The Governor rose to receive the messenger, took the despatch from his hand, and, after making a gesture of respect to the document, proceeded to cut the sealed thread which fastened it. He read it, everyone in court watching his face as he did so with intense interest.

It ran thus:—"Trajan Augustus, to his dearly beloved Cæcilius Plinius, Proprætor of Bithynia, greeting.—It is my pleasure that all persons, whether men or women, bond or free, who shall have been found guilty of cherishing the detestable superstition which has taken to itself the name of Christus, be forthwith sent to Ephesus, there to be held at the disposition of the Proconsul of Asia."



Everyone knew what this meant, for the great show of wild beasts and gladiators that was about to be exhibited at Ephesus was the talk of the whole province.

(To be concluded.)

PASSING CLOUDS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "OUT OF REACH," "SUNDAY EVENING IN A SICK-ROOM," ETC.

"Calm me, my God, and keep me calm."

ALL night long a wild wind and rushing rain held fierce revelry; all night long the sound of sighing waves and breaking branches kept up an undercurrent of reproach and remonstrance, and the waters of a Lake lying far up amongst the hills joined in the swelling chorus of complaint.

But when morning dawned, matters seemed far worse than in the darkness of the night, which at least had acted as a kindly screen.

"What have I done to deserve this?" murmured the Lake, as she felt herself beaten and baffled by the strong wind—"why can't I be left in peace? Yesterday all was so bright and calm, I could see nothing and reflect nothing but the blue sky overhead; and now here I am tossed and helpless, all my beauty gone, all dark and grey and troubled."

"Don't fret; they are only passing clouds," said a Robin perched on the bough of an alder-bush close by. He was always hopeful, and could not bear to see anyone out of heart. But his voice was drowned the next moment by the Lake suddenly lashing herself into a fresh fit of fury against her fate.

After a time this got monotonous, and from laying the blame on outward circumstances the poor Lake began to turn her thoughts inward, and to try if she could not find the root of the mischief there.

"It must have something to do with myself," she murmured, in a lower and yet more despairing key than ever. "I never used to be gloomy and restless, but now I suppose I have got into such a bad way

I can't get out of it again. Oh dear! whatever shall I do?" and she flung herself against the bank in self-abasement.

The eastward sky was getting brighter now; the wind had lulled and the clouds were quickly dispersing. The Robin thought it high time to come in with another chirp of consolation.

"You poor old Lake!" he said, "I am very sorry for you, but really it is your own fault."

"Yes, that is just what I am saying," broke in the Lake agitatedly.

"Hush! that isn't what I mean at all. You will never be better until you have learnt to lie still," said the Robin with authority. "Of course you think it is easy for me to say that, because I have got a pair of wings and can use them whenever I choose; but I have gone about the world and learned a great deal from observation, and I repeat it again, that this is at the root of half your misery—you won't submit to the darkness. If you would yield and remain passive, you would soon find things gradually come right of themselves."

"Do you really think so?" asked the troubled one.

"Think so? I know it. Now you take my advice. Make up your mind to bear all this as long as it lasts; give up torturing yourself as to why it is, and how it is, and fix your eyes on the first bit of blue sky that appears."

It was a difficult piece of advice to follow, for the Lake had found a certain satisfaction in all her tossings to and fro; and though she was now quite tired out, any alteration seemed better than just quietly to accept the present state of things.

But the advice was followed; and when a rift of blue shone out from between the cloudland overhead, she concentrated all her attention upon it, and gazed and gazed as if for dear life. Her task became easier every moment; she found "strength," not weakness, "in quietness and in confidence," and very soon all followed as the Robin prophesied. The clouds vanished, the wind dropped altogether, and a blue serene heaven overhead was reflected in the calm surface of the sunny Lake beneath.

RELIGION ON EARTH AND RELIGION IN HEAVEN.

BY THE REV. JOHN TELFORD, B.A.

And I will establish My covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee throughout their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee.—GENESIS vii. 7.

And God Himself shall be with them, and be their God.—REVELATION xxi. 3–5.

PART I.—RELIGION ON EARTH.

NEARLY a quarter of a century had rolled by since Abraham, surrounded by a little band of kinsfolk and servants, set out from Haran to begin his new life in Canaan. God had been with him and had blessed his strange pilgrim life with much earthly prosperity; but so far as the hope of posterity and the possession of the land were concerned, he was still resting on the unfulfilled promises. God had led him forth from his tent under the dazzling starlit sky, and had told him: "Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, so shall thy seed be." God had also spoken after Lot and his family departed to the Plain of Jordan: "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it, for unto thee will I give it." Yet, despite these promises, Abraham had no foot of land in the country, and the son of the bondwoman was heir to all his wealth.

The weary time of waiting had not, however, been lost. God was beginning a great experiment in the world. Henceforth religion was not to be left merely to the gracious influences which moved individual hearts. Such men as Abel, Enoch, and Noah had indeed walked with God as patterns of faith and holiness. But the corruption of the antediluvian world which cried for judgment, and which only the Deluge could sweep away, showed that the hour for a new dispensation had come. There was to be a peculiar people devoted to the service of Heaven, and drawing others into fellowship with God. That nation was to keep alive His worship, to preserve truth and purity in the earth. It was to train up such saints as Samuel and David, to call forth such service as Solomon rendered in the erection of the Temple, to make ready the soil in which Christ should scatter the seed of the Kingdom of Heaven.

It was fitting that the man whom God chose to be the founder of that new order, in which all the families of the earth were to be blessed, should earn the stamp of Divine approval ere he inherited the promises. Already that glorious portrait is taking shape on the canvas. In definite form and outline there begins to rise before us the character which has riveted the attention of all ages, dear alike to earth and heaven—the Friend of God, the Father of the Faithful. How often the Lord delays the fulfilment of His promises, that the character of the saints may ripen under the tests which hope deferred and joy delayed bring to all. A Christian man will assuredly silence his doubts about the mercy of God, if he studies this feature of the story of Abraham.

The trial of the patriarch was now almost at an end. A definite promise of the speedy birth of Isaac is given at the time these words were spoken. God, therefore, chose this hour to reveal to Abraham the purpose for which he had been raised up: the blessing he was to prize as the crown and safeguard of every joy to him and his for ever.

Standing here, we see the great river of religion begin to flow. All nations are to be enriched by its life-giving waters. Abraham's seed was to become as the stars of heaven for multitude; but the influence was not to be confined even to that countless host: all families of the earth were to share the grace. God Himself stands by its brink to show what the world is to gain from this river of water of life. Such a thought adds unutterably to our interest in those words. What God intends us to find in religion, that must become the hope and aim of every worshipper.

Man cannot live without religion. His necessities and his sorrows seem always lifting up hands of prayer. "Oh Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come." God's covenant with the patriarch shows that He intended religion to be a personal walking with Him. Abraham is to be the father of a great multitude—a holy race, a peculiar people. But he is not lost in the presence of that countless host of his descendants. He is to know in his own life those blessed and hallowing influences which spring from personal fellowship with his Maker. Nobly did he use those precious opportunities. His character ripened, his trust in the unseen Helper gained ever-increasing strength, till at last he became known to all generations as the Friend of God and the Father of the Faithful, honoured alike by the love of Heaven and the praise of all who follow him on faith's pilgrimage. The personal character of religion, then, is its fundamental, its most glorious feature. Of what avail would it be unless it met our individual needs? Religion may fill the whole earth with peace and salvation, but it can only do this by filling each soul with Divine light and comfort. Life's battle with sin and trouble is a personal struggle from beginning to end.

ITS INFLUENCE ON CHARACTER.

"I am the Almighty God; walk before Me, and be thou perfect."—Genesis xvii. 1.

GOD Himself has placed this phase of religion in the forefront. The first word He spoke to Abraham when He opened out the blessings of the Covenant was, "Walk before Me, and be thou perfect." It is not possible to exaggerate the influence exerted on human character by this personal fellowship with God. Character is largely moulded by surroundings. Fellowship with a noble spirit acts as a never-ceasing incentive to nobleness. Ten thousand nameless influences stream forth to others. Duty becomes a sacred obligation; care for others eats out the canker of self-seeking. We live in an atmosphere that braces our energies, that gives new purpose to all we do. Not long before his death an eminent English divine paid a tribute in Baltimore to the effect of such a fellowship on his own early life. "The lapse of years has only served to deepen in me the conviction that no gift can be more valuable than the recollection and inspiration of a great character working upon our own." He had come at a most impressionable age under the spell of Dr. Arnold, and to his dying day his character bore the impress. Years before, his mother, kept at home by the pouring rain, had read her son's notes of Arnold's sermons. "What a peculiar feeling of gratitude," she wrote, "it gives one to the man who makes such thoughts pass through one's child's mind." If such words may be spoken, and spoken truly, of communion with a great character, what words can express the influence of fellowship with God? There are ten thousand lives that may never hope for such a friendship as that of Arnold. Those are privileged circles into which few can enter. But who cannot enjoy this friendship of God? It is the great regenerating force of the world.

These thoughts may indicate the foremost purpose of religion. Abraham was surrounded by idolatries which brought a taint on society. Morality was sapped, the sanctions of religion were given to man's basest passions. Amid such surroundings the Patriarch enjoyed fellowship with the Almighty. "A God of truth and without iniquity; just and right is He." Abraham's character began to reflect the character of his Master. There were seeds of mischief in the deceit which almost wrought shipwreck of his prospects and of his domestic relations in Egypt. The incident betrays that want of veracity which is still the canker of the East. Like us all, Abraham needed the ennobling grace of religion. Nor was it long withheld. God saw his weakness, and supplied the force which alone could elevate and purify.

This, then, is one great purpose of religion: to enable us to walk before God and be perfect. For us such influences have a new meaning. The world's failure to follow this rule made God translate it into another and more alluring form. When Bunsen was dying he said, "I have ever lived and striven after the best and noblest only, but the best and noblest is to have known Jesus Christ." The world has only one perfect pattern. The graces of others may be stepping-stones towards the ideal, but we must test every earthly pattern by the heavenly. Judged by that standard, how few there are whom we can implicitly follow! John Ruskin laments over the same fact in his "Lectures on English Art." "Is it not a strange thing," he says, "and a lamentable, that no British artist has ever lived, of whom one can say to a student, 'Imitate him and prosper;' while yet the great body of minor artists are continually imitating the master who chances to be in fashion; and any popular mistake will carry a large majority of the Britannic mind into laboriously identical blunders for two or three generations." Such words may well make us thankful that the greatest art—the art of living—has found expression in Him

> "Who wrought
> With human hands the Creed of creeds
> In loveliness of perfect deeds
> More strong than all poetic thought."

THE RESTRAINTS AND SUCCOURS OF RELIGION.

BUT there is another side to this subject. The restraints awakened by the acknowledgment of God are not less precious than the influences which lift up to holiness. What life is not exposed to temptation? Happy is it, then, to walk before God. Reverence for Him rules our life; it quickens the perception of evil, it makes the conscience more tender, it gives strength of resistance to the will. Where nothing else could save, religion keeps us, by bringing thoughts of God to the heart. "Oh, do not that abominable thing which I hate," He cries; and our inmost soul responds, "How shall I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" Looking back on his heroic life-work, Nehemiah was able to contrast his conduct with that of others, and rejoice that it had been free from the self-seeking which had ruled their lives. What had made him to differ? "So did not I because of the fear of God."

These, then, are the twofold effects of religion on character. The spur to rouse and the bit to check are here. Life is braced for endeavour and held back from deeds of shame.

Religion is also a Divine provision for all the necessities of human life. That life is God's gift. "He hath made us, and not we ourselves." When God established the covenant with Abraham, He included in it providential blessing as well as heavenly grace. No religion can hold its place in the world which does not satisfy the needs of the worshipper. Where his unaided resources would fail, the grace and succour of Heaven must step in. "Hereafter," said our Lord to Nathaniel, "ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man." Jacob's vision is not to be the joy of one night of loneliness and Divine interposition. It is to be set before the eyes of every pilgrim right through his pilgrimage. "The way to heaven out of all places," as an old writer has put it, "is of like length and distance." Prayer can rise and succour can find us at every stage of the journey.

PERPLEXITIES arise. The way is dark. No lights of human reason or experience can be found to guide us. Such times come to every thoughtful man who is placed in a position of responsibility. To whom can he turn in his need? A false step may wreck his life, and not his only. The lives of many may be clouded by his error. The conduct of life—what a problem that is for a man who is awake to his perils! Religion brings God in to solve it. We "inquire in His Temple."

But it is not only in perplexities that we need God. TROUBLES also come. What sorrows may spring up around us in this road of life! Worldly comforts may pass, and leave us to a hard struggle with fortune. Friends may fail or death may snatch them from our embrace. Fidelity to principle may expose a man to ruin. He may suffer the loss of all things for Christ's sake; but whatever form the trouble takes, it finds our Helper near. This aspect of religion commends it to all who mourn. There are some who only awake to their need of heaven when earth is shorn of joy.

> "Ay, sooth, we are too strong in weal
> To need Thee on that road;
> But woe being come, the soul is dumb
> That crieth not on God."

Nor must we forget to show how religion equips men for the STRUGGLE of life—it supplies a new motive power which consecrates duty. The lowliest work and the loftiest are alike done to the glory of God. It opens new stores of grace and providential succour to those who thus labour. All the resources of the Master are given to the servant. "Man, when he resteth and assureth himself upon Divine protection and favour, gathereth a force and faith which human nature in itself could not attain."

Religion in this first great picture of its influence is, however, something more than a personal blessing for its earliest recipient. The gift which became the first patriarch's stay and inspiration was to be an abiding heritage to his children. If life brought like perils to all, the Almighty Friend would be near to all in every hour of need. This is the promise.

What a field for illustration the Old Testament affords! Abraham's children found the covenant sure. Of his son's religious life we know comparatively little, but we are told that God was the Fear of Isaac. He walked in lowly reverence before his father's Friend. Jacob's biography first shows us grace wrestling with human selfishness and unbelief. What an instance it is of the need of Divine power to transform the character, and to support in hours when all earthly refuge fails!

At the outset of his painful flight to Padanaram God steps in as the Companion of his wandering. Jacob arises from his pillow of stone at Bethel, to feel that life is lighted up with a Divine presence. God preserved him in his lonely pilgrimage, God prospered him in his exile, God brought him to his father's house in peace. Nor, with all his faults, was Jacob slow to recognise or to acknowledge the Architect of his fortunes. "Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the Fear of Isaac, had been with me, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty." It was not to Laban only that Jacob thus spoke of the blessings of religion. Years afterwards, in Egypt, when his chequered life was closing, he paid another tribute to the Good Hand that had been upon him for good. "And he blessed Joseph, and said, 'God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the Angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lad."

Joseph too. What did religion do for him? It gave him God, and God was his only Friend in Egypt. St. Stephen, with eyes enlightened by the glories of a martyr's crown, truly read the secret of Joseph's blessing. "God was with him." That was the one blessing he possessed, but it included every good. As a slave, as a prisoner, and as the ruler over all the land of Egypt, he never lost the smile of God. He adorned every position; he overcame every temptation because religion was the soul of his life.

Here, then, is the Old Testament picture of religion, with the sunshine of the better dispensation streaming upon it. For nearly four thousand years this great river of religion has been making glad the nations. How many hearts "have throbbed with an exquisite bliss"! how many drooping souls have shaken off their burdens! how many have awaked to new life under its influence! It has created saints and reformers; it has filled the Church with praise, it has raised up ten thousand ministering angels to relieve human sorrow.

PART II.—RELIGION IN HEAVEN.

"And I heard a great voice out of the throne saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He shall dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God.

"And He shall wipe away every tear from their eyes; and death shall be no more, neither shall there be mourning, nor crying, nor pain any more: the first things are passed away.

"And He that sitteth on the throne said, Behold, I make all things new."—Rev. xxi. 3–5.

WE have seen that in the covenant God made with Abraham, just before the birth of Isaac, there are wrapped up all the possibilities of religion on earth. Not that the fulness of meaning was developed in one generation; all the added lights of revelation are poured upon that covenant: star after star shines forth among the exceeding great and precious promises. We gaze on the growing glories with feelings such as the poet attributes to > "Some watcher of the skies,

> When a new planet swims into his ken."

But though the exceeding riches of religion are for ever unfolding, they are all included in the promise, "To be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee."

The description of the new heaven and new earth which is given in this passage of the Revelation forms as comprehensive a statement of the place which religion will fill in heaven, as God's promise to Abraham gives of the office of religion on earth. Not that all is clear as yet. We must learn to wait. Only Heaven itself can reveal to us the glories of the fellowship and succour that await the Christian beyond the grave.

There is no room for thoughtlessness as we face the responsibilities of life on earth. A wise man will never forget how many paths there are by which he may go astray and bring upon himself, it may be, lifelong disgrace and mourning. How much more solemn is the outlook on that life beyond the grave! This is for a moment, that is for eternity. We shall carry into the future the same nature, the same capacities.

What questions rise in our hearts as we face a change so unutterable! Are the dreams of any adventurer starting on the quest of a new world, the fancies of any youth leaving his village home for the capital of a world-wide empire, for a moment to be compared with our thoughts about the Home where we hope to dwell together when this life on earth is done? Circumstances are constantly forcing such questions upon us. We watch the feet of our friends touch the waters of that river which divides the home on earth from the home in heaven. Perhaps sickness brings us to the very verge of the waters, but God's mercy restores us to our earthly toil for a season. Who is there in all the earth whose breast has not been stirred by such thoughts a thousand times?

This attitude of mind gives exhaustless interest to the Voice from heaven which St. John heard. It assures us that the lights which gild this world of sin and sorrow beam forth in their glory in that world beyond the grave. That after-life is not to us what it was to the masses of Greece, "a poor, washed-out, shadowy copy of the brilliant life on earth."

"God Himself shall be with them, and shall be their God." All the possibilities of heaven are there. The whole soul is entranced by the glories on which St. John gazed, the pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb; the tree of life with its twelve manner of fruits and its leaves for the healing of the nations; the streets of pure gold like unto clear glass—all these we have been familiar with from our childhood. But these are but the setting of the gem, the framework of the picture, the decorations of the Home above.

Its glory is the Divine Presence. Rob it of that and it ceases to be heaven: take all else away, whilst that remains it is still heaven for the true pilgrim. This is the thought which reveals to us the fulness of meaning in this best description of heaven. Tennyson's picture of the ideal society, under King Arthur's rule, may furnish a suggestive comparison:—

> "And all about a healthful people stept
> As in the presence of a gracious king."

"GOD HIMSELF SHALL BE WITH THEM."

THESE words are not found in the promise to Abraham. They are, in one sense, implied in the command, "Walk before Me." They are more perfectly anticipated in the promise to Jacob: "I will not leave thee!" The nearest approach to their fulness of meaning is in the parting words of Jesus to His disciples: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." But that was only a spiritual presence. One of those who heard that promise wrote to the scattered disciples of the apostolic age: "Whom having not seen, ye love." Yet the spiritual presence on earth is the crown and seal of every blessing. It made Moses great; it nerved Joshua for the conquest of Canaan. Fear died away when that promise was spoken: "As I was with Moses, so will I be with thee." The Epistle to the Hebrews reminds us that this is the heritage of every pilgrim. "He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." And on our lips and in our hearts there is that answer which shows that the promise is the very breath of Christian life, "So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me."

Yet, however true it be that "God is the bounden companion of a good man's life," the "great voice out of heaven" means more than this. "The tabernacle of God is with men, and He shall tabernacle with them." As the Shekinah was the glory of the camp of Israel, so the Divine Presence is the glory of heaven. The tribes pitched their tents around God's tent, for He dwelt among them, making them His peculiar people. But there is another illustration. He who wrote the Revelation wrote also those words which record how God once dwelt on earth. "The Word was made flesh, and tabernacled amongst us." Here, then, is the joy of heaven. As Christ dwelt among His disciples, God will dwell among the citizens of heaven. "The throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and His servants shall serve Him; and they shall see His face, and His name shall be in their foreheads."

But if God is with us in this more perfect sense, He still holds the same relationship to His people; "and shall be their God." Every want shall be anticipated, so that strong crying and tears to Him Who is able to save shall be unknown in heaven. But praise shall live, if prayer is at an end. Love shall still bind our soul to God, if faith be swallowed up in sight. The nobler part of worship will thus remain in heaven. Service, too, shall endure, though its privations and disappointments are past. What comparisons and contrasts between service on earth and service in heaven are suggested by that verse: "His servants shall serve Him."

The old relationship between God and His people survives, adapted to new conditions. God will not sever the links which bind Him to His people, but will only draw us more closely to Himself. Did He for one moment withdraw His Presence, heaven would be darkened. "If Thy Presence go not with us, carry us not up hence," would be our prayer. The abiding Presence of God is the pledge that all our need will be satisfied throughout eternity.

Bishop Butler supplies a pregnant thought in his description of the future world as a dispensation under the more immediate government of God. That is, the Divine Will shall rule. There shall be no sin, no unbelief to thwart it. Our Saviour taught His disciples to pray that earth might thus be modelled after the pattern of heaven: "Thy will be done in earth as it is done in heaven." Every triumph of religion in the soul, or in human society, hastens the fulfilment of that prayer. But if sin were banished, our frailty would still prevent its perfect answer. Insight often fails us. We err even in our holy things. All such elements of discord will then be removed. "There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth." What a change that must mean we can somewhat conceive by asking ourselves what this world would be if God's will became the universal law of life. Crime and passion would expire, every unloving thought would cease for ever.

LIFE IN HEAVEN.

WHEN God is able to accomplish all His will, He will appear as the Comforter of His people. How the pity of God shines forth in His first act of love! He shall wipe away every tear from their eyes. Here we must often be content with grace to suffer. We rest on the assurance: "Like as the father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." God cannot yet close the doors of the school of sorrow. The soul has a strange insight when the eyes are dimmed with weeping. Here, at least, our tears do not "put out our eyes." Sorrow teaches lessons of the vanity of pleasure, of the frailty of earthly joy, when all other teachers have failed to fasten the nail in a sure place. We have much need to bless God that He does not yet wipe away the tears. But in that new life, when character is perfected, when sin is vanquished, God can close the chapter of suffering for ever. What an individuality there is in the revised translation: "every tear." "All tears" wakes up before us the world of mourners; "every tear" shows us that not one shall steal down any face. God Himself shall wipe them away. Who would not weep, someone said, if this be so! It is one of His most God-like acts. How gladly we would wipe away tears from the eyes of those we love, yet how powerless we are! When was Jesus more alluring to the world than when He went about doing good; when He wiped away the tears of the widow of Nain and, Himself weeping, spoke those words which dried up the tears of the sisters of Lazarus? Yet, if Christ comforted many mourners, how many, even in His own generation, never heard of His mercy! How many, who had once been comforted, were found again among the mourners! When God wipes away the tears, His saints will never mourn again.

For the sources of tears are also dried up. All that could move to weeping is banished. There shall be no more death. That home shall hear no heart-breaking cry, "Would God I had died for thee!" To wait for Death, to hear his footfall, to feel his cold hand upon us—that shall be an experience unknown in heaven. Yet not unknown; for who among the redeemed from among men but rejoices the more in that deliverance because he once knew the form of the King of terrors, and for himself or for others trembled at his approach? Death shall make no inroads on that company; he lies for ever vanquished at the feet of our victorious Saviour: that is the crowning triumph of the redeeming work. "He must reign until He hath put all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is Death."

Sorrow, the wailing grief that masters body and mind, and cannot be hid; that, too, shall be a stranger in the new heaven and new earth. When every avenue of trouble is closed, who will be left to mourn! "Crying," too, is done. The despair and dismay which roused it are not known where "Christ Himself doth rule." Pain is the last of the banished crew. The bootless, wearying toil which the word brings before our eyes, that too has died with death and all the company of troubles.

Such is the fruit of God's more immediate rule. But one word is yet to be added. "And He that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new." Out of the trials of the present there is growing up the glory of the future. It is a new world, and all things in it are fresh—bearing the stamp of the wisdom and love of God, unstained and unperverted by His enemies.

This, then, is religion in heaven: God more perfectly revealed, yet still holding the same relation to His people, moulding the life of eternity for their perfect blessedness. Religion on earth finds its limits in ourselves and our surroundings. It wages a hard war with our frailties, it is sorely taxed by our troubles. But it is preparing the world for a more perfect exhibition of Divine power, which begins with the wiping away of every tear. Whatever development religion in heaven may know must be on these lines: richer fellowship, more abundant succour. Richard Baxter, whose "Saint's Everlasting Rest" has lighted so many pilgrims on the way to that better country, caught this thought in his hymn:—

> "My knowledge of that life is small,
> The eye of faith is dim,
> But 't is enough that Christ knows all,
> And I shall be with Him."

GRANNY'S JUBILEE.

CHAPTER III.

GRANNY, let me peep."

Nance stood among the sunbeams glinting through a high window athwart the landing, and down the front stairs. She had stolen upon Mrs. Manly unawares, and surprised her taking a look at that turned picture, always in shadow.

"I hardly know that I ought," said she tremulously.

"Yes, Granny, you ought; then, if he comes, I shall know him"

"Hush, dear, hush!" Granny looked down the stairs and hearkened: all was quiet.

"Well, your grandfather never told me not," she observed: "he only said 'Shut him away, out of light and sight, like one dead and gone,'" she murmured to herself.

"Did Grandfather say that!" asked Nance, her quick ears hearing all.

"Yes, dear: but that was when the blow came."

"Did my—did my Uncle Jack hit Grandfather!" Nance's eyes were growing round.

"No, not with his hand, dear, but—but with his heart."

"Oh, Granny, how funny! how could a heart hit anyone! Mine only goes pit-a-pat," laughed the innocent child.

"'T was his want of love did it—no, his want of thought. Oh! child, that was a terrible time when that blow was struck, and he went out," continued Granny, as if she must talk of it to somebody.

"Do you mean when he went away who is to make your jubilee?"

"Oh! Nance, I can't think it will ever come," cried the hungering woman.

"Not your jubilee?"

"No." Nance's face grew a shade graver.

"But, Granny, He said it would."

"Who, dear!"

"Jesus. He said, 'Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in My name, He will give it you;' Jane read that to me in my Bible; and whatsoever means anything, doesn't it!"

"Oh yes," agreed Granny.

"Then jubilee is anything, and 't will come, Granny, 't will come."

"But how?" Ah! the doubts and fears come between us and our prayers. "He doesn't know we're hungering after him."

"Write to him," said Nance, sitting down on the topmost stair to have it out.

XUM

"Nance's pretty, rosy lips were pressed to the pictured ones."

"I daren't, dear, I daren't; Grandfather told me not."

"Then show me his picture—and he 'il know, and come, somehow."

Mayhap, had the child been o'der, the words of the hymn would have come to her ready tongue, instead of that "somehow"—

> "It may not be my way,
> It may not be thy way,
> And yet in His own way,
> The Lord will provide."

"Well, dear, just one peep, and you mustn't ask me again; remember, Grandfather has never forbidden this."

"All right, Granny," and the picture was turned to the light for an instant. A fair-faced youth, with blue eyes very like Nance's, looked at her from the canvas. The fellow to this, that of Nance's mother, was down in the parlour. They both had once hung there, one on each side of the glass door, so that Granny could see them as she sat by the fire. But Granny was speaking.

"Kiss him, dearie, kiss him;" and Nance's pretty, rosy lips were pressed to the pictured ones.

"He smiled—he really smiled," she whispered, when the picture was hidden again, and she went tripping down the stairs with Granny.

"Yes, Nance, pictures of those whom we love always seem to smile when we look at them," returned the patient little woman, pathetically.

"And I and you love him, and so does Jane; and only Grandfather doesn't."

"Hush, Nance! Grandfather loves him; 't is because of the love he is so bitter."

"Because of the love that he is so bitter," and "How will he know that we are hungering for him?" were subjects for thought with small Nance for days. She was pondering of this, walking among the lambs and daisies, one fine afternoon, she and her dolly, both in their sun-hoods.

"Well, little woman, what are you thinking of?" Grandfather surprised her thus, with a pat on her head.

"I was thinking of you, Grandfather, and how we can get Granny's jubilee to come."

"It won't come, child; I 've said it, and I mean it."

"But, Grandfather, we 're praying for it, and Jesus and praying are stronger than anyone," lisped the child.

"I wasn't thinking of prayer, Nance, I was thinking of—of——"

"The bitterness? The bitterness is love, Gran—somebody said, and I think so too."

Mr. Manly groaned.

"You love Uncle Jack, Grandfather—don't you?" Such a daisy-faced pleader.

"I did once."

"Granny says, love never dies, that it lives on in heaven."

"Nay, child, my love is lost;" he walked away, and here was a third subject for Nance to ponder over.

"If Grandfather's love is lost, the bitterness is lost with it, and bitterness means cross. If Uncle Jack knew Granny hungered for a jubilee, he'd come; if he knew Grandfather's love was lost, he'd bring it back; for, of course, he wants it back when 'tis gone out into the far country. And the bitterness may be put off with the rags;" she fancied Grandfather couldn't be cross with him, dressed like his son again, as she pondered, tripping among the bleating lambs and nodding daisies. "Granny mustn't write, and I can't." Somewhat of a dunce was she; though reading so glibly, she could not form a letter. "But I can make a letter from my pretty printing, as Jane calls it," was the bright thought. She often amused herself by cutting out letters from placards and the like, and stringing them together on paper, with a little gum, into words and sentences. Why not make Uncle Jack a letter? She fairly skipped at the thought, and went dancing into the house. Oh! the hours and days of patient toil, up in her own little nest of a room in secret, and anon the work of art was complete—two sheets of paper, and by no means a lengthy letter. It ran thus:—

"DEAR UNCLE JACK,—I'm Nance, and Granny hungers for a jubilee, and wants you to come and make one. She does not want a queen's one, you know. I, and Granny, and Jane are praying for you. Grandfather says his love is lost—that's you, and the bitterness. COME."

The come was all capitals. Away she flew down the back-stairs to Jane. She was ready to cry, she was so tired, so glad, as she clung to the old servant's arm while she read it.

"Yes, dearie, that'll do, and I'll direct it, and we'll have a secret, you and I, even from Granny. Yes, Miss Nance, I know where he went to—I'll direct it; and you post it."

Tears were in Jane's eyes as the child danced away to the cross roads to meet the postman with her precious letter. Now to the praying and waiting again; surely an answer of peace would be vouchsafed them.

"That's a secret," Nance told the postman, as he took her missive.

"My dear, that's what all letters are," he answered, smiling, and trudging on.

CHAPTER IV.

THE glad jubilee time came and went, Nature's jubilee time of harvest and rejoicing likewise passed, but Granny's jubilee seemed as far off as ever: nothing happened, no one came. Nance still clung with child-like faith to her hope, and kept her secret. "Praying always brings things, Granny; 't will come, your jubilee will come."

But the frost and snow were abroad at last, winter setting in right severely, and Grandfather even setting aside a Christmas log from the large pile in the shed; little Nance, in fur-tipped garments, standing by, watching him.

"'T will soon be Christmas, Granny," she cried, dancing in, after this.

But Granny was crying quietly to herself, by the fire, and only answered the prattler with a kiss.

"Is it about the jubilee, Granny?" she asked, and Granny answered—

"Yes, dear, about the jubilee."

"But 't will come, Granny; Jesus knows all about jubilees. Why, He had one once, didn't He?" A glad light broke over Nance's face. "When He went home to heaven, you know. Don't you mind—'Lift up your heads, O ye gates?' Oh! Granny, jubilees in heaven are most beautiful things, aren't they?"

"Yes, dear, and jubilees on earth are beautiful," returned Mrs. Manly, her face reflecting something of the light on the child's; "at least, one was."

"When, Granny, when?"

"Why, the first Christmas was a jubilee, and Jesus brought it; the angels told it, 'Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will toward men.' God took us back to His love and His favour; that was the world's great jubilee."

"Yes, and we keep it every year," said fur-clad Nance, looking thoughtfully into the fire. "Oh! Granny"—her blue eyes danced—"if your jubilee should come at Christmas, that would be better than having it with the Queen."

"Bless the dear child!" cried Granny, "thy faith and hope are stronger than mine."

So Mrs. Manly dried her eyes, and again prayed her longing prayer, Nance and Jane echoing it, as the hours and days flowed on, and, anon, it was Christmas Eve. Nance and Granny wreathed the rooms with evergreens, a sweet expectation on lip and brow, ringing out in the trip of Nance's dancing feet, in her glad young voice.

"He may be coming to-day, or to-morrow, Miss Nance, who knows?" said Jane that morning; and the child was as in a golden dream.

"Granny, if Uncle Jack should come for Christmas!" she could not forbear from whispering, as they twined and wreathed their fairy wreaths together.

But Granny, sick with longing, cried, "Don't, dearie; 't is more than I can bear."

Still the day wore on, the early shadows fell, the wind sank to rest, and Nance fairly wept, kneeling at the kitchen window, and watching till her faith and hope waned as the day died.

"He may come to-morrow," she thought, with a lump in her throat; "praying always brings things—and He said it, about 'two or three.'"

The tea was laid, the log fire stirred into a blaze. Grandfather tramped in, and sat down in his chair on the hearth. Hark! a knock at the front door Nance heard Jane answer it, heard the heavy door open and shut, Jane tarrying and waiting somewhere. Granny heard, yet gave no sign, but Nance sped out to see and hear. A tall, giant form was there, which Jane was ushering into the fireless parlour.

"He's come, Miss Nance," whispered Jane, after shutting him in.

"Who, Jane, who?" panted the child.

"Uncle Jack—'tis Granny's jubilee. Now steal in, and whisper to Granny that Jane knows he'll be here 'in the midst;' so Jesus is here, come to see your jubilee, and 't will be all right. You know He brought a jubilee once, and knows all about what they are."

"Abel! our boy, our son, is here!" Mrs. Manly seemed as if waking from a dream, and rose, laying her hand on her husband's arm.

"We have no son, Anne, and this—this stranger no home here"—his voice was husky, but he said it.

"Yes, Grandfather, yes—'He came unto His own, and His own received him not'; that is what the

"Into the firelight they went."—p. 379.

soon—that she has heard so—or, may be, 'twill break her heart with joy."

Dear mouse-like herald, how gently she did it!

"Granny"—her arm stole round Mrs. Manly's neck—"Jane says she knows your jubilee will come—come soon—perhaps to-night; someone has told her so," she whispered in her ear.

"Oh, Nance!" they clung together, the old woman and the little child.

"Why, what secret have you two got between you?" inquired Grandfather, jokingly.

"A secret all about Granny's jubilee," lisped Nance.

"He hasn't dared—he hasn't come——" How hard was the father's voice.

"Yes, Grandfather, he has dared, he—he is come." Brave, wee Nance, how she seemed to gather Granny to her, as to shelter. "Never mind, Granny; He said, Jews did to Jesus, and they were wicked men," pleaded Nance, standing between them, holding Granny's hand, and trying to take her grandfather's.

"Hush, Nance, hush!" spoke stern Mr. Manly.

"No, Grandfather, I mustn't hush: I've prayed for Granny's jubilee, and 't is come. You say, 'This my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found'"—tears were not far from Nance's voice.

Ah! when did a child, clinging to the words of Holy Writ, fail? How quiet Mr. Manly was, after this.

"Abel, have pity; for the sake of the love between us, the love that is doubly crowned to-night, do as the child says," pleaded Mrs. Manly through the silence, the old clock ticking "Come in! come in!" and nothing else—so wee Nance fancied, hearkening and waiting.

"Fetch him in, Nance.

"You take care of Granny, Grandfather," said the child, winding the old man's arm about her before she left her, and then darted away.

In the starlit parlour he waited—that tall giant.

"Uncle Jack, 't is me—I 'm Nance:" the little peace-maker was holding his hand. "Come to Granny and make her jubilee." He half hesitated. "Yes, Grandfather said so too," was the persuasive assurance, and she drew him on.

Into the firelight they went—the child and the repentant prodigal.

"Mother!"—"Jack!" "Father!"—"Jack!" So they met, the mother clasping her boy in her arms, the father's strong right hand wringing that of his son's.

"Well, mother, the thought of the grand jubilee you were having over here set my heart hungering with a great hunger, the same as you say it was with you; but this is what brought me," said Jack Manly, after the tumult of joy had subsided a little, and tea had been partaken of, all sitting around the fire: and out he drew Nance's letter from his pocket.

"'Twas a secret, Granny—mine and Jane's," whispered Nance.

Ay, the child has done it. What is man's obdurate pride before a child's clinging faith and love! They have played their part well, in many a good work, before to-day; and even He Who came to bring our jubilee, as Nance put it, condescended to take the form of a little child; as children we must enter into the Kingdom of Heaven—every man to his possession, every man to his family. Ay, Abel Manly's heart was broken; the husk of pride would never lay so thick around it again.

"Thank God!" said Granny that night. "Thank God!"

And Nance whispered to herself before going to sleep, "Jesus heard; I knew He would"—and to-morrow it was Christmas.

A RESTING-PLACE.

THE Dove could find no rest,
The heaving waters' ebb and flow
Revealed the awful tempest's throe;
O'er wreck and ruin rolled the waves,
And murmured o'er a world of graves.

The Dove could find no rest,
And when the crimson sunset burned,
With weary wing she homeward turned,
And one put forth his hand and pressed
The wanderer to his pitying breast.

My Dove hath found a rest!
When rough winds ruffle and distress,
In love's soft soothing and caress,
And by my open lattice lured,
She flies to me in faith assured.

O ye who mourn for rest!
There 's One Whose deep compassion waits
To ope for us the sunset gates,
And draw the weary wanderer in
From storms of sorrow and of sin.

CLARA THWAITES.

A MOTHER'S CONFIDENCES.

THE GOSPEL INSTRUCTION TO PARENTS.

WE have made a discovery, or rather, Evan has made it, and I assist at the rejoicing; I wonder will it strike you as anything new? Of course, I cannot keep it more than a day from you, for have we not told each other everything, since the secret was pretty beads which chubby fingers could just manage to thread? Well, I daresay you remember that Evan likes to get a quiet hour on Sunday morning while I am looking after the children, and various necessary matters. He does not talk much about the best things, but I have always fancied he liked to work out some idea which may have struck him in the readings at family prayers, and that this was the time for his weekly "think."

Yesterday morning he came out of his den looking radiant, running over with something he wanted to tell. But I only got—

"Eureka! Mrs. Burnet."

"What's the find?" said I eagerly; for I could see it was something to rejoice our hearts.

"Oh, it's too good to be handed round like afternoon tea; wait till we can sit down to it properly."

And so I had to wait until the evening service was over, and the babes in bed, and we were all to ourselves! 'Now for it!' thought I, as I came down, after doing myself up a little for the evening. And there was Evan in his special chair, looking deliciously happy, and—is inspired too strong a word? I drew my chair up beside him, and then—

"You have found it?" said I, by way of breaking the ice.

"Yes, little woman; and what would you give to know its name?"

"Oh, Evan, don't tease me," said I; "you know I never can bear to wait!"

"I know; 'in a minute' is madame's time for everything she wants to have done."

"Don't play, there's a good boy! We shall talk nonsense till bed-time, and then I shall not know this great thing till it's quite stale."

"Great thing" did for Evan; he felt I deserved to be told, and at once there came the serious, earnest look that would frighten all the nonsense out of me if he did not belong to me for jest and for earnest.

"You have been a discreet little wife to ask no questions about what I did with myself on Sunday mornings. I have had qualms—couldn't I help you with the children or something? And now, my perseverance and your discretion are to be rewarded. I have found it!"

"But, Evan dear, what have you found?"

"Can't hold out any longer, eh? Well, she shall be told what there is to tell 'in a minute.' Not long after we were married, I made up my mind that the chief part of the world's work must be done by parents; I mean, by parents in their own homes, not in their professional, philanthropic, or other callings. Don't be afraid, my dear; I'm not going to serve notice of ejectment on that excellent dame, Philanthropy, who puts poultices on many a bad place in this unwholesome world of ours. I only say if—if all parents knew how to bring up their children and did it, the world would want no more poultices, and we should be free to wish philanthropy a civil good-morning."

"I see; and therefore the bringing up of the children is the first business in life. But don't most people, like ourselves, for instance, know how to bring up their children? Don't you think that when we have children we somehow get into the way of managing them properly?"

"I think parents, you mothers especially, are gifted with love and insight, the like of which outsiders rarely enjoy. But no doubt we need knowledge, to help us to use these gifts from above. What is the lever to a man who knows nothing of its powers, nor how to use them? The lever we parents are in need of is firm grip of a few broad principles, one or other of which will raise out of the way every obstacle that occurs in the bringing up of children. Is any difficulty in the way, try it with one or other of these levers until it moves, as it certainly should. And even fairly right-minded people like ourselves, who live to do our duty by our children, if we don't get at these principles, make miserable mistakes which result in incalculable harm and loss to the children."

"Oh, Evan, you frighten me! I thought it was enough to do your best, and to do all you know how. Even that is more than I do. And as for working out the principles one should act on, why, I never thought of it. But I see now about your Sunday mornings. You have been hunting in the Bible for a sort of parents' code?"

"Just so; now you, as a parson's daughter, brought up as a Sunday-school teacher, and all that, should know your Bible a deal better than I, and small thanks to you, ma'am! Where should I look for this same 'parents' code?'"

"Let me see; there are a good many things in the Proverbs, and the Psalms, and Deuteronomy, and all over the Bible there are examples, bad sons and good sons; to say nothing of our Lord's example, and His 'Suffer little children.'"

"Ah! that last nearly touches the question; the rest are, for the most part, advice on particular points, and illustrations—most helpful, every one; but not just what I feel we want—the whole of the principles of education in a nutshell, put ready for the use of parents. I have thought all along that it was a curious omission for our Lord to make, for there is hardly another detail of Christian living of which He has not given us the principle, either in parable or precept. It would be strange indeed for Him to leave us parents out in the cold, when we, more than others, have the work of forwarding His Kingdom."

"But, Evan dear, don't you think it's all for us? The Sermon on the Mount, the sower and the seed, the good Samaritan, and all the story of the blessed life? Can we not get every principle of good living out of these for the use of our children? I don't see that, even as parents, we can want any more."

"While I am looking after the children."—p. 379.

"You are right, Mary; here is all, and more than we can need. But what will you say to this—that our dear Lord Himself, foreseeing the special needs of parents, has vouchsafed to us a complete code of education—not a lengthy book of precepts with attendant rewards and punishments, but three short sentences, each but two words long, containing the sum of the whole matter; and beyond these it is impossible to go in educational thought or work. Oh, the wisdom and consideration of our God! There they are, the perfect rule of life for parents! But, like the treasure hid in the field, you may run over them a thousand times, and never know they are there. Searching, ye shall see; and seeking, ye shall find! I wonder how many generations of perplexed parents this wondrous law and gospel of education has enlightened? But isn't it odd that one never comes across much mention of this 'instruction to parents' in the writings of even the wisest and best? Tell me, Mary, the three sentences of this law?"

I ran over fifty passages in my mind, but none of them would fit. That "two words" of Evan's made it hopelessly puzzling. I could think of no two-word text in the Bible but "Jesus wept," and it would take a good deal of twisting to make that fit.

"Surely, 'Suffer the little children' must be one of your principles, but there are many more than two words."

"You're right; I only meant that the gist of the principle lay in two words. But you have one of the three; now find the others."

But even with that much light on the subject, I got no further, for I have always thought that the one command of our Lord's especially about children. Evan saw I was in a muddle, and came to the rescue.

"Throw that sentence into a negative form, and that will help you: 'suffer' plainly means that there were those who would prevent or hinder the children from coming to Jesus—the disciples, as we know. Now use 'hinder' for your verb, and you get—'Hinder not,' that is, 'Hinder not the children.'

"'Where should I look for this same parents' code?'"—p. 380.

"I see; but that is only one of 'three nots.' Where are the others?"

"Oh, the others are close at hand, in due form. 'Suffer' is the only verb we have to change at all to get at the meaning."

"Oh, I have it, 'Offend not one of these little ones.' 'Despise not one of these little ones;' how odd! I never thought of applying these words to children at all. My idea was that they taught us to be careful lest by our careless living we should set a bad example to younger or less earnest Christians—and only that."

"And I believe most people have the same notion, and so it comes to pass that the children lose the great safeguard of a complete law and rule of life for parents, spoken with authority by the Son of man Himself."

"But would you, then, shut out the weak believers from all benefit of these protective clauses?"

"By no means; so far as these are ignorant and defenceless, prone to fall and ready to err, they come, in some ways at any rate, into the children's estate, and the protecting arm of the Divine guardianship is passed about them also. But to make over these precious counsels to the weak and erring and to deprive the children of any share in them! why, it's madness! And don't you see, Mary, how it seems as if our Lord were aware of how men would torture the first and principal meaning out of His words! He fences them about, and points their meaning in an unmistakable way, by calling a little child and setting him in the midst; and then, with the little child to point to, He says, "Take heed that ye offend not, take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones;" and a little later, as if the subject were still in His thoughts, to the disciples who would hinder the pious mothers, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not." Oh, we should get much insight into Christ's thoughts of the children, and the place they take in His Kingdom, if we would only pick out and ponder all the astonishing statements made about them in the Gospels. We begin by believing that we, the wise, are near and dear to the Father, while they, foolish and ignorant, must become like us before they can enter the Kingdom. And all the time Jesus says just otherwise, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children."

"Ours, the weary, long endeavour;
Theirs, the happy entering in:
Ours, to strive and wait and labour;
Theirs, to joy before the King!

"'Except ye be as the children,
Have ye in My courts no place;'
Ah, how meekly would we ponder
The glad secret of their grace!

"But I am wandering: the whole subject is full of fascination: but I know you want to think first about the 'three nots.'"

"Yes, it is all, as you say, fascinating, beautiful, and wonderful; and I'm sure it's true, for a hundred times a day I bow down in my heart before the babes, and feel that they are so much better than I, as though we were beings of a different class, they nearer the angels, in fact. Still, may I own that I do not see how these three precepts cover the whole of education?"

"Well, in the first place, do you notice that all three commands are really prohibitions? It isn't 'Do this,' but 'Don't do that!' Now, what do you gather from that?"

"I don't know, unless that we parents are apt to do the thing forbidden."

"In other words, that we are much more likely to do harm to our children than good."

"Oh, I don't see that! It's only the worst parents that are without love for their children, and love must be good for the poor little beings."

"I'm not sure you're right in either of your warm-hearted conclusions. I know of a case of lovelessness and neglect towards a new-born infant on the part of quite respectable and rich parents which would send a poor mother to gaol; not because the law favours the rich, but because these things are more easily found out among the poor. Then, I am sure there are few of us who do not know of cases of fond indulgence ending in the ruin of the child."

"I begin to see; we are not to be trusted: the touch even of baby fingers may fail to melt our cold hearts; or, we may lavish on them the fondness of an animal for its litter, and be unable to deny our children the most hurtful indulgences."

"I'm afraid you're right; we harm where we would most bless, unless we keep our necks ever under the yoke and keep pace with our Divine Fellow-labourer in this field. But there is another thing I want you to notice: these three sayings, which, when you examine them, cover the whole ground of education—so it seems to me, at least—are all negative prohibitions; and you think it is because we are such poor things—we are more likely, left to ourselves, to hurt than to bless our offspring. Now, where is the DO? Where are the positive commands? Are they here? and if not, why not?"

"I'm half afraid to say what occurs to me; but why should I be so, after all? It is treason, if at all, only against our common way of thinking. Is it that the children, being more innocent of evil than ourselves, are nearer to God than we; therefore, our one care in their bringing-up must be neither to harm them nor suffer them to be harmed?"

"That's it! You must paint, 'Offend not'—'Despise not'—'Hinder not one of these little ones,' on a scroll for our room, that the words may be always before our eyes and in our hearts. Kept from the things we may not do, we shall fall unresistingly into the things we must do."

"Yes; thus far I see—that the three great educational precepts addressed to parents all tell us what we must not do, because the chief danger threatening our children is, that we, their parents, notwithstanding our great love, may do them irremediable harm! But I do not yet see that, in observing this rule of conduct, we have done all that is possible for the children."

"That will take much talking out; we shall have to consider each of the 'nots' by itself, and find out its full meaning. But this much I think we are ready for. Have you ever had an ignorant housemaid who did not know the nature of things, nor how to treat them? For instance (I know I shall flounder here!), one who would rub your piano with sand-paper to clean it?"

"That's too droll for the ingenuity of the rawest 'help.' But don't I know what you mean, and isn't it the aggravation and misery of all young housekeepers?' (And don't we talk about it and about it whenever we meet?) "Well, where is this amazing illustration of yours going to fit?"

"As the poor maid must know something of the nature of, and the difference between, mahogany and marble, silver and steel, before she can keep each at its best by using the right cleaning stuff" ("Cleaning stuff! oh, these men!"), "so we must know something about body and brain, soul and conscience, and whatever else there is in the child, before we can even get on the right tack for training him. Here's a wide field of real hard study opened out to us already: and 'tis my belief we shall not escape the sin of despising, offending, or hindering our children until we know what there is in human nature, and what may be effected by Divine Grace. But I see you will soon be asleep, in spite of the best intentions. We'll talk out our three 'nots' at length on other Sunday evenings; and I think we agree so far."

"Yes, I follow you every step; but 'knots' they are, and I don't see my way to the undoing of them a bit further than you have taken me."

"We've got over the worst: the rest you will do as much as I towards thinking out, and very interesting we shall find it." CHARLOTTE M. MASON.

CHRISTIAN WORK AMONG THE ESKIMOS.

BY THE RIGHT REV. JOHN HORDEN, D.D., BISHOP OF MOOSONEE.

ESKIMO FINISHING HIS SNOW HOUSE.
(From a Drawing by A. DICKSON PATTERSON, R.C.A.)

FIVE hundred miles north-east of Moose Factory, the London of Hudson's Bay, and which lies a few miles up the great Moose River, we first meet with the Eskimos, a deeply interesting people, and among whom I have a most excellent missionary labouring — the Rev. E. J. Peck, who has made himself thorough master of their difficult language, and who is devoted to them with an intense love. And much they needed a loving and energetic pastor, for they were steeped in wickedness of every kind; a gentleman who was long a resident trader among them told me that there was scarcely one among them whose hands had not been imbrued in a brother's blood.

In one of my northern journeys, being in a canoe with some Cree Indians, we came upon a blind Eskimo, who was in difficulty with his nets, which had become much disordered by a recent storm. We set them right for him, gave him a quantity of provisions, and then went on our way. In a subsequent journey I made inquiries respecting this man, and a terrible tale was told me. He and his wife were reduced almost to starvation, when they were taken under the protection of another Eskimo; they rewarded his kindness by murdering him, that they might become possessed of his few earthly goods. News of what they had done soon reached the ears of a relative of the murdered man, and he instantly vowed vengeance. He came to the station of Little Whale River, and told his tale, saying that he should have no rest until he had avenged his friend's death. The humane trader of the post strongly endeavoured to divert him from his purpose, and thought he had succeeded. The Eskimo left, and did not return to the station for about two months, and his first exclamation on seeing the trader was, "I have done it! I have done it!"—"What have you done?" asked the trader.—"I have killed both of them," replied he. "But I thought," said the trader, "you were going to leave the matter in God's hands?" "And so I had intended," replied he: "but it could not be. I was haunted day and night, and I felt that I should get no rest until I had destroyed the murderers. I arose and went in search of them. I found them, and instantly speared the man. The woman ran off at her utmost speed. I soon overtook her, and raised my spear with the intention of despatching her. She begged piteously for her life, and for a moment I relented; but it was only for a moment; the thought of my comrade steeled my heart against her, and I thrust her through likewise. Now I have nothing to trouble me; appetite and sleep have returned, for my friend's blood has been avenged."

Mr. Peck has been among the Eskimos for many years; hardship daunts him not; danger is his frequent companion; and his superior is not to be found in the mission field. He is always at work, and is as content to sleep in the igloe or snow house, surrounded by his somewhat odoriferous flock, as in his own comfortable bed at Fort George, if by that means he can speak a word for his Master, or cause an extra ray of light to shine in the hearts of those committed to his care. He has translated several books, which are now in the hands of his people; and he has some young Eskimos under training who, I trust, will eventually become ministers to their brethren.

Among our Eskimo friends two have stood out very prominently, and my disappointment was great that they were not allowed to labour longer for the good of their fellow-countrymen. They were both baptised by me, one receiving my own name (John Horden), the other that of Timothy—his Eskimo name being Komuk (the Great Worm). The former was a young man of great promise, and was married to an equally good young woman. They lived at the Hudson's Bay Company's establishment at Little Whale River, where their means of usefulness were very extensive, as they saw and instructed every Eskimo who came to the place for the purpose of trade. The man was a great favourite among the Europeans of the post, who all respected him for the amiability of his temper and the consistency of his life, but in one year both he and his wife died.

Timothy Komuk was the strongest Eskimo I have ever met. He was thoroughly good-tempered, and one day, being insulted by an Indian, he simply took him up and laid him gently on the ground, showing him what he might have done had he felt inclined to resent the injury. He received the Gospel readily, quickly acquired the power of reading and writing, and was indefatigable in committing his one book (consisting of a catechism of the Christian faith, a few hymns, prayers, and texts of Scripture) to memory. He was a hunter, and wandered far and wide in search of food and furs. On one occasion he was two months on one comparatively small field of ice, drifting hither and thither according to the direction of wind and tide. My readers might think that his destruction was inevitable; he, however, felt quite comfortable; he made his snow house, and then patiently awaited the arrival of seals. He secured sufficient for the support of his wife and family, until, carried by wind towards land, he was enabled once more to make his way to the trading-post, where he interested all by the narration of his adventures. He constantly visited all the igloes in his neighbourhood, and with book in hand exhorted their inmates to accept the religion he had found so profitable for himself. Many rejected his proposals, but not a few listened to his instructions. Sickness, I thought, would scarcely touch him; he would for years be able to carry on his useful work; but God had ordered otherwise. He was attacked by that great enemy of both Indian and Eskimo, consumption, and after lingering for a time he was called home. His faith never wavered, and he died in peace.

Neither should I forget to mention the aged Melukto. He received the Gospel on my very first visit to Little Whale River, now more than thirty years ago, and ever since he has been most untiring in his exertions for the good of his fellow-Eskimos. He must now be quite eighty years of age, lame, and almost blind; but he rejoices in believing that Christ is his Saviour, and will deem the day a happy one which terminates his earthly pilgrimage.

On the north-western side of the bay, at Fort Churchill, I have likewise an excellent labourer at work, the Rev. J. Lofthouse, who has also made himself familiar with the Eskimo language. The natives of this quarter are not so much addicted to murder as those on the north-east coast, but are some of the most arrant thieves in existence. In the beginning of 1880 I spent two months at Churchill, travelling there from York Fort by means of dogs and sledge. The arrival of a body of Eskimos was always announced by two or three runners who preceded their companions by about a day. As soon as they arrived, everyone belonging to the establishment was summoned to keep watch, lest anything should be stolen.

A large band came in one day, and it was not long before they were with me. They were loud in their protestations of honesty, declared they had never stolen anything, that the thievish Eskimos belonged to another tribe, and begged that they might not be kept shut up at night during their stay at the fort. Some of them showed a great desire to receive instruction, and during their short sojourn made considerable progress in learning to read, as well as in committing some texts of Scripture to memory. Well, one morning they were astir very early, their dogs were harnessed, the sledges were loaded, and the whole body set off. From the vigilant watch kept, it was thought nothing could have been taken; but by-and-by it was discovered that a few at least were both clever and dishonest, for they had during the night got upon the roof of the trading room, which was covered with lead, and had cut off a large piece of it, which they had carried away with them, intending therewith to make bullets for their guns. Let us hope that in a few years Christianity may be to these long, long neglected aborigines a living power, transforming them more and more into the image of Christ.

As soon as I have the means placed at my disposal (and for it I require about three thousand pounds), I intend to establish another mission among the Eskimo at Ungava Bay, at the entrance of the Hudson's Straits, where the poor creatures would hail with joy the residence of a man of God among them. The man is forthcoming, one suitable in every respect, who has already spent two years among Eskimo tribes in the Hudson's Straits in the service of the Canadian Government, and who longs to be once more doing his best to enlighten those children of the North who are yet lying in the region and shadow of death.

I may mention that "Eskimo" is not a name these people have given to themselves; it is a nickname from their formerly deadly enemies the Indians, and means a raw-flesh eater; their own name is "Innuit," "the people;" their idea being that God made the rest of the world by way of experiment, and then, as His work of perfection, He created "Innuit." It is just as well, perhaps, that we Englishmen should see that other peoples, as well as ourselves, claim to be the superior part of God's creation. It is, of course, very impertinent of them to indulge in such ideas, but so it is.

SOME EVERY-DAY THOUGHTS.

BY E. C. RICKARDS, AUTHOR OF "HERE AND HEREAFTER."

THE FIEND OF THE MAGNIFYING-GLASS.

AMONGST our tormentors is a teasing little fiend, who goes about with a magnifying-glass in his pocket. His great delight is to take it out—especially if he observes that we are at all out of sorts—and hold it between our eyes and some little sore spot in our minds. If it is no larger than a pin's prick, his glass will make it look big enough to cover the whole range of our vision. When he thinks he has teased us enough, he pockets his magnifying-glass again; leaving us to wonder, when next we look for the little spot, how our eyes could ever have been sharp enough to notice anything so small.

UNISON AND HARMONY.

To hear the members of a circle perpetually re-echo the same opinions is as wearisome as to listen to tunes always sung in unison. Variety is needed in thought, as in music, to give the charm of harmony.

OFFER OF APOLOGY.

To allow our pride to make the occasion of an apology the opportunity of a fresh offence, is to take away with the left hand what we give with the right.

LOVE OF COMBAT.

How fully and how wisely does Christianity respond to the combative instinct that is so strong in some people!

"Behold!" it exclaims, "the battle set in array against you—a combat worthy of your ambition! Here are the forces of the World, the Flesh, and the Devil! In the power of the Divine Majesty attack and conquer them."

THE WORD OF GOD.

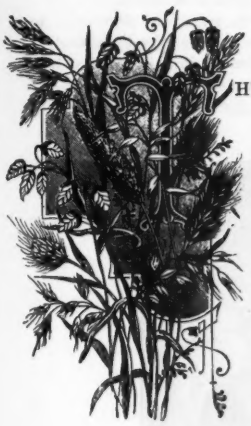
What a simple thing, in the thought of a child, is a daisy!

To the mind of a thoughtful man what wonders are contained in that tiny plant! How delicate, how elaborate is its construction; how beautiful the harmony of the laws by which its existence is maintained; how inexplicable the mysterious principle of life, without which the laws would be useless!

So is it with the Word of God. How many of the truths it contains the simple mind of a child is able to receive!

Yet the mature and thoughtful man finds in it ever newer and profounder depths of truth, traces therein fresh proofs of the working of the Hand of God, new signs of that mystery of its Life, breathed into it by the Holy Spirit.

WASTE OF TIME.



How many people would feel aggrieved if they were told that in future each day, for them, would be shortened by two or three hours. Yet how continually do they recklessly throw away as much and more time every day of their lives, as if for them it were without value!

STANDARD OF DEATH.

Grateful may we well be to Death, that at least for a time he forces upon our view the true standard by which to measure our earthly aims and ambitions. How incessantly have poets, philosophers, theologians, insisted upon their insignificance, and we could not realise it; but lo! Death enters, and compels us to see them in their littleness. Alas! that they should so soon again fill up the foreground as to conceal the larger distance; but at least Death forces their insignificance for a time upon our view.

A RESCUING HAND.

BY JESSIE MACLEOD, AUTHOR OF "A STRANGE COINCIDENCE," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

THE sun was sinking behind dark hills which formed the horizon, when along a road beside the Mississippi, between the plantations and the dyke formed to protect them from inundations, a young man was riding, evidently a traveller, judging by the knapsack between his shoulders and the valise strapped to the crupper of his mustang. He proceeded at a leisurely pace, surveying the scene around him, which, to an Englishman recently arrived in Louisiana, was novel and interesting: with the huge white herons sailing with flapping wings over the surface of the water, the mocking-birds in the tulip-trees, and flocks of arioles regaling themselves on the luscious berries of the quinquina.

Having crossed the ferry lower down the river, and passed three or four low-built shanties, he was looking out for a fork in the road, where, as a letter had informed him, a guide would join him from the plantation to which he was bound. Punctual to the appointment, a horseman appeared, advancing at a brisk trot: a lanky figure, clad in miscellaneous garments, with a large straw hat, from under which peered out eyes bright as a hawk's. His countenance was sallow, cheek-bones prominent, face long, with peaked nose and pointed beard. Instead of riding forward to meet the traveller, he reined up, waiting for him to approach.

"Hallo, stranger!" he called out when they were within speaking distance: "air you the Britisher hailing last from Jackson City?"

"Yes," replied the young man. "I am going to Magnolia Springs, Mr. Hope's plantation."

"All right, mister; I'm Jotham Binnie, which you've p'raps heerd tell on. Born and raised in Vermont State: mountaynious country, stiff sile. Deputy-bailiff on this here trac'. Blencoe sent me to guide you; but, lor! I say a guide's lumber; for this here road's as broad an' cl'ar as a turnpike in the Old Dominion—it runs chock up to the gate. How do 'ee like your bearings? I rayther calkilate you do, some."

"It is the people who make the place, Mr. Jotham," replied the young man rather sadly; for, a stranger and a wayfarer, he had left his kin and country to seek his fortune in America; and without capital this is a difficult undertaking in any quarter of the globe. As it was, he esteemed himself fortunate in obtaining a clerkship on the plantation of Mr. Hope, one of the richest proprietors in Louisiana.

"True for you," answered Jotham, nodding his head. "I some think you'll find us the right fixings; our boss is true grit; quite considerable smart; he's only been here fourteen year, an' made a fortin, all on his own hook—no pardeners."

"I should say that he has a good head on his shoulders. Has he a wife and family?"

"None on his 'n; he's a widdy—but owns a splendiferous step-darter—a desprit handsome gal. Everythink's a newity to you now, Britisher, but when you've been over our diggin's, and clapt eyes on Isabel, you'll never want to absquotulate."

During the next hour Mr. Binnie's untiring and almost unintelligible tongue never flagged, and by the time they reached the Magnolias, the new-comer was enlightened upon every possible subject connected with the plantation and its owner. He told all he knew—possibly a little more.

The moon had risen, when, entering a thicket of magnificent cotton-trees and hollies, they emerged at the large gates of the plantation. The dwelling-house lay long and white in the soft radiance of the moon, surrounded by a garden of the choicest flowers and fine magnolias, from which it derived its name. Beyond it was a group of houses, inhabited by the overseer, bailiffs, and helps; still farther apart was the negro settlement, working on the rice, cotton, and sugar plantations.

A most hospitable reception awaited the new-comer—who was much fatigued by his journey from New York—at the bailiff's dwelling, where his quarters were assigned.

On the following morning three persons were seated at breakfast at Mr. Hope's residence—the planter himself, a man of about forty years of age, with an intelligent, sunburnt countenance, active and well set-up in figure, dressed in a suit of white linen. A very lovely girl of eighteen, his step-daughter, an heiress in right of her parents: she was, indeed, a favourite of fortune, for she was bright and good, endowed with all these advantages combined. A graceful girl, she was attired in a soft white dress with delicate lace at the neck and wrists. The third person was an elderly lady of matronly appearance, who was engaged in pouring out the coffee: she was the chaperon of Isabel, and also took the direction of Mr. Hope's establishment.

In spite of great heat, the room was delightfully temperate, with its matted floor, many windows and persiennes opening on the verandah which encircled the house, muslin draperies, and profusion of flowers, the air redolent of their perfume. The breakfast-table was luxuriously spread, and perfectly furnished with choice porcelain, silver, and damask, proclaiming wealth and refinement.

"Massa Blencoe and anoder gentleman want to see you, sar," said a young mulatto servant, opening the door.

"Show them into my study; I will come to them," replied Mr. Hope. Then to his step-daughter: "It is the new clerk; I have selected him from upwards of seventy applicants."

"Then I hope he will prove a success," said Isabel.

"And not a crooked stick," commented Madame Santos.

"I will return and finish my breakfast presently. I feel anxious to see him," said the planter, rising.

Upon entering the study, he found the sturdy figure of his overseer and the slight one of the newcomer. Both bowed respectfully. The young man, rested and refreshed after his journey, looked a handsome, fair-complexioned, blue-eyed youth of three-and-twenty, far more resembling the type of young men seen at a cricket-match at Lord's, or one of the crew in an Oxford and Cambridge boat-race, than clerk to a planter.

Mr. Hope's dark eyes looked at him with such intentness, that they brought a faint blush to his open countenance; he took his hand and shook it warmly.

"Welcome to Magnolia Springs," said he kindly. "I am glad to see a countryman here. I trust you will be happy, and find it a true home."

"It'll be his own fault, sir, if he doesn't. And now, p'raps you'd like to talk to him by himself. I only walked up with him to introjuice him, being strange like, so you'll excuse me."

And the overseer took his leave.

"'I have selected him from upwards of seventy applicants.'"

"Sit down," said the planter to the young Englishman, whose eyes glistened with pleasure and surprise at his friendly manner.

"And now, Mr. Breakspear, tell me how it is that the son of your father, who is one of the most respected merchants in the city of London, comes to take a clerkship to a planter in the United States. You have surely not offended him?"

"My father and I have never disagreed in our lives. He is one of the kindest—the best——" He stopped, for his voice grew husky. After a minute's pause he continued, "I came out not only with my father's consent, but by his wish, sir. He thought it best for me to strike out in a new career."

Mr. Hope gazed at his young face with great interest. "You must not think me inquisitive," said he, "but once upon a time I myself was in a merchant's house at New York. One of their most esteemed correspondents was Mr. Breakspear, of Fenchurch Street—influential, wealthy. I own I am curious to hear why an only son (as your letter of application informed me) should descend to an inferior position."

The young man hesitated, then, with eyes cast down, he answered in a very low voice—

"It is because my father has failed."

"What? Failed!" cried the planter, springing to his feet. "I am sorry, very sorry, to hear it. When? How? Tell me."

"Thank you for your sympathy," said young Walter, much moved. "It is a sad story. The calamity has been hanging over us for some time: it began by the sudden collapsing of two banks, one directly following the other. Our trusted manager embezzled and decamped with considerable sums of money; in fact, losses and disasters came, as it seemed, in endless succession: it was blow upon blow. My father is a man who prefers poverty to dishonour; he has sold everything he possessed, and paid his debts—no one has lost by him. This happened recently. I came to America to try my fortune in a new sphere. I saw your advertisement for a clerk in a New York paper directly I landed—and, to my great surprise, I have been fortunate enough to obtain your appointment. How delighted my parents will be, not only at the very handsome salary you offer me, but with your kind, your extremely kind reception of a stranger!"

Gratitude was so plainly expressed on Walter Breakspear's face that the planter was visibly affected.

"And what are your father's intentions for the future?"

"He is retaining part of our London warehouses, and hopes to struggle on in a small way—to try and recover himself."

"Surely for so well-known a house there must be many persons willing to come forward and start it afresh?"

"That has been the case, sir, but my father objects to loans, neither will he sell his name. He wishes to try and re-establish the firm. Fortunately both my sisters are married."

"He will recover—the righteous will not be forsaken. Now, my young friend, we will enter upon your duties, and what I expect of you. Then one of my people shall take you for a ride over some of the plantations."

For two or three days afterwards Mr. Hope seemed much preoccupied, and busily engaged in arranging papers. One morning he sought Madame Santos.

"Madame," said he, "would you be surprised to hear that I find business matters will shortly take me to England?"

"I do not know that it ought to surprise me—but I trust you are going to take Isabel and me with you?"

"That is precisely what I am not going to do. I shall endeavour to transact my affairs as quickly as possible. Things here must go on exactly the same as usual. Not much company, remember; live very quietly. By-the-bye, if you can pay a little attention to young Breakspear, do so."

"He is an agreeable, handsome young man, monsieur," replied Madame Santos, "but allow me to say that the less he and Isabel see of one another, the better. They are both of an impressionable age—it would be neither prudent nor kind to throw them together."

"Act as you think proper, madame. I leave my step-daughter in your hands with the greatest confidence, but I do not think that Isabel has any ideas of what you suggest in her little head. On the whole, I think she rather dislikes the young men of these parts."

"Of these parts, yes; but this one is so different from any we have had visit here. He has fair hair and fine eyes—he is very dangerous. With her large fortune, Isabel must do better."

"Better than worth, good heart, excellent education, and honourable family? Money is not everything."

"It is three parts of everything," replied Madame sententiously.

Within a week of this conversation, having completed his arrangements, Mr. Hope was on his way to England.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.—MARCH 17 TO APRIL 14, 1889.

March 17th.—Christ's Love to the Young.

To read—St. Mark x. 13—22. Golden Text—ver. 14.

I. CHILDREN BLESSED. (13—16.) Christ came to bless all—old and young, rich and poor, sick and well, etc. Have had many lessons about His goodness to grown-up people—to-day's lesson tells of His love for children. Notice three classes of people—

1. The parents.—(a) They brought their children to Christ.

(b) Wished Him to touch them—i.e., put His hands on their heads, saying words of prayer over them. (St. Matt. xix. 13.)

This mode of blessing common amongst Jews. Examples—

Isaac blessed Jacob. (Gen. xxviii. 1.)

Jacob blessed Joseph's sons. (Gen. xlviii. 14.)

So these parents wished Christ to bless their children.

2. The disciples wanted to keep the children away from Christ. Why?

The children might trouble Him.

He too great to care for little ones.

But how much they mistook the character of Christ! He born a babe to show His love for children.

3. Jesus Christ—How did He feel?—

(a) Much displeasure at disciples.

(b) Much goodwill to the parents.

(c) Much tender love to the children.

So He smiled, took the babes in His arms—spake kind words—put hands on them—blessed them.

How are we to be like children?

Full of faith and confidence, as a child to its parent. Gentleness, humility, patience, docility, all characteristics of childhood. These are requirements for Christ's children.

Lessons. 1. Duty to bring children to Christ by prayer and teaching.

2. Danger of keeping back from Christ by bad example, etc.

3. Blessing of coming to Christ.

II. Young Man Unblessed. (17—22.) What did this man show?

(a) Eagerness—by running to reach Christ.

(b) Respect—by kneeling before Him.

(c) Anxiety to be taught by His questions.

(d) Ignorance that Christ was God.

What did our Lord show him?—

(a) Must keep the commandments.

(b) Must live for others as well as self.

(c) Must forsake all at Christ's call.

He could not do this—loved his money too much.

Lesson. The love of money is the root of all evil.

March 24th.—Blind Bartimæus.

To read—St. Mark x. 46—52.

I. The Blind Man. (46—48.) Many people cured by Christ, very few whose name given—only Lazarus, specially loved; Mary Magdalene, specially cured; and Bartimæus (probably), specially known.

Christ did miracles for many reasons—e.g.—

(a) To show He was God—as turning water into wine. (St. John ii. 11.)

(b) To show His compassion—as feeding the multitudes. (St. Matt. xv. 32.)

(c) When specially implored, as in this case.

Blindness specially sad—shuts off from so much.

Bartimæus could not work—could only beg.

But keen sense of hearing—hears tramp of the crowd. What does it mean? Jesus, the wonderful Prophet, is passing. What does he do?

(a) Cries aloud—showing his sense of need.

(b) Cries eagerly and repeatedly—showing his earnestness.

(c) Cries to Christ to help—showing his faith.

Thus his prayer had in it all the elements of true prayer—sense of need, earnestness, faith.

Such a prayer never could be in vain.

II. The Cure. (49—52.) Christ cured people in many ways.

(a) By speaking at a distance—nobleman's son.

(b) By speaking to the person—the leper.

(c) By using means—anointing the eyes. (St. John ix. 6.)

Notice the steps in this case—

(a) He called the blind man to Him.

(b) He questioned him as to his want.

(c) He healed him with a word.

Can also notice the steps on the blind man's side—

(a) He called out in hope that Christ would hear.

(b) He cast off his outer robe in eagerness to get to Christ.

(c) He answered readily in faith in Christ's power.

(d) He followed Him in gratitude for his recovery of sight.

Let teacher point out the two persons together.

The blind man in his sad condition—object of pity.

Christ in His majestic greatness—able and willing to help.

What brought them together? The man's faith—Christ's word.

III. Lessons. Blindness a type of man's natural state.

(a) He cannot see the things of God. (1 Cor. ii. 14.) Like the Pharisees. (St. John ix. 41.)

(b) He cannot understand God's Word. (Ps. cxix. 18.)

(c) He cannot know the way to heaven.

What must he have to be saved?—

(a) A sense of need—to cry for mercy.

(b) Strong faith—to call upon God.

(c) Perseverance—not to be discouraged.

Christ waiting to be gracious. Therefore—

"Just as I am, poor, naked, blind—
Sight, riches, healing of the mind,
Yea, all I want, in Thee to find
O Lamb of God, I come.

MARCH 31ST.—REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

HAVE had twelve lessons from St. Mark's Gospel on the Life of Christ. What have they taught us? We have seen—

I. Christ as a Man—living on earth.

II. Christ as a King—conquering Satan.

III. Christ as a Teacher—teaching by parables, calling disciples.

IV. Christ with the sick and blind—leper, etc.

V. Christ with the young — blessing children, etc.

VI. Christ as Messiah, sent from God.

Notice three points in each—

I. CHRIST AS A MAN. Question on His life on earth.

1. Going about with disciples, mostly in fishing villages of Galilee—holy in life.

2. On Sabbaths always going to worship in synagogue—devout in conduct.

3. Always kind, gentle, sympathetic in manner.

II. CHRIST AS A KING. 1. Way prepared by John the Baptist.

2. Showed His power over all disease.

3. Conquered Satan in person of evil spirits.

III. CHRIST AS A TEACHER. 1. Explained Scripture in the synagogues.

2. Taught parables from nature—e.g., the sower.

3. Called out and instructed twelve disciples.

IV. CHRIST WITH THE SICK. 1. Compassion to the lepers.

2. Encouragement to the timid woman.

3. Readiness to heal Bartimæus.

V. CHRIST WITH THE YOUNG. 1. Blessings to little children.

2. Encouragement to parents.

3. Caution against leading children to sin.

VI. CHRIST AS MESSIAH. 1. Claims homage from all.

2. Requires self-denial in His followers.

3. Promises future rewards.

Now see what are our duties in consequence—

I. Christ as a Man. We are to copy His example (1 Pet. ii. 21), keeping Sabbath-day holy—upright in life—gentle and courteous to all around.

II. Christ as a King. We must bow down to Him. Give up hearts, wills, lives to His service. Do nothing He would not approve.

III. Christ as a Teacher. Study His sayings—try to understand them—read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest. His word is indeed a lamp to our feet, and a light to our path. (Ps. cxix. 105.)

IV. Christ with the Sick. Can we not try like Him always to be doing some good? Sympathy, friendly offices, etc. The poor are always with us. (St. Mark xiv. 7.)

V. Christ with the Young. Children can help one another by example, influence, little deeds of kindness, etc.

VI. Christ as Messiah. As God's Son — our Saviour—demands surrender of ourselves to Him—all the faith, love, devotion we can give Him. Must confess Him here if would reign with Him hereafter.

APRIL 7TH.—THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY.

To read—St. Mark xi. 1—11. Golden Text—Zech. ix. 9.

I. PREPARATION. (1—6.) Christ now coming near to His death—going to pay His last visit to Jerusalem. Had been there often before.

Dedicated in the Temple when forty days old. (St. Luke ii. 22.)

Kept Passover there when twelve years old.

Cleansed Temple when began His ministry. (St. John ii. 15.)

Kept the various appointed feasts.

But the Jews there rejected Him—stoned Him. (St. John viii. 59.)

Therefore, most of His mighty works done in Galilee.

Still wished to visit the city once more—to come as King to His own people. So arranges a triumphal visit.

(a) Stops at Bethany, two miles off, on slope of Mount of Olives.

(b) Sends two disciples to the village.

(c) Tells them exactly where to find the ass.

(d) Prepares them for objections from the owner.

(e) Assures them of his willingness to let the ass go.

What did this show on Christ's part?—

Omniscience in knowing all that should happen.

Omnipotence in moving the owner's heart.

Therefore, He must indeed be God.

LESSONS. 1. The Lord hath need—because He chose to have need. He condescended to accept human help.

He still has need of all we can do for Him and His people.

2. The blessing of a willing mind. The owner's ass was used by Christ, and helped on His triumph. (Golden text.)

So all things done for Him are for His glory.

II. THE TRIUMPH. (7—11.) Picture the entry to Jerusalem—

Jesus rides in front on the colt—meek and lowly.

The people throw their garments on the ground.

Palm-branches strawed and waved in triumph.

Hosannas sung by all in praise.

What does all this show on their part?

(a) Acknowledgment of Christ as their King.

(b) Welcome to Him as the Messiah.

(c) Praise to God for sending His Son.

What does it show as regards Jerusalem?

(a) Probation. This was its day of grace.

(b) Mercy. Christ came to it as its Saviour.

(c) Fickleness. In four days the same people shouted, "Crucify!"

Remind of all that had been done for Jerusalem.

(a) Chosen by God as the favoured city (Ps. xlviii. 1, 2.)

(b) Hallowed by the Temple being built there.

(c) Visited thrice yearly by all pious Jews. (Deut. xvi. 16.)

(d) Warned by the prophet. (Isaiah i. 1.)

(e) Wept over by Christ. (St. Luke xix. 41.)

What more could God have done?

LESSONS. Let Jerusalem be a warning—

1. Great privileges involve great responsibilities.

2. Day of grace slighted will bring down vengeance.

3. Now is the accepted time.

XUM

APRIL 14TH.—THE REJECTED SON.

To read—St. Mark xii. 1—12. Golden Text—St. John i. 11.

I. THE PARABLE. (1—9.) This the last week of Christ's earthly life.

Spent part of this day teaching in the Temple.

Had ridden in triumph to the city.

Cleansed the Temple of those who profaned it.

Argued with the chief priests as to His authority (xi. 27).

Now speaks a parable against them. Why?—

(a) They despised and rejected Him.

(b) They stirred up the people against Him.

The parable founded on a story such as was not uncommon—

(a) The vineyard planted by the owner with great care.

(b) Hedge for protection, tower for watchman, wine-vat for pressing juice, all complete.

(c) Leased to others during the owner's absence.

(d) Servant sent for fruits—beaten and killed,

(e) Son sent at last—despised and rejected.

(f) Punishment to follow on these wicked men.

II. THE MEANING. So easy, seen by the people at once. Owner of the vineyard—God.

(a) The vineyard—the Jewish Church.

(b) The hedge—God's protection.

(c) The servants—the prophets.

(d) The Son—Jesus Christ. (Golden Text.)

(e) The rejection—Christ crucified.

(f) The punishment—Jerusalem destroyed, Jews scattered.

But the rejected stone became the head-stone.

Christ, once crucified, will put down all enemies. (1 Cor. xv. 25.)

Instances of prophets persecuted—

Prophets destroyed by Jezebel. (1 Kings xix. 1.)

Jeremiah imprisoned. (Jer. xxxiii. 1.)

Daniel put in lions' den, etc.

Instances of Christ being rejected—

At Nazareth, when taught in synagogue. (St. Luke iv. 29.)

At Jerusalem, for healing on the Sabbath. (St. John v. 16.)

And many other times.

LESSONS. 1. What think ye of Christ?

(a) Some despise Him—care not to follow in His ways.

(b) Some reject Him—openly sin against Him.

(c) Some persecute Him—mock at those who love Him.

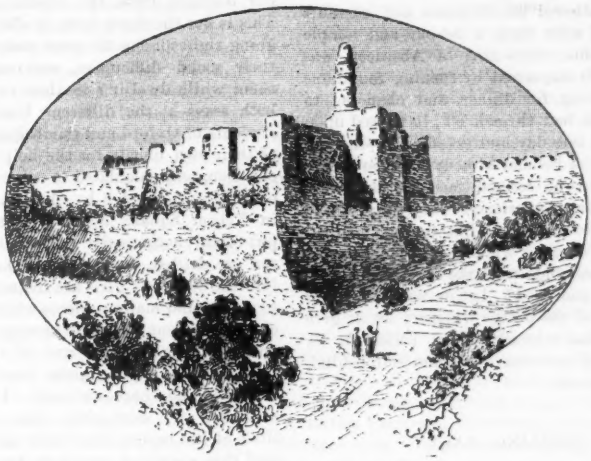
But the same Saviour, despised of men, sits at God's right hand, and is coming to judge all. Therefore—

2. Kiss ye the Son, lest He be angry.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

SEED-SOWING.



THE light is surely breaking across the vast land of India, since Christianity is breathing hope and liberty to women whose race has been oppressed for generations. "We have entrance to quite 1,000 houses in Calcutta," writes a lady worker connected with the Baptist Missionary Society, "and might open many more with added help." A constant correspondence is kept up with several women formerly visited, and tracts are sent them monthly. Children carry home sweet Christian hymns, pupils go forth from the Zenana Mission to take charge of village schools, and portions of Scripture are distributed broadcast at festivals and in quiet, lonely dwellings. All this does not go forward without opposition; we read of tracts flung in the ladies' faces, of abuse, and prejudice, and mud-throwing. Nevertheless, at one festival forty-two gospels and nearly 200 hymn-books were sold to the people. A girl of nineteen came to the missionaries, knowing of Christianity only through portions of Scripture that had come in her way. Being married, she was restored to her husband, who was most grateful for the protection the Mission had given her, and there are hopes that both husband and wife may profess Christianity. Speaking of the Bengali tendency to deceit, the missionary exclaims, "Oh, that I may live Christ myself before my pupils!" Is not this the yearning, too, of every teacher at home, dreading to put, by unconscious example, any hindrance in the way of those to whom we would fain show the Lord? If only Christians would be Christians, our sister cries yearningly, India would be won for Jesus; but there are some professing Christians who somehow look on missions with indifference if not with hostility. They are so accustomed to the natives as idolaters and Mohammedans that missionary zeal appears to them "much ado about nothing;" but in some sense every Christian ought to be a missionary, working out the fulfilment of the Lord's parting words, "Go ye out into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

THE VEIL OF MYSTERY.

Ministers are often disquieted by perplexing questions—there are certain hearers who do not seem quite happy unless engulfed in prophetical difficulties, and various problems are propounded for pastoral solution, patience and forbearance being thus called forth into valiant exercise. "But I have seldom," says a pastor, "felt so nonplussed as when a little child brought me this question to answer—'Why does A come before B in the alphabet?'" The little brain was not content to be told, "Because it is in the spelling-book," or "Because it has always been so," or even "Because teacher says that is right." She took the problem to the minister, and he owns he felt at a loss. He did his best to satisfy the little inquirer, and, fortunately for their elders, children's questions can be diverted, frequently, by the "biscuit or confectionery plum;" but it occurred to him afterwards that many perplexities concerning which arguments go on from year to year are as difficult of settlement, and, after all, as immaterial as the child's mental difficulty. There are certain points that give rise to disputes wordy and literary; but God has cast across them a veil of mystery, through which His sun will shine at last. Had He meant those mysteries to be quite plain to our vision, He would have left no perplexity surrounding them. It is not of the first importance that we should understand all the Divine workings: the one thing needful is the surrender of our will to God's, and that we follow where the Master leads. And if our own life and circumstances be veiled with mystery now, let us not keep asking why and wherefore, but let us be still, our hearts fixed on Christ, our faith content to wait till we know fully as we are known.

"Till the word of God hath broken
All life's mysteries, good or ill,
Be thou still."

THE JAFFA GATE, JERUSALEM.

CHRISTIAN PROGRESS IN THE EAST.

Last November the Mission House in Jerusalem (connected with Mrs. Meredith's far-reaching enterprises) was opened by prayer and praise; the first hymn sung was, "O God of Bethel"—that familiar strain with which Livingstone was long since laid to rest in Westminster Abbey. One after another, God's servants go forth into the vineyard beneath His protecting care; into all parts of the world His truth is penetrating, and yearning hearts long to make Jerusalem again a praise and glory in the earth. "It is down-trodden and forsaken-looking," the deaconesses report; "how different this must be from the Jerusalem which our Lord wept over!" The Mission House is on the high road to Jerusalem, outside the Jaffa Gate. Beautiful texts adorn the walls, and friends have contributed a piano and an American organ—the deaconesses hope to be able to teach the children of missionaries and teachers, as well as preach the Gospel around, and nurse the sick.

LIFE'S TURNING-POINTS.

We all know those familiar words of Shakespeare concerning the "tide in the affairs of men, which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune." Even in temporal affairs some small circumstance or opportunity has often changed the current of our career; and spiritual life also has its "turning-points"—those solemn moments when the soul stands face to face with Divine Truth, and reaches a never-to-be-forgotten crisis. We hold in our hands an interesting book on this subject by Mary E. Beck—"Turning-Points" (Hodder and Stoughton). Here we are shown some crises in the history of eminent Christians that turned their steps resolutely from darkness unto God. We read of Augustine of Hippo, seeking for truth, crying for deliverance, hearing a child's voice from a neighbouring house, Tolle—lege, "Take—read." The words were like a message to him; he opened the sacred page, and his eye lighted on these solemn words: "Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh." The wandering heart cast itself upon Christ, and the fetters of sin were broken. We find mention, too, of Bunyan, strolling about Bedford, chancing to overhear the happy religious converse of three or four poor women, and being so much affected by their words, that the effect was as if a spark had fallen among tinder. Judson, the great missionary, was solemnised by the fact that in the next room to his own at a wayside inn a young student died one night, and Judson could not rid his mind of the questions, "Was he prepared?" and what would his own deistical companions say or do at such a crisis? Knill was converted through being present at family prayers in the house of a tradesman, who gathered his shopmen and servants together, and held with them a devout and simple service. Lord Haddo, fifth Earl of Aberdeen, was deeply and strangely impressed by turning round one evening after dressing for dinner, and chancing to notice the clothes he had thrown off; it flashed upon him that he would one day undress finally—that he would be unclothed of his mortal body—and so deeply was he moved that he seemed face to face with eternity. Our human experiences vary, our opportunities and impressions differ; but to each and all of us is there not an hour when God's Spirit strives with us mightily, and bids us make our solemn, life-long choice of God and good? Let us not harden our hearts at the hour of the Divine whisper; let us give thanks that God has remembered us, called to us, chosen and ordained us to leave sin and self behind, and to be His witnesses.

THE "SHILLING BABY."

"Can a mother forget her child?" asks the Word of God, and human experience shows us so much of neglect, hard-heartedness, desertion, that with wonderment we confess it is possible to come to the end of a mother's tenderness. "Yet will I not forget thee," says the Almighty. And to many—whom drink and crime have robbed of their natural protectors, their Father in heaven has raised up friends who have saved them from drifting to shipwreck. Dr. Barnardo, in his yearning to befriend the young, has purchased little waifs before now. He obtained a little boy and girl from their begging mother for seven shillings and sixpence once, and he tells a pathetic tale of his "shilling baby," a miserable little forsaken creature that crawled about a lodging-house near Ratcliff Highway. A woman, who was supposed to have charge of it, though it belonged to people who had wandered away, offered to sell it for ten shillings, and finally arrived, in a drunken condition, to say Dr. Barnardo could have it for a shilling. He secured the baby, and it was sent to Ilford, where there proved to be neither beginning nor end to its apparel; the clothes had all to be cut away, and it turned out that baby's plaything, sucked at intervals with gravity, was an old fishbone wrapped in rag. A more wretched child could scarcely be imagined; but some time after, Dr. Barnardo was at tea in one of the cottage homes at Ilford, and the cottage pet, a chubby, blue-eyed, curly-haired little girl, was installed in her high chair beside him. He could not quite recall the winsome baby's name, and asked the cottage mother whence she had come. "Why," she whispered, "do you not remember? She is the shilling baby!" "Then," says Dr. Barnardo, "from my soul I thanked God for enabling me to hold out to this forlorn child the golden sceptre of a mercy that would, by His grace, purify and bless its whole life."

THE WOMEN'S UNIVERSITY ASSOCIATION.

A preacher once remarked that some people extend their charity as we hold out buns to a bear—keeping our distance from the objects of our benevolence. This is not the finest form of charity; and the idea of going right among the poor, seeing and understanding their social difficulties, and endeavouring to help them while dwelling in their midst, has occurred to both sexes at the different Universities. The lady-students of Oxford and Cambridge have now a society of their own, chiefly for the help of poor women and children, and calculated to solve the difficult problem of raising character by charity. Their residence is in Nelson Square, Southwark, and their efforts are put forth energetically in various directions. Children are drilled, taught, shown how to play, sent out into the country; girls are instructed as to sanitation, economy, and many subjects which will improve their condition—tennis and swimming are not forgotten; and the lady-residents are, of course, at liberty to take part in any religious work carried on by the churches and chapels around. Pupil-teachers, young servants, and work-girls, tired mothers who know little of life beyond their own sphere of work, should find this society a means of rest, uplifting, and recreation. There are wise words in the report of the treasurer of the Pupil Teachers' Association:—"This work is nothing if it is not a religious work; the games and concerts and classes are the means, and not the end." Hope and faith point to the time when the grimy babies of the present shall be good and industrious women, because those who strive to better their fate would fain teach their relatives to hunger and thirst after righteousness, and to learn the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom.

"FORGIVENESS FULL AND FREE."

A minister told a little anecdote concerning his niece, that illustrates a child's strong faith in the efficacy of prayer, and her joy in the Divine forgiveness. A sudden coldness took possession of the child towards her uncle. He could not understand her changed aspect, nor her evident disapproval; sternness took the place of fun, and he could only wonder at the mystery. The little one's demeanour was not explained till she was kneeling at her evening prayer, when she was heard to plead, "Oh, God, forgive my uncle for taking that lump of sugar." He then recollected that, as he sat chatting at the tea-table, he had put a piece of loaf-sugar in his mouth, an act which his niece's quick eyes had observed, and which had troubled her heart ever since on his behalf. No sooner had she uttered this prayer, however, than she felt certain it had been answered—her uncle was forgiven, and she gladly and freely made friends with him again as pardoned and reclaimed. Would that our own faith were more akin to the unquestioning trust of a little child! Let us in very truth believe the Lord hears and answers our supplications.

GOSPEL WORK IN PARIS.

One summer Sunday in 1857, a lady was resting in the Tuileries Gardens, waiting till some Protestant place of worship should open; a child on the same bench was playing with a book, and the lady gladly recognised it as a French New Testament. She entered into conversation with the child's father as to the preciousness of the Word of God, and he proved to be the colporteur of a Protestant mission, in connection with which a prayer-meeting was held that morning in a large upper room. She was so much interested in the evangelist of the little community, M. Vignal, that she has done her utmost to stir up Christian people to pray for his work and help it forward. Many encouraging testimonies show the work has not been in vain: we hear of earnest, impressive services held at the cemeteries, of house-to-house visitation, of infidels affected, converts continuing faithful, children asking for Bibles for their parents, and such cases as that of a Sunday-scholar who, when dying, was offered a medal of the Virgin, but replied, "No, M. le curé, this medal can do nothing for me; all I need is within this Word of God." At present—perhaps through the joyful fact that other agencies are now at work for the evangelisation of France—the brook of financial help seems drying up; but the good work is earnestly commended to the prayers of God's people, and contributions towards M. Vignal's support will be gladly received by Lady Congleton, 53, Great Cumberland Place, W., or by Miss E. W. Clift, 10, Trafalgar Terrace, St. Mary Church Road, Torquay.

IN OTHER LANDS.

The production of versions of the Bible in native languages grows apace. We have now before us an interesting work, by the Rev. A. W. Murray, upon "The Bible in the Pacific" (Nisbet), in which he tells the story of the difficulties which had to be overcome before the now numerous translations of God's Word into the languages of the Pacific Islands could be accomplished. Incidentally the work gives many interesting pictures of missionary life and labour in these far-away regions, and we can appraise at something like their real value the sacrificing, self-denying labours of those who have gone out, that a people who sat in darkness may see the Great Light. Naturally Bible translation is an invaluable aid to the missionaries, and one that they, as well as all Christians, are anxious to extend. One of the labourers in this distant mission-field, to whom Mr. Murray alludes in his book, was the Rev. J. G. Paton, whose work lay in the islands of Tanna and Niua, or, as it is sometimes called, Aniwa, islands in the New Hebrides group. An interesting autobiography of this heroic ambassador of the cross has just been published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. The work is only carried down to the point at which he was obliged to forsake the island of Tanna, and is full of the details of the interesting though deadly warfare with circumstances that were, for a time, too strong for the missionary in this region, but which at last bore glorious fruit in the after success which attended missions on this very island, from which Mr. Paton was driven in 1862. Mr. Paton promises a second part of his autobiography, if the first is found useful and interesting by the public. We feel sure that his friends, and his Scotch friends especially, will demand the fulfilment of this purpose at his hands.—From a story of missionary struggle and enterprise in the far Pacific, to an account of a pilgrimage to the Christian Churches of Eastern Europe and Western Asia, is a wide leap. The Rev. T. G. Clark, of Graz, in Austria, has much to tell that is deeply interesting concerning the churches of Russia and Eastern Europe in his "Christianity East and West" (Hodder and Stoughton). The work strikes us as being a little lacking in order, but it gives some very valuable information, and is the work of one well able to deal with the subject.

JONAH AND HIS GOURD.

Dr. Hutchinson sends us the following communication on this subject:—"In reading the wondrous story of Jonah, we are apt to overlook the difficulties of the journey he was, for the second time, called upon to undertake. From the trans-Jordanic frontier of the kingdom of Israel, Nineveh was about 420 miles to the north-east, on the left bank of the Hiddekel, or Tigris, the Euphrates intervening about 170 miles to the south-west. Thus, a march of forty-two days, at least, not including halts, and crossing the two great rivers, lay before him, and each day, as he advanced, grew warmer and warmer. Crossing the Tigris and entering the suburbs of Nineveh, his message of impending woe is accepted by the king and his subjects, and a solemn fast, with mighty supplication to God, is ordered, and universally carried out. 'And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way, and God repented of the evil. . . . and He did it not.' Jonah dares to remonstrate at this act of mercy, and, sullen and resentful, he makes himself a booth outside the city, and to its east, doubtless of the reeds growing on the river-side. In similar localities, such huts are common in India, and are quickly run up of two reed screens leaning against one another, a triangular one fixed at one end, and a similar movable one at the entrance. To protect him from the heat (for all such structures are more or less translucent), 'the Lord God prepared a gourd' to run up and over the reed hut, 'that it might be a shadow over his head.' Now, what was this 'gourd'? The Hebrew word is kikaijon (j pronounced as y), supposed by commentators to indicate the Palma Christi, the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant; now, considering the slow growth of this plant, so common in India, the non-umbrageousness of its foliage, as well as the acridity (common to all Euphorbiaceæ) of its juices, I don't think it can represent the 'gourd.' But let us deal literally with the great Natural Order of the gourds (Cucurbitaceæ), and in any one of them we can meet the requirements of rapid and umbrageous growth, up and over the booth, a thorough protection from solar heat; and thus, in India, you see them growing over many a hut, thatched or tiled. Further, as we are in the hot season, the Tigris would be low, and its edges and sand-banks would be utilised, as in India, for the growth of pumpkins, melons, cucumbers, and numerous other members of the gourd family. Jonah's gourd may, I think, be identified with the Indian kăkrī, where the root, two k's, may represent that of the similarly provided Hebrew kĭkaijon. While writing the above I am pleased to find the LXX. rendering 'gourd' by κολοκύνθη, Cucumis colocynthis, Nat. Order Cucurbitaceæ, or gourd family. When Jonah's gladness, on account of the shelter afforded by the gourd, was at its height, 'God prepared a worm when the morning rose next day, and it smote the gourd that it withered." Whatever the nature of this 'worm,' it is obvious that a castor-oil tree, six to eight feet high (as it would need to be to overshadow Jonah's booth), with its thick stem and large rootlets, would be more difficult to destroy than the slender half- to one-inch stem and tender rootlets of a gourd. Further, the castor-oil plant, in India, is notoriously free from attack, above or below ground; cattle won't touch its leaves, nor will white ants (the great underground destroyers of India) attack its roots or stem; but they think nothing of cutting the roots of all cucurbitaceous plants. I have seen a gourd climbing over a hut destroyed thus in one night by white ants, which are generically known as kīra (worm), and specifically as dīmăk, white ant. Was it the white ant which smote the gourd so that it perished in a night? I venture to think it was—that is, if white ants are as common in Asiatic Turkey as they are in India."

"The buds are blowing."

"OCCUPY TILL I COME."

Life has been compared to a leasehold possession, and eternity to a freehold; let us beware lest we reverse this truth in our own minds, and lay hold upon the things of this life as though absolutely and entirely our own. They are entrusted to us by our Master, to be used for Him and for those less privileged than ourselves. Money carries with it immense responsibility, for when the great day of reckoning shall come, we must give an account of our stewardship, and show if we laid out our gold to interest by lending to the poor and furthering the triumphs of the Gospel. For the richest among us an hour will come when our fingers can close around no shining coins, when only one Book—and that not our bank-book—will be of interest to us, and when we shall have no pockets to carry away our possessions to the Home where the rich and the poor meet together. Though the rich are surrounded by temptations, the fact remains, to God's glory, that very many among them are spending their money as His stewards; and it is unfair to cry down all capitalists, for, as a City Missionary explained to some socialists, Christian capitalists have raised and supported almshouses, asylums, schools, churches, and many invaluable agencies for good. May it be a matter for our personal consideration how we are expending the property we possess; the Master stands beside the treasury—may we all take to heart the good advice of Holmes: "Put not your trust in money, but put your money in trust."

THE TRIUMPH OF SPRING.

"Spring, who did scatter all her wealth last year,
Had gone to Heaven for more."

So sings the poet; and his words seem fulfilled as violets and primroses stir and wake, and the gold of crocus and daffodil shines out through mist and rain. Again the annual resurrection goes on in our midst, with its marvels of glory—"the great annual miracle of the blossoming of Aaron's rod." The flowers were late last year in bidding us good-bye; in our own garden, primroses and stocks smiled a welcome to Christmas, and from various parts of England we heard of rosebuds in the gardens even in December; but at last the brave blossoms died away one by one, and frost and cold held sovereign sway. So has it seemed to us in life sometimes; the leaf and flower have faded, darkness has settled down upon our spirits, death has taken away the lives that seemed dearer than our own, and Winter seems sovereign eternally. But our Lord, says Luther, has written "the promise of resurrection in every leaf of spring:" the buds are blowing in bright expansion now; very soon the south winds will breathe blessing to hill and vale, and the frozen brooklets will again make summer music; for there is a Love that conquers death, and the eternal life of Jesus is the assurance of comfort, joy, and light, that most surely will arise. Why should we sorrow for our lost as those that have no hope, when even now fresh, innocent daisies are beginning to awaken in God's-acre, and the dews of spring are baptising anew the grasses on the graves? Nature's text is Immortality—life beautiful and strong, with powers renewed, life bright with new-born hopes, and tender with sweet memories, because hill and valley and every human heart are in the keeping of the Lord of love. Our thoughts go back to our happy childhood; our visions go forward by faith to that nearing land of everlasting spring, now that the winter is past, the flowers appear, and the time of the singing of birds is come.

THE TRIUMPH OF SPRING.

THE PASTORAL EPISTLES.

Dr. Plummer's able work on the "Pastoral Epistles" (Hodder and Stoughton) is less an exposition of the sacred text than a collection of essays on the principal topics of the apostolic letters. In the course of these essays Dr. Plummer deals with many questions which have formed the subject of more or less heated controversy amongst theologians, and has dealt with one or two of those subjects in a somewhat partisan spirit. The writer's wide and ripe scholarship is manifest throughout a volume which it is impossible not to read with keen and unflagging interest; but we doubt whether it would not have been more profitable to the ordinary reader to have been presented with a more general and less controversial volume, in which should be presented the more practical teachings of this portion of the apostolic writings.

LODGING-HOUSES FOR WANDERING CHILDREN.

As a friendly trap for many little feet, Dr. Barnardo has undertaken a much-needed scheme of lodging-houses for wandering boys and girls, so as to save them from contaminating associations. His two "common lodging-houses" offer shelter to homeless waifs at the nominal charge of a penny; this includes a good meal, and we fancy, should the penny be absent, there is not much chance that the little "pilgrim of the night" will be turned away while there is room. Amid Dr. Barnardo's numerous philanthropic efforts, none seems more pressing and important than this plan for the saving of children from the surroundings of common lodging-houses. And this nightly shelter may be the means by which many more destitute waifs shall come within the influence of the Doctor's Homes, so that a few years hence the wandering match- or flower-seller may be the healthy, happy emigrant perhaps to Canada. Many know the history of the boy-waif who heard of Dr. Barnardo, and walked up to Stepney from the Midlands, to be received beneath his sheltering care. Not very long ago this lad went out to Canada, and to a lady who bade him good-bye he said, confidentially, "I am the boy who walked up from the Midlands. I am the boy mentioned in the paper; it says Dr. Barnardo put his hand on my shoulder at Exeter Hall, and I looked up into his face with a pleasing smile." The press report had made a deep impression upon John; instead of "nobody's child" he found himself a hero, and as heroes are made out of honest work and Christian purpose and goodwill, it cannot be doubted that Stepney Causeway has made many a hero out of the rough, neglected, friendless material of the streets.

THE MASTER'S CARE.

"I feel such a nuisance to other people," said one, in half-fretful allusion to his many infirmities; and this is a great trial to those who are weak—the sense oppresses them at times that they may be tiring out the patience of their friends. The idea is frequently a grievous mistake, for they do not realise how their very weakness endears them to those who minister to their needs. Still less do we comprehend how very close and precious to His heart are the feeble sheep of the Master's flock, how His care enwraps them, how He understands their deepest need and thinks upon them constantly. The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse relates that he was walking once beside some cliffs, when he saw a father draw near with his children—the two boys were running on in front, and every now and then the father called to them to be careful, and gave them various directions for their safety. But he was leading the little girl slowly and gently, for she was blind. Presently he sat down beside her, and told her all the beauties of the vision, cheering her by many a tender thought. He never let his healthy boys go beyond his sight, his care, but the blind child he held continually by the hand. So let the weak ones be cheered and encouraged by the thought that for them there are special promises, special assurances of care; thank God, none of us can drift beyond the reach of His love, but His feeble, helpless children He is holding by the hand.

THE EAST LONDON EVANGELISATION SOCIETY.

This association exists to hold Gospel services in the kitchens of common lodging-houses, to supply Evangelical preachers, to provide shelter and food for the homeless and destitute, and to distribute helpful literature. "Our primary object," say our friends of the mission, "is to point men and women to a personal and living Christ." A lodging-house congregation includes those who were once respectable—thieves, beggars, and "all sorts and conditions of men;" it is often a saddening spectacle for those on their way to places of worship, when they see by the wayside tramps and vagrants who seem to have no part in the Sabbath benediction, except the whisper of the flowers and the calm shining of God's sunlight—it is to such as these that the Gospel is carried in their humble haunts, and poor vagrants hear through the Lodging-House Mission of Him who came down from heaven to call sinners to repentance. A tract fell into the hands of a trainer of young thieves; he was startled by its title, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life," and he gave up his evil calling, and prayed for pardon and salvation. The Society aims at bringing every lodging-house in London under religious influences. The office is at 29, Senrab Street, Stepney, and we may add that every officer connected with it is working without pecuniary compensation.

FOR PULPIT AND PEW.

We have spoken before of the previous volumes of the "Biblical Illustrator" as they were published, and have commended them to the attention of preachers. The volume on the Epistle to the Galatians is now issued by Messrs. Nisbet, and in it the editor, the Rev. J. S. Exell, has gathered a most useful collection of anecdotes and illustrations bearing upon the chapters and verses in their own order. The illustrations are gathered from widely different sources, but are well adapted to form an eminently useful and handy commentary on the Bible text.—The same publishers have added to their "Men of the Bible" series a volume on Daniel, by the Rev. H. Deane, B.D., which is likely to prove useful to teachers as well as to preachers. The volume is a worthy addition to an excellent series.—Mrs. Bayly's "Life and Letters of Mrs. Sewell" (same publishers) is a record of the life and work of that devoted member of the Society of Friends, which may be read with much interest by many who did not know her or her work during her lifetime. The autobiographical chapters with which the work opens are especially interesting.—A series of sermons to young men upon "David, the Man after God's own Heart," has been published for the Rev. H. E. Stone by Messrs. Nisbet. The addresses were productive of much good at the time of their delivery, and we trust that they will be found more widely useful in their present form.—In the series of little volumes entitled "Heart Chords," Messrs. Cassell have issued new editions of several of the works which have been unusually popular. No word from us is needed to direct our readers' attention to works by writers so well known to them as Dean Chadwick, Professor Blaikie, the Bishop of Ripon, the Rev. P. B. Power, and Bishop Oxenden. The present edition of "My Bible," which is the Bishop of Ripon's contribution to the series, is the third, and the works by the other four writers whom we have mentioned are all in their second edition, as are the remaining works in the series, with the exception of Archdeacon Farrar's "My Object in Life," which has reached a sixth edition. Dealing, as these handy little manuals do, with distinct departments of Christian life and experience they are specially suitable for reading by those who are new to the Christian life, and so would form acceptable presents for young people, to whom they are likely to prove very helpful.—We do not quite see why "The City of Faith," by Mr. S. R. Bleau, M.A. (Elliot Stock), has been issued. Professedly it is made up to a large extent of quotations from "able and well-known writers," and we cannot see any useful purpose to be served by their republication in their present form.—"The Circle of Seasons" (same publisher) is a collection of hymns and verses by R. E. V., some of which are very musical, though as a whole the work is unequal.—Messrs. C. Burnet and Co. have just published, under the title "Every Morning," a series of "First Thoughts for First Hours," by the Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D. In his preface, which he quaintly calls "Fore-words," Dr. Parker explains that the work is intended to act as a disciplinary spur, calling upon his readers to wait every morning upon God in prayer.—"The Story of Genesis," by Frances Younghusband (Longmans), is a recapitulation, safe and simple in form, of the story of the first book of the Bible, admirably adapted for children's reading. In a little volume entitled "Newly-Enlisted," Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler has published (through Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton) a series of talks with young converts, which all who remember our paper upon its author will be prepared to welcome as a valuable addition to the library of preacher and teacher, and it might well serve as a timely gift to those who have but recently "named the name of Christ."

A FAR-AWAY HOME FOR FAR-AWAY WANDERERS.

In one of the main streets of the much-frequented port Yokohama, stands a Sailors' Institute, erected in 1881, chiefly by means of contributions from ships' officers and men. It consists of a dining-room, a reading-room furnished with five hundred volumes, many good papers, and writing materials, and an up-stairs dormitory containing eighteen beds; also a hall, lately added, for Gospel, temperance, and other meetings, where a daily religious service is held. The Christian English couple in charge of the work visit ships in port, supply them with bags of books and tracts, look after sailors in hospital and in the Consulate gaol ; while at their home, adjoining the Institute, there is ever a welcome for Jack, and a ready personal sympathy. A few weeks ago an English seaman, tempted to excess by the vile Chinese spirit, Sam-shu, was left behind, discharged, when his ship sailed from Yokohama. His own destitution caused him less distress than an order sent home stopping the half-pay given to wife and children during his absence. Humbled and broken-hearted, he came to the manager of the Institute, and they two, with a Christian visitor, held a little prayer-meeting in the dormitory, pleading that, unlikely as it seemed, some new employment might be found for him. A few days later his ex-captain unexpectedly returned, and was found willing to give him another trial, and at once to reverse the aforesaid directions sent to head-quarters.

THE CRIPPLES' NURSERY.

THE CRIPPLES' NURSERY.

It is not possible for hospitals, as a rule, to take in cases which will evidently require years of care and nursing ; all the more reason, therefore, for institutions like the Cripples' Nursery, Park Place, Clarence Gate, Regent's Park. Many cases stand a good chance of cure if treated wisely in infancy and early childhood. Nature is a splendid doctor, and increasing years, if they bring with them the advantages of warmth and food and prudent attention, may be far brighter than the weakness of babyhood seemed to foretell. Through the Christian thought of two ladies the Cripples' Nursery was founded some years ago. Here the elder children may be seen in the schoolroom, taking a few proud steps to show increasing strength, learning to knit and mend, and storing their minds with religious and useful knowledge. In the room above, other children are resting or playing with their toys ; and in a sheltered garden, those who cannot be taken out in perambulators lie playing on their mattresses. There is a Seaside Home at Margate, the balcony of which almost overhangs the sea, and to this breezy Home the children are sent in rotation, deriving much benefit from their stay beside old Ocean. We read that they have several kind juvenile benefactors, whose portraits are their pride and delight. One boy chooses for his birthday present "cake for the cripples ;" and another, with his little sister, puts by a store of pocket-money for the Home. If the parents who measure their bonnie growing bairns so gladly, and boast of "baby's weight," will send a thank-offering to the Home at Clarence Gate, then more efficiently than ever the hands which hang down will be lifted up, and the feeble knees will be strengthened.

"DUST-AND-ASHES CHRISTIANS."

Religion has been likened to a knife that cuts away cancers of sin, and carves out monuments of beauty ; but there are worthy religious people to be found here and there who are consistent, resigned, eminent as to goodness, but whom nobody would associate with beauty, and no little child would run after them shouting and plucking them by the garments. "Dust-and-ashes Christians," we heard a preacher call them once ; it would be well for us to examine ourselves, and ask if we come within this category—for this class of Christians will never recommend religion to the outside world, or show its hopefulness, its peace, its victory over gloom. The preacher referred to prescribed some cures for unholy despondency : "Keep an open road between the soul and Heaven," he said ; "let prayers ascend and God's blessings come down ; let there be real communion with the Lord—look away from self to Him." And make use of the gifts that prayer brings down ; what large things are besought of God, and how bountifully His grace and strength are given ! Let us realise and use His bestowments, doing some honest, hearty work for Him and for our neighbours ; Prayer and work will lift us out of the Slough of Despond.

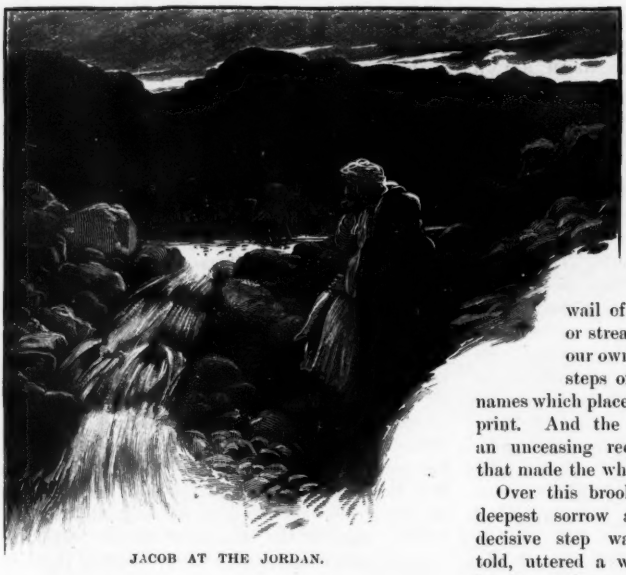
CROSSING THE RUBICON.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., ETC.



"And he passed over before them."—GEN. xxxiii. 3.
'The king himself also passed over the brook Kidron."—2 SAM. xv. 23.
"Jesus went forth with His disciples over the brook Cedron."—ST. JOHN xviii. 1.

ON the eastern side of Italy, near the town of Rimini, there is a petty stream, falling, after a short course of twenty-five miles, into the Adriatic. This insignificant river has acquired a famous name in history and a prominent place among the popular proverbs of mankind. Its modern name is the Uso, but the peasants in the neighbourhood, who have no antiquarian theories to uphold, give it the name of "Il Rubicone." In spite of the contested claims of other streams in this part, there can be almost no doubt that this is the celebrated Rubicon which formed the boundary between ancient Italy and Cisalpine Gaul. Its geographical position between the true peninsula of Italy and the alluvial basin of the Po, as well as its short, straight course directly from the rocky buttresses of the Apennines to the sea, marked it out as a most distinct and appropriate political boundary. Besides its importance as a frontier-line, it had a sacred significance attached to it as one of the streams that were haunted by the river-gods, and were in consequence worshipped. The crossing of it with a legion, army, or cohort, was therefore deemed not only a political but also a sacrilegious offence. What has immortalised it is the well-known incident in the civil war between Cæsar and the Roman Senate supported by Pompey. When Cæsar came with his army to the bank of this river, he hesitated for a long time as to what he should do. He said to his officers: "We can even yet draw back, but, if we cross that little stream, all must be decided by the sword." The night passed in anxious deliberation, and at daybreak, the legend says, a majestic form appeared to him, seated on the bank, playing on a flute. As the soldiers drew near to listen, the angel snatched from one of them a trumpet, blew the signal of advance, and then plunged into the river and disappeared. "Let us go," said Cæsar, "whither the portents of Heaven and the injustice of the enemy call us. The die is cast." And with that exclamation he boldly passed over the stream, followed by his army. That was the decisive act which led to victory and to the dictatorship of the Roman Empire.

Long ages before this memorable event, we read of an older Rubicon, the crossing of which led to results even more momentous. Returning from the country of Laban, where he had been many years an exile, Jacob came to the banks of the Jordan, where the Jabbok, wrestling through its rocky defiles, falls into the sacred stream. Hearing that his brother Esau, with a large force, was on his way from the fastnesses of Edom to seek revenge for the wrong done to him, he took all the precautions against the threatened danger which his prudent nature suggested. Under covert of the dark night, he sent across the stream the helpless train of women and children and the vast flocks and herds with which he was encumbered. And then, alone, in the awful solitude, full of gloomy forebodings regarding the morrow, he realised that this situation of peril was the punishment of his sin, and—in the first recorded words of human prayer—poured out to God his trouble and perplexity.

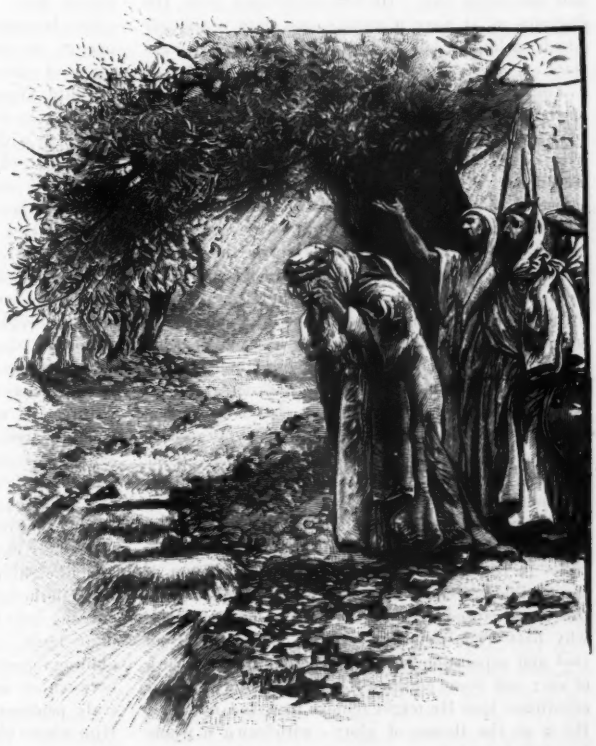
Gradually, as in the case of the Philippian jailer afterwards, his prayer was purified from its selfishness, and slavish terror passed into repentance, and the longing for deliverance from man into the longing for the favour of God. His faith laid hold upon the Invisible, and an unknown superhuman Visitant gave Himself into his grasp, with Whom he struggled earnestly, his strength and tenacity of hold increasing with the strain, till the morning reddened in the sky over the eastern hills. He prevailed in the end, and won the blessing, but not without sore wounds which maimed him all the rest of his days. He passed over the Jordan a changed man; and when Esau saw him, with the hallowed effulgence of that interview with God shining upon his face, he forgot his deadly purpose, and, remembering only the innocent days of childhood, when they played together in their father's tent, he rushed forward, and fell on his neck and wept. That crossing of the Jordan was the great crisis in Jacob's life. Esau left him henceforth in the undisturbed possession of the land of his inheritance; and in his own inner nature the spiritual element obtained the final victory over the carnal, and Jacob indeed became Israel—the crafty schemer the prince of God.

In later ages there was another crossing of the Rubicon hardly less inferior in interest and results. No incident in Jewish history is described with such fulness of detail as the flight of David when his son Absalom rose up in rebellion and seized the kingdom. He left Jerusalem on foot, accompanied by his courtiers, on the morning of the day that he received the fatal news, and passed over the brook Kidron. Kidron means blackness or sadness. Why it received this ominous name we do not know. Some human tragedy must have left its trace upon it, as it left its wail of anguish in the name of the Cona, or stream of wailing, which flows through our own Glencoe. We can trace the footsteps of Sorrow over all the earth by the names which places have received from her deeper imprint. And the waters of the Kidron murmured an unceasing requiem over some terrible secret, that made the whole scene blasted for its sake.



Over this brook of sadness the king passed in deepest sorrow and humiliation; and when this decisive step was taken, the procession, we are told, uttered a wail of anguish which was echoed by the rocks around, until it seemed as if "the whole land wept with a loud voice." The king had resolved to abandon his royal home and accept the doom of the exile. With chastened soul he would not allow the ark to accompany him in his flight and share his personal peril. With unselfish consideration for others, he urged Ittai and his warriors, and their wives and children, not to endanger their lives in the cause of a fallen Sovereign. But with unshaken fidelity the brave body-guard adhered to him. And covering their heads with their cloaks, and rending the air with their wild laments, they crossed over the Mount of Olives, and descended into one of the deep ravines leading from the plateau of Jerusalem to the fords of the Jordan.

This dreadful march, which was rendered still more dreadful by the curses of Shimei, the fierce Benjamite, which followed him all the way, was never effaced from the memory of David. In the twenty-third Psalm, which we have every reason to believe was composed on this occasion, he called the deep, desolate ravine through which he passed, with its ghastly gloom, and the agony of his own heart, the valley of the shadow of death. He indeed tasted the bitterness of death. Over the Jordan he passed till he came to the pastoral uplands of Mahanaim, and there, amid the very scenes where Jacob centuries before spent his unforgotten hours of agony and prayer, he wrestled, we know not how long, with the fears and sorrows of a broken heart. What Peniel was to Jacob that sore experience was to David. When he crossed the brook Kidron he became a different man. It marked the crisis of his life. He bade adieu for ever to all his former light-heartedness and bright enthusiasm. A vulture pain was ever gnawing at his heart on account of the dark sins which he had committed, and the terrible punishments with which they were visited, and wrung from him the bitterest cry of a sinner's anguish to be found in the annals of the human race. The shadow of that anguish was never lifted off his life. A careworn, sorrow-stricken man he went down to the grave. But while his outer life was thus darkened and blasted, his inner life became tenderer and more beautiful. He grew daily in grace and humility, in spiritual insight and sympathy. In that hour of agony when he crossed the Kidron his sorrow had made him a little child again. He forgot all about the weary years of vain pomp and glory which he spent upon the throne of Israel, and went back in spirit to the bright days of his youth, when he watched his father's flocks on the hills of Bethlehem, and knew neither ambition nor care. And with the tried faith of the experienced man combined with the simplicity of the little child, he poured forth the fulness of his unquestioning trust in the God of his salvation.

And what happened to David happened to David's Son and David's Lord more than a thousand years afterwards. It is strange how their experiences coincided, how the same thing happened to them both. We are told that, after the passover, "Jesus went forth with His disciples over the brook Cedron." As David passed over the brook to suffer the greatest trial of his life, so did Jesus. That brook marked, as it were, the dividing line between the period of His comparative success, and the period of His uttermost sorrow. With Christ Himself, as with most Christ-like lives, the easiest part came first; it was at the last that the cross was brought to Him. It is recorded of His early years that He grew in favour with God and man as He grew in stature. In His obscurity at Nazareth He suffered no persecution. The world tolerated Him, for His hour was not yet come. And even when He entered upon His public ministry, the common people heard Him gladly, and admiring crowds followed wherever He went. His influence as a teacher and miracle-worker radiated light all around Him. But now the decisive moment had come. He had a baptism to be baptised with, and He was straitened until it should be accomplished. The thought of the decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem exclusively occupied His mind. When He crossed the Cedron, therefore, it was no longer as the great Teacher, but as the great Sacrifice. He entered upon the final path towards which all the steps of His life conducted; the path which led to the hall of judgment, to the cross of Calvary, and to the glory beyond, into which He should enter through all that suffering. He passed across the Cedron to the Garden of Gethsemane to face the hour and power of darkness alone. There He endured the crucifixion before the crucifixion; there He manifested the sublimest triumph of self-sacrifice and submission to the will of God; there the bitterness of death was past, and the real victory over it secured; for the cross was merely the open display to the world of the death which He had already died.

David's sorrow as he passed over the brook Kidron was great; but what was it compared with that of the Man of Sorrows in the same storied spot? Jacob's wrestling was sore; but what was it compared with the wrestling of Christ when, for one awful moment, He would have put the flaming cup from Him, and prayed that He might not drink it; and the Father still pressed it to the Sufferer's lips, and in His agony His sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground, and He needed an angel to strengthen Him. A sympathising crowd followed David with wild lamentations; but their touching sympathy could not reach the desolation of his soul. The disciples followed their Lord as He walked before them to His willing doom, and a weight of mysterious awe fell upon them as they saw the shadow of inward anguish gathering over His face; but they were like little children who gaze silent and wonder-stricken upon their parents while enduring some terrible trial to them unknown. He was not above the need of human sympathy. We know what a help it was to Him to have His disciples with Him—that those were nearest who loved Him most. Touched with a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, He could not bear to be suffering while His disciples were sleeping. He said to them, with reproachful tenderness, "Could ye not watch with Me one hour?" He was always alone, the loneliest of all beings. "His soul was like a star, and dwelt apart." He acted as the solitary representative of Heaven in a world of sin and woe. But when He crossed the Cedron, and passed into the deepest shadows of the olives of Gethsemane, the loneliness of His life came to a head—as the loneliness of a mountain reaches its climax at its summit, where there is nothing but the lifeless snow and the silent sky. He was withdrawn from His disciples, as it were a stone's cast, into a solitude which no human fellowship or sympathy could penetrate.

And that solitude was the expressive symbol of the isolation of sin. Sin broke up Eden, and separated man from man; and exiled man into the wilderness. Sin divides all human interests, breaks all human ties, destroys all human harmonies. It creates a waste, a solitude wherever it works. And our Saviour, coming into the world as the Sin-bearer, experienced this dreadful effect of sin to the utmost. It separated Him in the wilderness of temptation from all human beings, and brought Him into the dreadful communion of devils and lost spirits. It separated Him in the Garden of Gethsemane from the friends that were dearest, and brought Him into awful contact with the powers of darkness. It was because He was made sin for us that He was cast out—like David—by His own people, who rose in rebellion against Him, and cried, "Crucify Him! Crucify Him!" and Shimei's curse in sevenfold bitterness pursued Him all the way. And this separation from man was but the prelude to the more awful separation from God. The withdrawal of the disciples in the garden was but the commencement of the terrible process of desertion, whose completion on the cross caused Him to cry, "My God, My God! why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Separation from God and separation from man is the dreadful work of sin; and Jesus endured it to the uttermost as our substitute, that He might remove it. And now that He is on the throne of glory—withdrawn a whole heaven's height from us—what separated Him most widely from human beings while He was on earth unites Him more closely with them. He stood apart from man because sin had banished Him from them; because He had to drink a cup which they could not drink, and to be baptised with a baptism which they could not share. But now, sin atoned for, the baptism of suffering endured, the grounds of alienation removed, He draws more closely to those for whom He was made sin. He brings them nigh by His blood; He draws them by the cords of His love. He uses the love that for their sakes endured the cross, despising the shame, as a magnet to attract them more powerfully to Himself. Having passed through such a terrible experience, He must needs be touched with a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, in a way in which He could not otherwise have been.

In every human life there is a Rubicon to cross. A critical moment comes, sooner or later, in which we have to pass from the old life to the new by an act which decides our fate, and determines the whole nature of our future. There is no career so quiet and uneventful but this fateful moment occurs in it. It will come in the shape of temptation, or sorrow, or change; and the way in which this crowning trial will be met will be determined by the training that has been received from the previous routine of ordinary life. We learn in little things the lesson which becomes of powerful use in great events; and acquire in resistance to daily petty temptations the force of character which is to be called out into resolute vigour in critical experiences. The best preparation for the crossing of any Rubicon is wrestling with God beforehand in prayer, like Jacob. If we succeed in getting the blessing of the Lord we know that our path will be a victorious one, that our foes will become our friends, and the things that were adverse, favourable. We shall pass over into the new circumstances, knowing, it may be, but dimly what shall befall us, but having already in possession, wrought out in the very texture of our soul, through the trial in which we have been victorious, that faith in God which is the ground of our most absolute confidence and our largest hope.

But it may be that our Rubicon is of a different nature. It may be like David's, a flight from the consequences of our sin. We cross the brook of sadness because we have planted in our life some seed of evil, and are now reaping its bitter fruit. We have found that sin breaks the ties and sweet associations of life, and drives the soul into a dreary and lonely desert. The curse rises from the ground, and, like Shimei's, becomes articulate to us. We pass through the valley of the shadow of death. But such a crossing over the Kidron of the soul will be blessed if it leads, as in David's case, to heartfelt and abiding repentance; for the sin that creates a breach between us and others, will only create, if we are truly penitent, a deeper friendship between us and Him whose blood cleanseth from all sin, and whose love makes the sinner's sorrow—which would have been unavailing if it were only the sorrow of the world that worketh death—the strait and narrow way to higher holiness and purer happiness. If the crossing of the stream has been to us, as to Jacob and David, a decisive change of character and purpose, the waters will be a very baptism of purification, in which our old life will be carried from us down into the Dead Sea, and our flesh will come again like unto the flesh of a little child. We shall pass over to a Mahanaim, the Lord's Host, from the valley of the shadow of death, led across the dark waters of Sorrow to God's heart and to God's throne; and shall acquire, in the wrestling of the Jabbok, the earnest of the inheritance of the saints in light.

The passing through any trial that is sanctified to us is a crossing of the brook Kidron to the Gethsemane of the soul with Christ. Why is all sorrow so lonely? Why does it make a solitude around us and within us? Why does it withdraw us from our fellow-creatures, and lead us into the desolate wilderness, where common experience and ordinary sympathy are unavailing? Is it not that we may be brought into nearer and tenderer relationship with Him Who has felt the awful burden of human woe as no human being has realised it, and in all our afflictions is still afflicted? We are made capable of feelings which we cannot utter, and of pains and sorrows which we cannot share with others, because Jesus is the interpreter of our feelings and the sharer of our sorrows. The cloud that shuts us out from the world shuts us in more closely with Him; and in the very core of the cloud's darkness and loneliness we behold the transfiguration of sorrow—a beauty and a glory such as we see not in all the fairest and brightest hours of life. The wilderness, where human help is farthest off, is the place where Heavenly help is nearest, where the ladder is set up that reaches from earth to heaven, and the angel appears in the bush and ministers tenderly to our necessities, under the shadow of the juniper where we have lain down to die.

Life knows not such peculiar and gracious revelations of Divine love as the solitude of suffering into which we are withdrawn from our fellow-creatures, to be more entirely alone with Himself. We have not to say to Him, "Couldst Thou not watch with me one hour?" He is with us—a very present help in our time of need. It is no angel that strengthens us, but the Lord Jesus Himself. The sorrow with which no stranger can intermeddle, may weep itself out on the bosom of the Friend that sticketh closer than a brother. For us there is no lonely, forsaken place in God's universe. We can say, "Alone, yet not alone, for the Saviour is with me," as we pass over the brook Kidron to share in the Gethsemane of the soul, the fellowship of His sufferings, as He shares the fellowship of ours. Our own pain and sorrow will give us a fuller understanding of the sufferings of the Man of Sorrows, and bind us more closely to Him; for nothing brings two beings nearer than a shared sorrow. And having thus drunk of the brook of sadness with Him by the way, we shall yet lift up our head with Him in bliss. We shall be with Him when "the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

MISS HILARY'S SUITORS

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A WILFUL YOUNG WOMAN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XVI.

HOW the sister of Hilary's quondam lover and the rich curate of Netley happened to be there together may be more naturally explained to the reader than to the surprised girl.

When that terrible fiasco at Abbotswick dashed the hopes of the Cavenhams as to securing a young and wealthy bride for their spendthrift George, and so importing into the family a standing ease from long-standing worries, the second daughter had ingeniously projected out of their shattered plan another, superior in her own opinion to the one just broken up.

For the curate, of course, would in time settle into his squirearchy, though he was very judicious—Gertrude thoroughly approved of that: it lengthened the hour of her opportunities—and made no effort to push his immediate entrance into county society. He could easily have done it had he so chosen, for when a man is known master of five thousand a year, people in general care very little how he comes by it. The curate got now and then a rap over the knuckles on the subject from someone unconventionally or spitefully free-spoken, but it was not the business of his neighbours to inquire closely as to whether he had secured his prize by bringing an undue amount of clerical influence to bear on that eccentric Miss Humphreys. No one a few miles off knew personally much of that child the old lady had adopted. The arrangement sounded rather hard on her at first, but she was provided for, was she not? Here and there someone had met Mr. St. John, a pompous, obtrusive sort of person, no real relation to the Humphreys, and no acquisition to any circle. And this Mr. Stafford was a clever man—a preacher whom people had even run after when he was poor—good-looking, and not at all plebeian; someone ferreted out that his mother had been a Cumberland Colville, and his father once foremost among the oldest established cotton aristocracy. A little clique, to be sure, spoke regretfully and pityingly of the disinherited girl—the Milroys, for instance, and their immediate set—but for the rest the young heiress was soon forgotten, and county courtesy was ready to open its arms to the man who stood in her place.

But Mr. Stafford was in no hurry to use his promotion. When invitations to manors and halls came thick upon him, and he was bidden to drop in when he liked at some of the most exclusive houses within range, he shelved all alike with the plea of being busy over parish alterations, and plunged into these so as truly to leave himself but little leisure. The tumbledown old church, as Joyce had said, was being well-nigh rebuilt; rows of two-roomed dens, miscalled homes, were being replaced by dwellings where comfort was encouraged and decency made possible. The long stretch of parish running out to the marshes was no longer left to send its half-dozen representatives up to church on Sabbath days while the odd three or four hundred lounged and slept and drank their hours of rest away. What Mr. Leigh had vainly longed, his curate vainly striven for, and Miss Humphreys never could be brought to consider needful, was at length accomplished. St. Michael of Netley ere long had its daughter church down at Netley-by-the-Sea, and its rough, amphibious population had a parson to themselves—a friend of Norris Stafford's, one who, "encumbered," as worldly prudence would call it, with wife and bairns, jumped at the big stipend offered, and willingly came to work hand and glove with his old college chum. Meantime the deviser and controller of all these changes had hardly an hour in which to rejoice or repent over his ownership, and, far from seeking new acquaintances, seemed shy of letting old ones develop into intimacy.

Very satisfactory was this to one who had made up her mind to nurse her little more than introduction to Mr. Stafford into the closest of relationships. Though Abbotswick had been snatched from her brother, Miss Gertrude Cavenham saw no reason why it should not be left for her. Indeed, this arrangement would be preferable, perhaps for the property, certainly for herself. So, being rather a clever woman, with a cool head, plenty of determination, and more sense than sensitiveness, she laid down her lines of campaign, and set about them promptly.

Netley was not the directest way from Steeple Forncett to Brainford, but she discovered it to be the quickest—"not so many ups and downs for her poor pony." Further, she began the exemplary duty of a bi-weekly visit to the hospital of the town. A Netley man chanced to be there for weeks. Miss Cavenham was benevolent to him to the last degree, and naturally, when she met the curate of the poor fellow's parish, she stopped to leave with him the latest bulletins for anxious friends. She would stoop graciously from her saddle to deliver long wordy messages from the patient. She would ride back to repeat, smiling, some inconsequential phrase she had forgotten, knowing perfectly well she never looked better than when on horseback, and determined to pose at her best as long and as often as possible before this desirable clergyman's eyes.

That hospital parishioner was answerable for Miss Cavenham's appearance at Netley Church on three successive Sundays. "The poor grateful creature told me so much of your preaching, I felt forced to come," she half-apologised to Mr. Stafford, strolling after service near the vestry door, as she waited for her pony carriage. "And oh, I don't seem ever to have heard a sermon till to-day! How you make one think!"

This was after the third Sunday—an unpropitious drizzling afternoon in January—and the enterprising lady felt as if the delicate flattery of her attendance hardly got its due reward when Mr. Stafford, totally ignoring her compliment, answered—

"It will scarcely be wise for you to venture here again till our building is done. I think we must work on half the church at a time, and the other half will be so filled with our own people, there will hardly be accommodation for others."

This was not encouraging; in fact, it was all but rude. But a lady of thirty bent on propitiating a rich bachelor is not easily put down.

"Rebuilding," she cried; "oh, how interesting! I do so love to see arches—and, and gurgoyles—and things of that kind growing, as it were. How I shall watch it as I pass!"

And she did, unquestionably, getting up a manual of Gothic architecture to meet the occasion, and discoursing of splays and corbels to the curate whenever she could entrap him, and she even got her father, who knew as much of the Decorative style as he did of Sanscrit, to drive over and inspect the restoration, when the old general insisted on taking the curate back to dine with him.

"Don't make a monk of yourself, man," he said, "though you've got *Abbots*wick; we've done with those rules nowadays, and you fellows can have your wives and chicks about you as you ought. 'Don't think you can come?' Fudge! My girls will be disappointed if you don't. They all took to you when they used to meet you there at Miss Humphreys'. Eh? what? 'Only once!' Well, that seems to have been enough. Soon know if you like anybody—I do; 't isn't many I press a dinner on, but there! I'm not going to have you say no."

So Mr. Stafford, seeing the gouty old gentleman was ready to fly into a passion if refused, and not at all considering himself worth a contest, submitted to be carried off and entertained. And Miss Gertrude Cavenham sang some sacred songs to him after dinner, and stitched round a little print pinafore while she asked was there anyone at Netley who could attend to mothers' meetings, and so on, for him. "Oh, if she were not thought intrusive, how she should like to help in that way! She did so delight in that sort of labour!"

Mr. Stafford, as we have said before, was not conceited. He quite missed the source of the lady's amiability. Philip Conway's wife, with her three-months-old baby, might be glad of this assistance. Miss Cavenham, exultant, got her foot well planted in his parish. With time and no rivals he would certainly succumb to her attentions. Her sense of security grew apace all the spring through, and when he returned from an absence abroad, and she, having learned the hour when he was expected, chanced to be sketching in the churchyard as he drove up, her greeting was most touchingly effusive.

"Ah, dear Mr. Stafford! Now Netley will seem itself again! Is it too bold to say the place was almost empty without you? Mr. Conway is very nice, but oh, everyone wanted you; and I—I——"

"They seem to have been getting on uncommonly well, though," Mr. Stafford prosaically interrupted, as he politely shook hands, and with a pleasant nod to his servants at the gate, walked straight off to the church. —"Down, Tip! down!" to a yapping little terrier of uncertain breed but devotedly affectionate disposition, whom he had saved from a brick round its neck and the village pond years before, who now hailed his appearance with barks of joy and futile jumps to lick his hand—"Down, you noisy rascal! I promise you I'm not going away again.—Why, yes, Grimes has done well; I hardly hoped to see this south wall so forward. Now I hope all will be done by autumn."

"And you will remain to enjoy it, then? You will keep your promise?" said Miss Cavenham, sentimentally.

"Keep what?" said the curate, halting and looking puzzled.

"The promise you made to—oh, only your dog, not me!—that you won't go away again for ever so long."

"I assure you I'm not likely for some time, at any rate," said the curate, rather absently.

"Oh, I'm so, so glad, for the sake of—of the parish," said Miss Cavenham, looking up fervently and then looking down modestly; and just that moment they turned an angle of the building and came upon Hilary St. John.

For a few seconds they were all taken aback; the encounter was so palpably awkward. At sight of the pair the colour, which, unluckily, she could not command, fled fast from Hilary's cheeks. The elder lady reddened unbecomingly, wrathful at her tête-à-tête being interrupted, confused at thus meeting the girl she had loaded with caresses when last they parted. It is the trick of common or mean natures to dislike those they have treated ill. Miss Gertrude was very nigh hating Hilary at that moment, but never lacking outward composure, she now veiled her chagrin with an air of society politeness, advancing calmly as she said—

"Miss St. John, actually!" (It was "her own sweet Hilary" at Steeple Forncett.) "How odd for us to meet here! Were you coming to look for—either of us? And are you quite well?"

"Quite, I thank you," said Hilary, all the courage in her composition called quickly to the fore. The Cavenhams, with their little farce of mock love, had insulted her girlhood, but—noblesse oblige!—she was not going to lower herself by a sign of retaliation. "I was looking for no one. I should not have come to the church if—if I had not thought I should be alone—if I had known whom I should meet."

That much she simply could not help saying. It was a protest she owed herself. Norris Stafford had avoided her at Brainford; he must not suppose she was now seeking him at Netley.

Miss Cavenham shrewdly read emotion behind this restraint of manner, and was not disinclined to aim a random dart or two at it.

"Oh," she said, with the utmost affability, "please don't mind us ever. No one can help the past, can they? We should be so sorry if you did not meet us as you used; should we not, Mr. Stafford?"

He had gone back a pace when they met. Miss Cavenham did not see the wonderful change that came over him—the interest, the life, the love that shot into his grave eyes and softened his now almost always stern-set lips. And Hilary saw none of this, for she would not let one single glance rest on him. But when he spoke, it was in a voice so different from the ring of his ordinary speech that keen-witted Miss Cavenham almost started, swiftly added two and two together, and trembled for her cherished scheme.

"I wish," said Mr. Stafford, putting his arms behind him, and leaning back on the railings of a tomb, "with all my heart that I had not been here just now, Miss Hilary. You would have liked to be alone; you ought to have been so. How did you come? Who takes you back to Brainford?"

"I walked over. And I'm just going back," said Hilary briefly. He—this old friend—would not even offer to touch her hand; his companion's "us" and "we" somehow gave her a miserable chill. She would get away from them as fast as she could, and turned abruptly, as if to leave that very moment.

"Oh, pray don't let us hurry you," said Miss Cavenham, "for I really must be going, as my pony is a little fresh, so Mr. Stafford will perhaps kindly see me off; then you can be alone if you positively wish to, if you really don't want Mr. Stafford for anything."

"I am at your service, Miss Cavenham," said the gentleman quickly. Her assumption of familiar ease with him was irritating. He was obtuse, as all men are more or less, but nevertheless discerned that her words to Hilary were less kind than they would seem. Himself, he dared say nothing, or he would have said too much. The girl with that sweet, wistful pride on her young face, that indescribable something that bespeaks suffering well borne, was infinitely dearer to him than in her happy days of gay good luck. It was hard indeed to keep from bidding her stop and hearken soon to words of tenderness that were welling up from his inmost soul. But that was denied him. Safety lay only in deserting her.

He lifted his hat; Hilary bowed silently. "So sorry I don't go your way, or I could have given you a lift," said Miss Cavenham, stepping away with stereotyped smiles; and close to Mr. Stafford's shoulder, vivaciously smiling up at him, she carried him off, Tip following with a dissatisfied whine, for the sensible little beast was fond of Hilary, and his canine intelligence rebelled at thus deserting an old playfellow.

Quick and quicker Hilary went along the Brainford road, aching! aching! aching! No one wanted her at home, her place was fast filling up at Netley. Joyce wanted her just a little, perhaps, and Joyce, she thought contritely, she had never been so very kind to. Oh, what a world of opportunities she had missed in her young years! It had become natural to her to buy everything—respect, and liking, and—— Ah! she shook herself, as if to be quit of that memory. All might have gone perhaps from bad to worse if her life had been paved with gold. And Aunt Phil had been angry: that sting was very sharp. She would smart under it to the end of time. Ah! she had done no good to anyone; made nothing but miserable blunders. It was best that—that someone wise and clever should rule in her stead. And how well he was doing it, this someone! And yet, he might have spared her just a little of his abundant strength and usefulness—she did want it so! But he had hardly spoken to her; he had gone away—with Gertrude Cavenham.

Hilary looked out wearily along the straight road, far on to the dark, dense clouds that hid the dying sun. No one, then, cared for her now, when she had no money.

No one?

A figure was advancing up the white footpath as she hurried on deep in thought; she would have passed on, but the new-comer stopped. It was her step-brother's friend, Mr. Bevis.

"Miss St. John, will you allow me the honour of returning with you into the town? It is too late for you to be out alone"

"Is it?" said Hilary, startled out of her troubled self-communings; "I had not thought of that. But," not in the very least wishing for this companion,

"there's nothing for me to be afraid of. Please don't let me stop you in your walk."

"I only took it on your account," answered the young man, assuming her consent and pacing respectfully beside her. "I happened to see you go by our office this afternooon, and—forgive my doing so—ventured to ask your brother where you were bound for. I knew you could not be back till late; I heard you were to be alone. That distressed me, and I took the liberty of watching for you, of meeting you, as no one else intended to do so. I do trust you won't think me officious."

"N-o," said Hilary, colouring deeply as she saw how this stranger realised how she was of no consequence to anyone; "I can only think you kind, and thank you very much."

Her voice, sad and sweet, sounded propitious. "Now 's my time," thought the young man.

"Dear Miss St. John," he said almost deferentially, "pray don't thank me for doing what is my greatest pleasure. Don't be too astonished"—she was looking at him with evident surprise—"but let me just say that every time I have met you for weeks and months has deepened my esteem and—something more. At one time I dared not have dreamed of saying this: I should have carried my love for you a secret to my grave—I should indeed. I have tried to stifle it. I have said to myself, 'Miss St. John's earlier friends will never part from her in this way; though no longer the heiress, they will keep her among them. She will live, she will marry in a circle far above me. But," carefully watching in the girl's speaking countenance the effect of his well-chosen words—"I was mistaken. I see the world—your world—is less wise, less generous, less liberal, than I fancied it, and now I ask if you will look—down to me. I feel it is down, but, Miss St. John, the greatest gap can be bridged by affection, and affection that would never have aspired to you wealthy, dares now to offer everything its owner has in the world when you are no longer rich. Will you accept it? May I hope?"

It was getting dusk. They were nearing the town. A group of noisy soldiers returning to their quarters blocked the footpath. Hilary shrank aside, tremulous and mute in her amazement.

"Take my arm a moment," begged Mr. Bevis, "till we have passed this tipsy gang." She did as he asked half-unconsciously; he ventured ever so lightly to press her hand to his side.

"Oh, that this may be an omen," he said, "of a future right to shield you always! I ask no better lot in the world."

So, as he had frankly put it, she was poor, and all her friends had fallen from her; yet here was actually someone who cared for her just for herself, without money, without position. Dizzy with strange emotions, something—she scarce knew what—something akin to despair lowering all her forces, Hilary hardly knew what she wanted to say, nor how to say it. How could she, who had been nigh starving for lack of love, reject it now, so true as it must be, and yet—oh, it must be wicked of her not to want it! Should she not be the most thankless creature upon earth to put it from her? How could she bring herself to tell this man she had not one spark of feeling for him such as he desired? How could she wound the one person on earth who sought her out just to be kind, and generous, and tender?

Deeply moved and confused, the girl tried brokenly to thank her suitor, saying with down-bent averted face she had never once thought of this.

"But not that you never will think of it," he interrupted eagerly; "for such a—for you I can wait and wait, a month, a year, as long as you will, only, dear Miss St. John, don't dismiss me like a cur. When a man offers his very all, he deserves something better than that—he really does."

He put his appeal admirably. He spoke with earnestness absolutely unfeigned. Hilary faltered over the positive refusal her lips inclined to. Mr. Bevis pressed the slight advantage.

"Hard as it is to do it," he said magnanimously, "I leave the question entirely in your hands, and myself at your mercy. Only don't refuse me the delight of seeing you often at Park Villa. Let it rest so for a time, and I will school myself to be content."

They had reached her home by now; he skilfully retired without at least having received a rebuff direct; bade her good-night, just lingeringly enough to mark his new position towards her, and went his way warm with self-satisfaction.

And Hilary, hardly knowing to what her silence had committed her, went in, and up-stairs—shivering!

CHAPTER XVII.

When Miss Cavenham piloted Mr. Stafford away from that embarrassing interview in the churchyard, although she felt mistress of the hour with the man of her designs securely by her elbow, yet a certain uneasiness rankled within her. Hilary's agitation might be accounted for in fifty ways—that she set aside as of no immediate consequence. But Mr. Stafford's odd manner made her more anxious, and she set about investigating it with the promptitude of a woman who feels she has no time to squander in uncertainties. So, while the Rectory lad went round for her Norfolk cart, and she stood waiting, sketching apparatus in hand, Miss Cavenham cast out long lines with which to hook forth the information she desired.

Gazing from the Rectory at one end of the thick budding avenue, to Abbotswick at the other: "So you have not brought Mrs. Stafford back with you from abroad?" she said. "We mean to have the pleasure of seeing your mother here!"

"Heidelberg suits her," he answered quietly, "and my sisters, you know, have just married near her, so she agrees with me it would be a pity to quit her home there. She will not join me—at present."

"Ah! perhaps the Rectory would be small, and it would be hardly worth her while coming there," agreed Miss Cavenham, "but when you move into that dear old house yonder, then you must have—a Mrs. Stafford with you. Abbotswick would be a desert without a lady in it."

"It would," he assented briefly.

"And you would feel—well, quite puzzled to manage the establishment you would require there?"

"Yes, indeed I should."

"So you see, Mr. Stafford, the house will positively require a mistress."

"It positively will."

"So we shall hope to have your mother here, then?"

"But I assure you she's not likely to come."

Miss Cavenham grew impatient. This talking in a circle was unsatisfying. She could hear wheels approaching, and made a bold dash at the central point of her anxiety. Clapping her hands with quite a youthful gush of excitement—

"Ah! Mr. Stafford," she cried, "I have found you out! Somebody must go to Abbotswick with you, as you say" (he had said nothing of the sort, but, much bored with this gossip, let the assertion pass), "and you're going to bring a lady there. A—a wife! Don't contradict me, but let me guess who it is. Oh, would it not be charming—just like a fairy tale, you know, where everything always ends happily—if you presented us all to a Mrs. Norris Stafford, and it turned out to be yonder young lady whom I've cruelly dragged you from!"

The thrust was so totally unexpected, the curate had no weapon to meet it with but the truth.

"Miss Cavenham," he said, "I must entreat you never to mention such a thing even by way of joke—never. I can hardly conceive a greater impossibility than for me to ask Miss Hilary St. John to be my wife."

He spoke with downright sternness, anger perhaps. Miss Cavenham was delighted beyond expression, and cheerfully apologised for her somewhat impertinent curiosity.

"I was always such a dreadful baby, Mr. Stafford, over anything romantic, and so rashly frank over anything that interests me. Do forgive me! I'll never say another word to you about it. But I'm quite aware, poor child—for I had her stay with us, you know—that she's not the least little bit fitted—oh, there!"—the curate was knitting his brows ominously—"how naughty I am! Good-bye, Mr. Stafford! I'll make no more guesses about the new mistress of Abbotswick till," very sweetly, as he placed the reins in her hands, "till you come and tell me of her your own self."

Then she drove away. The curate went very soberly indoors. Tip smelt superciliously at the tracks of the Steeple Forncett cart, and presently discussed with him a mixed after-journey meal.

This four-footed little friend of Mr. Stafford's had had his afternoon's excitement. An inborn detestation of pussy-cats made him such a terror to cottage pets, and such a nuisance to his master on that score, that Tip's perambulations were generally confined to the Rectory grounds. But this very day a bold bad Tom had even ventured there, had been promptly chased from end to end of the Rectory garden till the rampant monster had taken refuge up a tree, where Tip had barked at him till he was hoarse, and had only left off because, to his joyful surprise, his master had come home. Perhaps this excessive activity had sharpened the canine appetite. At any rate, Tip proved so much the better trencherman at that dinner—though the curate had last eaten under sound of the carillons of Notre Dame at Antwerp—that he licked his hairy little jaws over the greater part of the housekeeper's carefully prepared viands, while his master seemed to dine mainly off thought, and, to judge by his jaded aspect, the fare agreed with him very poorly indeed.

Tip knew enough of household habits to discern something amiss when an hour had passed and the table was still uncleared, so he took upon himself to approach his master with first a tremendous yawn and stretch, and then a waiting attitude on three legs, his head on one side, one ear up and the other down, which said so very plainly, "What on earth are we sitting here for, doing nothing? Is anything particular the matter?" that Norris Stafford got up rebuked, pulled himself together, and prepared to take a tonic in a late round among his people. "For," said he, with a sigh, patting his adviser's sleek little ginger head, and looking into his sharp, intelligent eyes with a steady, courageous smile, "we must bear it and make the best of it, Tip. Make the best of it! Mustn't we?"

Perhaps this labour might not have been lightened could the curate have followed Hilary homeward, and could he have known the entanglements that would be the issue of that walk.

Entanglements fine as cobwebs, but strong as iron bonds, they truly seemed to her, and they gathered about her thick and fast after that fatal evening. Mr. Bevis lost no time in confiding the step he had taken to Mr. St. John. That gentleman solemnly intimated to his daughter his approval of her suitor.

"Fortunate you should consider yourself, Hilary, in having the power once more put into your hands of establishing yourself well without hanging on your family. Of course it does not retrieve the past, but it ameliorates it; with his professional prospects, Mr. Bevis could easily have commanded a better match, but he prefers to ally himself with—a-a-h'm—my family, and the woman of his choice. Be thankful that it is so; I trust you may be happy."

That was the evening after the proposal. The whole day long Hilary, in utter unrest, had been struggling between dread of what fate seemed forcing on her and fear of casting away a good greater than she deserved. Now if her father would but guide her through her difficulty! She looked at him with appeal almost piteous, but he chose not to observe it. Then out of her own confusion of ideas she tried to be explicit.

"Papa, it was all so strange. I do assure you I said nothing positive to Mr. Bevis. And I don't think I can—yet, or," stammering under her father's fixed stare of disapproval, "not what he wishes exactly. So—so"—blushing scarlet—"please do not speak of my—of anything being fixed."

Mr. St. John thought it as well, perhaps, to meet her thus far, so he made an affable gesture.

"I will leave things to arrange themselves, my dear. I have constitutionally a dislike to meddling with affairs of this nature. The St. Johns have plenty of sense. I confidently trust to yours on this occasion. With respect to saying anything about it, I will meet your wishes. Good-night, child, good-night."

So, wanting bread of him, she had only got a stone —scarcely concealed reproaches, hints to remove the encumbrance of her presence from the household. The one bit of consolation extracted from her father she partly owed to Mr. Bevis. The young suitor represented himself to his future relative as rather more secure of Miss St. John's hand than perhaps he really felt. The wish being undoubtedly father to the thought, he professed to treat the engagement as fully determined on. "But," he said, "every wish of your charming daughter is law to me. I see she dislikes the fashion of publishing such strictly private matters. I wouldn't have her vexed for the world, so will you keep this change in—may I say—our home circle private for the present? Meanwhile, though, command me, my dear sir, as though I were your own son."

So Mr. Bevis came and went about Park Villa much as he chose, pushing his suit along lines where it was difficult to repel or deny him: catching at any hint of Hilary's tastes, then gratifying them; bringing the children a succession of small presents, which delighted them and kept his praises ever flowing; loading Mrs. St. John's drawing-room table with flowers which the lady, who never could arrange half a dozen roses in her life, passed on with significant smiles to her step-daughter; and having nice confidential chats with Mr. St. John up and down the back garden, which made them faster friends than ever; superintending lazy Bertie through his evening studies —though not to very much purpose, it struck even Hilary, this last attention. She was generally present through these evenings. An hour, or even a minute, alone with Mr. Bevis she avoided, and the gentleman pressed for nothing she disliked, only asking and seeming satisfied to see her sitting by, while Bertie ground at his history and Latin so reluctantly that his master had to expostulate.

"If you don't do better than now, my good fellow," he said one night when Bertie had just presented him with a hopelessly muddled précis on feudal laws under the Plantagenets, "you'll be plucked to a dead certainty. Just look at this writing: there are not two legible words in a line. See here; it ought to be as plain as this: 'In the fourth year of his reign the Barons'"—rapidly executing a clear, upright piece of penmanship; "and instead of that, here's your elegant style"—as quickly running off the very facsimile of Bertie's untidy scrawl.

"Oh, I say, Mr. Bevis! isn't that clever!" cried the boy, quite ready to be amused at anything rather than his work.—"Do look here, Hilary; you couldn't tell that writing from mine, could you? How awfully nice! Can you imitate anyone, Mr. Bevis?"

"Why, ye——" began Mr. Bevis, then suddenly came to a stop. Hilary was looking full at him for once, just a little amused at his accomplishment. Her clear gaze seemed to embarrass him. "Imitate anyone! Certainly not," he said sharply; "I did it on the spur of the moment, but it's a thing I've never attempted before," and he was so much annoyed at the lad's foolish question, that the colour mounted to the roots of his sandy hair, all round even the edge of his white collar, as he stooped over the table and went on with Bertie's paper.

It was the most trivial incident, yet somehow it lodged in Hilary's recollection. Her young sisters had just fathomed the cause of Mr. Bevis' frequent presence at Park Villa, and, following in the wake of their elders, had been making it clear that they relished the coming alliance. "Wasn't Hilary going to have a house of her own?" they had asked her that same day; "and should they come and stay with her? and would she give them pretty things? And wouldn't it be nice!"

And she was severely catechising herself that very evening as to the worth of her own doubting judgment: and, indeed, as to the possibility of her ever making one in the children's agreeable forecast of the family future.

Now, somehow, Mr. Bevis's trick of imitation displeased her. His petulant disclaimer, the angry sparkle in his light eyes, gave her a faint qualm of aversion. She returned to her book, wishing the evening well over, though she felt that wish ungracious when Mr. Bevis next spoke.

"I have taken the liberty of sending to Norwich for some of those little blue flowers which I heard you telling Mr. St. John you admired, Miss Hilary." He had not advanced yet to freer form of address. She looked up pleased, if not as promptly grateful as she ought to have been. "The scilla? Ah, I do love them! Ours at Abbotswick were brought from abroad by——"

"Yes," said Mr. Bevis; "by Daniels, or King, or some of those seed people, I suppose?"

"N—o—o," said Hilary. "By Mr. Stafford."

There was just the shade of a different inflection in her voice—so slight, only her acute suitor perceived it. But precisely as something similar had alarmed Miss Cavenham, so this faint signal now alarmed him. As he frequently reminded himself, he was travelling on very thin ice in the matter of Miss St. John's affections. Was there anything antagonistic to his prospects connected with that parson? The mere suspicion darkened his horizon; like Miss Cavenham, again, he could not rest until he had sifted it. He went home very thoughtfully that evening, and a few days later, when Mr. Stafford was at the office, seized the opportunity of politely inviting the clergyman into his room till the head of the firm was disengaged. With much civility he expressed his hope that the church building was getting on well at Netley. He thought he had heard the whole of the old edifice was being restored.

Mr. Stafford thanked him, the work was nearly done —would be complete in the next month, October.

Then Mr. Bevis would take the liberty of naming this to Miss St. John. Of course, she would like to hear of Netley, "notwithstanding—er—everything."

No remark whatever from the client upon this, but such a firm closing of the determined mouth, and such a steady gazing through the office window at nothing at all, that Mr. Bevis sniffed danger. He went cautiously a little farther.

"I suppose I might suggest Miss St. John looking over all these changes at her old place? Unless, that is, you wish or intend to draw her attention to them yourself."

Mr. Stafford rose abruptly.

"Pray do as you wish, Mr. Bevis. I'm not the least likely to have any communication with Miss St. John. I believe that is Mr. Milroy's door? Good-morning."

Mr. Bevis, left to himself, sat down musing, one knee over the other, with a broad, growing grin of satisfaction.

"So ho! my honourable friend," quoth he to himself, "you won't enter the lists. We-ll," slowly recording every shade of expression on Norris Stafford's features, and matching it with Hilary's changed tones, "so much the better for me. But, ye stars! how opportunities are thrown away upon some people!"

CHAPTER XVIII.

IT is to be feared that at this point of Hilary's history she may not stand very high in the eyes of some readers, young ones particularly, who have followed her fortunes thus far.

To glide voluntarily into an engagement that in itself offered not one single attraction to her may seem a piece of folly unwarrantable, unpardonable, in any girl of spirit or sense; and natural judgment enough this is for happy hearts that have never been tossed about on troubled seas, but that have sailed into calm wedded havens under the safe convoy of kind domestic care. But Hilary, her faith in well-nigh everything she had ever leaned on shaken to its foundations in the last sad year, grew, all that summer and autumn through, more irresolute, more fearful of meddling with her own destiny, and those who have known great perplexities themselves may possibly pity and pardon her.

If Mr. Bevis had overpressed his slumbering claim or impatiently demanded the charming little ceremonies of betrothal, Hilary might have broken through her meshes in sheer affright. But Mr. Bevis was prudence personified. He never let his emotions run away with him. He was not going to scare away his fair lady's lukewarm liking, and thanks to this discretion, and something else almost to be called accident, the success of his suit seemed strengthened as winter approached.

Since housemaid Jane's outspoken lecture, Hilary's eyes had been opening to various avenues of household helpfulness down which she had ventured, at first with the shyness of excessive ignorance, more boldly as practice gave her confidence, and soon the whole house looked better for her labour, which she herself grew to like, if only because it was her refuge from thinking.

Mrs. St. John's drawing-room, a very emporium of tasteless furniture and ornaments hideous to behold, had by degrees its worst monstrosities conjured into obscurity, their places filled from Hilary's own store of Aunt Phil's countless costly gifts. Dust no longer took up weekly residence on every article. The mistress's favourite couch, where she read, and took naps, and ate little niceties between meals, was restored once in the day at least to seemly tidiness. (Three crumpled handkerchiefs, two pink-paper-covered novelettes, a bag of chocolate, a mêlée of nuts and broken shells, three pears, and a long list on a torn envelope of what mending Jane had to do before Saturday night!—that was one of Hilary's finds behind her stepmother's sofa-cushion!) As they cost nothing, and were not even set down to that terrible Nemesis "Credit," Mrs. St. John kindly permitted these little changes, and even suggested more. "Had not Hilary any little pictures of Abbotswick? It would be so nice for people to see what might have belonged to—them!"

Yes, Hilary had them truly, but had never taken them forth to foster sadness by their constant sight. Now she hesitated, and her stepmother misinterpreted the sign.

"Don't get them out unless you like," she said good-humouredly; "perhaps you would rather save them for your own nice little house. Mr. Bevis was——"

But Hilary fled; she never could endure hints on that subject. To evade them she would parade every treasure she possessed of her old home. Foraging now for these, she came unexpectedly upon something that sent her back with eyes glowing, lips in soft, uncertain curves.

"Mamma, I have unpacked a box that was set away when I first came, and found a letter in it from Mrs. Dasent of Mosswick. She must have written it the very day I left, when they too were all starting for America, and I had been fancying she had gone away and thought no more about me. Oh, if she's home I want to answer her directly!"

The Dasents were home, so Bertie told his step-sister, and Hilary eagerly wrote her long-deferred reply, feeling, after those kind, tender lines, as if she were once more in communion with some true, tried friend. And the outcome of this was a call from the mistress of Mosswick the very next afternoon, and the carrying away with her of Hilary for a three days' visit.

For three whole days she was whirled off into the delicious open country, that, for all it was November, had golden leaves left yet on great, broad oaks, and robins singing every-day psalms in hedgerows still brilliant with scarlet hips and haws! For three whole days she was with someone she dared speak freely to, someone for whom she even lifted the veil that hid her deepest wound, and told how "Aunt Phil must have been angry with her at the last, and that was worst of all!"

"She is as loyal a girl as ever breathed," said Sylvia to her husband, when he came to her dressing-room before dinner. "I feel as though I could almost hate the man that's got her money, even though it's Norris Stafford."

"Don't do that," said her husband; "he doesn't deserve it. He's fagging over the property till he looks ten years older than when we went away. I was with him this morning, and thought naturally he would talk his queer legacy over with me, but he didn't seem inclined to. I confess to trying to lead up to it, but all I got for my pains was, 'Don't judge me, old fellow, just yet.' So we won't, little wife, nor hate him either."

"I'm sure I don't wish to," protested Sylvia, "though I think Hilary——"

"Must, as a matter of course!" exclaimed her husband. "Why, that's true; and yet, most unfortunately, I made Stafford promise to come round here to-night, and stay till the end of the week. What's to be done?"

For a moment Mrs. Dasent was dismayed; then, by some curious turn of thought, she grew excited, said that perhaps it might not matter after all, and went off to break the awkward news to her girl guest, who, though she would willingly have renounced her dream of pleasure to escape the threatened meeting, would yet have suffered anything rather than let such weakness be known.

"You need not be afraid; we shall not fight," she said. And very erect and bright-eyed, blushing under her friend's praise—"Brave child, how long have you learned to make the best of everything?"—and looking altogether very lovely and lovable, she presently entered the drawing-room, and was greeted by Mr. Dasent and the curate-squire of Netley.

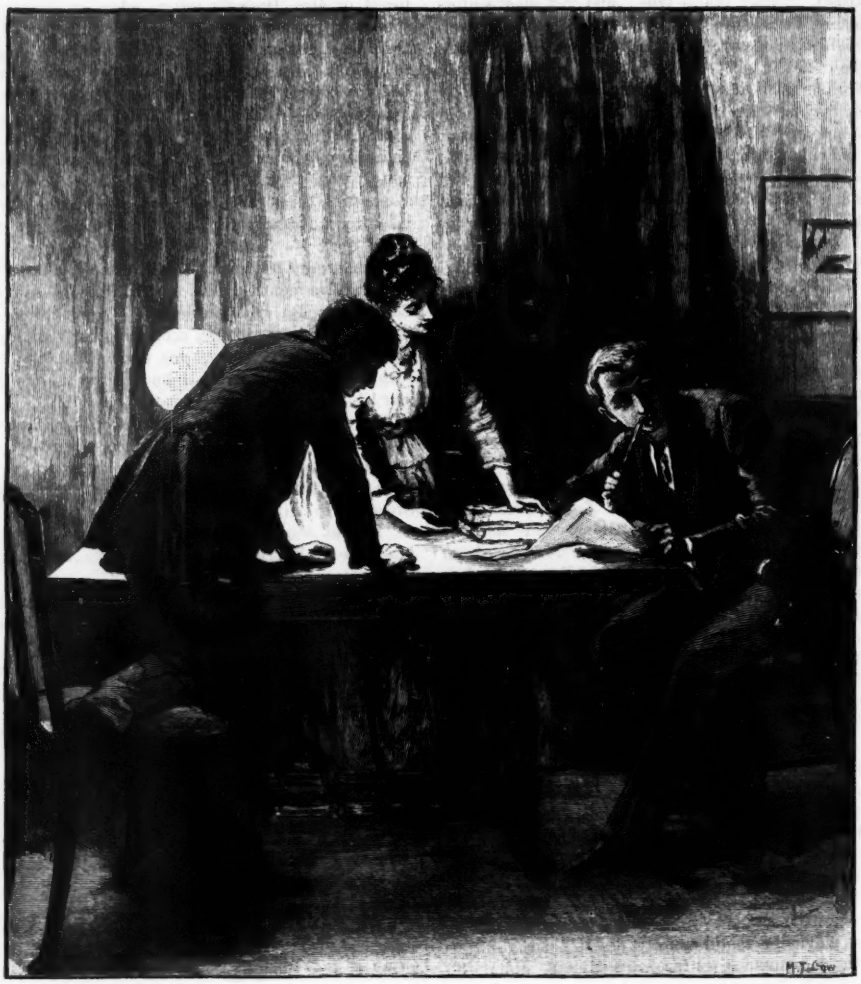
But that instant cruelly chilled the incipient romance Sylvia Dasent was secretly weaving. Norris Stafford, well on his guard, forewarned by Hugh Dasent's announcement of his fellow-guest, was simply coldly courteous to Hilary, and nothing more. Vainly did Mrs. Dasent watch for one gleam of the emotion she had fancied he betrayed when they were all at Abbotswick together. None such escaped him. Of interest and attention he had plenty for the Dasents and their travels, but for Hilary not a syllable, not a word, except what politeness towards a stranger might demand. With his hostess he was, as naturally with womankind, gentle and genial. To Hilary, stiff, restrained, frigid. With the children after dinner, when running in they rapturously claimed him, he was nearest at perfect ease. Small Sylvia, perched upon his knee, ate all his grapes, and Carr, the boy, half throttled him in warm embraces. Under their caresses the deep lines on his face vanished, and smiles reigned instead. But he had no smiles for Hilary, either then or the next day, or the next, and when the little ones would fain have enticed "pwetty Hilawy" into the circle of their frolics, their other playmate would quietly desert them, refusing all but ceremonious contact with Miss St. John. So poor Sylvia Dasent was worried and perplexed over her two ill-met visitors; and noting Hilary's growing consciousness of the chill her presence put on Mr. Stafford, could only try to mend matters by privately singing the virtues of each of her guests to the other, thus tormenting and working upon both in a way she little imagined. But the crowning disaster of this visit was on the third day, when, just as the gentlemen had been beguiled from the master's den, where they were working at plans of a cottage-hospital for Netley, into the cosy little drawing-room for four-o'clock tea, Miss Gertrude Cavenham was announced. Then did Mrs. Dasent feel herself unlucky indeed. George Cavenham's desertion of Hilary had filled her with shame; his speedy marriage with another with disgust. Nothing could have been less acceptable than Gertrude's call was to the mistress of Mosswick at this moment.

But the lady was irrepressibly amiable. She had heard of Mrs. Dasent's return when at Netley that afternoon (where also she had heard in what direction the curate was straying!), and had come directly to welcome her back; she was suggestively playful and easy with Mr. Stafford; very respectful to Mr. Dasent, who disliked her vastly, and remarkably condescending to Hilary. But, charming as she endeavoured to make herself, Miss Cavenham was an added weight upon the already ill-assorted party. When Mr. Dasent, after only one cup, said he must go back to his plans, Norris Stafford also rose with relief upon his face.

"What, only ten minutes' talk after you have been away twelve months! Oh, fie, Mr. Dasent," said Miss Cavenham. But the gentlemen protesting, jokingly, it was their duty to finish something for that night's post—"Oh, if it's duty," she emphasised, "we can't stop Mr. Stafford. We all know duty is his lodestar!"

The unlucky man thus belauded felt a fierce inclination to gag the speaker. The absurdity with which this praise must strike one hearer smote him with mortification, and threw him off his balance. Stooping to Hilary, he said in a low voice—

"If that sounds preposterous, don't set it down as altogether false," and then followed Mr. Dasent from the room.



Not once since they had been together at Mosswick had he spoken to her, looked at her as now. Hilary's pulses started wildly throbbing. Her colour rose, and deepened as Miss Cavenham stared at her ill pleased. That lady had not been making way with the curate as she could wish; her smouldering jealousy was ready to blaze up at any trifle. This offensively good-looking girl might be trying to entrap Mr. Stafford, assisted by Sylvia Dasent, who was weak enough for any folly. She would promptly put out the spark of that experiment. Mrs. Dasent going to the nursery at this moment to fetch her children, Miss Cavenham, with an agreeable smile, expressed her pleasure at finding Miss St. John so soon among old friends.

"And with Mr. Stafford it must seem quite like old times," she said, planting her stabs with skilful spite. "Oh! as I've thought scores of times, what a pity it is this fracture in your life can't be mended up as royal people mend feuds—by matrimonial links, you know! It would be so nice! I actually said so once to Mr. Stafford, but the rude man told me flatly it was absolutely impossible he should ever marry you. Was not it too bad of him, dear?"

The children came racing in, and Hilary was spared reply. She was particularly self-possessed, and gayer than her wont that evening, but when, as they bade her good-night, Mrs. Dasent made light of her departing next day, and pleaded imperatively for a longer visit, the girl was immovable as a rock. She must be back very early: nothing must detain her; and distressed though she was by it, Mrs. Dasent had to give in to the girl's determination, which took her to Brainford on a chill November morning burning with intensest, bitterest shame.

in her proud passion of humiliation. Henceforth she would stop at Park Villa, tie herself to it by habits, fashion herself by all her tastes to that home, or—or to one like it. Aye, even—forcing herself to look forward with almost despair gnawing at her spirit—

"Certainly not,' he said sharply; 'I did it on the spur of the moment.'"—p. 413.

She had been offered to Mr. Stafford and rejected by him! Other people might know this and be scoffing, jesting at her. Oh! it was horrible—something she had surely not deserved. Why had she gone into the Eden of Sylvia Dasent's beautiful home, only to hear this? Never would she venture there again while Norris Stafford was within miles of Mosswick. Better still, never again at all. Never! she was ready to vow even bind herself out of reach of such gross indignity as Gertrude Cavenham had dragged her through by something she could hardly think of without a shudder!

And so the strange outcome of that visit was the progress of Mr. Bevis' wooing, though not exactly upon lover-like lines.

THE SEVEN LEAVES OF THE VINE.

THOUGHTS UPON THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF OUR LORD UPON THE CROSS.

BY THE RIGHT REV. WILLIAM ALEXANDER, D.D., D.C.L., LORD BISHOP OF DERRY AND RAPHOE.

THE FOURTH WORD FROM THE CROSS.

"And when the sixth hour was come, there was darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour. And at the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani? which is, being interpreted, My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?"—ST. MARK xv. 33, 34.

THE fourth word from the cross is probably given by St. Mark in its exact original form.* Let us (1) assure ourselves that the sentence was actually spoken by Jesus; and (2) address ourselves to its interpretation.

I.

This word was spoken by our Lord. And this in itself is an absolutely tremendous fact. More tremendous, more incalculable, more soul-subduing, when we reflect that this is the one only last word recorded by the two first Evangelists. Let us conceive the case of a modern missionary martyr, who lays down his life for the testimony of Jesus. Some of his companions escape, and return to England. A vast assemblage gather to hear of the sufferings whereby the athlete of the faith has won his crown. They seek to know from ear-witnesses how the Son of God sustained His faithful servant, what message came back from those dying lips, with what last word he has enriched the treasury of the Church. And those who heard the martyr can only give for answer—"The man of God bore himself with a glorious patience, but all he had to say was just this, 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?'"

It need scarcely be said that this fearless candour of the Evangelist has been cruelly travestied and heartlessly misunderstood. The bolder and coarser schools of unbelief have said out that it was the cry of cowardice. The sentimental school has used it as a motif round which they have embroidered their poor romance. The most popular and most voluble of the literary artists who have thus dared to play with Calvary is the author of the fascinatingly written book, so profanely and so fancifully called the "Vie de Jésus"—the work of the theologian who has confessed that his ambition is to have his pages "turned by daintily gloved fingers." "Perhaps" comes in here with a frequency unusual even in that book of guesses. "Perhaps" in that supreme moment He repented giving a life so precious for a race so vile. "Perhaps," as has so often been the case with martyrs and others who sacrifice all they have for an idea, the moment came to Him also, the first of the idealists of humanity, when Death, with the irresistible terror of his icy sarcasm, whispered—"In vain." "Perhaps" He thought of the fountains of Galilee, or of its moonlit waters, of its wild flowers, and the golden joy of its sunny days, and regretted that He had not remained a workman of Nazareth, with a peasant's home and simple pleasures.

But, at all events, it remains certain that the fourth word from the cross and the agony in Gethsemane are historical.

Legends, it will be said, falsify. No doubt; but they surround their heroes with splendid exaggerations. Such forms look larger than human on the frozen hills of death. "Being in an agony, He prayed more earnestly; and His sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground."* A demigod, covered with a sweat of blood, writhing on the ground like a crushed worm! No legend ever decked out its subject in a drapery so strange, or invested him with a beauty so uninviting in the eyes of man. We are reminded that the last words of men who lay hold upon the popular imagination are sometimes invented, sometimes self-moulded. An instance of this occurs almost as these lines are being written. Who has forgotten the most pathetic sentences in all romance? "Just at last bell the Colonel said, 'Adsum.' It was the word at school when names were called; and he, whose heart was as a little child's, answered, and stood in the presence of the Master." This sentence is placed in a Scottish parish over the remains of the brave officer who was the original from which the great writer drew Colonel Newcome. It is fast becoming a local tradition that the words were really spoken by the fine old soldier in his last moments—which assuredly they never were. But the case is different here. Who is represented as falling upon the earth with a sweat of agony, or crying from a cross, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" The paradox of the fervent African becomes applicable here—"I believe it, because it is impossible."

II.

LET us now place ourselves at the point of view which alone can render this word intelligible, coherent with the character of Christ, almost (one ventures to say) conceivable.

Let us remember, then, to ask ourselves, "Who is He, what is He, who so speaks in His dying hour?" Let us remember, at the same time, that the

* Cf. Talitha, St. Mark v. 41; Ephphatha, vii. 34; Abba, xiv. 42.

* St. Luke xxii. 44.

Evangelists have this peculiarity—that they often lay open to us in a single sentence a whole series of precedent conditions. Who is this? we ask. We believe that it is the only Son of God, God from God, Light from Light, Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate. And this word, apparently so hopeless and helpless, is really the word which opens up to every believer in the Atonement the whole series of precedent conditions from which that Atonement flows.

If Christ were short of that which we have just declared Him to be—if He were a transcendent moral teacher, a genius in the spiritual sphere, a man of saintly excellence, and nothing more—then logic would drive us to some such conclusion as this:—

Christ clung to the illusions of His opening career almost to the last. Possibly, He carried them with Him up to and upon the cross. They were with Him up to midday on the fatal Friday. But as the moments passed, and His weakness increased; as the darkness deepened over Calvary, as the lurid sky was inexorably still, and no angel's wing cleft the air, no smile of pity visibly fell upon Him from the Father's face; as He was left to go down to the dust of Golgotha by an ignominious death, crucified with thieves—the very name of one of whom was the caricature of fate upon His career—His courage failed, and he gave Himself up to despair. And however piteous the story, however cruel and unjust the punishment, it was but another instance of the cynicism of our human history; but another example of the lively or splendid enthusiasm of youth mocked, corroded, ruined, by the failure of manhood.

Thus the Christ who is not the Christ of faith is discrowned by His own utterance upon the cross. And of all the seven last utterances, this is the one which is the most utterly certain. For who that loved Him, or believed in Him, would have invented it under any circumstances, or would have recorded it—unless indeed he held the view which we are about to develope?

Take the Christian view of the suffering Son of Man; look and listen to St. Matthew and St. Mark as they chronicle the fourth word, and think what we must conclude.

"It was about the sixth hour, and there was a darkness over all the land until the ninth hour, and the sun was darkened."* The darkness was not that of an eclipse, but the precursor of seismic disturbance. It was within three hours of the moment when "the earth did quake, and the rocks rent."† That darkness, by some preordained harmony, was in sympathy with the inward darkness of the dying Lord of heaven and earth. The fierce, prolonged pain of crucifixion, the torn and tormented brow, the anguish, to a nature so exquisite, of human hatred—of being taken for a sanguinary fanatic and associated with crime—tortured that gentle heart, that susceptible organisation. Three hours ebbed away as He hung silent in the lurid gloom. Death was fast approaching.

"But why should not the Elect of humanity, the acknowledged King of the spiritual world, have faced that moment with a sweet, untroubled calmness, with a smile of hope and love? Why should He not have been as unbent in manhood as the one Kaiser on his white bed, as the other with his superb self-control?"

There is but one answer, and that is perfectly conclusive.

For one like Jesus death had two conditions:—

1. It was a death which (if we believe prophets and apostles) was constructed, so to speak, to bear the punishment of human sin. "He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon Him." "His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree." "God made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin."‡

The peculiar punishment of sin is nothing outward so much as being abandoned by God. "Ye shall know My alienation," said God to sinners of old.† What must the feeling of that have been to Him Who declares to us the inner secret of His life, when He says, "As the living Father hath sent Me, and I live by the Father!"‡

This fourth word from the Cross, then, speaks to us of man's sin endured in man's Representative.

2. Once more, that death was a death on behalf of every man.§

His consciousness was fused into and made identical with ours. Our misery was felt by Him, so far as it could be without contamination. The sinking which is the prelude of the last moment; the falling and fainting away into the deeps: all this was gathered into one focus. The Prince of Life felt death as the death of humanity. There was no dissolution of the hypostatic union, as if He were altogether abandoned by the Person of the Word. But the heart of God felt death in the dying heart of the Son of Man, Who is the centre of our humanity.

* St. Luke xxiii. 44, 45.

† St. Matthew xxvii. 51. "Under the reign of Tiberius, the whole earth, or at least a celebrated province of the Roman Empire, was involved in a preternatural darkness for three hours. Even this miraculous event, which ought to have excited the wonder, the curiosity, and the devotion of mankind, passed without notice in an age of science and history." ("The Decline and Fall," chap. xv.) A distinct chapter of Pliny is devoted to eclipses of an extraordinary character and unusual duration. But St. Luke's phrase (xxiii. 45) is the same as that in Apoc. ix. 2—ἐσκοτίσθη ὁ ἥλιος, "the sun was darkened"—i. e., obscured and partially concealed by smoke and dust. Modern observation makes us familiar with the fact that a darkening of the sky very frequently precedes earthquakes. (See Dean Milman's note to his edition of Gibbon, vol. i., 525, 526.)

‡ Isaiah liii. 5; 1 Pet. ii. 24; 2 Cor. v. 21.

† Numbers xiv. 34, R.V., not (as A.V.) "breach of promise," but alienation or withdrawal.

‡ St. John vi. 57. § Heb. ii. 9.

Now this was over. Then death died in the heart of God. The dereliction melted away in depths of unclouded light. "My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Unbelief, as we have seen, cries, "Despair, impatience, ignorance, cowardice." Rather, it is not only the necessary utterance of the atoning death of the Incarnate Lord; it is a proof of the reality of the suffering of His soul. It is a sweet protestation. It points, of course, to past hours of darkness unspeakable. But it leaps to His lips as if with a burst of music, with some far-off accompaniment of triumph. He cried "with a great voice," and it was the cry, the word, which supremely impressed the earliest Evangelists. But now it is over, past and gone, lying in the distance—"Why didst Thou?"*

III.

THE writer of this paper will suggest but one practical thought bearing upon the awful mystery of death. He will suppose himself, on this occasion, to be writing especially for the young—and for young people of the better classes in London, where the circumstances of their lives bring them into contact with what is so well known as the "London Season."

Some may say that this is a peculiarly unsuitable kind of lesson.

Those who are old, or growing old, who know little of fashion but its exterior, have no right to speak bitterly of that with which they are but imperfectly acquainted. It is, of course, no heavy task to aim facile shafts at balls, dinner-parties, receptions, concerts, drawing-rooms, dances, for which the June nights are all too short. Worldliness is a word with flexible and wavering outlines when we come to define it. Its line of demarcation is never local, or made of material stuff. It is inside the Church in mist, as well as outside in pomp. The duties which devolve upon the much-abused "designing mothers" are like other duties: they only become mean when they are meanly done. For those among the elder to whom the season is supposed to be a period of delightful excitement, it is, sometimes at least, a protracted self-sacrifice, a weary fast of much more than forty days.

But for the young, "Rejoice in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment."†

This is not, if we understand it rightly, the utterance of an elderly roué become a Trappist, or a sickly valetudinarian with an unwholesome religionism, thinking fiercely upon youth, and hissing out, with a bitter laugh or sneer, "Go on! enjoy yourselves if you like, but take the consequences!"—a warning which differs from an anathema chiefly in its form. The sentence is most truly understood by taking it literally. The best rule for its interpretation is to suppose that a sweet and kindly smile looked down upon the page whereon it was first inscribed.

The writer who addresses the young of whom we have spoken should surely in substance speak to this effect—

We are, in fact, in different lights: you in the dawn, I in the sunset. I cannot see things in your light, still less can you see them in mine. As I look backward with you, the radiance of my past is dimmed with a mist of tears; as you look forward with me, the light is too severe, too pathetic, lingering as it does high up on cliffs whose bases are becoming darkened with gathering shadows. Yet at least keep your hearts pure, remembering that "He who was begotten of God keepeth you, and that wicked one toucheth you not." Every season the dawn fades, and the darkness comes for young souls. Perhaps grief, perhaps change of circumstances, perhaps disappointment, perhaps sickness, perhaps the death that comes with a foot of velvet and strikes with a hand of steel.

In a great spiritual manual there is a solemn chapter "On the Withdrawal of all Consolation." It must have been written under the shadow of the fourth word from the cross by one whom its echoes haunted, whose spirit re-translated it into language more easily understood by sinful man. "He rideth easily whom grace carrieth joyously." "Do I love Jesus?" is often asked. At times it is answered in the affirmative, with a facile joy which is superficial. The great picture in Lear is full of instruction. The old man asks his daughters, "How much do you love me?" Two of them heap hyperbole on hyperbole, and make professions, extravagant no doubt, yet possibly not intentionally quite false. One only says little, almost nothing, knowing that "her heart is richer than her tongue." But which really loved most? Bear witness the scene where the storm rolls over the old discrowned king's white hair upon the heath. Not strength of profession, but tenacity of grasp, will avail you in such hours as we speak of. Above all, strengthen yourselves by contemplating One Who (as the fourth word from the cross testifies) knew the trials of feeling as well as the touch of pain. Hold fast by the hand of Him Who suffered darkness and death, that He might turn death into life, and darkness into light. Pray ever—

> "Abide with me from morn till eve,
> For without Thee I cannot live:
> Abide with me when night is nigh,
> For without Thee I dare not die."

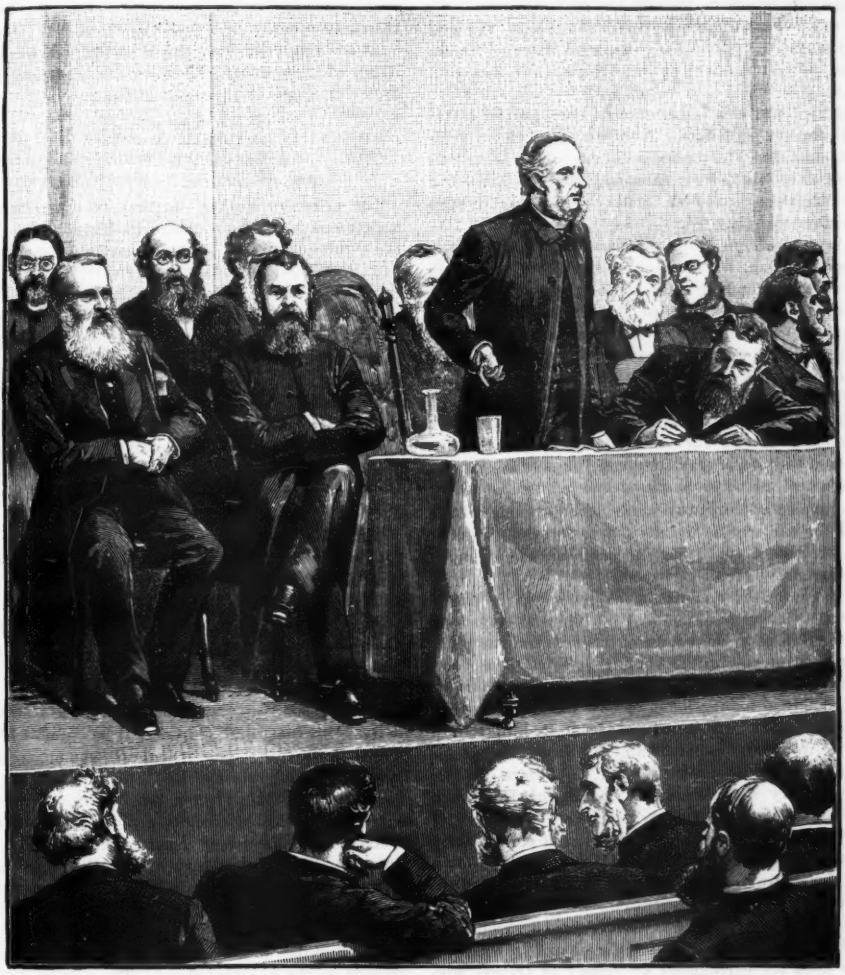
THE WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE.

BY THE REV. JOHN TELFORD, B.A.

THERE is an old print, of some interest though of little or no historic value, which represents the first Methodist Conference in Session. The scene is a small room of Wesley's first preaching-house, the Foundry, in Little Moorfields. Wesley himself is on his feet, his brother Charles seems to be installed as secretary, whilst four other clergymen occupy the front seats. Behind them stand the coming men, four representatives of that noble band of itinerants who became Wesley's sons in the Gospel, and spread the influence of the Evangelical Revival throughout England and America. Behind Wesley is the President's chair, which seems to show us "many more" who are to fill that seat of honour after the Founder's death.

It was on Monday, June 25, 1744, that those ten men met together. Two years earlier Wesley's visit to Newcastle had extended the boundaries of his vast circuit to the extreme north of England. Methodism had become one of the chief religious forces of the time. Step by step God had led the Oxford graduates to their life-work by a way they knew not. So rapidly was Methodism growing that Wesley felt he must take counsel with men of kindred spirit lest the vast opportunity should not be fully improved. He therefore sent invitations to a few of his friends and helpers asking "their advice respecting the best method of carrying on the work of God."



THE REV. JOSEPH BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

The progress already made was evident in the Sacramental service held the day before the Conference. The London Society, numbering between two and three thousand, received the Communion from the hands of five clergymen. The whole town had indeed been stirred by the revival. Next morning Charles Wesley opened the session with one of his mighty sermons and baptised "Samuel Holloway, who in that moment felt the great burden taken off." The week was spent in prayerful conversations on the doctrine, discipline, and mission of Methodism. Before it closed all perceived that this assembly for consultation and prayer must become a permanent feature. The workers had been brought face to face, to their unspeakable comfort and to the priceless advantage of their work. Henceforth the gathering became the Annual Conference. By this assembly the doctrines of Methodism were discussed, and its growing organisation was adapted to the heavy demands made upon it. Above all, the bonds of friendship and sympathy were knit more closely between scattered workers who could have known little of each other had they not thus met occasionally at Conference.

But though the Conference took root thus early, it was not till February 28, 1784, that Wesley executed his Deed of Declaration, which finally fixed its legal basis after the death of himself and his brother. That deed contained the names of one hundred "Preachers" who were to form the Conference. They were empowered to meet once a year, to fill up vacancies in their number, elect a president and secretary, appoint ministers to the various circuits, admit suitable men to the ranks of the itinerancy, and exercise general control over the United Societies.

Their annual assembly was to sit not less than five nor more than twenty-one days. It was not legal unless forty of its members were present. If anyone was absent for two years in succession without a dispensation, he ceased to be a member unless he was present on the first day of the next Conference.

When Wesley executed this deed there were one hundred and seventy Methodist preachers. His selection of names gave considerable offence to some who found themselves passed over. In the following year, however, he wrote a letter, in which he besought those whose names were on the deed never to avail themselves of that instrument to assume any authority over their brethren, but to let all things go on as when he was with them, so far as circumstances would permit.

THE CONFERENCE IN SESSION.

This letter was entrusted to Joseph Bradford—Wesley's travelling companion—to be read to the preachers after the Founder's death. Wesley's injunction has been faithfully obeyed. The British Conference now represents more than 2,500 ministers and supernumeraries at home and abroad, but "the hundred" is still the "Legal Conference," which must confirm all decisions of the General Conference in matters provided for by the Deed of Declaration. This is generally done as a matter of course, though in case of hasty or unconstitutional legislation the veto of the hundred would secure time for further deliberation. A place in the "hundred" has now become one of the coveted distinctions of Methodism—conferred for administrative ability, pulpit power, scholarship, or special work of any kind. It is hard to say what gifts or services qualify a man for election, but a glance at the roll will show how various are the excellences which have been thus recognised. It must be borne in mind that the president and secretary can only be chosen out of this inner circle, so that it forms the way to the highest honours of Methodism.

The time and place of each Conference are fixed in the previous year's assembly. There are thirteen "Conference towns" which bear this burdensome but much-prized honour:—London, Bristol, Leeds, Manchester, Sheffield, Liverpool, Birmingham, Newcastle, Hull, Bradford, Camborne, Burslem, Nottingham. The Minutes of Conference, which form the official year-book, always contain a statement of the number of ministers and laymen to be chosen by each of the thirty-five districts at their May Session. Since 1878, laymen have taken their place with the ministers in the "Representative Session" which is held in the third week. The "Pastoral Session," composed of ministers only, sits during the two first weeks.

At the Camborne Conference of 1888, provision was made for 400 ministers. Members of the legal hundred, candidates for ordination, and others, were estimated at 121; 279 were chosen by the districts. For the Conference of 1887, held in Manchester, 450 ministers were invited.

"Who shall go to Conference this year?" is a question which, with commendable discretion, is left almost to the end of the agenda in the May district committees. The names of the ministers are called over, and each man states whether he wishes to attend. Then comes the process of sifting, which is often somewhat severe before the list is reduced to the allotted number.

Meanwhile, the Conference town is preparing for its guests. Homes have to be found for four or five hundred visitors, a plan of preaching services drawn up for two or three Sundays, and elaborate postal, telegraphic, and railway arrangements made. It is hard for one who is uninitiated to form any idea of the tax which such matters make on the strength and ingenuity of all concerned.

Going to Conference is a happy event. Friends generally travel together and beguile the way with speculations as to the course of business and the chief points of interest in the coming session. The Camborne Conference added a new delight to the journey. By the skilful management of two London ministers, a special train was chartered from Paddington, in which circuit and departmental ministers set out for Cornwall with their wives and daughters. "The west country was all astir as the Flying Dutchman steamed in with its precious freight." The variety of provisions suggested a picnic, the buzz of conversation savoured of a debating club. It was evident that a new departure had been made which was destined to become a popular institution.

It is necessary to be astir early on the first morning of Conference. The doors of the chapel in which it is to meet are surrounded by groups of friends who have, perhaps, not met for many a year. Looking inside the place, a platform may be seen stretching across the end of the building. Gradually this is filled with Conference officials. In the centre is the outgoing President, whose year of honour is almost over. On his left is the Secretary with his three assistants, behind whom are the "official letter-writers;" on his right sits the Ex-President, beyond whom are those who have "passed the chair," arranged in order of seniority. Seats are also reserved for representatives from affiliated Conferences. The seats nearest the platform are reserved for the legal hundred, officers of departments—such as the Home and Foreign Missionary Societies—and chairmen of districts. The rank and file of the pastorate fill up the unoccupied seats down-stairs, and overflow into the gallery. Many ministers who find homes for themselves swell the numbers. About five hundred men in all gathered at Camborne on July 24th, 1888, but the great distance generally makes a Cornish Conference smaller than any other.

At the appointed hour the President gives out that hymn which awakens a host of reminiscences in the breast of every Conference veteran:—

> "And are we yet alive,
> And see each other's face?
> Glory and praise to Jesus give,
> Who saves us by His grace!

The precentor strikes the first note—an organ is undreamed of—and the whole building vibrates with the volume of praise. After devotional exercises are over, the Secretary calls out the roll of the legal hundred. The vacancies caused by death are then filled up, nominations being made in brief speeches which state, with varying degrees of effectiveness, the special claims of various brethren to election. Every man thus chosen must have been at least fourteen years in the ministry. The elections are made alternately on the ground of seniority, and in recognition of any kind of special work. When the vacancies caused by death or absence without a dispensation have been filled up, those due to superannuation are left over till the President and Secretary have been chosen.

This is the event of the day. The result of the vote for President has generally been foreshadowed by the previous year's election. The name which then stood second now generally takes the first place. When the voting is declared his deposed predecessor quits the chair of office, and in a brief congratulatory speech hands over the official seal and John Wesley's Bible which he used in his field-preaching. The new President then requests his brethren to be seated, and delivers his inaugural address. It has almost become a custom for this speech to suggest some motto for the year. At Camborne, the Rev. Joseph Bush, who was called to the chair after a long course of honoured service in Methodist circuits, gave as the watchword, "Conversions in every congregation." The Rev. David J. Waller, Secretary of the Wesleyan Education Department, was again elected Secretary of the Conference by a virtually unanimous vote.

The Conference prayer-meeting held at one o'clock on the first day of the session is much appreciated by friends in the neighbourhood. The "Open Session" is even more largely attended. At Camborne it was held at a quarter to three on the second afternoon. Addresses were read from seven affiliated conferences, and speeches delivered by their representatives. Such a gathering serves to show how cosmopolitan Methodism has become. The Rev. Charles H. Kelly, who had just returned from an official visit to the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, delighted the Conference and its friends in Cornwall by his humorous and suggestive descriptions of Methodist life across the Atlantic. Anyone who will glance at that speech as given in the Methodist papers of the time will see how valuable an instrument of education the "Open Session" may thus be made. Whilst we are speaking of the gatherings to which the public are invited we may refer to the Ordination Service, at which the young ministers who have successfully passed through their three years' training at college and their four years' probation are set apart by imposition of hands. The Ex-President delivers the charge. The official sermons, the public examination of candidates for ordination, the Conference love-feast, the recognition of returned missionaries, the temperance and holiness meetings, are all eagerly appreciated.

We must return to the Conference itself. Some of its most solemn hours are spent every year in answering the question, "Who have died this year?" Charles Wesley's funeral hymn is sung—

> "Come, let us join our friends above
> That have obtained the prize."

Then follow tributes to honoured friends from those who have known and worked with them in former days. Each man seems conscious that his own turn will come by-and-by. The "Conversation on the Work of God" gives any minister who has been blessed with marked success an opportunity to cheer and rouse his brethren. Suggestions as to the best means for reaching the masses, building up the Church, or shepherding the young, are also welcomed.

Ministerial character and orthodoxy are watched over with special jealousy. The Conference is the final court for the trial of all cases of discipline. Charges are generally referred to a committee of appeal, which brings in its report to the Conference. Candidates for the ministry, after passing through a searching and prolonged series of tests, are finally accepted or rejected by the Conference. Students who have completed their term at the Connexional colleges are appointed to circuits, and reports of their reading and examinations are annually made until the four years of probation are over.

The great event of the pastoral session for a large proportion of the men is the discussion and confirmation of "stations," as the appointments for the year are called. The system of itinerancy allows no minister in the ordinary work to remain more than three years in a circuit. Each May District Committee chooses a representative to whom ministers and circuits make known the invitations given and accepted, or the arrangements which they wish to be made. When the Stationing Committee meets, the representative does his best for his own circuits and men. A "first draft" is issued before the Conference meets, but many changes have to be made before the "third draft" is read and confirmed. When six hundred men and six hundred circuits have to be considered and consulted, it is naturally a hard task to suit every individual case. It is surprising how well both men and places are satisfied with the result.

All matters affecting ministerial work come before the Conference in its pastoral session. Notices of motion, or reports brought in by committees appointed the previous year, sometimes give rise to great debates. Such was the debate at Camborne on the class-meeting, on the order of sessions, and on foreign missionary affairs. New men come to the front in these debates, but the fathers of the Conference are always looked up to for guidance. If opinion is seriously divided, or further consideration is deemed expedient, questions are referred to committees, or even submitted to the judgment of the district meetings. When all the work is finished, friends and hosts are admitted, and the Conference journal is signed by the President and Secretary.

Up to 1878, as we have said, there was only one session of Conference. In that year, laymen first took their place in the assembly for the transaction of the financial business of Methodism. The "Representative Session," as it is called, meets in the third week—on the August Bank Holiday. It is composed of 240 ministers, with an equal number of laymen. At Camborne twelve laymen sat as treasurers of connexional funds, eighteen were chosen by the previous Conference, 210 were elected by the laymen in the various districts; 141 ministers were also selected by the ministers; the rest of the 240 were what one may call ex-officio members. A "Laymen's Special" ran from Paddington to Camborne. It is said that the Great Western never issued so many first-class tickets by a single train. Saturday was pleasantly spent among the beauties of the county. On Sunday the President preached his official sermon, and on Monday evening the annual Fernley Lecture was given. Business began on Monday morning with an inaugural address from the President, in which special reference was made to the lamented deaths of Alderman Sir William McArthur and Mr. Alderman Barlow, who were both honoured members of the previous Conference. Each financial department has to present its report to the Representative Session, and important discussions often arise, such as the debates on Foreign Missions and on the Order of Sessions at Camborne. The "Conversation on the Work of God" bears witness to the self-sacrificing zeal and happy success of the laymen of Methodism in spiritual work. When all business is transacted the journal is signed, and the representatives hasten back to their circuits. The Minutes of Conference published each year at the end of August bear witness how vast and varied is the business transacted by the Annual Conference of the people called Methodists, in its pastoral and representative sessions.

SOME BIBLE PLANTS.

HYSSOP.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM SPIERS,
M.A., F.G.S., F.R.M.S.

THE inquiry as to what plant corresponds to the Biblical "hyssop" is of special interest to the Christian, for it was used as the medium by which the sponge filled with vinegar was given to the Redeemer upon the cross. (John xix. 29.)

There are many other references to hyssop in the Scriptures. In the Levitical ritual the blood of animals offered as sacrifices was sprinkled on the transgressor, or on the sacred utensils, as the case might be, by means of a bunch of hyssop, a custom that seems to have originated from the fact that at the Exodus it was used by the Israelites, in accordance with God's command, for the purpose of sprinkling the blood of the lamb on the lintels of the houses. (Exod. xii. 22.) It was put to similar uses in various kinds of ceremonial purification. (Lev. xiv. 4—7, 48; Num. xix.) These associations of the plant with expiation and cleansing give a beautiful significance to David's petition in the hour of his deep and sincere penitence: "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean." (Psalm li. 7.) In the Epistle to the Hebrews we find these Jewish customs thus referred to and interpreted: "When Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book and all the people, saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you. Moreover, he sprinkled with blood both the Tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry. And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission." (Heb. ix. 19—22.)

There is another reference to hyssop in the passage which sets forth the wide knowledge of plants which Solomon possessed. "He spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall." (1 Kings iv. 33.)

We are able to gather, then, from these various Scriptural expressions, that hyssop was plentiful in Egypt and in Palestine, that it was found in the wilderness, that it grew also on the thick earthy mortar or cement that was used in ancient masonry, and that it was a somewhat small herbaceous plant, which could easily be arranged in a bunch and utilised as a sort of rude brush.

The difficulties connected with the identification of hyssop have arisen mainly from the uncertainty as to what plant was intended by the original words of Scripture that denote it, and also from the undue straining of some expressions that occur in the Bible concerning it. The Hebrew word (ēzōb) is rendered in the Septuagint by the Greek ὕσσωπος (hyssopus), for which there was probably no better reason than a similarity of sound between the two words. It is not at all clear what the Greek hyssop was, though most botanists regard it as being a species of Saturcia, a labiate plant something like mint, while others favour the marjoram (Origanum).

The language of David, already quoted, has led some to imagine that the plant was possessed of purifying properties; but the conditions of the case are fully satisfied by the supposition that he merely had in mind the ceremonial uses of hyssop (ēzōb).

In the accounts of our Lord's crucifixion given by St. Matthew and St. Mark, there is no mention of hyssop, but it is stated that the sponge was raised to the Redeemer's lips by means of a reed. But as St. John distinctly asserts that hyssop was used, we must suppose that the sponge and hyssop were fastened to the reed. The suggestion has been made that the hyssop had a stem strong enough to warrant its being described as a reed; but this is not the most natural interpretation of the passage.

Linnæus adopted the notion of Hasselquist, that hyssop was a moss growing out of the wall at Solomon's Well. This moss was named by Linnæus Bryum truncatulum, and is now called Pottia truncatula. This is a very small plant, being less than an inch in height; so that we may unhesitatingly dismiss its claims to be regarded as the hyssop with which the Jewish priests sprinkled the sacrificial blood. The plant now known as hyssop cannot be meant, for it only received its name in modern times; while it is a native of Europe, and is never found in Palestine, nor in the district of Sinai.

The prevailing opinion amongst botanists of our time is that the Biblical hyssop is the plant called by Linnæus Capparis spinosa, the most familiar member of the caper family. Sprengel was the first to advance this opinion, his Capparis Ægyptiaca being practically identical with Capparis spinosa. After a thorough examination of the question, Dr. Forbes Royle adopted this view; and he has been followed by Tristram, Stanley, and other travellers in the Holy Land.

The caper plant is shrubby, and has several slender stems, from which spring many broad, smooth, and toughish leaves. The flowers are white, and fruit nearly an inch in length grows at the end of a long stalk. It is not the seed, but the unopened flower-bud, that is pickled and used as a condiment. Canon Tristram records that he saw this plant hanging from the walls of Jerusalem, and growing round about the site of the ancient Temple; while it abounds in the vicinity of the Dead Sea and the plains of Shittim. Dr. Royle pointed out that the Arabic name for the caper, which is azuf, or asaf, is very similar to ēzōb, the Old Testament word which is rendered hyssop; that it grows on rocks and walls, that it is capable of being used as a reed, and that it was always regarded as possessing cleansing properties. On the other hand, it should be pointed out that its woody stem, its prickles and its smooth leaves, would rather militate against its being used as a sprinkler. Moreover, the Gospel narratives of the crucifixion do not necessarily imply that the hyssop and the reed were the same plant, but seem to indicate that they were not. Dean Stanley observes: "The asaf, or caper plant, the bright green creeper which climbs out of the fissures of the rocks in the Sinaitic valleys, has been identified on grounds of great probability with the hyssop or ēzōb of Scripture, and thus explains whence came the green branches used for sprinkling the water over the tents of the Israelites."

Whatever, therefore, may have been the plant signified by the Greek hyssop, it appears to be the general opinion that the Old Testament ēzōb was neither mint nor marjoram, but the caper. Mr. Carruthers is almost the only authority who appears inclined to hold to the ancient tradition that the marjoram or Origanum was intended. Dr. Kitto hints at the possibility that a kind of soap-plant found in Mexico was the Biblical hyssop; while others have thought that, as such great quantities would be required at the Passover of the Exodus, it may have been the common sorghum or millet that was used, a plant widely utilised for making brooms. Mr. Grindon thinks the Mosaic ēzōb was the marjoram, while the hyssop of Solomon was the caper plant; and he believes the former, not the latter, to have been the hyssop of the crucifixion.

The question is evidently surrounded with uncertainty, and if we learn no other lesson from its consideration we shall be reminded of the value of patient research, and of the wisdom of avoiding dogmatic assertion in cases where there is legitimate room for differences of opinion.

There, in Christ's garden, blissful joy
And peace are felt, without alloy;
And how must there resound
The voices of the Seraphim,
Who, with untirèd voices, hymn
Their hallelujahs round!

3.

If I were there, if I might stand,
Almighty God, at Thy right hand,
And wave on high my palm;
I'd imitate the angels' lays,
Exalt Thy name with songs of praise
In many a joyful psalm!

4.

But why, while earth is my abode
Beneath this body's mortal load,
Should I withhold my praise?
My heart shall one unceasing song,
While I through life my course prolong,
For all Thy mercies raise!

A RESCUING HAND.

BY JESSIE MACLEOD, AUTHOR OF "A STRANGE COINCIDENCE," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

AT the corner of a lane leading out of Fenchurch Street stood the extensive premises once in the occupation of Mr. Breakspear; all its windows and doors were closed, and the placards affixed to them, of "This Spacious Warehouse to Let," gave the building a dreary, melancholy aspect.

One day late in autumn, a gentleman of foreign appearance, dark and sunburnt, was standing in the busy thoroughfare, surveying it. His difficulty was to find an entrance. At last he saw a gateway leading to an inner yard, at the back of which were outbuildings, and a ladder-like flight of steps leading up to a half-glass door. Ascending them, he pulled a bell-handle; the peal sounded loud and melancholy, as bells always do in empty houses. He had to repeat the summons, and was about to think the place uninhabited, when heavy footsteps were heard descending from the upper storeys, and the door was unbolted by an old man with round-eyed horn spectacles on his nose, his face furrowed with wrinkles, a paper cap upon his head, a canvas apron, shirt-sleeves rolled up to the shoulder, and hands hard and horny—brave old hands, denoting a long, industrious life.

"What may be your pleasure, sir?" asked he, peering at the new-comer attentively.

"Is Mr. Breakspear here? I wish to see him."

"On business, sir?"

"Yes, on business."

The old fellow hesitated. "I know it's a liberty, sir, and a question such as I ought not to ask, and I hope you'll excuse it—but you see, my master has been much harassed lately: he's not the man he used to was: is the business anything about back debts—anything unpleasant?"

"I have nothing to say that will annoy your master; quite the reverse."

Upon this, with a relieved expression, he held open the door, admitting the visitor to a roughly boarded passage, dusty and cobwebbed, from which a narrow stair ascended.

"Mr. Breakspear is here to-day, sir. I'll go up and tell him you want to see him. What name shall I say?"

"Mr. Ashworth, from New York."

The honest old warehouseman plodded up to the top storey of the outbuilding, which, on account of a good light, had been temporarily converted into Mr. Breakspear's office, where he could sit and write undisturbed. The heavy footfalls of age soon redescended, and presently old Gregory, leaning over the hand-rail, called out, "Will you please to come up, sir?"

Whereupon the gentleman mounted to the loft, for it was little better.

As he entered, the merchant rose to receive him. The twenty years which had passed since Mr. Breakspear was first introduced to the reader had left their mark upon him. The happy, prosperous, fresh-complexioned, robust man of forty was now sixty years of age; his colour had fled, his brown hair was grey; anxiety and care had lined his brow; the full bright eye had paled, and sight was failing; yet, in spite of these changes, he still bore the stamp of what he was: an honourable, upright man. Almost overwhelming misfortunes had overtaken him, which some persons would have tided over with an unscrupulous high hand. Not so Mr. Breakspear; he was struggling on, trying to keep together the fragments of his once prosperous business.

Mr. Ashworth gazed at the merchant earnestly; he spoke first. "I trust you will excuse me intruding upon you without an introduction from one of your personal acquaintance, but I bring testimonials from houses of repute in America. If you will kindly read some of them, they will explain the business I come upon."

"Certainly," replied Mr. Breakspear, a little at a loss to understand the drift of his words, for his visitor bore the appearance of prosperity in manner and tone of address; "though I fear I can be of little use to you at present." He adjusted his eyeglasses with a hand that had recently begun to tremble (for he had become nervous of late; sensitive people cannot help being shaken by their trials), and read one of his visitor's letters.

"Messrs. Maxey and Vanderlinden, of New York and Boston, most highly recommend Mr. Ashworth as manager or junior partner in a merchant's house. He possesses great experience, has superior business abilities, is of strict integrity, with a large capital to invest in any concern wishing to extend its connection."

"This is very good. Am I to understand that you come to me as being likely to forward your views? If so, I fear you are mistaken," said Mr. Breakspear, with a sigh.

"I have only just arrived from America. It was there that I heard of an opening being possible in your well-known house."

"Alas! I must not deceive you; no manager is required where there is so little to be managed. The aspect of my affairs has quite changed. As to partnership, the idea is impossible."

"Pardon me if I think differently. Your name stands high. Dishonour only means ruin."

"You are very good," replied the merchant, visibly touched. "I am doing my best to keep affairs together, retaining this outbuilding in the rear of my former warehouses for the sake of being on the spot. That old man you saw, who is fidelity personified, and one clerk, more faithful still, are my only assistants. Will you excuse me for a few minutes while I consult this friend?"

Mr. Ashworth bowed, and the merchant disappeared through a door communicating with another room. The visitor looked around at the bare appearance of the office, shaking his head pityingly. "Sad, sad!" he murmured to himself. "How he has changed, poor man! I have not come a moment too soon."

Presently Mr. Breakspear reopened the door.

"Will you come in, Mr. Ashworth? There is a fire, and we can, if you please, talk over affairs more comfortably."

The visitor entered; to his surprise, a lady was seated at the table, writing.

"My wife—and only clerk," said the merchant. "There are few women who would have risen to the occasion as she has done. It is her high courage which has sustained me, and kept my spirit from being crushed."

"No, no, Philip," said Mrs. Breakspear, smiling; "you will give Mr. Ashworth too high an opinion of me.—You see, sir, I am quick with my pen, and have always been fond of figures; my father is a clergyman, and when I was a girl, drilled me well in algebra." She was a small, plump little woman, who had been pretty in her youth, not looking in the least the heroine she was: who had resigned her happy home, her carriages, her plate, and all her jewellery, save her watch and wedding-ring, without a murmur, working at the books as no paid accountant would have done so unremittingly, night and day.

"My opinion is," began Mr. Breakspear, "that you might invest your capital better than in joining a shipwrecked man, but my wife thinks differently."

"Yes, Philip, I do. If a friend comes forward holding out his hand to you in good faith, why not take it in all honesty of purpose?"

"You are right, madam," said Mr. Ashworth, with a little bow, looking with pleasure at eyes sparkling with renewed hope, and the delicate flush of pleasure on her cheek. "Besides, this is not a shipwreck; the barque has got 'snagged,' as we say in the States; who knows but that a high tide will disentangle and float her?"

"If we are to think seriously of a partnership, we must fix a time for going through the affairs," said the merchant.

"There is no time like the present," replied the visitor, drawing his chair close to the fire. "If it is convenient to you, we will begin now."

Much talking and serious business can be got through in two hours, when people are in earnest. In that space of time the two gentlemen had come to a good understanding, and most of the preliminaries of the intended partnership had been arranged, although there was much more to be done on another day. Mr. Ashworth took his leave, well pleased with the result of his interview.

Hailing a hansom, he drove direct to St. Osyth's Vicarage at Brompton; for that very morning he had looked at a newspaper, the first he had seen since arriving in England; it was the copy of a previous day, and almost the first thing that caught his eye was his own name—being, in fact, the advertisement inserted by Mr. Heritage, addressed to Francis Ashworth, who was earnestly entreated to communicate with the Rev. Mark Heritage, St. Osyth's Vicarage, Old Brompton. His astonishment, it is needless to say, was boundless. The vicar was at home, and would see him. The visitor did not send in his name; but at the first glance Mr. Heritage knew who he was.

"I come in answer to your advertisement; I am——"

"Francis Ashworth himself," interrupted Mr. Heritage. "You so strongly resemble your father that I need not ask your name. How thankful the old gentleman will be at this immediate and fortunate result to the advertisement!"

"Then he lives. I feared he was dead."

"Yes, he lives, but, sad to say, he is blind. The past is a bitter grief to him—he has longed for reconciliation many years."

"I have written to him repeatedly, and all my letters have remained unanswered. Strange! I even came to England, not so very long ago, expressly to ask for his forgiveness, and was spurned from the house by the cruel message that 'He forgot he ever had a son.'"

"May I ask who gave you the message?"

"My cousin, Miss Siddall—it was she whom I saw. Two days ago I arrived from America. Imagine my great surprise when I read your advertisement in the very first newspaper I took up."

"Your father told me he had repeatedly advertised for you. It is my firm belief there has been some chicanery, and the advertisements were never sent out of the house. It is providential that he should have placed the matter in my hands."

"My poor father! I will go to him at once," cried Ashworth, springing from his seat.

"Gently. Remember he is old and feeble: this great joy might prove too much for him. I will accompany you, and break the news gradually."

The two gentlemen then walked together to old Mr. Ashworth's residence, comparing notes on their way, and quite convinced there had been foul play. Mr. Heritage was now admitted without difficulty. He found the old gentleman in his chair at the fireside, more cheerful than usual; he greeted the clergyman cordially.

"I have wonderfully good news for you, Mr. Ashworth—our advertisement is answered. Your son lives."

"Lives! Heaven be praised!" he bowed his venerable white head, clasping his hands in mental prayer. "Is he in England," he asked, after a pause.

"He is."

"In London, perhaps?" (anxiously).

"Indeed he is, Mr. Ashworth."

"He is here! I feel it," cried the father, as if by inspiration. "Bring him to me. May Heaven's blessing rest on you, Mr. Heritage."

Miss Siddall was up-stairs, dressing for her morning walk. Hearing unaccustomed sounds in the house, she descended, and found the vicar walking up and down in the hall, like a sentinel, before her uncle's door.

"Good-morning, Mr. Heritage," said she. "May I ask why you are waiting here?"

"Because Mr. Ashworth is engaged with a visitor."

"A visitor!" she exclaimed, opening her eyes with surprise. "Who is it?"

"Let me go!" she cried, gasping for breath.

"Harriet Siddall," said the old gentleman, turning towards her his sightless eyes, from which tears still flowed. "False woman! Traitress! At last I learn your true character. For years you have lived under my roof, eating my bread; hearing my laments for my lost son day after day unmoved. One word from you would have renewed my peace of mind. Heart

"To his surprise, a lady was seated at the table writing."—p. 428.

"A visitor from abroad—America."

She made a dart at the door.

"Stop," he said, placing his hand on the handle. "You must not go in yet."

"And pray, sir, why am I to be prevented from entering my uncle's room?" she exclaimed, indignantly.

At this moment Francis Ashworth opened the door; she recognised him, and started back in astonishment and dismay. He grasped her firmly by the shoulder, and, in spite of her struggles, forced her towards his father.

of stone! base, designing woman! Begone from my house!"

The wretched woman crimsoned and paled alternately with shame and anger; her scheming to be his heiress had failed.

"But, uncle, I cannot be turned away like this. When I came to live with you, did you not promise to provide for me? I——"

"A clever manœuvrer such as you have proved yourself has, I feel sure, not neglected the many opportunities there are in my house for making a private purse. Besides, I have paid you a regular salary. Begone, unnatural woman!" exclaimed the indignant old man, holding up his hands in abhorrence.

She fled from the room—but not from the dwelling, until after she had packed her many belongings, her sordid nature valuing nothing but this world's gear.

From that moment the restored son never again quitted his father, whose few remaining years he soothed with filial affection, trying to atone for the past.

One fine morning, six months after these events, he visited Mr. Breakspear, who had just become repossessed of the old mansion at Hampstead. For since his partnership, prosperity had returned with surprising rapidity. The warehouses in Fenchurch Street were again in full working order, the counting-house was occupied by busy clerks. Old Gregory was promoted to the post of office-keeper—a happy, important person, wearing a new suit of clothes, and a pair of silver spectacles, the gift of the junior partner.

The house of Breakspear flourished once more.

Francis Ashworth found the merchant arranging volumes on the shelves in the library, a room in the rear of the house, opening upon the garden. He grasped his hand. "I have come," he said, "to congratulate you upon your return to your old quarters; I trust you will enjoy many years of happiness here."

"I AM happy—and, under Providence, thankful to you. Your energy and pecuniary resources have effected the change as if by magic. All is sunshine. My boy, too, is prospering in Louisiana; I had a letter from him this morning; he writes in high spirits, but wishes for the return of his employer, who is making a long stay in England. It seems that he and Mr. Hope's step-daughter have fallen in love with each other. A few months ago I should have felt bound to forbid him aspiring to the hand of an heiress, but, under my present brightening circumstances, if all goes on well, the match may not prove so unequal. I must try and see Mr. Hope myself."

"You see him now," said his junior partner, smiling.

"What!" ejaculated Mr. Breakspear. "I do not understand."

"I have been wishing to tell you for some time that I and the Louisianian planter are one and the same person. Hope is my business name in America. Hearing from Walter of your undeserved troubles, I felt it my imperative duty to come to the rescue."

"Your duty!" cried the bewildered merchant.

"Clearly, since it was through your benevolence that I made my fortune. Carry your memory back twenty years. A stormy night, and thieves endeavouring to effect an entrance by that very window. You fired a revolver from your bedroom, wounding one of them—a very young man."

"Yes—I remember, I did so—but how do you know this?"

"Because—I was that miserable culprit," said Ashworth, turning down his collar and showing the scar on his throat. "By that capture you arrested a career of infamy. Your subsequent goodness started me on the path of rectitude. I found my way to the United States, I exerted my energies, and prospered. Imagine my surprise when, on advertising for a clerk, your son applied for the situation. I engaged him at once, wondering what chance had sent him to America. It was no chance—it was Providence. Walter shall take my place on the plantation for the present, and if the young people are really attached to each other, I see no reason to prevent them marrying whenever they wish. All I possess will be ultimately theirs."

Mr. Breakspear was utterly overcome.

"You are good!" he said—"you are grateful!"

"Can I be too grateful to you who rescued me?"

A WRITING LESSON.

BY THE REV. MICHAEL T. EASTWOOD.

"An example."—1 PETER ii. 21.

THE word "example" means a writing model; and literally a copy traced for a child to write over (ὑπογραμμός).* The thought suggested then by this literal rendering is—Christ's hand sets the copy for us to write upon.

Nor is this all. A kind parent or teacher does more than that. He guides the little hand—so weak, uncertain, and bewildered. Our theme then becomes—Christ sets our copy; Christ's strong saving hand holds ours as we write. It is with a smile of relief we think of the words "writing made easy," and henceforth we invest that phrase with a meaning more hallowed and tender. For, as we talk of writing, let us understand that we mean living—our life.

We all know that the reputation of a school depends very largely on the writing of its pupils. Ordinary folks are puzzled by the various "'ologies" and glib references thereto, and at once turn to the young people and say—"Show me your copy-book." Thus also the Christian school is most recommended by the writing—the life—the common every-day life—of its scholars. People can judge of that. Its value, its meaning, its beauty, its simplicity: these are more easily gauged than subtle theories. A simple, beautiful hand makes people covet the same for themselves and their children.

So we call to mind that we ought to be epistles—

* The writer's attention was first called to this word by a footnote in Farrar's "Early Days of Christianity," p. 91, Popular Edition.

"known and read of all men." With fear and trembling we perceive how much depends upon us, and how we are unconsciously recommending—or perhaps discrediting—the school of Christ. One thinks too of the future, when our life (like a piece of writing) shall be held up before heaven and earth. Who is sufficient for these things? "Ye" are: "Ye are My witnesses." Then we proceed, it may be with fear and trembling, but with joy, as we remember it is God that worketh in us, both to will and to do of His good pleasure. Once more we repeat—Christ's hand traces the writing; Christ's hand will hold ours as we follow the copy.

The picture before us is explained by the one word —surrender. And our Lord Himself accomplished His great work not by the stretching forth of His hand in its power, but by surrendering it to be nailed down to the cross—helpless, but victorious. He calls us to crucifixion too—but it turns out to be the surrender of our hand to His strong, saving clasp. This complete surrender is the only condition that can give peace to ourselves and satisfaction to God. Like the little child, it is absolutely impossible for us to fill a page with writing that shall be worth looking at, unless the copy is set and our hand supported. A child two or three years old might as well try to imagine the alphabet, and make intelligent use of it in writing, as we—children of riper years—to live the Christian life on our own resources.

But you will easily perceive that the Divine method does not suppress individuality: no more than the process of engrafting suppresses the individuality of a tree; on the contrary, it enhances and sweetens it. We have no need to fear surrender to Christ. We shall not lose but find ourselves in Him. Those who have made the most complete surrender to Him have ever been conspicuous for their individuality, originality, and power. Keeping to the illustration before us—the writing model—have we not often noticed how a copy so written touchingly exhibits both child and teacher? The same truth is pathetically and beautifully illustrated in the epistle from which our text is taken: it is all Peter; it is all Christ. And another apostle, who, weak as he was, left the mark of his personality graven deep on the tablets of history, was ever showing and telling how Christ had "laid hold" of him. It is only when He so lays hold of us, and we humbly submit, that our true individuality comes out. It is only then that our writing can live. And what Peter did—what Paul did—we can do in our own sphere. Our Master has no favourites; His "ye" meant the apostles; and it meant every one of the hundred and twenty scholars in His school. It meant all who would accept the condition. So but a few days later Peter stood up and said—"The promise is unto you and your children . . . and to all."

In Christ's hands we may write our name.

But Christ must be all and in all. He must be Master in every sense of the word. His rule must be absolute. He will have no compromise. We cannot bring our own copy-books to His school. He will set His own copies, and they must be written according to His will.

But He is gracious. See how patient and long-suffering with Peter. Never was a worse scholar than Peter; never was a better. How tender the Master to His bungling disciple; He never despised him—any more than you despise that tearful little boy who brings up a disgraceful copy. You can see the little fellow wants to do well, and therefore you guide him with patience and long-suffering. So Peter at the worst was willing to be right, willing to be put right; and the worst page he ever wrote—when the Master looked upon it, Peter covered it with tears—tears from the heart, every one a prayer to be put right.

This doctrine—this fact, indeed—is clearly enunciated in the New Testament—that he who is willing to be put right, shall be. "He that is of the truth, heareth My voice." "If any man will do [wills to do] His will, he shall know of the doctrine"—"shall receive the full saving benefit of My school."

True, there is some sternness about our Master, but the sternness of love. No error escapes His eye, or the touch of His inexorable pencil. Our attitude is noted; our mistakes are indicated. Nothing is passed over. Sometimes our book is taken from us, our opportunities are withheld; just as if, at school, our copy-book might be taken from us for a time as we were left to make fugitive impressions on a hard, dull slate. These are dreary times. But the chastening is never prolonged further than need be. He doth not willingly afflict. His actions, His words, are never capricious.

With what a glow of thankfulness should we remember that our religion has a Person behind it: a Person—not a mere doctrine; a Person—not a tradition; a Person—not a system. We have more indeed than the Bible itself, good as it is: we have living contact with a living Person, His hand ever upon ours.

To Him let us bring the old copy-book—the old unassisted writing that has shamed us so long. Look at it. How soiled and woe-begone! What mistakes! yet we were to be pitied if these were no more than mistakes. Sin is more than error—more than weakness—more than ignorance; at bottom of it are pride and rebellion. This spirit is embodied in the old writing. It is rude and harsh, breathing defiance to man and rebellion against God. Its whole cast plainly declares that we meant to write our own way, like that foolish boy who despises lawful authority, and thinks it a fine thing to scribble after his own conceited fashion. And then the blots—whole series of them—like diagrams to illustrate some grim experiment—bespeak our wanton heedlessness rather than the trembling hand of mere weakness. And those pitiful erasures do but aggravate the evil, telling, moreover, that we would deceive if we could; telling too of the vanity of our own methods—clumsy devices, that eat into the fibre of our life without doing any good.

But enough. As we sorrowfully gaze upon the past, and look up into our Master's face, what has happened? The old book has gone—as far as the east is from the west. A new creation is ours, a new book, fair and full of promise. And lo! the Master's finger traces the characters in red—each the crimson seal of our acceptance in His school and the earnest of our new life.

Let us very briefly study the characteristics of the new writing, which, by the way, is illustrated in the tendencies of actual writing during the last few years. It is plain. It is upright—like print. It is uniform; its ups and downs are ruled by the same principle. It is strong, but graceful; bold, yet chastened and subdued; beautiful, but useful. For though uniform, it is natural, and therefore tempting and charming;* the stilted, artificial "copperplate" that distressed our youth has given place to something more natural and hopeful.

So our Master's copy is human, divine, and natural. By nature we are really unnatural. Grace is to bring us into a state of nature—sweet simplicity and spontaneity, as the word indicates—that which is always about to be born—hence child-like, but not childish. Now, boys have a rooted objection (at first) to write a large plain hand. They forget that with advancing years our writing becomes smaller, and that if we began with a matured small-hand, our writing would dwindle away to nothing. And similarly, many people are deterred from the Christian life by its simplicity and child-likeness. But let us not forget that the Master Himself began at the beginning. He divested Himself of His native, rightful majesty, and began as a little child. And only little children can find a place in His school. We must become as little children, or we cannot even enter. The doorway only admits little children.

But the standard is perfection, after all. Our child-like life is always growing and moving towards that. This natural life is always developing. Hence our Master's fixing the standard at perfection is neither hopeless nor contradictory. Had He placed the standard of Christian life at anything short of perfection—why, it would have been imperfection. We could have attained to it; and what then? As it is we shall have room for eternal progress. We are children, but it doth not yet appear what we shall be. God only knows our glorious future. Thus every time we glance at the pierced hand that holds ours, we are incited to holier ambitions.

So we press forward; we patiently follow our copy wherever it leads; and, the strong, saving hand of the Master upon ours, we write for earth and heaven, for men and angels, for time and eternity. And when our writing is held up to the light of judgment we shall not be afraid, for it is His work rather than ours.

* I once knew a boy, the despair of schoolmasters, so far as his writing was concerned, who accidentally came across a paragraph in "The Popular Educator," the facsimile of a natural hand. It at once inspired him, and he wrote that hand ever afterwards.

AN APRIL-DAY THOUGHT.

"Transeunt nubes; Cælum manet."—ST. AUGUSTINE.

I WATCHED upon an April day
The darkening clouds arise,
Until they hid the light away
From out the bright blue skies,
Shrouding the heavens all around
With their black drapery profound.

How changed the scene, erewhile so glad—
The world seemed all so fair:
But now I felt my heart grow sad,
Beneath the gloomy air:
The lark had ceased to pour along
The leaden sky his joyous song.

But soon a gentle breeze of spring
Breathed through the saddened sky,
Bearing upon his buoyant wing
The clouds that hung on high:
Then heaven again beamed out serene,
And sun and light made glad the scene.

And such is life (thus ran my thought),
So chequered and so strange,
With sorrow and with pleasure fraught
Through many a fitful change:
Now smiles, now tears, now hopes, now fears
Brightening and darkening all our years.

To-day I learnt this lesson wise—
That though the clouds may lour,
They yet must pass from out the skies,
And light regain its power:
Or soon or late, clouds pass away;
The heaven above remains alway.

Lord, be it mine, when clouds of sin
Hide heaven from out my sight,
Oh! may Thy Spirit breathe within
My soul, and give me light:
That so, when all the clouds are past,
My eyes on heaven may rest at last!

A TINSELLED DEATH-TRAP.

INTERIOR OF AN OPIUM DEN.
(From a Drawing by W. Simpson, R.I.)

"SURELY this is not what you call an opium palace?"

We were on our way one August night to visit some of the notorious opium divans in Shanghai, and, to my surprise, our first halt in the crowded thoroughfares was in front of a low, rough archway, within which some shabby fruit-stalls were spread out. Here, however, our guide led us in; and a few yards beyond the entrance, the passage opened upon a large, square, lofty hall, on each side of which were counters covered with opium-pipes for sale or hire. Very handsome many of these were—large, flute-like objects, in ivory or carved wood.

This large hall was partitioned off from the space around, to which we passed on, and found it was divided into compartments about the size of a square church-pew, each furnished with broad wooden couches on two sides, and between these a low table bearing a small lamp and tea-drinking apparatus. Two men, or sometimes a man and a woman, lay one on each couch, their faces towards the table; most of them were heating, over the lamp, the opium in their pipe-bowls. In all directions attendants were carrying about trays laden with small metal cups filled with opium of the treacle-like consistency used by the smokers.

Every inch of ground, save the narrow passage running between the central hall and the smoking-chambers, was occupied by the latter, and all of these were tenanted. Besides the inmates reclining, men and women visitors were in many instances seated on the couches, some of whom, we were told, were transacting business with the opium-smokers; but this surely could not come to much, judging by the sleepy stupefaction manifestly overtaking the latter, some of whose faces were ghastly from habitual indulgence in this poison-process.

A winding staircase led to an upper storey arranged like the ground-floor, with galleries running round and overlooking the great entrance-hall. Here also all available space was occupied by well-filled smoking-boxes. An official told us there are on an average 1,500 visitors a day at this opium divan—by far the larger proportion between the hours of eight and twelve at night.

Very elaborate, costly, and even artistic were the fittings of the place. Every partition was composed of beautifully carved open-work in dark polished wood, with panes let in of richly coloured or finely graven glass, whereon were depicted birds, flowers, stars, and other devices; while the great hanging lamps in all directions displayed the same rich carving and fine glass, and were decorated with innumerable tassels of brilliant-coloured silk and beads. Yet the whole effect of the scene was squalor; and every attempt at adornment seemed like gay trappings on a corpse. Most incongruous of all were the sweet flowers here and there growing (or surely perishing) in great porcelain vases; while, most painful of all, there were little children among the throng, some sadly crying—one pretty little girl fast asleep, her face resting on a smoker's table.

Visibly the fumes were fulfilling their fell office, and faces growing dreamy, glassy-eyed, idiotic; while the atmosphere of the divan had become so foul, so stifling, we had to retreat, and breathed with keen enjoyment the outer air, which half an hour before had seemed so oppressive that still, sultry summer night. We went into three other opium divans, all exhibiting the same features in the main, though none so showy as that above described, which is said to be the largest and grandest in China. Indeed, the opium-smoking houses of Shanghai (of which there are over two hundred in the foreign settlement, and many in the native city) are of every degree of grandeur and griminess. To-day two were pointed out to me which were mere boarded-in, windowless shanties, through whose narrow doorway we peered into a dark, loathsome, and, alas! thickly peopled den. Great also is the diversity in the quality of opium smoked by various classes. The poorest of the people buy a kind of refuse, of which about 80 cash- (threepence-) worth serves them the twenty-four hours. The rate at which opium-smoking injures health and shortens life depends largely on the victim's means of counteracting its effects by nourishing food; but so notoriously demoralising, as well as stultifying, is this indulgence, that an habitual opium-smoker is rarely employed in any office requiring intelligence and rectitude—or even in the smoking divans.

Deaths, both accidental and suicidal, from overdoses of this drug are frequent. A few days ago I saw in our native hospital a stalwart-looking man just brought in unconscious on a stretcher, who had poisoned himself thus because of some dispute with a relative. The native doctor said he had little hope of saving him, and in a few hours he died.

Strangely different was the scene witnessed in the opium divan from that exhibited in a London gin-palace, with its uproar ever faster and more furious, more wild and frenzied the infatuated guests. Here all grew strangely quieter as the victims subsided into their dreamful slumbers. "After all," remarked the leader of our party, one who has spent forty years in labours of Christian love among this people, "what are the poor Chinamen to do with their evening hours? Home-life, in our sense, has no existence for them; of intellectual resources the mass of the people have none, nor harmless amusements in the way of games." And as to their waste of time, health, substance, in this deadly dissipation, what can be expected of a people ignorant of responsibility towards the Giver of all, and of the eternal considerations, the heavenly hopes, which lend such vast import to the life that now is: when we see hundreds of thousands in our own enlightened lands also, according to God's solemn Word, "dreamers," "defiling the flesh, and walking after their own lusts," and needing no less than these poor heathen the heavenly call, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light"!

"TUNE ST. ELWYN'S."

A STORY IN THREE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

NCE again, children! From the fifth line—'and e'en though long.'"

"And e'en though long and far we roam,
Thy love, O Saviour, is our Home!"

sang the bright young voices, while Miss Tremellen stood before them, erect and animated, her fair face slightly flushed with excitement as she beat time for the little group by rhythmical passes of her white hand through the air.

"It goes well, doesn't it?" she cried, when the last note died away, and turning as she spoke towards a young man who was seated at a small organ at the other end of the class-room.

He started slightly, and raised a pair of dark, thought-filled eyes, with the expression of one suddenly recalled from a dream of far away. "Yes; oh yes—I think it will do," he replied, without enthusiasm; and Pearl Tremellen's radiant face shadowed as she met his look.

"You may go now, dears," she said, addressing the children. "If we practise with as good a spirit from now until the anniversary Sunday, we shall do well. You like the new tune, don't you?"

"Yes, teacher, it 's pretty!" replied several, in a breath. One bright-looking boy adding, "And we like the words too, miss! Father said you must be a real genius to be able to write a hymn like that."

Pearl coloured, and laughed. "We are fortunate in having such an organist as Mr. Adair to set them to music," she said. "A dull tune would have killed it."

"Good-bye, Willie! Good-bye, Kitty! Good-bye!"

And with hand-shakes and kisses Miss Tremellen bade good-night to her little choir.

Ten minutes later, Laurence Adair was escorting her homewards along the undulating cliff path that led from the school-house to the village. He still seemed sad and distrait.

"What are you going to call the new tune?" asked Pearl, in an endeavour to break the strange silence that seemed to be settling down upon them. "It ought to have a name."

"I had not thought of that," answered the young man. "I suppose it should. What do you suggest?"

"I really don't know that I can suggest anything. Unless"—(after a pause)—"how would it do to call it after its birthplace, St. Elwyn's?"

"St. Elwyn's! Yes; that would do well. Nothing better. St. Elwyn's has many pleasant associations for me. I have been very happy here."

The organist spoke slowly, with a brief silence between each sentence. His tone was as that of an allusion to the past, and those wistful, dusky eyes rested unseeing upon the shining wet sands below, that gleamed like a stretch of solid mother-of-pearl as they reflected the faint blue and rainy green, mingled with yellowish pink, of the changeful sunset sky.

Miss Tremellen glanced at him, vaguely troubled. The "have been" smote like a knell upon her ear, yet she could not frame the question which rose to her lips in reply. They were nearing the vicarage, her home.

"Tune 'St. Elwyn's,'" repeated Mr. Adair. "So let it be!"

CHAPTER II.

ST. ELWYN'S was in a state of unusual commotion. The organist, who for two years past had given complete satisfaction to both vicar and congregation, to say nothing of the choir-mistress, the vicar's daughter, had suddenly and mysteriously disappeared. Death or disaster were happily, however, ruled out of the numerous speculations of the villagers, for his valise and most valuable belongings had vanished with him, and the exact sum due to his landlady was found neatly sealed up in an envelope directed to her, upon his bedroom mantelpiece.

Not a trace of the how, the why, or the whither of his flight did the closest scrutiny reveal. And it was the day before his three months' salary was due.

For some occult reason everybody looked to Pearl Tremellen as the person most likely to be able to throw light upon the strange occurrence. It was very trying for her to be forced to say, over and over again, "I really know no more about it than you do. I was not in Mr. Adair's confidence. I am really unable to assign any reason for his very peculiar conduct."

The graceful little head took a somewhat prouder turn as she spoke, and the lines grew a trifle strained about the soft red mouth—that was all. Some responded with an air of sympathy which yet they scarcely dared to show, and a few, not wholly acquainted with the invariable characteristics of a lady and a Christian, even doubted her word.

The days and weeks passed on; the Sunday-school anniversary came and went. Miss Tremellen herself presided at the organ, and the new hymn, with tune "St. Elwyn's," went off with éclat. The evening was intensely hot, and the church unusually full. Owing, no doubt, to these circumstances, combined with unwonted excitement and exertion, she turned faint, and was compelled to leave the building as soon as this special item was concluded.

The weeks accumulated into months, and the months into years. Pearl Tremellen, fair and sweet as of yore, went in and out among all ranks of her father's parishioners; ever busy, ever bright, and loved by old and young alike. It was whispered, however, that although more than one apparently desirable wooer would fain have laid himself and all that he possessed at her feet, a certain something—a dignified reserve, a gentle closing of the inner door of her being towards every "eligible" of the opposite sex—restrained them. To her bosom friends she still could truthfully confess that she had never received "an offer" in her life.

Towards the completion of the third year from that marked by the singular disappearance of the organist, Mr. Tremellen removed from his little seaboard parish to a sphere of greater power and usefulness in one of our large towns. It was a wrench to Pearl to part from sweet St. Elwyn's, from its grand grey cliffs and sheltered coves, its green ravines and sunny yellow sands, and the ever-chiming sea. Still harder was it to say farewell to its friendly faces, its familiar nooks, its sadly dear memories of the past. Yet she accepted the change cheerfully, with a hopeful look forward into the future, for her hand was in the loving clasp of an all-wise Father, and she could not doubt that He held something good for her in store. Her great desire was that the sorrowful world might be something the happier for her sojourn in it, and this wish being known to Him in whose hand lay her destiny, she believed that the present change would probably work for its fulfilment.

The vicar's daughter was soon as well beloved among her new friends as she had been with the old. Mr. Tremellen was compelled, by stress of work, to engage the assistance of a curate, and in the young wife of the latter Pearl found the companion and confidante whom almost every woman craves.

It was on a mild September afternoon that Pearl was sitting near an open window, with dreamy fingers softly touching the keys of her chamber organ, when Mrs. Westmere entered.

"What was that lovely thing you were playing as I came up the garden?" queried the latter eagerly, the moment greetings had been exchanged. "I stood under the window for some minutes listening. I do not remember to have ever heard it before."

"Was it this?" asked Pearl. And again the melodious cadences of her favourite hymn-tune thrilled upon Mrs. Westmere's delighted ear.

"Yes! I never heard anything so sweet. What is it, Pearl?"

The vicar's daughter sought for a few minutes among a pile of loose music at her side, and finally drew forth from the brown wrapper which carefully protected it, a half-sheet of ruled paper, plentifully besprinkled with pen-made dots and strokes.

"Ah, you have it in manuscript! Don't you know where it is published?" said her friend. "'Tune, St. Elwyn's,'" she added in some surprise. "That is where you used to live."

"Yes," answered Pearl quietly, but with a flickering smile.

"Is it original, Pearl? Oh, do tell me!" cried Mrs. Westmere. "And are these the words? and your initials to them!"

So Pearl was obliged to confess that the hymn was her own, and that it had been set to music for the school-children to sing by a friend—a gentleman who was their organist at that time.

After this nothing would do but Mrs. Westmere's Band of Hope choir must learn it for their forthcoming anniversary.

children should learn her hymn, and his tune; and the blessing of God the Giver be upon both!

CHAPTER III.

IT was a wild night towards the end of October; colder than might have been expected so early in the season. The north-east wind, with that suggestion

"'You know the gentleman, do you say, miss?'"—p. 437.

"We are so wanting something new," she said, "and the children will be so delighted. If you will come down on Tuesday evenings and teach it to them, dear, you will know that it is done properly. And it would be such a help to me!"

How could she refuse? She had thought, when first the words of that hymn came, like singing angels, into her own heart, that they were from God, with a mission—of which she might be the humble instrument—to someone or other of the few to whom they should become known. Why shut them up, and stop their course, just to gratify a selfish sentiment, to indulge a foolish shrinking? It must not be. The of remorseless cruelty which distinguishes it from a gale from any other quarter whatsoever, was sweeping through the streets, tearing the few lingering leaves pitilessly from the boughs to which they clung; now hurrying, anon retarding, the steps of such pedestrians as found themselves at its mercy; driving the weak, buffeting the strong, and swirling and flapping the flimsy garments of the shivering poor with, it would almost seem, a sort of spiteful derision.

Among those who appeared least able to stand against its fury was a young man who, with his shabby coat closely buttoned round him, lowered his head, and endeavoured to push forward in the blast, before which he was visibly staggering. At a bend of the road somewhat more sheltered, he paused to rest and take breath, and the gusty gleam of a street-lamp momentarily revealed a face white and sharp, and darkened, rather than lighted, by its large, hollow eyes. After a moment or two he pressed on again, only to be met at the next corner by a dash of icy sleet.

He glanced up and down, hesitating. Across the way, a short distance farther on, the spire of a church stood out clear and black against the stormy sky; the open doors showing a faint light within. "Anywhere—anywhere, out of this wind!" murmured the traveller, and sought the inviting shelter of God's house.

He entered. All was silence and dusk; a door at the farther end of the building having been closed, the light was gone. But all he wanted was to rest. Groping his way to the nearest seat, he sank exhausted on the cushions, and fell asleep.

How long the wanderer remained unconscious, he never knew. Probably, at the utmost, not more than half an hour. When he awoke his senses were bewildered and dazed. Before him, like a luminous picture in a Gothic frame, the wide open doorway of the church-room showed a scene of radiance and beauty within; a dozen bright-faced children grouped round a lovely woman form, while the music that stole out, echoing strangely yet with wondrous sweetness among the pillars of the empty church, seemed to transport him into a previous state of being.

"Tune St. Elwyn's," upborne with the harmony of those clear young voices—the picture of the singing-class with her for its leader, carried the listener back to a scene of long ago, the latest memory of that period of halcyon calm which preceded the long-continued storm that had harassed mind and body ever since. He knew not if he waked or slept; he thought it was a dream. His head was swimming, and he felt faint. The excitement of this marvellous vision was too much for a weakened frame. The concluding words of the hymn:—

> "And e'en though long and far we roam,
> Thy love, O Saviour, is our Home!"

fell upon dulling ears, the music was mingled with surging sounds in his own head, and Laurence Adair swooned away.

"You know the gentleman, do you say, miss?" queried, in scarcely veiled surprise, the verger, who, presently lighting up the sacred edifice for evening service, had discovered the wayfarer's unconscious form.

"I think so," murmured Pearl. "I fancy he was the organist of papa's church at St. Elwyn's. Send for a cab, please, at once, and let him be taken to our house. How ill he looks!"

So it came about that Mr. Adair was nursed beneath the vicarage roof through a long and dangerous sickness which supervened. The fatigue and exposure of a journey of many miles on foot that stormy night was more than a body enfeebled already by illness and privation could bear, and it well-nigh cost him his life. The first conscious words that his lips uttered were the same as had been the last of which his ears took cognisance; they had hovered, angel-like, about his fever-tossed spirit through it all.

"Oh, merciful Saviour!" Pearl heard him whisper. "Take me home, take me home to Thy love. I have wandered long and far; but it has been bleak, and wild, and barren without Thee! Forgive me, and take me home!"

"Why did you leave St. Elwyn's as you did?" the girl asked him, with averted face, a few days later.

"I was unhappy," he replied. "I felt I was under false colours. For I had read sceptical authors of one sort and another till I thought I no longer believed in anything. I had not the courage to confess; I could not live the life of a hypocrite, so I fled."

"But you were none the happier for that?"

"No; thank God, no! Though I had the comfort of feeling that I was no longer deceiving anyone. But the Shepherd sent many sharp-toothed sheep-dogs after the wanderer—poverty, loneliness, disappointment, pain. Yet these alone might have driven me to despair; but, when my heart was broken, the sweet words of your hymn and the precious truth they contained were poured into it like oil and wine. They, as the human vehicle for God's mercy, saved me."

As soon as Mr. Adair was sufficiently recovered to resume work, the vicar's influence was instrumental in procuring him the post of organist at an important church in the neighbourhood. Not very long afterwards Mr. Tremellen also gave him the boon he most desired, a priceless Pearl, to be his loving helper on the upward way.

Some people thought the children's hymn to tune "St. Elwyn's" rather unsuitable for a wedding; but those most concerned would not have exchanged it for the grandest chorus ever penned. At their special request it was sung, and they were satisfied.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

April 21.—The Two Great Commandments.

To read—St. Mark xii. 28—37. Golden Text—St. John i. 11.

I. CHRIST A TEACHER. (28 — 34.) Christ in Temple on Tuesday before His crucifixion, walking in the courts teaching various classes of people. Sadducees been put to silence, now Scribe comes — one of writers and teachers of the Law of Moses. Find from St. Matthew xxii. 34 that he was a Pharisee—wanted to tempt (i.e., test) Christ. Pharisees had added many things to the Law, such as washings, etc. (vii. 3). So want to see which Christ considers of highest importance. What is the answer?

1. First Commandment is Love to God.

Taught to Israelites by Moses. (Deut. vi. 4, 5.)

Taught by God in first four Commandments (Ex. xx. 3, etc.) as follows:—

First Commandment teaches to put God first—i.e., love Him best.

Second Commandment that love to God requires true worship

Third Commandment that love to God will not allow His Name to be dishonoured.

Fourth Commandment that love will give definite part of time to Him, and hallow all days.

This love also requires all man's faculties—

(a) Heart, seat of the will and choice.

(b) Mind, seat of the intellect.

(c) Soul, seat of the affections.

(d) Strength, i.e., the whole man—body, soul, and spirit.

Examples:—(a) Joshua chose to serve and love God. (Josh. xxiv. 15.)

(b) Saul loved when convinced Jesus was Christ. (Acts ix. 6.)

(c) Woman out of love anointed Christ. (St. Luke vii. 47.)

2. Second Commandment is Love to Neighbour, i.e., all men.

This love shown by observing last six Commandments:—

Fifth teaches respect to those above us.

Sixth teaches kindness to all.

Seventh teaches purity in conduct.

Eighth teaches honesty in deed

Ninth teaches truth in word.

Tenth teaches regard for rights of property, etc.

Result of this teaching to the Scribe was—

(a) Understanding—saw how well Christ had answered—saw spiritual nature of God's requirements. Love seen in the life better than formal outward observance.

(b) Conviction—was very near becoming a disciple.

Lessons. 1. Love to God the first thing needful. Is it so with us?

2. Love to Man. Is this seen in our lives?

II. Christ the Son of David. (35—37.) Now Christ questions His questioners.

Christ is the Son (i.e., descendant) of David.

But David calls Him Lord. (Ps. cx. 1.)

How can He be both Son and Lord?

Why could they not answer?

Because thought Christ was only coming to be an earthly king.

Could not understand His spiritual Kingdom.

He was as man descended from David, and yet was David's Lord as being also God.

Notice the contrast. His own received Him not. (Golden Text.)

The common people heard Him gladly.

Lesson. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven.

Alternative Lesson for Easter Sunday, April 21.

To read—St. Luke xxiv. 1—12. Golden Text—St. John xi. 25.

I. Resurrection Facts. Our Lord buried evening of Good Friday, hastily embalmed by Joseph of Arimathæa, watched by Roman soldiers, lay at rest all Saturday. Then came Easter Day. Notice the order of the events:—

1. Christ rose at early dawn. (Ver. 1.)

2. Women of Galilee go to tomb to finish embalming Christ.

Find tomb open and Christ gone.

3. Two angels appear to them and tell them He is risen.

4. Mary Magdalene goes to tell Peter and John,

5. Peter and John go to the sepulchre, which they find empty. (St. John xx. 3.)

6. Appearances of Christ:—

(1) To Mary Magdalene on her return to the grave. (St. Mark xvi. 9—11.)

(2) To Simon Peter or Cephas. (1 Cor. xv. 5.)

(3) To ten apostles. (St. John xx. 19.)

(4) To eleven apostles. (St. John xx. 24.)

(5) To nine apostles at Galilee. (St. John xxi. 1.)

(6) To 500 in Galilee. (1 Cor. xv. 6.)

(7) To 120 disciples at the Ascension. (Acts i. 9.)

(8) To St. Paul in a vision. (Acts ix. 5.)

II. Resurrection Lessons:—

1. Christ's conquest—

(a) Over death, for it could not hold Him. (Acts ii. 24.)

(b) Over Hades (or hell), for His body did not see corruption. (Acts ii. 31.)

(c) Over Satan, king of death and hell.

2. Christ's Resurrection affects us now.

(a) Believe in a living Saviour. (St. John xx. 19.)

(b) Share His resurrection, new life. (Col. iii. 1.)
